that botflies would take your skin and bloodworms settle inside the cords and bands that laced your belly, your church of folded hands.

But all in good time, Trinket!
Was it something you understood?
Full of false pride you lay down and died in the sun,
all silken on one side,
all mud on the other one.

MAXINE KUMIN

("Mrs. Stratton of Oak Knoll," "Pat Collins" and "Andrea"), sustain that reputation, but one other impression emerges. His characters are so adroitly and firmly established in their various environments that one soon becomes aware of how very little maneuverability (i.e., freedom) they really possess. One always suspected that Julian English did not have to throw that highball in Harry Reilly's face in Appointment in Samarra, even if Julian's suicide seemed to be the culmination of an inexorable process. The import of these stories is to suggest that the highball episode, trivial as it appears, was inevitable in O'Hara's view of things, that it too was simply a step in an unintelligible, and therefore wholly implacable, process.

The working out of that process involves O'Hara's notions about society and the subtle laws which govern it. In "Over the River and Through the Wood," O'Hara sees a young woman's revulsion at an old man's casual gesture at amiability to be the end for which the man's whole life has prepared him. In "Mary and Norma," sisters-in-law discuss the dull, trapped lives into which their marriages and extramarital affairs have led them, and one declares about men: "I hate them. It isn't only them hating us. But what are you gonna do?" In Gibbsville, where propriety, class postures or religious scruples order relations among people, gentility and violence are often indistinguishable. In "The Manager" a man begins to hemorrhage in a hotel dining room, but when he rushes to the men's room and collapses, his wife cannot bring herself to follow him there. People in O'Hara's stories are the victims of their milieu, even when they embrace and cultivate that milieu; their manners are merely the symbols of their bondage.

While he was writing his first novel, O'Hara read Somerset Maugham's version of the Samarra legend and knew that he had found the title for his book. The legend, O'Hara said later, is "thousands of years old; Maugham happened to put it gracefully, and his way of putting it fitted nicely into the inevitability of Julian English's death." The retrospective view afforded by this collection suggests that that early note of fatalism is a current which runs through his best stories. Fatality for the O'Hara generation works itself out in terms of country-club membership committees, the Evening Bulletin, 1929, Players Club ties, the AEF, stingers, Victrolas, the Catholic conscience, Penn Station, influenza, Bambalina, and Pierce-Arrow families. The choices his characters make are seldom choices at all; they are only steps. O'Hara's characters often project the illusion of action freely taken, but their respective societies are so close-grained that options either do not exist or are beyond their imagination.

Often enough, O'Hara has delighted in the ridiculousness of existence. He is fond of recounting, without the least embellishment, the struggles toward status of the Gibbsville WASPs and their less successful but equally motivated Irish auxiliary. Hollywood and New York likewise offer him inexhaustible opportunities for social commentary, but that side of O'Hara is subordinate for the most part in these stories. There is a "recurrent imagination" in O'Hara, Lionel Trilling once noted, that brings him very close to the author of The Trial, for it amounts to an almost metaphysical fear in his view of society. In this collection of stories it is that curious, apprehensive imagination which prevails.

Nation Book Marks

BRING ME TO THE BANQUETING HOUSE. By Sol Biderman. The Viking Press. 284 pp. $5.95.

A first novel about a Denver boy being brought up in the Jewish Foundling House.

OR WE'LL ALL HANG SEPARATELY: The Highlander Idea. By Thomas Bledsoe. Beacon Press. 266 pp. $7.50.

Records the achievements of the Highlander Folk School and its founder, Myles Horton. Highlander, founded in 1933 as an adult education center, has trained union leaders and, more recently, civil rights workers in its dedication to a progressive, egalitarian South.

THE VIETNAM SONGBOOK. Compiled and edited by Barbara Dane and Irwin Silber. Guardian. Distributed by Monthly Review Press. 224 pp. $3.95 paper.

An international anthology of more than 100 songs of anti-war protest.

AGAINST THE CRIME OF SILENCE: Proceedings of the Russell International War Crimes Tribunal. Edited by John Duffett. O'Hare Books. 688 pp. $8.50. Paper $5.75.

A compendium of the proceedings and testimony offered in the War Crimes Tribunal which Bertrand Russell initiated to investigate the role of the United States in Vietnam.

THE CHINESE VIEW OF THEIR PLACE IN THE WORLD. By C. P. FitzGerald. Oxford University Press. 82 pp. $1.25 paper.

A monograph analyzing the history of China's foreign relations and that country's current view of its international position.

PEOPLE AND PLANS: Essays on Urban Problems and Solutions. By Herbert J. Gans. Basic Books. 385 pp. $10.

The author, a city planner and sociologist, critically examines current practices in planning and urban renewal which take too little account of people's goals, behavior and needs.

THE RIGHT TIME. By Harry Golden. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 450 pp. $6.95.

Autobiographical memoirs of a varied and productive life: an Orthodox Jewish boyhood on New York's lower East Side, the twenty-five-year history of the Carolina Israelite, his outspoken participation in the struggle for civil rights.

THE IMMORTALIST: An Approach to the Engineering of Man's Divinity. By Alan Harrington. Random House. 324 pp. $6.95.

"The Immortalist thesis is that the time has come for man to get rid of the intimidating gods in his own head, to grow up out of his cosmic inferiority complex, bring his disguised desire for eternal life into the open and go after what he wants, the only state he will settle for—that is, divinity." Alan Harrington, the author of two novels and an analysis of the mores of American corporations, provides an argument for the possibility, indeed the

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

necessity, of achieving human immortality.

VIETNAM VIEWPOINTS: A Handbook for Concerned Citizens. Compiled by Margret Hofmann. Published by the author, 610 Cardinal Lane, Austin, Tex. 78704. 186 pp. $1.50 paper.

A compilation of public statements by Congressmen, officials, reporters and commentators about the indecency and futility of the war.

THE DARK SIDE OF THE HOUSE. By Yale David Koskoff and Richard Goldhurst. Dial Press. 218 pp. $5.95.

The account of the life of Millard Wright, a burglar facing life imprisonment as a habitual criminal, who requested that Dr. Koskoff perform a lobotomy on him. A provocative look at the strained relationships between medical science and criminal justice.

JASPER JOHNS. By Max Kozloff. Harry N. Abrams. 50 pp. and illustrations. $25.

The first full-length study of the Abstract Expressionist painter who reinstated elements of objective realism. Written by the former art critic of The Nation, the volume contains 143 illustrations, including 41 hand-tipped color plates.

THE MONEYMAKERS: The Great Big New Rich in America. By Kenneth Lamott. Little, Brown & Co. 328 pp. $6.50.

A study of the new tycoons: how and why they amassed such fortunes, their life-styles, their influence on American society. The book alternates its exposition with a portrait gallery of such notables as Jean Paul Getty, H. L. Hunt, Joseph Kennedy, Joseph H. Hirshhorn and Howard Hughes.

POVERTY: AMERICA'S ENDURING PARADOX. By Sidney Lens. Thomas Y. Crowell. 341 pp. $8.95.

Describes the "endless capacity of poverty for reincarnation" in this, "the wealthiest society of all time." As a history of the changing but never-ending faces of national poverty and of the succession of anti-poverty movements, the book stands as a companion volume to the author's Radicalism in America.

MASTERPIECES OF HEBREW LITERATURE. Edited by Curt Leviant. KTAV Publishing House. 571 pp. $8.95.

The first anthology in English to attempt an in-depth presentation of Hebrew literature, covering a range of 2,000 years, from the Apocrypha to the 18th century.

THE MEXICANS IN AMERICA: A Students' Guide to Localized History. By Carey McWilliams. Teachers College Press. 32 pp. 75c paper.

A pamphlet by the editor of The Nation detailing the history of Mexican immigration to the United States, the social problems, and the new political awareness of our third largest ethnic minority.

AMERICA THE RAPED. By Gene Marine. Simon & Schuster. 312 pp. $5.95.

Subtitled "The Engineering Mentality and the Devastation of a Continent," this study is an indictment of the spoilage of the American landscape and its people in the interests of technological "progress." "We need not merely a sense of responsibility toward the land and the rivers and the trees, but a whole way of thinking constantly in environmental terms . . . that embraces cities as well as mountains."

ROAD TO RUIN. By A. Q. Mowbray. J. B. Lippincott Co. 240 pp. $5.95.

Disclosures about the Congressional boondoggles and lobby interests that have accounted for the obsessive construction of federal highways over the face of America, displacing people and desecrating parklands.

EINSTEIN ON PEACE. Edited by Otto Nathan and Heinz Norden. Schocken Books. 720 pp. $10. Paper $2.95.

A collection of Einstein's writings on war and peace from 1914 to 1955, including his correspondence with Freud on aggression and war. The book contains a Preface by Bertrand Russell.

THE MUSIC OF SURVIVAL: A Biography of a Poem by William Carlos Williams. By Sherman Paul. University of Illinois Press. 141 pp. $5.95.

The book traces the genesis and meaning of W. C. Williams' "The Desert Music" to illuminate the poem, the poet and the creative process.

A NIGHT FOR RIOTING. By Allen Planz. The Swallow Press. 53 pp. $4.

A volume of poems by The Nation's poetry editor.

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY. Edited by Alan Reitman. W. W. Norton & Co. 248 pp. $6.95.

A collection of essays by members of the ACLU on right of privacy, church-state relations, labor union democracy, censorship, civil rights, academic freedom, police power and the impact of the cold war.

MASS COMMUNICATIONS AND AMERICAN EMPIRE. By Herbert I. Schiller. Augustus M. Kelley. 170 pp. $9.

An analysis of electronic communications as an element in America's expanding influence in global affairs.

THE YOUNGEST REVOLUTION: A Personal Report on Cuba. By Elizabeth Sutherland. The Dial Press. 277 pp. $5.95.

A first-hand report on Cuba and the effects of revolution on its people by a former literary editor of The Nation. Extensive photographs by Leroy Lucas.

THE CHOICES. By Norman Thomas. Ives Washburn. 85 pp. $3.50.

Completed just before his death, the book contains discussions of Socialist economics, racial fraternity, civil liberties and the way to peace. Norman Thomas was an associate editor of The Nation (1921-22).

VIOLENT MEN. By Hans H. Toch. Aldine Publishing Co. 268 pp. $7.50.

A social-psychological study of the violent-prone personality, relying heavily on peer interviews. The author is a member of the President's Violence Commission.

LOOK TO THE NORTH STAR. By Victor Ullman. Beacon Press. 337 pp. $7.50.

The Buxton community in western Ontario was a haven for runaway slaves before the Civil War. Founded in 1848 by William King, a Presbyterian minister, it continued after the war to become a stable economic and political force in the area, setting up factories, a forceful voting bloc, and the first integrated public school in North America. Buxton has provided a leading example of the achievement of full emancipation for black people, before and after the Civil War.

CONTROVERSIAL CONVERSATIONS WITH CATHOLICS. By Edward Wakin. Pflaum Press. 211 pp. $5.95.

The author has interviewed sixteen clergymen and laymen to give a well-rounded view of "how American Catholicism is confronting change in its contemporary setting and where it is heading."

ART/Lawrence Alloway

Surrealism as an alternative to the formal tradition of Cubism, erotics as the latest iconographical news, and realism as "illusion without convention" are the themes of three exhibitions in New York. The shows are minor, but the symptoms are real and can be anticipated in other shows this season. All have to do with a general curiosity about the alternatives to abstract art. They do not represent an attack on abstract art but a resistance to the extent to which it has monopolized critical attention.

"Young and Fantastic" is an exhibition of English painters in a rather seedy cul-de-sac on the ninth floor of Macy's (you should note the floor if you intend to go; the information counters, called "service" in the store, don't know about the show). The artists are new in the United States and new in themselves, born for the most part between 1937 and 1943. England doesn't lack for young artists—it is the older ones that are hard to find—and here is another generation of talent. Mario Amayo, who chose the show for the Institute of Contemporary Arts, London, suggests as common denominator "the spirit of Surrealism . . . screened through a Pop sensibility."

This seems about right, inasmuch as the artists who use mass media or popular culture sources do so with symbolic overtones and undertows. Christopher Finch in Image as Language (a new Penguin book) says of one of the artists, Colin Self, that "no overt moral is drawn, but the fact is stated" in his work. That seems precisely wrong: it is not the detachment of Pop art that characterizes Self's work but a tendency, seen here in other British artists, to dissolve fact into topical symbols or personal fantasy. The influence of Jim Dine's juicy plasticity on Self's drawings of settees, or of Rosenquist on Brendan Neiland (even to the point that one of his paintings of reflections is called "Green Fender") are pretty much what is meant by Post Pop art. (The phrase was coined a couple of years ago, and refers to the development of the realistic potential of Pop art rather than of its schematic sign properties.)

The styles of the artists in Amayo's group range from a soft version of Viennese Fantastic Realism (Charles Beauchamp, Richard Humphry), through René Magritte turned into Science Fiction (clouds by Bob Evans painted in a room to look like rampant spores), and abstract illusionism turned figurative (Glynn Williams' witty double take in which Art Déco motifs are loaded onto shaped canvases derived from Richard Smith). The best of the group at present is certainly Clive Barker whose chrome-plated objects—grenades, a newspaper (legible), a bucket of raindrops—have a severe presence which gets dissipated in the symbols and nuanced fantasy of the other artists.

You can go to "Orgy 1969," arranged by the United States of Erotica, Inc., by appointment (call 212 369-4701), but it's only a mixed art show in an apartment. I went expecting graphics of the kind that Screw and such journals use as filler, but that wasn't it. Much erotic art of the 16th to 18th centuries closely resembles the public fine art of the period, but with the fig leaf removed from the males and the adhesive drapery unstuck from the women. Thus a muted but persistent memory of sexual specifics adds resonance to the conventional poses of nymphs and satyrs, the Venuses and the Marses. It is a version of this back-up art that you get at "Orgy 1969."

However, this show is the mimicking underside of the Washington Square Open Air Art Show, not of royal mythologies. It is largely amateur art with new anatomical coordinates. Instead of Swan Lake ballerinas, it's Leda and the aroused bird; instead of knees-together poses for White Rock maidens, it's legs akimbo every time. Washington Square-type art has its visionary and cosmic flashes, of course, and so does "Orgy": the result is like Zap Comix's ithyphallicism grafted onto Maxfield Parrish.

A number of recent exhibitions have treated realism, not as a revival but as a present problem: "Realism Now" (Vassar College Art Gallery, 1968), "Aspects of a New Realism" (Milwaukee Art Center, 1969), and "The Impure Image" (arranged by David Antin at the Art Gallery of the University of California at San Diego, 1969). A mixed show called "Direct Representation" opened the season at the Fischbach Gallery with a catalogue text by Scott Burton that is brief and contradictory. He argues that the five painters in the show are committed not merely to "figuration, but . . . to unmitigated illusion." This unreal separation, as if illusion were not generated by images of identifiable things, enables him to discuss realist pictures as if they were abstract. He uses a traditional formalist language to talk about space, neglecting iconography as thoroughly as any Clement Greenberg follower.

Burton allows that "all art is of course conventional," but states that what he calls "directly representational painting aspires to a conventionlessness, and a styleless transparency." He states in one place that DR painting "does not at all eliminate or make obsolete other varieties of painting," and in another place that it is "the only major mode now available to painting adequate for the expression of the fullest individuality." Apart from the fact that we now have a conventionless mode, this is the wrong way to write about realism. The present fragmentary state of opinion about realism badly needs a synoptic view, but Burton would reduce realist criticism to the primitive either-or, right-wrong stance of much criticism of abstract art. Realism, like abstract art, is an option, not an imperative. Maybe David Antin's awaited text on "The Impure Image" will put realist aesthetics on a more secure basis without recourse to absolutism.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

Waterford, Conn.

When I first heard, several years ago, that something called the Eugene O'Neill Memorial Theatre Foundation was sponsoring something called a National Playwrights' Conference, my reaction was somewhat guarded. Yet another program for the care and feeding of young playwrights? And just what purpose was to be served by carting a bunch of playwrights off to some kind of summer camp in Connecticut? On the other hand, the theatre needs all the halfway decent playwrights it can get; and maybe what the playwrights need is a chance to go off into the country somewhere with a group of actors and directors and work the kinks out of their scripts in a context where success pressures are kept at a minimum.

And in fact the idea seems to be working out pretty well. There has been a Playwrights' Conference every summer since 1965 at the foundation's big white mansion overlooking Long Island Sound; no geniuses have been unearthed so far, but the conference has been a factor in the careers of a number of young playwrights who have lately won reputations for themselves: Leonard Melfi, Paul Foster, John Guare, Israel Horovitz, Ron Cowen, Frank Gagliano, Lanford Wilson and others. This is a heterogeneous group; the foundation authorities have been at pains not to confine their beneficence to any particular kind of playwright. And nowadays the foundation also sponsors a number of activities besides the Playwrights' Conference, including the National Theatre of the Deaf, which has won golden opinions in this country and abroad, and programs for the training of drama critics, high school drama teachers and deaf theatre personnel.

This year the foundation has branched out in a new direction by sponsoring the American debut of the Theatre Workshop of Trinidad. The Trinidadians took part in the regular activities of this summer's Playwrights' Conference; in addition, they presented several public performances of Dream on Monkey Mountain, a play by their founder, director and playwright in chief, Derek Walcott.

Mr. Walcott is black, and so are the members of his company; his play deals, in highly metaphorical terms, with the situation of the West Indian Negro, caught between British "civilization" and a deep sense of identification with Africa. The dreamer on Monkey Mountain is a drunken old charcoal burner who imagines himself King of Africa. After a series of phantasmagorial scenes, he is enthroned amidst his black wives and warriors, and ritually executes a symbolic white girl. This scene appears to owe a great deal to Genet's The Blacks, which is also in the company's repertory; it is interesting that a black writer should borrow from a white writer the terms in which to talk about blackness.

Although he has spent ten years creating and leading his company, Mr. Walcott is not, I think, primarily a man of the theatre. His poetry, which he began publishing at the age of 19, is much admired by such judges as Robert Graves and Elizabeth Hardwick, and Dream on Monkey Mountain has the worst fault to which plays by poets (even plays by good poets) are prone: it is not successfully designed to be apprehended in the theatre. Symbols are thick on the ground: among the characters listed in the program are "Basil, a cabinetmaker, figure of Death," and "The Apparition, the moon, the muse, the white Goddess." The dialogue is full of elaborate imagery: "Make a white mist in the mind and make the mist to hang like the dress of a woman, on prickles, on branches, and make it rise like the breath of the dead on Resurrection morning." That passage seems to me rather splendid as I read it over, and I have no rooted objections to cabinetmakers who are figures of death. But all this paraphernalia does not function well dramatically; the play is murky and slow, encumbered by the very distinction of its style, choked in its own luxuriance. Nor does the production make up for the deficiencies of the script.

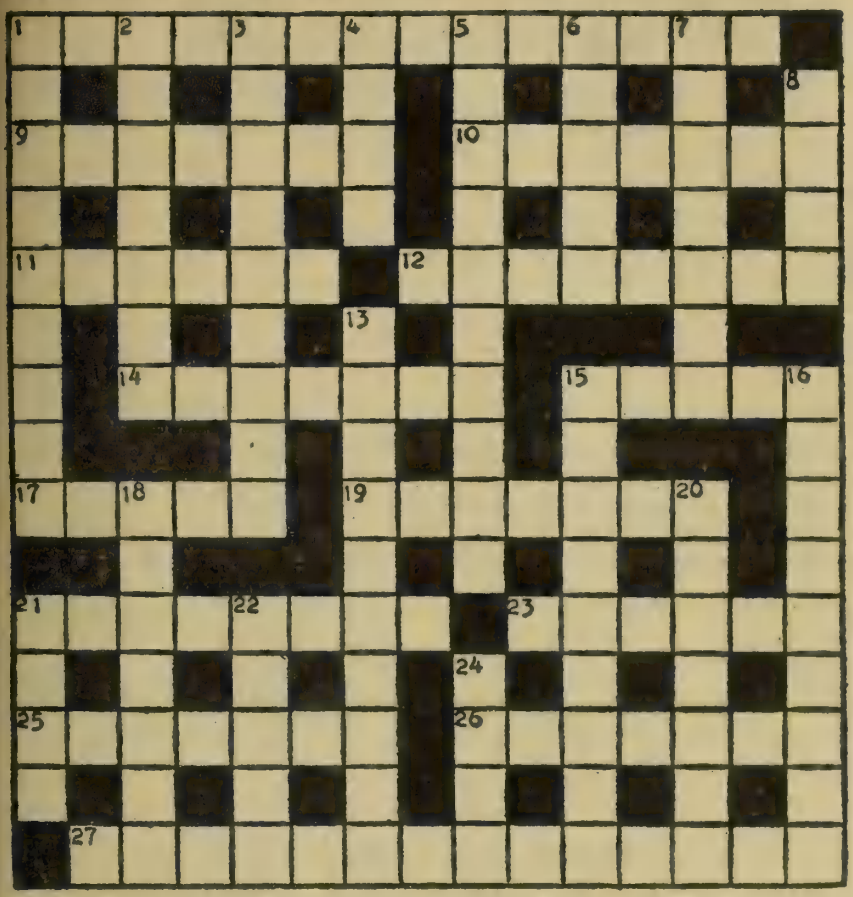
I don't mean to suggest that the Theatre Workshop of Trinidad is without promise (even in an American context; what it means to Trinidadians is another question). Mr. Walcott is far from being a nonentity; and, given time and training, it is not impossible that his company, now still nonprofessional, will satisfy the hopes that have been invested in it. But that brings us to the great general difficulty in writing about the O'Neill Foundation: its final justification is not the work that the participants in its activities do while they are in residence at Waterford but the work they do afterward. This is true to a considerable extent in regard to the Trinidadians, and even more true of the conference playwrights in general.

The conference functions both as a laboratory and as a market place. Not only does the playwright get a chance to work on his play in concert with a director, some actors and even an advisory critic (several are attached to the conference, and the playwright is assigned one of them); a number of producers have been known to come up to Waterford to see what's going on, and participation at the conference has led directly to several productions in New York. At last year's conference, I was given to understand, the temptations of the market place had gotten out of hand; productions had become very elaborate, and the conference had become tense with just those pressures from which it was supposed to be a refuge.

This year efforts were made to relax the atmosphere, and to allow the laboratory aspect to predominate. Except for Monkey Mountain, a special case, all the plays at this year's conference were given in staged readings rather than as full productions; all the actors carried their scripts, as a constant reminder that the aim was not to turn out a finished production for the audience but to help the playwright work on his play. As usual, the public was allowed to buy tickets if it liked, but, except in the case of Monkey Mountain, it was explicitly told that it was to watch a work-in-progress.

Even so, it makes sense to ask a couple of questions about the conference in general: are the actors and directors good enough to be of real assistance to the playwrights, and do those playwrights appear to be worth assisting? As far as I could see in a short stay, the standard of performance was high; even with script in hand a good actor is a good actor. There were plenty of those around: established professionals like Caroline Coates, Peggy Pope, James Ray, Stephen Strimpell and others. As to the quality, actual or potential, of the playwrights, I heard expressions of discontent from several people at the conference, and during my weekend at Waterford I did see some stuff that seemed to me scarcely worth bothering about. But I also saw a quite remarkably funny play entitled The Disintegration of James Cherry, about a nice young man to whom the most ingeniously awful things keep happening. The dialogue is strange and quietly wonderful: "If the stickleback catches you, the stickleback will kill you. There's a stickleback loose somewhere in the afternoon." Jeff Wanshel, the author of The Disintegration of James Cherry, is 21 years old, and I think, to put it mildly, that he and his stuff are well worth bothering about.

Perhaps, however, the conference is valuable most of all as a conference—"a meeting," as my dictionary puts it, "for consultation and discussion." The place swarms with playwrights, actors, directors, critics and miscellaneous others, consulting and discussing with great spontaneity and vivacity, and a high degree of cogency as well. Two playwrights, two critics and a director are standing around on the beach. "I don't know which is the id and which is the ego," says one of the playwrights, with reference to some play, or playwright or theatrical phenomenon. "Modern times has confused those polarities, hasn't it?" replies a critic cheerfully. On the beach!



And, for a change, the critics and those they criticize can meet one another as colleagues, not adversaries. Furthermore, just as the playwrights are a heterogeneous lot, so are the others. One of the highlights of my visit to the conference was the chance to have lunch on the grass with Elizabeth Hardwick, the most articulate American spokesman for the idea that the drama is a form of literature that has fallen into bad company by frequenting the theatre. Had I arrived a few weeks earlier, I might have had lunch instead with Richard Schechner, who maintains that the primacy of literature in our theatre is an oppressive and by no means irremediable peculiarity of Western culture. No one can say conclusively what has resulted, and what will result, from the success this conference has had in putting widely various kinds of theatre people in touch with one another; but I suspect that this may turn out to be its most valuable contribution.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1315

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 The natural thing in the way of curriculum content. (6,2,6)
9 Modern music not paid for ahead of time? There's something fishy! (4,3)
10 Go back over and soak a group of people. (7)
11 They might suggest Southern Comfort, but they're really different drinks. (6)
12 Boring ratio? Cringe in confusion! (8)
14 Put down quotation marks under something. (7)
15 Set to catch one? (5)
17 White like a Wyandotte, for instance? (7)
19 They could put themselves right on the line in this country. (7)
21 One can get on the average a very loud indication in wax. (8)
23 Fancy an ice cream cone containing blue! (6)
25 Plain cakes are usually so seen. (7)
26 Forestall before the opening? (7)
27 Thick and thin does as a cliché for what the golfer does. (7,7)

DOWN

1 Hip joint possibly? (9)
2 and 21 down Titillated? Stick with it! (One is so happy!) (7,4)
3 The peak of March? (2,7)
4 You might find quarrelsome types at this. (4)
5 Well done, perhaps, but not eaten on the premises. (7,3)
6 Make the speech complete? (5)
7 His wail is heard in Africa. (7)
8 Inquire if it's about right for the ice? (7)
13 It's not exactly so weird now, but it might be associated with mullions. (4,6)
15 It takes someone like Roosevelt to carry a favorite for the younger generation. (5,4)
16 Only indifferent net results, but might be called for on the field. (4,5)
18 The sorry state of Cleveland is about to tell on the playwright's character. (7)
20 The lines of a poet and roué, possibly. (7)
21 See 2 down.
22 What's the point of convergence? (5)
24 What might be given up in land projection? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1314

ACROSS: 1 Blow-hard; 5 Spices; 10 Cheer; 11 Padlocked; 12 Amateur; 13 Counsel; 14 Misses; 15 Shearer; 18 Angevin; 21 Cheats; 24 Candles; 26 Initial; 27 Tarpaulin; 29 and 28 Clean-shaven; 30 and 7 Birthday cakes. DOWN: 1 Buccal; 2 Overawing; 3 Harkens; 4 Reports; 6 Procure; 8 Saddlers; 9 Educes; 16 Retrieved; 17 Narcotic; 19 Villain; 20 Nestle; 21 Chianti; 22 Epithet; 23 Plenty; 25 Nurse.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box [illegible] NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

CONTESTS. Send stamped addressed envelope for Rules of New Testament Prize Contest to Box 37, Huguenot, N.Y. 12746

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

PROTESTANT VISIONS OF THE VIRGIN MARY. 500 pages. Unique. Historic. Entrancing. Desparately needs a non-subsidy publisher. Write or wire: B. Wm. Palmer, 15 S. Second St., Haines City, Fla. 33844

"THE BELLS AREN'T RINGING"!—Are you going to sit still and let the New York Telephone Co. (A.T.&T., that is) overrate itself at your expense? Learn the facts and how a few consumers shook up the P.S.C. and the New York Telephone Co. by sending 50c for a 16 page booklet to: M. J. Herman, 134 East 60 Street, New York City 10022

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS IN THE NATION

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

It's fall again . . .

The students are back on campus and the Establishment is holding its breath. Black people are continuing to organize all over the country. Congress is preparing for new battles on arms expenditures. Women are raising the issue of their exploitation and oppression. Riots have been occurring in the armed forces. Even George Meany is battling the Administration.

Who can keep up with it all? You can — by reading The NATION. The NATION provides thoughtful commentary on the significant trends and events of our time.

Subscribe now. A new one-year subscription will entitle you to four bonus issues. So use the coupon below and subscribe to The NATION today.

BONUS OFFER: If you join us for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me four bonus issues at no additional charge.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $5. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 10-6

FILM FESTIVAL HAROLD CLURMAN

THE NATION

OCTOBER 13, 1969 35 cents

S-7OR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY.
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
OCT 13 1969
LIBRARY

Commission on Violence
THE RHETORIC OF EVASION
RICHARD DRINNON

By Road & Rail
Explosions en Route
SANDY MORRISON

Japan 1970
Year of Upheaval
JEFFREY P. FREED

San Francisco Police
Black vs. White in the Station House
ROBERT A. JONES

Frank J. Donner / The Trial of Dr. Spock
C. P. FitzGerald / China and Vietnam

LETTERS

democracy in Greece

New York City

DEAR SIRS: In the last two years you have published a number of fine articles and editorials about Greece, and this is something that few American publications have done. An example is the article "Greece: A Chance for Democracy" by W. G. Forrest, as well as your editorial "NATO's Missing Link" [both Sept. 22].

Allow me, however, to observe that the editorial considers Greece a "missing link," because of the purges that took place in the armed forces. It seems to me that the morale of the people is also of importance. I don't think that the average soldier would fight only to preserve the junta, even if the officers had not been purged.

Mr. Forrest's article, despite its many valid points, makes some astonishing statements. He says . . . that Greece had been all this time poor and underdeveloped. This is not so. In the 1860s industrialization had advanced quite a bit, but then retrogressed with the policies of the Danish King George I and the spreading of colonialist policies of the big Western powers throughout the Balkans, the Near East and Africa.

A most serious error is that there was no democracy in Greece before the Metaxas dictatorship (1936) or that of Papadopoulos (1967). True, there was an imperfect democracy, which needed profound reforms. But . . . the truth of the matter is that in the 140 years of Greece's independence the country has enjoyed more parliamentary democracy than most countries of Europe, including such countries as France, Germany, Italy, to say nothing of Eastern Europe and the Middle East.

Also, I found galling the completely unfounded allegation that Greek politicians were corrupt. After two and a half years of monotonous repetition of charges of corruption by the junta, no scandals have been uncovered, even against the most ardent opponents of the military. Where is the corruption?

Spyridon Granitsas

bon voyage

Pacific Grove, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Agonizing over Vietnam, Nixon, the military-industrial complex, racism, and all such matters, is irrelevant and academic. The fact is that the basic ecosystems and biological cycles of this planet have already been irremediably distorted and poisoned, and that within some twenty to forty years only a few tough human mutants will be around.

The atmosphere is dying, losing its oxygen; the waters are already so full of pesticides that the organisms at the top of the food chain are vanishing; the earth is pervaded with radioactive wastes and CBW discards. In short, we've had it, so let's enjoy the time that's left. When you book passage on the Titanic, why go steerage?

Arthur Porges

Reagan's razor

Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: While I disagree with several points made by Ross Y. Koen in "Higher Learning in California: The Education of Ronald Reagan" [The Nation, Sept. 29], on the whole I found it to be a well-documented study of the Governor's manipulation of California higher education for his political benefit.

I think it is important to remember that the Governor's

(Continued on page 381)

EDITORIALS

The Wrong Place To Cut

"What a Bedlamite is man," Thomas Jefferson sighed. Intensely research-minded though he was, long before the term acquired its modern meaning, what would he say if he could see funds for biological and medical research being slashed while billions are poured into weapons of mass destruction? Happily, total insanity in politics is almost as rare as total sanity, and Rep. Richard D. McCarthy has injected his customary note of reason by publishing in the Congressional Record (September 16) some of the protests against the 20 per cent cuts in biological and medical research grants proposed by the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

The protests have not been muted. On September 9, the American Chemical Society and the New York Academy of Sciences held meetings to bring this threat to research in the life sciences and medical technology to public attention. Dr. Philip Handler, the new president of the National Academy of Sciences and himself a biologist, said at the ACS meeting that the proposed cuts would bring "panic" to many research institutes. He warned that denying funds to young scientists and doctors is "selling our future short." Dr. Handler is not one to cry without reason. He was supported by Dr. George Wald, who received the Nobel Prize for his work in the chemistry of vision. Dr. Wald reiterated his appeals to scientists to cease working on "the technology of death and destruction" and the Pentagon's "chemical chamber of horrors"—napalm, chemical and biological weapons, defoliants and herbicides. According to The Washington Post (September 11), most of the predominantly middle-aged audience rose and applauded him wildly.

At the New York Academy of Sciences meeting, Dr. Albert Szent-Györgyi, who received the Nobel Prize in medicine for his discovery of Vitamin C, likewise blamed huge military spending and military control over the economy for the plight of basic research, not only in the life sciences and medicine but in the physical sciences generally. A physician and the director of the Institute for Muscle Research at Woods Hole, Mass., Szent-Györgyi would like to do cancer research. Since the research cuts have been put into effect the NIH no longer supports his project, but National Science Foundation grants enable him, as he puts it, to work with his two hands. Unfortunately, that is not how cancer research is done, and Szent-Györgyi must regretfully refuse the applications of young scientists who want to work with him and who might turn up something significant. Obviously, barring the way to young men and women who wish to start careers in the physical, biological or medical fields is ruinous. There are signs, in fact, that the United States is slipping from its leading position in the life sciences and will continue to lose ground as long as it gives priority to killing rather than healing.

A parallel piece of folly is the reported intention of the National Cancer Institute to kill 380 monkeys because of a shortage of funds. These are not ordinary laboratory animals. Five years ago, in infancy, they were inoculated with tissue from human cancers suspected of being caused by viruses. They are now to be killed before the results of the experiment can be known. Since it costs $3 a day to support one of these animals, more than $2 million has already been invested. But then, who gets what in budget allocation depends more on interest-group pressures than on good sense, and the most powerful pressure group is the military-industrial complex.

In the case of the grants for young scientists, the protests appear to be having some effect. Science (September 19) reports that NIH has reduced its projected cuts from the 20 to the 5 to 10 per cent range. This is contingent, however, and the entire situation is in flux. The partial restoration (which is by no means assured) has been made possible by the Nixon Administration's decision to treat the Medicare and Medicaid programs separately, thus relieving some of the pressure on research appropriations. Inflation, caused in large part by military spending, is also a factor; it is blamed specifically for the proposed closing of nineteen of the ninety-three clinical research centers—miniature hospitals affiliated with medical schools and research-oriented hospitals, and financed by NIH. Whatever its form, the budgetary pressure on both current and future medical study comes from the continued drain by military hardware, research and manpower. Unless the misnamed "defense" budget can be drastically reduced, funding of medical and biological research will remain precarious.

Willy Brandt Looks Ahead

Bonn

In the sixth national election since the West German Federal Republic was founded twenty years ago, Chancellor Kurt Kiesinger's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) won a narrow victory of 46.1 per cent over the 42.7 of Foreign Minister Willy Brandt's Social Democrats (SPD). But as of this writing, Mr. Brandt appears to be negotiating a successful alliance with the small Free Democratic Party (FDP), the battered remnant of the old Liberal Party, whose 5.8 per cent of the votes would give the coalition control of the Bundestag, permit the Foreign Minister to form a government and throw the Christian Democrats into the opposition for the first time since 1949, when Konrad Adenauer led them to victory and what has come to look like permanent rule.

Close to 87 per cent of the 38.6 million registered voters turned out at the polls on September 28—a figure that must break the record for Western Europe—and the election was satisfactory in other ways. Most conspicuously, Adolf von Thadden's ultra-rightist National Democratic Party drew only 4.3 per cent of the votes and will be banished from Parliament under a rule that excludes any party falling below 5 per cent. The National Democrats remain a provincial aberration. Further, if Brandt manages to form a government, it will attempt to thaw out the Central European political glacier. This implies no radical change in West German policy, and believers in coexistence should not become overexcited by the prospect.

IN THIS ISSUE

October 13, 1969

EDITORIALS

362

ARTICLES

368 San Francisco Police: Black vs. White in the Station House — Robert A. Jones

370 Commission on Violence: The Rhetoric of Evasion — Richard Drinnon

374 Japan 1970: Year of Upheaval — Jeffrey P. Freed

379 By Road and Rail: Explosions en Route — Sandy Morrison

BOOKS & THE ARTS

382 Forget About the First Amendment — Frank J. Donner

383 Campus ROTC (poem) — Philip Legler

384 East Asian Backgrounds — C. P. FitzGerald

384 Elegy for Ike Eisenhower (poem) — John Ridland

386 Thrashing With Doom — L. Alan Goldstein

387 Book Marks — Sara Blackburn

388 Music — David Hamilton

388 October (poem) — John Unterecker

389 Film Festival — Harold Clurman

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR. | Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS | Associate Editor PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH | Literary Editor BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 12

Brandt and his presumptive Foreign Minister, Free Democratic Party leader Walter Scheel, differ from the CDU only in the warmth with which they approach the subject. All three parties remain throttled by the Adenauer principle that only a general European peace treaty can solve the border, refugee and restitution problems. It takes two to make a bargain, and at present the Communist approach is to skirt the issue of a peace treaty and press for some umbrella formula of accord based on its proposed European Security Conference.

Leaving aside such foreign-policy imponderables, the poll tabulations make interesting reading for the future of West Germany. For the first time, the SPD broke through the magic 40 per cent barrier, the party registering gains almost everywhere except in a few strongly Catholic-Conservative areas of lower Bavaria. Significantly, its gains came less from its traditional working-class base than from segments where the party has not previously been particularly successful. They include both Catholic and middle-class voter groups, and early analyses indicate that the swing in these key blocs was at the expense of the CDU. Kiesinger's party did well in Protestant areas, picking up from the FDP (whose percentage dropped from 9.5 to the perilously narrow 5.8, which is nevertheless now so important to Willy Brandt) enough votes to compensate for the inroads made by the SPD. Overall, the elections showed a continuing trend toward a two-party system.

German voters receive two ballots: on one they vote directly for candidates to the Bundestag; on the other they pick a party slate, by states, and Bundestag seats are then allotted to the contending parties by proportional representation. For the first time, the SPD won more direct mandates than did the CDU and its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Democrats. This should encourage advocates of electoral reform in the SPD who, like members of the CDU, would prefer direct Parliamentary election.

The gains of the SPD are the fruit of the party's struggle for respectability. Ten years ago, it formally abandoned Marxism and set out to win the support of the bourgeoisie. In 1966, it entered a governing coalition with the CDU, and has since shown its ability on the ministerial level. The CDU, on the other hand, conducted an unenterprising campaign, confirming popular feeling that after twenty years in office it had gone stale and had nothing new or progressive to offer. Kiesinger, clinging hard to Adenauer's mantle, harped on cold-war problems. It was probably a mistake: like the menace of Red China, the cold war has become a bore to the public, which in any case knows itself helpless to deal with confrontations at the atomic level of the superpowers.

JOE ALEX MORRIS, JR.

Ramming Through the SST

No one with the slightest knowledge of the aerospace branch of the military-industrial complex, and of President Nixon's basic economic stance, could have doubted that he would approve further development of the supersonic transport. His attitude toward opponents of the SST is essentially the same as his attitude toward critics of the Vietnamese War. To the latter he said bluntly that under no circumstances whatever would he be affected by their opposition. Toward the SST critics he is less arrogant, but their arguments might as well be voiced in a vacuum. As one headline puts it, the "controversial project moves inexorably ahead."

Whence comes this foreordination? The Russian TU-144 and the British-French Concorde have already made test flights, the latter, briefly, at supersonic speeds. Thus, if only for reasons of prestige, we must have a bigger and faster SST—the only meaningful question, according to the President, being whether "the people of the world will be flying in American supersonic transports or in the transports of other nations." But if the SST is a commercially sound venture, then why does the aerospace industry refuse to contribute more than 10 per cent of the development cost, forcing the taxpayers to risk billions on a dubious venture?

The truth is that in the Presidency Mr. Nixon is what he has always been—the guardian of the profits of big business. Boeing's prosperity takes precedence over mass transport on the ground, medical research, and all the other unfilled needs with which the country is plagued. The National Institutes of Health closes down clinical research centers that would cost $6.5 million a year, while $1.2 billion in government funds has already been disbursed or committed for the SST, with no one able to forecast the ultimate cost.

Finally, if the priorities are to be limited to aviation, would it not make more sense to put larger amounts into airport radar, anti-collision devices, rapid transit facilities between cities and airports (which will also serve local public transportation needs) and similar necessities, rather than into aircraft that have only special-interest appeal, and much of that specious?

The Conspiracy in Chicago

The real conspiracy in Chicago is not the one with which the government has charged the eight defendants, but its own action in securing their indictment. The decision of Attorney General John Mitchell to seek the indictments (his predecessor, Ramsey Clark, had no enthusiasm for the project) might be regarded as the "overt" act. The intent of the government's "conspiracy" was to discourage opposition to the war in Vietnam. A glance at the backgrounds of the defendants makes evident the intention to indict persons who represent principal elements of the anti-war movement: David Dellinger (old Left, pacifist); Rennie Davis (New Left); Tom Hayden (radical-revolutionary); Bobby Seale (Black Panthers); Abbie Hoffman (hippies); Jerry Rubin (Yippies); John R. Froines, assistant professor of chemistry at the University of Oregon, and Lee Weiner, doctoral candidate in sociology at Northwestern University (campus intellectuals).

Despite the clear motive of the prosecution, the public at first showed little interest in the trial. In fact, only a day or so before Judge Julius Hoffman ordered the summary arrest of four young defense lawyers, Rennie Davis had complained that demonstrations in aid of the defense had been disappointing. "We somehow have to tell the country what this trial is about so that people will know." He need worry no longer; Judge Hoffman's bizarre conduct on the bench has made obvious what the prosecution is about.

Three of the four young lawyers had been retained for the limited purpose of preparing pretrial motions—a practice not uncommon in political trials. The fourth was originally supposed to be a member of the trial team, but withdrew to work on the defense of twenty-one Black Panthers in New York. Judge Hoffman tried to justify the arrests on the ground that the four had no right to withdraw by telegram. But they were not in Chicago—they live elsewhere—and they had the permission of their clients to withdraw. More to the point, Judge Hoffman tried to use their arrests as a way to force the defendants to proceed without their chief trial counsel, Charles Garry, who was about to undergo a gall bladder operation in San Francisco. Judge Hoffman denies that he made the dropping of charges against the four lawyers conditional on the defendants' assertion that they were content to go to trial with the counsel immediately available, but his intention is evident from the record. When he realized that his action had aroused a storm of protest —from thirteen members of the faculty of the Harvard Law School, from civil liberties organizations, and from a group of 150 lawyers resident in all parts of the country, who hurried to Chicago to express their sense of outrage—he vacated the contempt proceedings.

By then the damage had been done and he should have declared a mistrial. Now this unhappy prosecution, which should never have been initiated, will drag on for months; but it will probably have the effect of breathing new life into the anti-war movement which it was supposed to arrest. Judge Hoffman will see to that.

Operation Showboat

During the 1968 campaign, Richard M. Nixon referred scathingly to President Johnson's habit of making a big splurge with one innovation after another—"showboating" Mr. Nixon called it. He had a case, but now his Administration is engaging in the same practice, only splashier. Mr. Johnson's ingenuity never hit on anything as foolish, or as violative of good order and the rights of law-abiding citizens, as the current federal drive to prevent the import of marijuana from Mexico. Nothing like it has been seen since Prohibition; actually, in some respects, this saturnalia in the guise of law enforcement is more invasive of common decency than anything Prohibition ever spawned.

Billed as "the biggest smuggling crackdown in history," "Operation Intercept" is the result of seven months of planning by Attorney General Mitchell and his deputy, Richard Kleindienst. It involves a veritable mobilization of federal agencies and the use of aircraft (both fixed-wing and helicopter), patrol boats, radar, esoteric instruments such as people-sniffers and marijuana-sniffers and, above all, the full weight of the government's publicity apparatus. It began on September 21 with a media-shaking bang, and is proceeding crash by crash; it takes no prescience to forecast that it will end with a whimper.

The locations where the drive is most arrogant in the application of federal power are at the border crossings between Mexico and the United States. Normally, at the sixteen customs gates between Tijuana, Mexico, and San Ysidro, Calif., below San Diego, the border guards pass the cars through with a glance at the occupants and a wave of the hand. On September 21, a Sunday, the crackdown began at 2:30 in the afternoon, just before the peak of Sunday shoppers, weekend tourists and bullfight and Caliente race track crowds began re-entering the United States. All cars were halted for a search of the interior, the engine compartment, trunk and, with the aid of long-handled mirrors, the underside of the chassis. On a hit-or-miss basis, or for reasons known only to the men who manned the gates, many cars were shunted aside for more intensive searches of up to half an hour. Very soon, cars were backed up into the Tijuana streets and then for 3.5 miles to the race track. Delays of four hours and more were reported. Women's handbags and children's lunch boxes, teddy bears and the like were searched. Some women were required to unbutton blouses; men were forced to take off jackets and vests and loosen clothing.

The temperature was very high and cars began to overheat. Many had to be pushed through the gates for tow-car service on the American side. Tempers grew short and there were fist fights among drivers. At intervals, hundreds of drivers blew their horns in concerted indignation. These scenes, duplicated at other major border crossings, disrupted normal intercourse between adjacent towns in the United States and Mexico. There were outcries from chambers of commerce, shopkeepers and hotel men, and one diplomatic incident when the Mexican consul general in El Paso was pulled from his car and "violently" searched. The Mexican Embassy sent a note of protest.

The fruits of this operation, in the form of drugs seized, were unimpressive, but the discovery of such contraband was not the main purpose. The objective, according to Mr. Kleindienst, is to deter smugglers, so that the price of marijuana will rise and an estimated 30 million young Americans will be obliged to forsake the weed for lack of funds. At least the more impecunious of them will undergo a money cure. Some, of course, may turn to heroin or other addictive, dangerous drugs. If the price of heroin is also jacked up, the addicts will have to steal more to get their daily fix. (The notion that drug addicts mug and rob people appears to be fallacious; mostly they steal, because they are too uncoordinated for crimes of violence.) It is more likely, according to Southern California authorities, that African hashish, cheaper and more potent than Mexican marijuana, will take over most of the market.

The Nixon Administration's primary motive in these theatricals appears to be to put on a big splurge for the edification of lovers of law and order, those who detest college students, and that far from inconsiderable number whose political attitudes are largely determined by fears and hostilities. The Administration, up to its ears in problems which are insoluble by its quack techniques, is ever on the lookout for diversionary melodrama. From this viewpoint, Operation Intercept is a beauty. Actually, it is aimed less at the smugglers than at the Mexican authorities, who are to be blackmailed into getting tough with marijuana growers and dealers on their side of the border. The probable degree of success may be gauged from the history of Prohibition.

The most absurd part of the whole performance is that there is no authoritative information on the harmfulness of marijuana, or on what measures may be justified to curb its use. Rep. Edward I. Koch has introduced a bill, H.R. 10019, closely paralleling Sen. Frank E. Moss's S.2590, to establish a Presidential Commission on Marijuana. The purpose would be to conduct a multi-disciplinary, authoritative study of the legal, social and medical ramifications of marijuana use and to provide a basis for intelligent discussion and legislative action. Often the appointment of a commission adds little to public enlightenment, but in this case confusion is so widespread, and the opportunities for political charlatanry so great, that such a step seems eminently desirable.

The Green Beret Scandal

When Mendel Rivers announced in the House of Representatives that the Army's murder case against eight men of the Special Forces (Green Berets) had been dropped, some members rose and cheered. They might better have wept. No doubt the damage to the Army, the Green Berets and the Central Intelligence Agency was less than if military justice had been allowed to take its course, but all three came out with grievous injury to their reputations, already considerably debased by the inherent vice of the Vietnamese War.

The Green Berets' image has been tarnished, although the returning officers will no doubt be greeted as heroes in John Wayne quarters. However irrelevant considerations of morality in war may be in the eyes of the Green Beret officer corps and many civilians, some Americans retain the quaint notion that there is a difference between killing in combat and in gangster fashion. Indeed, Secretary of the Army Stanley R. Resor, in announcing the conclusion of the proceedings, reiterated that "the acts which were charged, but not proved, represent a fundamental violation of Army regulations, orders and principles." His wording could be construed as implying that such violations had in fact occurred but that the manner and circumstances precluded a successful prosecution.

In the issue of September 8 The Nation said editorially that it was most unlikely that any of the Green Berets would be court-martialed or, if tried, that they could be convicted. The crucial question was why, assuming they were guilty as charged, they should be punished for the murder of an obscure South Vietnamese alleged to be a double agent. Why this sudden squeamishness? To be sure, a case could be made out against the accused on the basis of the Nuremberg principle of individual responsibility, but in organizations like the Green Berets this is hardly more applicable than it was in the Nazi SS.

The background for the scandal seems to be that the CIA, the Green Berets and the Army headquarters in Vietnam have been at one another's throats. Once the charge of murder was in the open, the CIA even took the unprecedented step of trying to exculpate itself by holding a press conference at which it presented its side of the story, naturally on a no-ascription basis. Accusations and counter-accusations flew all over the place, presenting a picture of the participants which belied the traditional patriotic portrait of the military as honest, disciplined guardians of the national security.

As just one sidelight, William Beecher wrote in The New York Times (September 28) that on June 21 Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, commander of all American forces in Vietnam, was in touch with Col. Robert B. Rheault, commander of the Green Berets in the area where the alleged double agent disappeared. The General asked for a status report on the case and reportedly was told that the man was on a dangerous mission, when supposedly he had been killed the day previously. Beecher continues, "Why he [Colonel Rheault] said that remains a mystery to this day." Still without the protective "it is alleged," "it is said," etc., Beecher writes that Sgt. Alvin L. Smith, Jr., told his story of the killing to the CIA a few days later (in other accounts Smith is said to have been in fear of his life at the hands of his comrades in the Green Berets) "causing, among other things, General Abrams to become furious at being lied to and to order a no-holds-barred investigation."

The lawyers for the accused then proceeded to try the case in the newspapers and in Congress, and the scandal mounted. After first denying, for two days, that the President had approved the decision of the director of the CIA not to permit its personnel to testify—because of "national security" of course—the White House finally admitted that Mr. Nixon had endorsed, if indeed he had not ordered, the CIA refusal. The affair thus takes its place as an inglorious episode in an inglorious war.

Prop for the Warfare State

It is evident from the President's proposals to Congress that he has no intention of correcting the two basic evils of the draft system. The lottery and the induction of 19-year-olds first would isolate those affected by the draft, and Mr. Nixon hopes this would reduce dissent. But men will continue to kill and die against their wills in a war they despise, and Congress will still be unable to control manpower levels. Until Congress regains the purse and until the draft is ended, there will be no progress toward restoring the powers of war and peace to the people.

Unfortunately many liberals have been taken in by the attempt to make a thoroughly unjust system more efficient. Senators Kennedy and Javits have offered the Congress similar bills, which assume that it is somehow fairer to take first those who cannot even vote. Why not follow Dr. Ralph Abernathy's suggestion that the 65-year-old decision makers lead the parade? Those who urge the reforms often infer that some kind of draft should be maintained in order to keep anti-war pressure high and avoid a professional army. They overlook the fact that the draft may have angered thousands of middle-class parents, but it has effectively militarized millions of young conscipts and their families, both by propaganda in training and by the old reaction of vested interest. It is expressed as, "We cannot have served (died) in vain," or "If I had to go, then everyone must go."

Outright repeal of the draft is now necessary because of the seriousness of our present crisis. Few liberals are able to face the fact that the problems causing dissent are so deep that only two solutions seem likely. Either we will retain compulsion in institutions like the draft, go on feeding an economy which, despite patchwork poverty programs, enriches the rich and penalizes the poor—and then arm to the teeth for a final blood bath—or we will recognise the decay of the nation-state, end compulsion, lower military commitment, put heavy controls on the military and the bureaucracy, increase citizen participation, redistribute wealth, and prepare for a shift to new political institutions of supranational and subnational forms. The draft is a basic prop for the illegitimate warfare state. To reform it or temporarily suspend it will only prolong its negative effect on our whole society.

The war and the draft are rightly at the center of an unparalleled protest movement that shakes our nation.

Political Amnesia

A neglected aspect of the American electorate's penchant for "instant remedies"—and its disdain of remedies that do not work miracles on the second—is its chronic forgetfulness. What it once knew, it soon forgets. Consider, for example, the current spate of criticism about the extraordinary confusion over intelligence operations in Vietnam, which no doubt reflects a similar confusion in other areas. A survey made by The New York Times (October 1) yielded "a general picture of an elaborate, often inefficient intelligence community." What has been forgotten is that the Central Intelligence Agency was set up in the first instance as the sovereign remedy for precisely the condition that by all accounts continues to exist and may actually have become worse since the CIA was established. And what happened to those numerous pronouncements that, at long last, the super-spy agency would be closely and thoroughly supervised by Congress? Actually the "forgetfulness factor" should not be charged directly or solely to the electorate; it reflects a failure of political leadership. No one in Congress has raised the issue that the CIA has failed to end confusion, duplication and conflict in the nation's intelligence community. Cloaked in mystery, a law unto itself, America's super-dagger agency has failed in its basic job.

That Memorial

The dead have no need of memorials; like funerals, memorials are for the living. A memorial reminds us that greatness implicit in human nature has become explicit in an individual, and so affects the lives of millions. Martin Luther King was an individual of this rare and indispensable type; a memorial to him is fitting and indeed necessary, unless it has become true that man lives by bread alone.

But apparently the Nixon Administration does not see it that way. At first, Mr. Nixon was enthusiastic about Coretta King's idea of creating a Freedom Memorial Park in the downtown Atlanta area that contains Dr. King's birthplace, his grave, and the Ebenezer Baptist Church where he preached. It would have been odd if Mr. Nixon had not responded warmly, for the proposed memorial offered him an opportunity to make a start, at least, toward overcoming the distrust in which, as he has admitted, the majority of Negroes hold him. He was so taken with the idea that he sent Robert H. Finch, his Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, to see Mrs. King. It is safe to assume that Mr. Finch was genuinely in favor of the project, then and later.

But it all came to naught. Leonard Garment, designated by Mr. Nixon to negotiate with the memorial foundation, turned out to be, if not the "killer of the dream," at least the conveyor of the bad news. The foundation wanted White House sponsorship of a bill to provide for acquisition of a site and construction of a building. On August 1 Mr. Garment wrote that the President was not prepared to support such legislation. Coupled with this turn-down there was a vague offer of help if the foundation sought private money.

By now Mr. Nixon's "Southern strategy" for 1970 and 1972 has become well defined. John N. Mitchell, his 1968 campaign manager, now Attorney General and the strong man of the Administration, is reportedly prepared to write off Negroes, Jews and Establishment liberals—in fact, the entire Northeast, if necessary—and concentrate on the South, West and Midwest for votes. And it is easy to see that white Southern votes are not going to be garnered with a King memorial in Atlanta.

Interviewed by Henry Raymont of The New York Times, Mr. Garment said that the memorial proposal posed a number of technical, legal and financial problems. Asked if political problems were not also involved, he replied, "Well, they're all sort of tied together."

It is a waste of time to discuss any Nixon action or inaction except in political terms; all else is irrelevant. Evidently Mr. Nixon weighed the alternatives and decided he had more to lose than to gain. The King memorial proposal will proceed, but it is revealing that even in a matter of this sort Mr. Nixon put politics first.

A Lack of Fitness

Judge Haynsworth has now "run the gantlet" (editorial of September 1) and, thanks largely to Senators Bayh and Hart, his nomination has received the close scrutiny it deserved. Disclosures at the hearings make it clear that, judging from his actions on and off the bench, Judge Haynsworth does not measure up to the standards of excellence and distinction which the Senate and the people have a right to expect of nominees to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court is not just another court; it is the nation's highest tribunal. That a nominee may have served for a decade or more on an intermediate federal court without provoking much in the way of audible protest does not mean he is qualified to serve on the Supreme Court. Whatever may be said about—and for—Judge Haynsworth, it is now evident that he is not of Supreme Court caliber.

Black vs. White in the Station House

ROBERT A. JONES
Mr. Jones is on the editorial staff of the San Francisco Bay Guardian.

San Francisco

This summer at a meeting of the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, the head of the city's Police Officers Association (POA) silently handed a booklet to each supervisor. It was titled The Black Book. In its introduction Jake W. Ehrlich, chief counsel for the POA, charged that a rival black association, the Officers for Justice (OFJ), was racist and contributing to the "destruction of law and order." The 18 pages of "documentation" in the booklet would prove his charge, Ehrlich said.

The occasion for The Black Book was a referendum which the OFJ had submitted to the Board of Supervisors, and which the board had placed on the fall ballot. If approved it will grant time and a half for overtime and a night differential to all policemen and firemen, elevate the Police Community Relations Unit (PCR) to a bureau (on an organizational par with, say, Missing Persons or Homicide), promote the head of the new bureau to a director of the department, and reform promotion procedures.

The referendum thus would increase the wages of every policeman and fireman in the city (who are already the highest paid in the nation), while at the same time it strengthened the department's efforts to reach the disenfranchised. The final two sections of the referendum—the elevation of the PCR and the restructuring of police promotions—have been tried and found successful in other large cities.

Yet, several days after the referendum was put on the ballot, Ehrlich announced the POA's "unalterable opposition." The proposal, he said, was a "political hoax" and would cost the city too much money. Neither charge makes sense. The intent of the referendum is direct and simple; there is little room for hoax. And though the proposal would certainly cost the city money, the supervisors unanimously agreed that it would be well spent, as a boost to both a new recruiting drive and to the morale of the existing force. On the surface, the POA's opposition makes as much sense as if Walter Reuther were to fight a pay hike at General Motors.

However, fitted into the racism of the San Francisco Police Department, and especially of the POA leadership, it makes too much sense. Of all the nascent black police officer associations across the country, San Francisco's Officers for Justice is probably the most militant and certainly the most political. By sponsoring the referendum, the OFJ has made a play for a wide base of support and, simultaneously, caught the POA with its apathy showing. Even though similar proposals had been suggested by civic leaders, the POA never bothered to submit a referendum addressed to the critical needs of the next few years. So the Officers for Justice stole the initiative. The leaders of the older, white association reacted as expected, even though by doing so they worked against the welfare of every policeman on the force. When asked what the OFJ planned to do with the POA's refusal to support the referendum, one of the black leaders said simply, "We're going to make fools of them."

The Officers for Justice was organized in early 1969 after a group of black officers, charged with an off-duty offense, was refused legal aid by the POA. The POA claimed it did not have the authority to defend off-duty charges. Yet several months later it threw its influence, and the services of Ehrlich himself, behind Michael O'Brien, a white policeman who was accused of having shot and killed a black man while off duty. O'Brien was acquitted.

By the end of O'Brien's trial, the OFJ was functioning. The nucleus of the association was a group in the Community Relations Unit that had worked for years—sometimes openly and sometimes covertly—against the POA. In January 1969, after Mayor Joseph Alioto's Tactical Squad had clubbed and arrested hundreds at San Francisco State College over a three-month period, three members of the OFJ held a press conference on the campus. Advising students and faculty to carry cameras and note pads to document any questionable police behavior, they promised to bring such information before the complaint department of the police and the Community Relations Unit. One officer announced: "We deplore the carnival glee of police departments within a hundred miles of San Francisco who now beg to have their policemen permitted to get 'riot training' experience on the heads of SF State students."

The reaction was prompt. Word drifted down from the Mayor's office that two of the most outspoken officers at the press conference—Palmer Jackson and Richard Hongisto—were to be transferred out of the PCR on the charge of "un-officerlike conduct." "So I picked up the phone," Hongisto remembers, "and called the Mayor's office and let them know that they were fools if they thought the Mayor and the POA could rip us out just like they would have fifteen years ago."

Instead of retreating into a defense of their first press conference, the group attacked. Jackson explained: "We knew that our strength was in the community, not in the police department. So we didn't play politics with Alioto and the POA. We went to the people." The next OFJ statement read: "It was inevitable that the Police Officers Association would pressure Alioto to move against Jackson and Hongisto. Most of the recent prosecution of white San Francisco cops for maiming and killing citizens has come out of the efforts of the Community Relations Unit. Both Jackson and Hongisto, along with others, have spent off-duty hours helping to gather evidence against cops who have 'abused the badge and the gun.'"

For several weeks the OFJ kept it up. They released figures showing that only 4.5 per cent of the Police Department was black (the figure still holds), and that of those, three were assistant inspectors (detectives), one a sergeant, and none was higher.

"In silence, gentlemen, in silence, we have carried the double burden of Black officers and Black men," another statement read. "What redress do we have when confronted with the spectacle of Black brothers and sisters being mistreated? The days of fronting the grinning darky to appease the Black community are dead."

A few days later, Jackson and Hongisto learned that the charges had been dropped.

But as Rodney Williams, head of the Community Relations Unit and a member of the OFJ, pointed out, racism is not the only issue the OFJ faces. "Remember, the name of the organization is the Officers for Justice, not the Afro-American Police Officers Association or something like that. More than anything, we want a police department that is honest, professional and compassionate."

Because of the OFJ's emphasis on professionalism, the POA has become an increasingly vulnerable target. The stagnation—if not the incompetence—of Harry Bell and John Lahane, leaders of the POA, is plain to all young officers, whether black or white. Elective positions within the police association are almost always filled as the result of friendship cliques that take many years to develop, and the leaders have seen to it that police promotions lean heavily toward senior members of the force.

The present weight given seniority on promotion examinations is three times that recommended by most police authorities, notably by O. W. Wilson, dean of the University of California's School of Criminology, in his Municipal Police Administration. Young whites, as well as blacks, are excluded from advancement commensurate with their ability, and the police administration is filled with veterans whose police mentality was formed in the 1940s.

But perhaps nothing makes cynics of young officers more quickly than the equanimity with which police crime is regarded by the POA. A young white officer, discussing with me the seniority system, casually added: "And, of course, it was a long time before the old officers accepted me enough to steal in front of me." Shocked by his nonchalance, I asked him to describe how officers steal.

"Well, I don't know about other cities, but in San Francisco it's mostly done in patrol cars. Two officers will break into a store that's in their patrol area. They take the loot out, put it in the trunk, drive to a private car and transfer the stuff. Then they return to the scene and make out a burglary report."

Almost nothing is done about such theft, for several reasons. First, Thomas Cahill, the police chief, will retire soon and wants, above everything, to avoid a riot in his city or a scandal in his department. Then, everyone who knows of the crime usually gets a cut. Finally, the POA at least tacitly accepts police theft as a police fringe benefit.

In the same offhand way, the young officer added: "Right now there's an organized burglary ring operating out of the Hall of Justice. About nine guys are involved, I think, and I've heard they're selling color TV sets for $50 apiece in the basement. Cahill is trying to cover it up before the press gets hold of it."

The story was so fantastic that I dismissed it as rumor, but the next day the San Francisco Chronicle ran a front-page article headlined, "SF Probe of Alleged Cop Theft Ring." The Chronicle said that Cahill had assigned three captains to investigate the "rumor" that a burglary ring was operating out of the Hall of Justice. When I phoned the young officer, he commented: "Did you notice that Cahill assigned the three dumbest captains on the whole force to investigate?"

It is noted with irony in the department that Community Relations, the unit that has received least support from Cahill and the POA, has become nationally famous for its professionalism and work with the city's minority groups. Dante Andreotti, whose leadership helped create the reputation of the unit, left the department when Cahill persistently refused to support the work of the PCR. [See "The Friendly Fuzz" by Alvin A. Rosenfeld, The Nation, April 21.] After Andreotti's departure, a series of white administrators failed to win the support of the men in the unit or the communities they served.

Though deprived of effective leadership, these men have maintained their alliances with the city's minorities. In June, working with the OFJ (many officers were members of both groups) they helped secure the appointment of Rodney Williams, the first black officer to head the PCR. Williams has been a member of the OFJ since its beginning. This appointment was a signal to the POA that the black movement had come of age in the San Francisco Police Department.

Racism in the department has moved a long way from the rubber hose in a back room, but its present sophistication does not mean its disappearance. It does mean that those who would fight racism have a much harder time finding their targets. Hongisto, the only white member of the OFJ, explained: "It's the way the white guys look at the black guys, like they know why the black guys are there. It's where you get assigned and who'll help you if you get in trouble. It's just a reflection of the way the outside works, only worse."

The size of membership is a problem for the OFJ. There are only eighty black officers in the whole department, and if every one of them is a member of the OFJ (it will not disclose membership figures) the group is still numerically very weak. The POA has more than 1,700 members. Judging the relative strength by membership is deceptive in this instance. The apathy of the POA reduces its strength. Fewer than 100 officers came to the September 16 meeting, when the POA decided to oppose the referendum. Conversely, an OFJ member must be active almost by definition. Nevertheless, the Officers for Justice must attract a membership that is not based on race alone if it hopes to erode the POA's hold on police politics.

The proposed referendum may help. Palmer Jackson, vice president of the OFJ, has pointed out that the real strength of the OFJ comes from community support, not from department politics, and the referendum perfectly fits that situation. The POA must now present its case to the public, and there the black association has already proved itself more adept.

The POA must also try to neutralize the support which the referendum is receiving from a unanimous Board of Supervisors, the Mayor, the department's administration, the city's newspapers and, perhaps most important, the rank and file of policemen and firemen who are naturally inclined to back a measure that will increase their pay checks.

If the referendum does pass, it will not signal that the battle has been won but only that it has begun. The POA's revenues and traditional influence guarantee that it will continue for many years to represent most police officers in the city. The Officers for Justice do not expect that they will severely eclipse that influence. Although they will accept any police officer as a member, no white policeman—except Hongisto, who was one of the founders—has applied.

The OFJ does hope that by winning the referendum it will gain a position strong enough to alter the policy and performance of the police. Rodney Williams was explicit: "For instance, a black kid was shot a month ago after he jumped out of a stolen car. There was no reasonable excuse for the shooting, but it often happens: some kid goes joy-riding, gets scared when the cops chase him, and runs. He winds up dead, and usually he's black. Now, why couldn't Cahill order that car theft suspects not be fired on? If there was a black deputy chief, or even one who cared about blacks, then a no-shoot order could be suggested at the highest level. As it is, all we can do is sit and hope."

If the POA has its way, that is all that men like Williams will ever do. Chief counsel Ehrlich will not say how he plans to defeat the referendum ("As general, I can't commit my troops until all the facts are in. George Washington and Napoleon learned that"), but the POA can afford to spend many thousands of dollars on the campaign.

Sitting in his office, festooned with intertwining American and Confederate flags, Ehrlich denied that racism was behind the POA's intent. But when questioned about some of the charges of the Officers for Justice, Ehrlich motioned to Harry Bell, head of the POA: "Get him The Black Book." Bell hustled off. Ehrlich handed me the book when Bell returned. "Here, this'll show you who the real racists are."

San Francisco, for all its renown as a progressive city, has yet to support real reform in its Police and Fire Departments; and Mayor Alioto, who is reading the conservative winds in politics very carefully, may not push the referendum. Within the Police Department the bitterness is growing. "It's as if the department woke up one day this year and found out the world was coming apart along a black and white seam," remarked a member of the OFJ, "and the department was going with it. Only it was happening faster here because it had to catch up. And no one can say that things have improved, but neither can they say things will ever be the same."

More than anything, the POA fears change. Harry Bell and Jake Ehrlich know that their association will last out this test, but they are old men clinging to ideas and attitudes whose time has passed. Whether or not the POA wins this one, everyone will know there has been a fight, and that another is coming soon.

COMMISSION ON VIOLENCE

THE RHETORIC OF EVASION

RICHARD DRINNON
Mr. Drinnon is a professor of history at Bucknell University. He is the author of a biography of Emma Goldman.

[The U.S. Government is] the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today. Martin Luther King, Jr.

So let us, for God's sake, resolve to live under the law. Lyndon Baines Johnson

Violence in America is now out in the open—in the streets, so to speak, and in the libraries, offices, conference and hearing rooms. Violence finally exists for the simple reason that it can no longer be denied. But once recognized, it must be immediately reconcealed, rendered politically irrelevant, like an earthquake or a hurricane. After all, one of the traditional claims of the national state is that it provides security to its subjects. More important, the recognition of significant internal violence would call into question all the current myths that legitimize official violence. Seen in this light, Chief Justice Warren headed up our first national commission on violence; his task was to restore the feeling of security shattered by President Kennedy's assassination. This was accomplished by establishing the pretty truth that the ugly event had no meaning: Oswald was a nut. After the assassination of Robert Kennedy, Mr. Johnson followed what had become standard operating procedure: he quickly announced the appointment of "a commission of most distinguished Americans to immediately examine this tragic phenomenon." Milton Eisenhower took up where Warren left off, Eric Hoffer replaced Gerald Ford as the solitary man of letters on the commission, and a new team took over.

Though the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence has pretensions, as its name suggests, which go beyond those of any of the recent spate of investigations, it is in origin and operation a political body moving into politically contested areas.* The study team on San Francisco State, for example, having found "instances of police overreaction," then discovered that these details had been omitted from the final version of their report. James Brann, one of the researchers, told newsmen the deletion "appalls and saddens me." The special report on "Shoot Out in Cleveland" carefully lists the names of black nationalists and omits those of the police who were obviously involved in acts of violence. Why? Both reports contain conclusions at variance with data introduced in preceding pages. Why? Any meaningful answer to these questions awaits a careful, independent study of the inner workings of the commission and its relationships with its advisory panel, executive staff, directors of research, task forces, study teams, consultants. Evidence already available, however, suggests the kind of political infighting associated with, say, the McClellan subcommittee's inquiry into "college violence."

*Thus far the commission has issued a Progress Report to the President, as well as statements on Campus Disorders, Firearms, and Violence in TV Entertainment; five Investiga-

But an understanding of the commission's politics must be sought, in the main, at a much more subtle, sophisticated level. "For purposes of commencing our study," the commission noted, "we have defined 'violence' simply as the threat or use of force that results, or is intended to result, in the injury or forcible restraint or intimidation of persons, or the destruction or forcible seizure of property." It is not true that this is "simple," nor does it follow that "there is no implicit value judgment in this definition." The definition blurs over distinctions that must be made between intimidation, force, coercion, vandalism and violence. By bringing in destruction of property it confuses the sensible distinction between property crime and violent crime. More important, once a definition deals with property as well as people, the exploitation, neglect and abuse of the wretched of the earth must be taken into account. The commission assigned no task force to that area. Further, though it granted that wars fell within the above definition, it predictably failed to assign a task force to study the violence of the United States Government. In laying out seven areas of inquiry, the commission demonstrated a keen interest in black and white protest politics and individual acts of violence. The answers were largely built into the questions: the commission's "conclusions" will almost certainly find their way back to its definition.

The "Preface" accompanying each report shows how violence can be stripped of its social meaning and made into a "problem" of manipulation and control. Violence is quickly whisked under the carpet of behavioral science rhetoric. James F. Short, Jr., and Marvin E. Wolfgang, directors of research, were impressed by the encouragement and response of the "scientific community." They enlisted "scientists"—even historians are generously honored with the title—for the staff and helped them "in structuring the strategy of design for each Task Force." They kept a close eye on the "delicate details of some of the statistical problems and computer runs." They made every effort to blend the work of lawyers "with the methodology of science and statistical reasoning." They show in their prose the bureaucrat's contempt for the "irrationality" of good craftsmanship: "Partly because of the freedom which the Commission gave to the Directors of Research and the Directors of each Task Force, and partly to retain the full integrity of the research work in publication, these reports of the Task Forces are in the posture of being submitted to and received by the Commission."

Short is co-author of Suicide and Homicide (The Free Press, 1954). He and Andrew F. Henry tried to demonstrate "that the acts of both suicide and homicide are undifferentiated responses to extreme frustration arising from extreme loss of position in the status hierarchy relative to the status position of others in the same status reference system." For a discussion of why this hypothesis will not work, once deciphered, see Martin Gold's critique in Society and Self, edited by B. H. Stoodley (The Free Press, 1962).

Wolfgang collaborated with Franco Ferracuti on The Subculture of Violence (Barnes & Noble, 1967). Showing remarkable detachment from the tragic history of blacks in American society, the authors confessed to an unreadiness "to assert how a subculture of violence arises," and concluded with a cheerful discussion of Orwellian techniques for better controlling members of the unexplained phenomenon. These included "television block-scanners relaying street scenes to the police, and stationed strategically throughout the city."

Short and Wolfgang proudly remark on the "uncommon degree of prominence accorded research" by the willingness of the commissioners to let them participate in meetings and engage in discussions "at the highest level of decision making." Their awe and elation are understandable: This latest recognition of the enhanced status of the technical elite puts them in a strategic position to hook scientifically processed and evaluated data directly onto the top link of the chain of command. Their sense of freedom is less impressive. Like other objective scholars who have undergone the painful process of internalizing their mission of mystification, they could be trusted to act "reasonably" and "responsibly." So far as I can tell, the freedom granted them differs in no material respect from that granted the members of an Institute of Defense Analysis or a panel of government trouble-shooters assigned to work out ways to win the hearts and minds of exotic but recalcitrant foreigners.

Ithiel de Sola Pool, champion of CIA support of the social sciences, moved with grace from studies of how to immobilize Vietcong cadres to an assignment with the task force on "Individual Acts of Violence." Other scholars include John J. Guidici, Captain of Police of Oakland, Calif., and Raymond Tanter, the 1967 Deputy Director for Behavioral Sciences of the Advanced Research Projects Agency, Department of Defense. The quality of Tanter's impartiality comes through in the introductory comments to his paper: "The media carries [sic] the mestive Reports: Chicago, Cleveland, Miami, Counter-Inaugural, San Francisco State, and three Task Force Reports: (1) "Violence in America: Historical and Comparative Perspectives"; (2) "The Politics of Protest: Violent Aspects of Protest and Confrontation"; and (3) "Firearms and Violence in American Life." Four other Task Force Reports have yet to appear. Technically, statements are made by the commission; investigative and task force reports are presented to the commission.

---

sage of the violent ones. 'Draft Beer, Not Boys,' 'Hell no, we won't go'. . . ."

Given this parentage, the two volumes on "Historical and Comparative Perspectives" provide few surprises. No critic, novelist, poet, or playwright explores the rich area of American imaginative expression. There is only an inadequate paper by Kenneth Lynn, who goes out of his way to pummel Leslie Fiedler and other "messianic" critics—meaning apparently those, like Fiedler, Baldwin, Sontag, Mailer and others, whose absence seems such a distracting presence. In any event, Fiedler and his like are guilty of an "indictment of American books [which] has opened the way to the conviction of American society."

The contributions of historians are, on the whole, only slightly less disappointing. Charles Tilly's "Collective Violence in European Perspective" establishes some of the connections between political life and forms of collective violence. Unfortunately these connections, the politicalization of modern patterns of violence, the rise of the centralized state and the concomitant nationalization of repressive forces—all important issues—are not pursued in depth by other contributors. Sheldon Hackney does demonstrate that violence in the American South cannot be explained by any of the behavorial models of interpretation and thereby leaves the door open a crack for suspect historical accounts of manners and beliefs.

Louis Hartz goes some way in "A Comparative Study of Fragment Cultures" to isolate what is unique about American patterns of violence. The colonies were founded and the United States has been run by WASP immigrants, Hartz points out, who fled from the social revolution in Europe, established a fragment culture based on the absolute taking for granted of bourgeois values, buttressed this with a peculiar sense of mission, and articulated the whole through a particularly virulent strain of nationalism. The result was a "shrunken consensus" which other fragments within, or other societies without, could reject only at great peril. If this valuable lead, which in Hartz's formulation necessarily remains abstract, had been fleshed out by inquiries into the means by which the consensus was enforced, the discussion of vigilantism would have had some context and there would have been discussions of that prime enforcer of them all, the national state. Some historians, however, simply make collections of violent episodes, frontier or urban, and hang them from a time line with a few observations. Others seem undone by the challenge of their new status as scientists. Prof. Richard M. Brown, for instance, devises a typology of violence: there is "negative" violence and there is "positive" violence. Vigilante groups can be otherwise divided:

> For purposes of analysis, the 116 Eastern vigilante movements and the 210 Western vigilante movements have been divided into the categories of large (L)—a large movement or one of particular significance; medium (M)—a movement of medium size or significance; and small (S)—a small movement or one for which there is insufficient information to otherwise categorize.

For a still more advanced use of refined techniques, one must turn to the behaviorists themselves. James C. Davies, a political scientist, brings scientific method to bear on historical events in his paper on "The J-Curve of Rising and Declining Satisfactions as a Cause of Some Great Revolutions and a Contained Rebellion." In several case studies, including one on the American Civil War, Professor Davies found that revolt was each time preceded by a long-term improvement in conditions that had very recently been reversed. Rebellion arose from the resultant gap between expectations and satisfactions. You might visualize the J-curve as a shepherd's crook, grasped by the straight end and held out at an angle of 45 degrees; the curve is turned downward to indicate the sharp decline in satisfactions. Applied to the Civil War, the J-curve indicates a rising level of satisfactions in the South from the invention of the cotton gin to the panic of 1857, at which point satisfactions drop off sharply during four years of economic depression. The curve ends with the firing of "the first shot, on the federal Fort Sumter in Charleston Harbor, on April 21, 1861."

Obviously Professor Davies had no premeditated intention of firing the first shot at a fort which had already surrendered—the bombardment of Sumter commenced on April 12 and the garrison surrendered the following day. But there are more serious problems. He makes "the immediate and very threatening economic crisis of 1857" an event of decisive importance: "This was the final critical downturn in the gratifications of Southerners." If it was, the South's leading economist did not know it. In 1857, J. B. D. De Bow gleefully reported in his review that the South had suffered less than any other region from the effects of the temporary breakdown: "The wealth of the South is permanent and real," he announced, "that of the North fugitive and fictitious."

Of the tens of thousands of volumes on the Civil War, Davies lists four references: A summary of census statistics, W. J. Cash's study of the Southern mind, an 1897 study of the cotton industry, and Robert R. Russel's Economic Aspects of Southern Sectionalism, published in 1924. While Russel's work remains a valuable summary, it obviously could not alert Davies to the recent controversy over the state of the slave economy in the 1850s. Flush times apparently continued throughout the decade, with only a slight pause in 1857. Lack of acquaintance with the issues and sources leads Davies astray in less important areas, as in his great howler: "In America the South denied the desirability of education and anything other than agricultural technology." And he apparently thinks planters were called "plantationers." Even J-curves owe a measure of respect to the materials they so abstractly pretend to explain. Besides, how do you measure satisfactions?

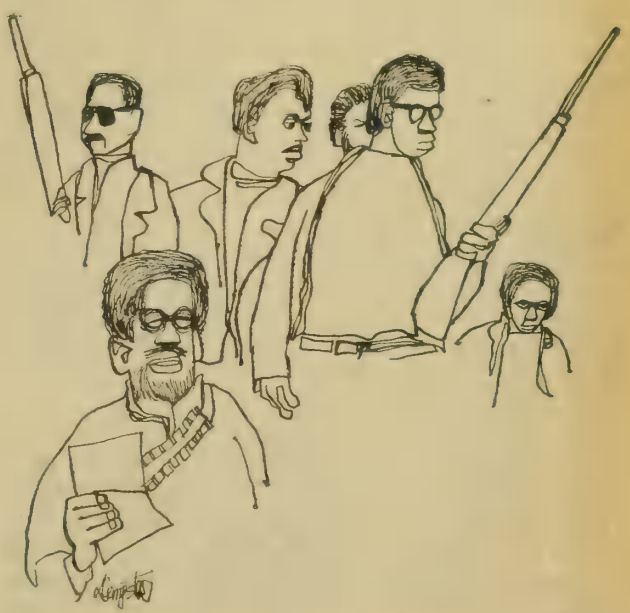
Ivo and Rosalind Feierabend and Betty Nesvold use the J-curve and its variants in their still more ambitious study of social change and political violence. Investigating eighty-four countries over a thirty-year period, they find that political violence is least in traditional and modern societies and greatest in transitional or modernizing societies. Think of an elliptical curve on a chart, with traditional and modernity stages at the ends and a transitional stage in the center, where the gap between aspirations and achievements is greatest. At this center point is the highest level of violence. Unhappily, the model does not fit the data on violence in the United States. It is admittedly the most modern nation in the world, yet in measurement of political violence it falls at the median position, with half the nations having more violence and half less. Moreover, all of the turmoil indicators show that rates of American violence have increased in the 1960s.



Are the elaborate model and laboriously collected evidence to smash on the rocks of precisely what was to be explained in the first place? Feierabend, Feierabend and Nesvold gallantly try to salvage what they can: perhaps the United States, as the most modern nation, is moving into yet another transitional stage not yet experienced elsewhere; perhaps its relatively high level of violence can be explained by the presence of traditional subcultures only now experiencing the frustrations of modernization; perhaps "the transitional process within our own society was intensified by the demonstration effect of the global process at mid-20th century." Perhaps.

"The demonstration effect of the global process": What a peculiar way to express the sense of identity and kinship felt by Malcolm X and others with the rise of the Third World. Ideas and feelings must slip into behavioral studies by the back door. Counted millions disappear to become bits of data for the frustration-aggression hypothesis or, as Ted Robert Gurr more dogmatically puts it, "the frustration-aggression mechanism, apparently a fundamental part of our psychobiological makeup."*

*For Feierabend, Feierabend and Nesvold it is a hypothesis and for Gurr a mechanism. Is there no difference? The assembly-line characteristics of the collection leave other rough edges over such issues as the improved status of American blacks, the relationship of rising levels of education to rates of violence, and so on.

I do not recall that any of these writers refers to racism or colonialism or imperialism. Gurr rules out of his tabulations official violence, "the violence used by regimes to maintain social control"; and in his ranking of 114 nations by "total magnitude of strife," he has the effrontery to put South Vietnam in third place, behind the Congo and Indonesia and thirty-eight places ahead of the United States. The role of the United States in the "strife" in Vietnam—the war against the people and the countryside, the accelerated "urbanization" of peasants—hardly bears mentioning at this point. And the tabulated results are not what they seem for other parts of the world. In Guatemala, for example, which Gurr lists in twentieth place, the level of strife has something to do with the American intervention of 1954, which stopped the pitifully small steps toward reform then under way, and with the subsequent use of Panama-based planes to drop napalm on suspected rebels. But enough. With a few exceptions, like the fine contribution by Louis Hartz, the papers in "Historical and Comparative Perspectives" posit a world without meaningful history, without real people, without felt experiences. Violence—notwithstanding the admission that Americans are "bloody-minded"—is pulled into all the tables, charts and figures and J-curved over the horizon.

It would be nice to think that "The Politics of Protest: Violent Aspects of Protest & Confrontation" stands in such sharp contrast to the other commission reports because of student and black efforts to establish the connections between private and official violence. It was undertaken at Berkeley, in any event, while that campus was declared to be under a "state of extreme emergency." The early lessons of the counterinsurgency campaigns of cops and National Guardsmen on that campus—leading on down to the People's Park confrontation last spring and the symbolic appearance of a helicopter dropping C.S. gas on people in Sproul Hall Plaza—could hardly have been lost on Jerome Skolnick and his associates. For whatever reasons, it is an analysis rather than an investigation, as Skolnick insists, and it properly starts out by clearing away much of the ideological underbrush. Violence is declared to be an ambiguous term defined by the political process. The war in Vietnam is present in its soul-deadening fullness as a genuine experience of our time. Even the illegality of the war is taken into account. The ideology of black nationalism is treated with respect, and not mishandled as in the other reports. The role of the police in causing violence is emphasized. White militants receive due credit for being, outside those in official positions, the single most violent force in American history. The Skolnick analysts see contemporary violence as a sign of the desperate need for fundamental change in American society. They warn against interpretations of riots in terms of the "carnival," "contagion" and "control" preoccupations of sociologists such as Morris Janowitz. They have, in short, produced a valuable, courageous document.

This much said, I must add that Skolnick and his associates have hardly escaped the official bag. They seem never to have come to grips with the implications of "the suspicion with which this Commission is viewed by many militant black leaders" (the blacks flatly refused to cooperate with the study team on San Francisco State and held back from full cooperation with this inquiry). And, after all, the assignment given the Skolnick task force was the violence of protesters, not the connections between official and protest violence. Thus in discussing the raging racism which is not receiving the massive attention it demands, they rather lamely conclude that "other priorities and other claims still seem to dominate the nation's budget." Good enough; but why not come right out and say that the trillion dollars we have spent on "defense" since 1945 are among the trillion reasons that we are in the present fix? Finally, even this important step toward understanding violence amongst us will be trivialized, lost like Hartz's essay in the mass of surrounding jargon. It will come out distorted in the commission's final report, which will be a judicious and irrelevant balancing of measures of concession and control.

Suspicion by militant blacks helps put the commission in its proper context. Or imagine Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese monk and poet, working his way through the reports. He might be bemused by the sleight of hand whereby President Johnson directed attention away from the task forces waging a war of desolation against Vietnam, and toward the task forces considering the "violence" of those protesting it or suffering from it.

JAPAN 1970: YEAR OF UPHEAVAL

JEFFREY P. FREED

Mr. Freed, formerly at the International Relations Center, San Francisco State College, is this year at the University of Oregon. His third trip to Japan was made this summer.

The civil turmoil, violence and repression which will sweep Japan in the next year has been predictable since 1960, when the government of Prime Minister Nobuske Kishi rammed ratification of the U.S.-Japan Mutual Treaty of Cooperation and Security through the Diet. Under the treaty's provisions 1970 is a critical year, for either party can then give notice of intent to revise or abrogate the pact. Since Prime Minister Eisaku Sato's government intends to allow the agreement to extend its term automatically, the stage is set for a yearlong series of confrontations that may easily surpass the massive protests of ten years ago.

In 1959-60 the Kishi government negotiated the security treaty with the United States as a revision of the 1951 Peace Treaty, which was the basis for post-occupation U.S. policy in Japan. While the United States proposed changes that were from Japan's viewpoint a substantial improvement over the terms of 1951, the more onerous details of post-occupation relations remained untouched—Japan was still tied to U.S. policy in the Far East, and numerous American military bases remained on the three home islands.

Once negotiations were in progress, an opposition movement quickly developed. Led by the Japanese Socialist Party (JSP) and its labor affiliate Sohyo (General Council of Labor), and bolstered by the radical students in Zengakuren (Federation of Student Self-Governing Associations), the movement grew. People joined for various reasons. The majority of the Left opposed the treaty itself, but many moderate citizens joined in protest against Kishi's undemocratic methods, and in hostility to Kishi himself, who was a "depurged" war criminal. (He was Minister of Finance in the Tojo cabinet.) At their peak, the dissidents numbered in the millions, and their outcry forced the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) to dissolve the Kishi government.

The 1970 anti-treaty movement, although engendered by the same issues that arose in 1960, has become a more general protest, having as its broadest target the whole Japanese "system." Vague fears of ten years ago have today become a stark reality for most of the opposition. The major issues are:

American Bases. These produce both political and social irritants. For the Left, the more than 120 military installations are an infringement of national sovereignty. They also represent "American aggression" in Vietnam, most of the large posts having been used as staging areas for the Southeast Asian battlefields.

The social irritants are as potent. Over the last ten years protests have been staged against the "low morals" of American military personnel, against restrictions on civilian activities around bases, and against military-related flights over and transportation through densely populated areas. Agitation against this last category of provocation became widespread and militant in 1967-68, following the crashes of fighter aircraft, and the explosions of trains carrying jet fuel and munitions.

Okinawa Reversion. In the last several years the matter of ownership of the Ryukyu Islands, of which Okinawa is the largest, has taken a dramatic turn. The fact that Okinawa is run by the U.S. Department of Defense under conditions bordering on dictatorship does little to create good will, and Japanese opinion has always been uneasy about the vast U.S. bases there. But feelings began to grow much hotter when it was discovered that the Okinawan airfields were used to mount raids on North Vietnam. More recently, people have been outraged to learn that nuclear, chemical and biological weapons are stored in the Okinawan depots. The protest against bases has extended to include Okinawa, and at the same time the Okinawan nationalist movement has gained force. The cry is for self-determination, which most Japanese construe as a return of the island to Japan.

The Sato Government. For many, the present government recalls the Kishi days (Sato is Kishi's younger brother). In the midst of its third term in power, the Sato group has moved significantly to the right. In foreign relations it has committed the nation to two unpopular causes: renewing the security treaty, and approving a general rearmament and increase in the size of the Self-Defense Forces (SDF), a euphemism for the army and navy. Domestically, the government has gained passage of a feudal health and old-age bill that places the burden of care on the family, and a university control bill. It has not put through needed social welfare and relief legislation. These programs and their roughshod passage through the Diet have drawn criticism even from anti-Sato factions within the normally conservative and acquiescent LDP.

American Imperialism and Japanese Militarism. Linking the other issues is the underlying assumption that the United States has been able to make Japan an accomplice in its "aggressive and interventionist" Asian policy. More recently, it has been argued that Japan has been integrated into the American military-industrial complex, its industries producing war material for U.S. forces in Asia, and its government following the dictates of the Nixon Administration that it rearm and take over the policing of the Pacific region.

According to opinion prevailing on the Left, the very fabric of Japanese society has been recast by the United States, acting in consort with Japan's ruling class. Given this premise, almost any anti-U.S. and anti-government issue becomes part of the treaty fight. Most newspapers refer to any protest as an "ampo kogai," translated as a "public disturbance caused by the security treaty."

There is by no means unanimity of opinion within the anti-treaty opposition. A fundamental difference divides the movement into reformist parties and new Left groups. The reformists call for a political reorientation to reverse the gradual deterioration of parliamentary democracy and the revival of militarism; the new Left believes that effective democracy has already disappeared and that the country is held by a reactionary ruling class bolstered by U.S. imperialism. Applying these analyses in actions, the reformist parties favor ballot-box politics and peaceful demonstrations, while the new Left calls for sustained mobilization, involving rebellion if necessary. The reformist parties reproach the new Left for engaging in unreasonable actions likely to provoke fearful retaliation from the authorities; the new Left denounces the parties as "revisionist" and "sell-out." Parallels could be drawn with the liberal-radical disputes in the United States, except that the Japanese Left has long been a Marxist movement and that no group there even approximately corresponds to our conception of "liberal."

The Agencies of Protest

Anti-War Youth Committee (AWYC): The dominant organization of young workers (formed by Sohyo).

Beheiren: Japan Committee for Peace in Vietnam.

Kankoro: Council of National and Local Government Workers' Unions.

Komeito: The political party of the Buddhist Value Creating Society (Soka Gakki).

Minsei: Democratic Youth League (formed by Japanese Communist Party).

Soka Gakki: Buddhist Value Creating Society; a religious sect.

Sohyo: General Council of Labor (affiliate of the Japanese Socialist Party).

Zengakudo: All-Japan Student Alliance (formed by Soka Gakki).

Zengakuren: Federation of Student Self-Governing Associations.

The overall composition of the opposition movement is as follows: The reformist category is occupied by the Japanese Socialist Party (JSP), with its large labor affiliate Sohyo, and by the Japanese Communist Party (JCP). A third party, Komeito, the political arm of Soka Gakki (Buddhist Value Creating Society) is a borderline group that often sides with the new Left. The two main sections of the new Left are the student and youth organizations, and the citizens' groups. Zengakuren, controlling the student movement, is comprised of a number of major factions, and is usually referred to as the Anti-Communist Party Zengakuren. (The name is misleading, since the group is not opposed to communism as such, but to what it sees as the revisionism of the JCP.) Closely associated with the Anti-CP Zengakuren, but not affiliated with any Zengakuren faction, are the Joint Struggle committees formed last year to support the strikes that closed most of Japan's major universities. The dominant nonstudent youth organization is the Anti-War Youth Committee (AWYC), consisting of young workers and also associated with the Anti-CP Zengakuren. Organizational identification in the citizens' movement is more difficult because it is composed of hundreds of local groups; but one that is of national importance—it may be the single most influential organization in the new Left—is Beheiren (Japan Committee for Peace in Vietnam).

The government has already named the new Left as its major opponent in the coming year. A report to Prime Minister Sato, issued on August 14, 1969, by the LDP's "Special Conference on Student Problems," identified the Anti-CP Zengakuren, the Anti-War Youth Committee and Beheiren as "dangerous groups warranting attention in the upcoming struggle."

Both the Socialist and the Communist parties have recently disengaged somewhat from the anti-treaty struggle. The reasons are a little different in each case, but factionalism, lackluster programs, scandal, unwillingness to cooperate with other Left organizations and a fear of decisive militant action can all be blamed. In the years since 1960, when it organized and led the anti-security treaty movement, the JSP has fallen on bad times. The problems arise, essentially, because the party is built around professional politicians and has no mass support except for a tacit alliance with Sohyo. Recent national elections have reduced the party's Diet strength, and similar losses in local elections have diminished its effectiveness in prefectural councils and metropolitan assemblies. Adding to these afflictions is some decline in the Socialist hold over Sohyo's 4 million affiliated members. The labor federation has itself split into left and right wings, with the powerful Left drawing strength from Kankoro (Council of National and Local Government Workers' Unions), and the Right relying on the craft and industrial unions. The Right wants Sohyo to curtail its program of political strikes and demonstrations and pay more attention to economic demands. It also resists any connections with militant student and youth groups, especially the Anti-War Youth Committee. And, of course, the Left takes the opposite position of more political action, and closer alliance with the students and young workers. With the JSP's primary source of votes at loggerheads, the party has floundered through the last two important elections.

The Communist Party has fared somewhat better, particularly in its ability to attract votes; most of its new support comes from disenchanted Socialists. The JCP has 300,000 open, and 100,000 secret members, and polls about 2 million votes. However, it would be hazardous to predict that the JCP will sustain this voting strength. In the last three years it has become an outcast on the Left, because of dishonesty in its ideological position and "sectarianism" in its relations with other Left groups. The party's ideological shiftiness became evident in 1966 when it swung dramatically from a pro- to an anti-Chinese position. This reversal was touched off by an accurate charge from Peking that the JCP's revolutionary rhetoric was not borne out in its "revisionist" actions. The JCP made virtually no attempt to deny the charge; it replied by accusing China of meddling in JCP affairs and went on to purge pro-Chinese members from the party. In recent years the party has tried to remold itself along French and Italian Communist lines, seeking power through parliamentary victories. Its position on the Left is rather peculiar, since most other groups stand to its left, and its exclusionist policy is directed against radicals. The fact is that a great many people who vote for JCP candidates are casting "protest ballots"; the party itself has less appeal than its election figures would suggest.

JSP and JCP weaknesses have played havoc with their attempts to lead the anti-treaty movement. Each party has its own anti-treaty organization, the JSP's being the Anti-Japan-U.S. Security Treaty Council, and the Communists having the Council for Abrogation of the Japan-U.S. Security Treaty and for the Realization of Various Demands. At present neither party is willing to ally its group with that of the other, and the prospects for JSP or JCP anti-treaty action with the new Left is almost nonexistent.

Kyoto Demonstrators Set Afire by Their Own Molotov Cocktails during Brawl with Police.
—From an AP Photo, September 21

With Socialists and Communists standing on the perimeter of the anti-treaty movement, the only political party that might play an influential role is Komeito. Formed in 1964, as the political arm of the Buddhist Soka Gakki sect, its strength lies in some 10 million to 15 million members (organized around 4 million family units) who are typically blue-collar workers employed in private enterprises. The sect is thus the largest proletarian unit in Japan. Soka Gakki offers a Populist program that stresses elimination of poverty, health programs, and public well-being (often called "socialism"). In the last two years it has sought relations with the new Left, and has committed itself to join the anti-treaty protests. But Soka Gakki's influence with the radical groups will remain nebulous until it decides its political course. Since its professed goal is to be the major challenger to the LDP by 1975, it can be expected to restrict its activities in the immediate future to running candidates, and mobilizing anti-treaty forces through its newly formed student organization, Zengakudo (All-Japan Student Alliance).

That leaves the new Left to take to the streets. Its prominence in the anti-treaty movement has not been long established, and it too has suffered from internal squabbles, particularly in the volatile student sector. For more than two decades the student movement has been synonymous with Zengakuren. Its organizational form is a federation of hundreds of university student governments. From 1948 to 1958 the JCP was the predominant force behind the movement, but distaste for the rigid party discipline and the failure of the party to involve itself in militant action produced heretics. The JCP reacted harshly with widespread purges. There the party miscalculated: the anti-party radicals were the majority in Zengakuren, and they retaliated by taking the student movement away from the JCP. Throughout the 1960 anti-treaty mobilization, Zengakuren was a unified vanguard. Its snake-dancing students led assaults on the Diet and clashed with riot police, gaining national recognition. But ratification of the treaty was followed by tactical revaluations and these led to dispute. By 1961, Zengakuren had entered a period of extreme factionalism, characterized until 1967 by repeated splits followed by new mergers. This proclivity for realignment gave the Communists a chance to recapture the student movement. They used as their vehicle Minsei (Democratic Youth League), pitting it against the weak amalgamation of anti-CP factions. By 1968, the Communists had regained control over more than two-thirds of Japan's student governments. Then, in the latest swing of this power game, anti-CP Zengakuren initiated most of last year's student strikes, and as the strike movement grew, support for Minsei began to dissolve. Minsei attempted repeatedly to abort the strikes and to mobilize students against Zengakuren. Most students, while preferring not to clash with police, sided with the more radical students. Zengakuren emerged from last year's actions with control of the movement regained from Minsei. By May, anti-CP factions dominated nearly 40 per cent of all student governments, representing more than two-thirds of Japan's university students. The groups have followed up this tactical alliance with attempts at joint action. In May, eleven factions agreed to combine in a demonstration to prevent Foreign Minister Aichi's visit to the United States. This was the first real joint move since 1960.

Serious differences still remain within Zengakuren, and competing groups often engage in what the Japanese call Gewalt (German for "violent struggle"), expending as much energy in combat with one another as they direct toward the riot police. These clashes have become full battles when the opposite sides were anti-CP sects against the hated Minsei chapters. However, as preparations for the anti-treaty struggle have increased, the propensity for Gewalt has subsided. Diminishing friction has enabled groups to spend more time cultivating outside alliances, with special attention going to the Anti-War Youth Committee.

The Anti-War Youth Committee was formed by Sohyo in 1965 as an organization of militant young workers responsible for labor action against ratification of the Japanese-South Korean Treaty of Friendship. In four years it has become almost as controversial as Zengakuren; it is currently embroiled in a triangular dispute among JSP, Sohyo and JCP. Millions of Japanese youth, denied the advanced education that leads to better jobs, are forced to seek employment in industry. Having found work, their dissatisfaction is likely to increase in the paternal atmosphere of Japanese business. These rebellious young workers are the ready recruits for AWYC, which has had a spectacular growth.

Working through Sohyo, AWYC has made contact with militant workers in the Kankoro (government workers) unions, many of whom were former Zengakuren activists. Such connections are particularly strong with the Japan Teachers' Union and the various communication industry and local government unions. With older labor militants providing the introductions and radical students doing the organizing, AWYC has gradually moved to the point of following anti-CP Zengakuren in most struggles. For this reason AWYC finds itself in trouble with Sohyo and the large reformist parties. The JSP sought to have AWYC dissolved, Sohyo banned the committee from its anti-treaty activities, and the JCP refused to enter into any unified action with JSP or Sohyo if the radical young workers were included.

Nor are the "reformist" parties the only group alarmed by AWYC's potential. At its regular general meeting on April 23, the powerful Japan Federation of Employers' Associations warned of "moves to create disorder through illegal means such as political strikes among some groups in connection with the so-called 1970 struggle." Everyone on the Left knew that "some groups" meant AWYC and its student allies. Despite opposition from both labor leadership and employers, AWYC continues to grow.

While activists from anti-CP Zengakuren, joint struggle committees and the Anti-War Youth Committee will furnish shock troops for the anti-treaty movement, tacit leadership is being exercised by Beheiren (Japan Committee for Peace in Vietnam). Established in 1965, the group has grown to more than 300 local chapters with an estimated membership of nearly 1 million. Beheiren bans no one and its ranks contain a wide political assortment from the Left, along with many apolitical citizens who are alarmed by the security treaty and its related issues.

This nonrestrictive approach carries over into relations with other groups, and it is primarily by the efforts of Beheiren that joint action has again taken hold on the Left. Beheiren's leaders are continually meeting with other Left organizations in quest of some basis for cooperation, but its leaders believe that their influence with others comes as much from their response to specific situations. The two most often mentioned are the April 28 "Okinawa Day" demonstrations and the June 15 anti-treaty demonstration.

The critical events on Okinawa Day occurred as a Beheiren-led march was moving through the Ginza (Tokyo's shopping and night-life boulevard). A little earlier, radical students armed with staves had marched to the nearby government offices district, and there met thousands of riot police. After an eruption of hit-and-run street fighting, the students were driven back toward the Ginza. Beheiren's leaders had two options: to terminate the march or to allow the fleeing students to escape the police by entering their ranks. They chose the latter, and then decided to emphasize their defiance of the government and police by having the entire march (nearly 50,000 persons) sit down in the street. Beheiren's actions brought an immediate pay-off in Zengakuren good will, bringing the student and citizen movements closer together. A test of this solidarity came on June 15, chosen as the anniversary for the 1960 resistance. Beheiren called for a massive demonstration against the treaty and for the reversion of Okinawa, and invited all groups to participate. But instead of forcing participating groups to attend its rally, Beheiren sanctioned other rallying areas for use by the more independent students. However, when the time came to march, all the groups joined, the radical students participating for the first time since 1967 without their staves. The spirit of unity carried over into a two-day meeting that ended with the formation of the Anti-Treaty Unified Executive Committee consisting of representatives from more than 300 organizations.

Though events have taken the new Left a long way toward joint action, the cooperation is still of limited scope. Almost the only areas of agreement are that there will be a 1970 anti-treaty campaign and that its opening round will take place from October through December. Three sets of actions are to mark this period. There will be a "Haneda struggle" on October 8, second anniversary of the student-police clashes at Tokyo's Haneda International Airport at the time when Sato departed for an unpopular tour of Southeast Asia. Sometime late in November will come protests aimed at preventing Sato from flying to the United States for talks with Nixon on Okinawa and the Security Treaty. And, assuming that Sato is able to leave, his homecoming will touch off another round of confrontation. Aside from these plans, nothing has been agreed upon for the "autumn struggle."

As the least tactically militant of the new Left groups, Beheiren will probably confine its actions to a combination of education and demonstration. However, the organization models itself to some extent on the American civil rights movement, and its demonstrations could involve mass sit-ins. The next level of action would be strikes, a tactic that logically belongs to the young workers in AWYC and their strong supporters in Sohyo. Given the internal disputes, it is not likely that all Sohyo unions will join in anti-treaty strikes but those affiliated with Kankoro could alone play havoc with education, local government, transportation and communication. The Railway Workers' union has already committed its members to anti-treaty actions, and the huge Teachers' Union is expected to follow. Finally, some of the units in anti-CP Zengakuren can be expected to seek street confrontation. The students say that the events of Okinawa Day taught two important lessons: that large confrontations with police are ineffective and should be avoided, and that since confrontations are most successful when police are outnumbered, the best maneuver is to stage many simultaneous demonstrations. The students have also learned that Tokyo's subway and train stations are important targets. Most commuter trains in Japan's large cities run on loops encircling the urban center. If several stations are disabled or occupied along the loop, the entire system becomes paralyzed, leaving tens of millions of commuters stranded. Whatever the final mix of tactics, the government will find itself having to cope with three distinct movements that will use combinations of demonstrations, sit-ins, marches, strikes, street battles and urban guerrilla warfare.

None of the groups has planned beyond the "autumn struggle." They want to see what the government's reaction will be to this initial round of opposition. Most groups anticipate an unprecedented wave of counter-violence and repression, and are preparing themselves accordingly. Beheiren leaders expect to be jailed and militant workers expect to lose their jobs. The students fear even worse retaliation, including assassination at the hands of right-wing fanatics and gangs of criminals hired by the Security Police. Some of these fears may seem exaggerated, but Japan does have a history of political violence that has carried over into the postwar era. Also, many of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party's local political bosses and staunchest supporters are former "China ronin"—those men employed by the Imperial Army to organize the plunder of Asia. There is no solid evidence of recent illegal activities by these men, but their names are connected with enough sordid incidents to keep people wary. Most Zengakuren groups have sent their leaders underground, and many of the more notable joint struggle committee leaders have followed. Some units have taken the added precaution of stockpiling guns, an extremely difficult project in a country where firearms are outlawed.

The government has made no secret of its preparations. An initial precaution has been to fortify likely demonstration targets. In Tokyo these include the American Embassy, the Prime Minister's residence and the Diet building. The police have plans for mobilizing 85,000 men, most of whom are being rearmed and trained in riot control. The most controversial government preparations involve the Ground Self-Defense Forces (army). At Prime Minister Sato's request, the police agency, the metropolitan police director and the defense agency drew up plans for troop mobilization. The proposal, ready in June, called for stationing troops in the vicinity of large cities, and providing them with riot-control equipment and training. The plan also stipulated a schedule of troop deployment, starting with the use of troops in rear support of police, and moving up to "offensive action for suppression of rebels." As soon as this plan was set, the defense agency began to train several divisions in riot control at a base near Mount Fuji. There is also evidence that, if the anti-treaty movement is extremely large, the government will deputize civilian anti-riot patrols. These squads would probably be drawn from Japan's large corporations, many of whose employees have been sent for limited periods of martial training with the Self-Defense Forces. Incomplete figures show that more than 100,000 received this training in 1968. In addition to mobilizing police, troops and civilian squads, the government considers organizing pro-Sato-U.S. demonstrations for late November. The most subtle and expensive anti-Left operation will be the EXPO '70 world's fair to be held in Osaka. Woven into the government's fair publicity are such nationalistic themes as pride in Japan, overseas expansion, and Japan as the guiding light of Asia. Also quite explicit is the notion that 1970 should be a year of boundless support for the government.

The Japan police agency has estimated that the number of anti-treaty activists should reach half a million by May-June 1970. Based on past experience, the activists might well be supported by ten times that number. That is a substantial movement, but as many were involved in the 1960 opposition, to little avail. Therefore, the real test for the anti-treaty forces will be their ability to gain wide popular backing.

Extension of the treaty will not be debated or voted on in the Diet, and it will be up to the opposition to acquaint the public with the issues. However, even if the country at large does not fully grasp the main argument, certain tangent developments might bring it into the movement. If, for instance, there were to be a flare-up between local residents and a nearby U.S. base, or an explosion on a munitions train, or the crash of a military aircraft in a residential district, any of these could excite a popular anti-bases movement that would add weight to the anti-treaty protests. Stronger outcries could come if the United States refuses to set an Okinawa reversion date in the coming year. For that matter, any incident involving local citizens, a U.S. base, the visit of a U.S. nuclear-powered military vessel could set in motion the forces for another "Sasebo incident." Sasebo is a small Japanese port, where in January 1968, the visit of the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier Enterprise led to violent demonstrations in which the local populace joined with radical students against the police. Since that incident, there have been others. A question for 1970 is whether the anti-treaty movement will be able to create the Sasebo phenomenon on a nation-wide scale.

With all the indications pointing to a year of extreme upheaval, it is sobering to realize that most Left leaders do not believe they can force the abrogation of the security treaty. There is a consensus that, at best, a successful movement can accomplish the resignation of Sato and stem the government's drift to the right. As for Sato, his departure would not be seen as a permanent victory, since his government would undoubtedly be replaced by another conservative, pro-American LDP cabinet. And though the anti-treaty movement may be able temporarily to reverse the government's rightward trend, unless some dramatic alteration occurs in U.S.-Japan relations over the coming decade, the Left expects to be back for another try at "Ampo" in 1980.

BY ROAD AND RAIL

EXPLOSIONS EN ROUTE

SANDY MORRISON
Mr. Morrison has recently completed a book on explosions.

Each year, more and more explosions are occurring on the nation's railroads and highways.

Last January 15, a freight train crossed a broken switch near Springville, Ala., and derailed thirty of its cars, seven of them carrying liquified petroleum gas, or butane. One car exploded. In the twelve hours of spreading fire, two more cars exploded. More than a hundred people fled a mile to safety.

Only one week later a freight train derailed near Laurel, Miss., when one of its gondolas broke an axle and lost a wheel. A tank car containing 42,000 pounds of butane blew up, igniting flammable chemicals in other cars. In the holocaust of overturned cars and fire, two people died and thirty-eight were burned; eighty-five homes and eighteen business buildings were destroyed.

These were but two of forty explosions and accidents involving hazardous materials that have rocked the nation's railroads since 1964, and roused the public's fear and indignation. In Ohio, angry demonstrators compelled the Army to cancel a shipment of phosgene gas (used in World War I); in Detroit, officials of the Canadian Government prevented a trainload of phosgene from crossing Canada into New York; mayors of several Indiana towns complained of the numerous explosions and derailments that occurred in their state. And from all parts of the United States, letters have been beseeching Congressmen to do something about the accidents on the railroads.

Derailments cause more than half of these accidents, and they have been increasing steadily—from an average of 264 a month in 1964 to 457 a month in 1968. Thus far, fortunately, there have been no explosions or spilling of dangerous chemicals near large concentrations of population. But this luck is not apt to continue indefinitely, and any day could bring a major tragedy.

During the long decline of earnings after World War II, with much of their freight business lost to the long-distance trucks on the publicly subsidized highways, the railroads have gone slack on maintenance. Work crews were cut by more than one-half from 1960 to the present. Thus railroad ties are wearing out faster than they are being replaced. (One official, in a newspaper interview on this condition, said: "Well, there's an awful lot of track out there.") Two railway bridges collapsed recently. Wheels and axles are breaking on freight cars; tracks are fracturing.

This deterioration of equipment seems to have spread to the work force. The incidence of accidents caused by negligence has risen steadily over the decade. The official accident reports of the Federal Railroad Administration, from which these data are taken, describes a derailment near Columbia, Pa., that occurred because the rail tie plates were loose; nearby was a bucket of tie spikes that seemed intended for these plates. A head-on collision took place in New York when a frantic control-tower operator was unable to warn the engineers of the impending crash because neither man had his two-way radio turned on. The cases proliferate.

The rising frequency of such incidents has been aggravated in the past decade by an increase of freight-car capacity from 60 to 80 tons, and of their running speed from 60 to 70 miles an hour. Even modernization of rolling stock has contributed to the problem. Automobile carrier cars are so long that they have a weakness for uncoupling themselves; the new, longer box cars have, while traveling at high speed, set up harmonic undulations strong enough to rock their wheels from the tracks. The higher speeds and heavier loads have produced enough brake-generated heat to crack wheels.

The disaster potential in these accidents is raised by the marked increase of hazardous cargoes. When the first regulations for explosives were issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1908, there were only a few such commodities. Today, the Department of Transportation, which has taken over railroad regulations from the ICC, lists more than 900 dangerous materials. Our economy is permeated with the manufacturing and conversion of highly sophisticated, unstable chemicals. Since 1946, the chemical output of the United States has increased 350 per cent, much of it in hazardous substances. Excluding munitions, 1.8 billion pounds of commercial explosives were produced and shipped in 1968. In the same year, more than 1.3 billion pounds of butane were hauled over the nation's railways, which also carried 84,000 tons of anhydrous ammonia, as well as thousands of tons of chlorine, phosgene, hydrocyanic acid, etc. All these substances are perfectly safe while being transported; they are dangerous only when wrecked.

War materiel bound for Vietnam has added to the railroads' gamble with tragedy. At least five accidents in three years have involved freight trains carrying munitions. A derailment in North Carolina last year tossed 105 mm. smoke shells all over a school yard; no one was injured. On June 30 of this year, a freight hauling twenty-two cars of munitions in its string of seventy-one gondolas derailed near a freight station at Tobar, Nev. One munitions car blew up, strewing shells across the desert. Four people were injured.

Phosgene gas is always on the move somewhere. It is a weapon of war, but is also used commercially in the manufacture of plastics. A form of nerve gas, over which there was much outcry last spring, is also shipped in large quantities throughout the United States. Nerve gas was developed in pesticide research in Germany, before World War II. In the concentration that is shipped, one drop on human skin will cause death; diluted one pint to 500 gallons of water, it is used every growing season from one end of the country to the other.

Another highly dangerous compound is anhydrous ammonia, a common fertilizer. It is a drying agent, and will draw moisture from human tissue. On the morning of February 18, a derailing freight struck eight cars of a train on a siding in Crete, Neb. One of the struck cars ruptured, and anhydrous ammonia leaked onto a nearby farm. Nine people were killed and forty were injured by the fumes.

Of course, the overwhelming bulk of hazardous chemicals shipped by train does arrive safely, but the danger does not end at the terminal. Almost all rail freight is reshipped in smaller quantities by truck over crowded highways. In 1968 at least 100 explosions involving hazardous chemicals occurred on the nation's roads. Butane trucks have exploded in collisions, and so have gasoline trucks. Gasoline is the most common and therefore one of the most dangerous commodities. A passenger train struck a stalled gasoline tank truck at a grade crossing in Massachusetts and twelve passengers and two trainmen were burned to death. In Michigan a tank truck hauling gasoline was struck at a street corner and turned the intersection into a crematorium.

The situation is made more critical by land developers who put more and more population centers—commercial and residential—close to highways. Federal road planners abet this tendency by suggesting the advantage of using air space over highways for office buildings. If large buildings are to be erected over or near thruways, legislation should be written to divert hazardous materials to other, clearly defined roads. Large cities, among them New York, do compel explosive-laden trucks to give advance notice of their arrival and to travel under police escort on designated roads. But in most places these tremendous vehicles shoulder their way through heavy traffic.

This situation has also raised public alarm. Newspapers have lately called attention to H.R. 11870, a federal bill that would permit trucking firms to put still larger carriers on the highways. They would not only lower the safety margin for the passenger cars traveling with them but would increase the quantity of hazardous material subject to a single accident. Editors have been asking their readers to write to their Congressmen, urging the defeat of this measure.

The rising traffic in hazardous materials has been a challenge to the new Department of Transportation. Aware that accidents and explosions are increasing, it sought to have a bill introduced in Congress last year that would give it broad regulatory power over the railroads. House committee hearings on this legislation disclosed not only widespread dereliction on the part of the railroads and its employees but opposition by both management and union to any regulation. The Association of American Railroads always suspects government control, and now probably foresees that the proposed bill would add employees to the payrolls, just after they had been drastically reduced. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen fears it would lose its strike prerogative, and that licensing, similar to that of airplane pilots or truck drivers, would be forced upon it. Between them, these and other interests had some sixty amendments planned for the bill; as a result, it died in committee.

This session, nine bills for the regulation of safety on the railroads are before Congress. Chances are that none will come to a vote. A D.O.T.-sponsored bill will probably be presented and acted on, but only after it is drafted by a task force set up for that purpose. The department has called together representatives of the railroads, the employees and the state public utilities commissions and asked them to compromise their differences and make concrete proposals for safety legislation. Each concerned has much to gain. The railroads lost $250 million in 1968, just from destruction of equipment. The damage claims must add up to another startling figure. In the same year, 146 railroad employees were killed and 17,993 were injured in rail accidents of all kinds.

A hazard that worries the Office of Hazardous Materials, a bureau of the D.O.T., is the spontaneous explosion that can occur when two chemicals are brought together by chance. For example, nitrogen tetroxide has been hauled safely across the country in huge tank cars to fuel the Apollo and other rockets at Cape Kennedy. But a tank load of it will explode spontaneously if a handful of carbon dust is tossed into it. Again, a solid chemical widely used as fertilizer becomes a powerful explosive if mixed with a widely shipped liquid; it requires only a detonator to set it off. Dozens of other chemicals act similarly.

One mixture that went off with a bang on September 17 was the bringing together of transportation management with military experts in explosives. At the Army Ammunition Center in Savanna, Ill., the Office of Hazardous Materials sponsored a two-week seminar in the safe handling and transportation of dangerous products. The civilians were enthusiastic about what they learned from the military. Possibly some of this feeling will be channeled into support for much needed federal railroad safety legislation.

LETTERS (Continued from page 362)

lack of success for the first two years of his term in financially emasculating the state's colleges and universities was due, in large part, to the Democratic state legislature which refused to pass his tuition bills or agree with most of his proposed budget cuts. The fact that the legislature went Republican in 1968 is, in my view, one of the principal reasons that Ronald Reagan has now proposed—and will probably achieve—budget cuts of 20 per cent at both the University of California and the state colleges, accompanied by widespread turning away of qualified students. . . .

Public higher education will indeed be an issue in California in the 1970 campaign. Whether Mr. Reagan's political efforts will pay off, to his benefit, however, is far less certain. . . .

Jess Unruh, Assembly Democratic Leader

Pendleton

Glen Rock, N. J.

DEAR SIRS: If the situation at Pendleton brig ["The Pendleton Brig: Andersonville-by-the-Sea" by Robert G. Sherrill, The Nation, Sept. 15] is as bad as outlined, I feel that the Congress of the United States owes us an explanation. Why have no funds been appropriated for adequate facilities? Why is the Marine Corps so overextended by our Vietnam excursion that it is unable to adequately staff its brigs?

Unfortunately, I think I know Congress' answer before it has even been written: "National priorities do not permit us to operate effectively in those areas at present."

Prison conditions in much of the United States are substandard. Only when an aroused public demands prison reform will it be undertaken. I hope Sherrill's article will aid in that direction. . . .

John J. McCullough, Jr.

the Wobblies

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: May I point to three direct errors in Melvyn Dubofsky's piece on the IWW ["The Radical Goad"] in your labor issue of Sept. 8?

(1) Father Hagerty was not defrocked. (2) IWW advocacy of "one big union" has not prevented its use of appropriate bargaining units, usually all wage earners on the same job. (3) Since 1937 the IWW has permitted time contracts, with only this restriction: "No agreement made by any component part of the IWW shall provide for a check off of union dues by the employer or obligate the members of the union to do work that would aid in breaking any strike."

It is an additional distortion to picture IWW as consisting only of hungry migratory workers. We have been much concerned with these, and from them have developed some of our best organizers . . . but our membership has always included a sizable number of craftsmen and better paid and regularly employed workers. Reporters were less likely to find these in an IWW hall than men between jobs, but without them we could not have exerted the influence in the trade unions that we did. . . .

Fred Thompson

canny Nixon

Concord, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: President Nixon seems to be making considerable effort to stop marijuana usage. . . . This is shrewd politics. . . . Absurd as it may seem, probably more people in this country are concerned about marijuana than about the war in Vietnam. . . .

Meldon C. Belknap

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Forget About the First Amendment

THE TRIAL OF DR. SPOCK. By Jessica Mitford. Alfred A. Knopf. 272 pp. $5.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner, a frequent Nation contributor, is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

Jessica Mitford has written a superb account of the trial of the renowned baby doctor, Benjamin Spock, and his four co-defendants—Michael Ferber, Mitchell Goodman, Rev. William Sloane Coffin, Jr., and Marcus Raskin—on a charge of conspiracy to "counsel, aid and abet" violations of the draft law. It is the best treatment I have seen of an American political trial.

Jessica Mitford not only sat through the trial and mastered its Byzantine intricacies; she came to know the defendants and their lawyers well and brilliantly portrays their varying styles, their crotchets and personalities. She also interviewed the prosecutors and Justice Department officials responsible for the prosecution, the court clerk, General Hershey and, most notably, three trial jurors.

Her chronicle is spare and selective but full of the essential facts. She has managed to eliminate the tedious and irrelevant, but never at the expense of the basic legal process through which the issues unfold. With the off-stage aid of her lawyer-husband, Robert Treuhaft, she lucidly explains complex legal doctrines like conspiracy and the complementary functions of judge and jury. A gifted writer, she makes the whole trial come to life—as though it were specially staged to provide raw material for her creative skill. Miss Mitford makes no bones about the fact that she regards the trial as an outrage, is fond of the defendants and wants you to like them too, and is appalled at the judge's systematic show of bias against the defendants and his attempts to influence the jury in the government's favor.

Modern political trials tend to border on the ludicrous. It is not merely that the ceremonial trappings have grown rather dingy and fail to evoke intended sentiments of respectful decorum or that our adversary system is so clumsy. A trial like Dr. Spock's, where the basic issue is speech and assembly, unfolds without the drama which redeems the conventional criminal trial. There are no dead bodies, violent acts, alibis, clever disguises. Here the government relied on half a dozen "overt acts" in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy which included a "Call to Resist Illegitimate Authority," holding a press conference, speeches and a confrontation with government officials. All of the claimed criminal activity was undisputed and highly publicized—most of it was televised.

The government had to mobilize all its resources to demonstrate the danger of such seemingly innocuous conduct. The central focus in a trial such as this is not the facts but the meaning of the facts, the inferences which could be drawn from them. The need to justify the overriding of constitutional restraints on the punishment of dissent forces the government to exaggerate the menace of the defendants' behavior—one of the less savory aspects of political justice in a democracy. The government's struggle in this case to clothe protected utterance with sinister meaning produced absurdities which were tailor-made for the author's comic gifts.

The contest over inferences is inevitably weighted in favor of the government—primarily because our society is incapable of sustaining a sturdy and skeptical opposition. Claims of a threat to important governmental interests are invariably viewed as more authentic than the assertion of the right of freedom. And the contest becomes almost hopeless when the charge is vague. Here the jury rejected the relatively precise charge that the defendants had conspired to "counsel" draft-law violations but found four of them guilty of the vague and elastic charge of conspiring to "aid and abet" such violations—a reliable clue to the way in which the government's hocus-pocus triumphed over the jurors' common sense.

The Spock trial was a political trial. The one circumstance which unifies and explains political justice is the nature of the decision to invoke legal process in the first instance. Who decided to initiate the Spock prosecution and why?

A decision to use the criminal law to attack opposition to a basic government policy is never made by a line prosecutor. Such a decision raises vital questions of formal constitutional law and, more important, political questions which require answers by higher-ups. What use will be made of such a decision by the political opposition? How will it strengthen the Administration's electoral prospects? Are the timing, form and scope of the prosecution politically wise? Beyond this, there is the root question of the risks involved, the most obvious of which is that a verdict unfavorable to the government, even a hung jury, might serve to legitimize the activity which is being prosecuted. In this instance a court defeat could have spelled the end of conscription. Finally, even if the technology of synthetic Schreck in the political trial process minimizes the risk of failure, the decision maker must consider whether he has the power to limit a conviction to its intended consequences—a rough problem in a fear-ridden, scapegoating society.

With stakes so high, it is hard to agree with the explanation advanced by the Department of Justice and apparently adopted by Miss Mitford about the genesis of the indictment in the Spock case. On October 26, 1967, following the demonstrations at the Pentagon, Selective Service Director Hershey notified the nation's draft boards that registrants who interfered with military recruiting or draft administration would be reclassified for immediate call-up. This recommendation, which had the force of law, was widely denounced as illegal, unsound and unconstitutional. Department of Justice lawyers early in November informed General Hershey that his ruling was invalid and that a proposed Executive order to enforce it would be unconstitutional.

Hershey stood by his guns and stated that his "recommendation" had been authorized by the White House and that he would withdraw it only on White House request. Thereafter, early in December—about a month before the indictment in the Spock case—pressure on the White House from a great variety of sources produced a "summit" statement by Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark and Hershey announcing the setting up of a special unit in the Department of Justice, speeding up investigations of draft-law violations. The statement was intended as a sort of peace treaty to supplant punitive reclassification with legal process and to assure concerned Americans that registrants' protests against the draft would be protected.

Jessica Mitford was informed by the chief of this newly created unit, John Van de Camp, that "The prosecution came about as a result of our flap with Hershey and his October 26 letter to the draft boards. The prosecution of these five was thought to be a good way out —it was done to provide a graceful way out for General Hershey."

Was it? To begin with, the suggestion that the decision to prosecute the Boston five was purely an internal departmental matter can hardly be squared with the political implications of such a proceeding. And if it resulted from a deal with Hershey, why did the General persist in his view, after the launching of the speed-up program and the filing of the indictment, that he had been authorized by the White House to make his ruling, that prosecutions were not a substitute for punitive reclassification, and that he would stand by his ruling until officially requested by the White House to withdraw it? And why did the White House remain silent?

An explanation far more consonant with the background facts and the changing political climate in the fall of 1967 is that the White House ordered the prosecution—not, as claimed, in a futile attempt to appease General Hershey—but as part of an all-out reversion to the politics of repression. And, as in the case of many of our most flagrant political prosecutions, Congressional pressure played a part.

On May 4, 1967, in the course of a hearing on amendments to the draft law, Chairman L. Mendel Rivers pointedly asked Assistant Attorney General Vinson how many prosecutions had been brought under the counseling, aiding and abetting provisions of the draft act. Vinson's reply that the First Amendment was a barrier to prosecution led to an outburst by the committee's hawks in the course of which Representative Herbert of Louisiana loudly urged, "Let's forget about the First Amendment." A few days later, Chairman Rivers returned to the attack and in the hearings charged that the Department of Justice was in collusion with federal judges to prevent the prosecution of those who preached defiance of the draft.

After the October Pentagon demonstrations, the demands for punishment of such conduct grew to a roar in Congress as scores of resolutions were prepared pressuring the department and charges of malfeasance were leveled against the Attorney General. In the fall of 1967, the President was making his own sympathies with the reactionaries increasingly clear.

Early in November, in a private briefing for Republican House leaders, President Johnson intimated that the Pentagon demonstrations were Red-inspired. In his report on the President's disclosure in the House, Republican Leader Gerald Ford added that he had been urged by Attorney General Clark not to release the information. Johnson subsequently overrode his Attorney General in a deal with the late Senator Dirksen to breathe new life into the Subversive Activities Control Board. At about the same time the administration, by-passing Clark, submitted to the Congress a measure severely limiting the right to travel. And on the very day that the Spock indictment was returned, J. Edgar Hoover's annual report was released, calling attention to the mounting resistance to the draft.

About a month after the indictment, in February of 1968, the President—again reversing Attorney General Clark —surrendered to the law and order forces on the wire tap and Miranda issues. He also endorsed the repressive anti-riot bill, passed in the House the previous year over the opposition of his Attorney General.

Although we have not yet heard from Ramsey Clark on the subject, the available evidence strongly supports the view that the initiative behind the Spock indictment was taken by the White House, not by the Department of Justice, and that it was part of the administration's repressive crackdown and sharp break with the Left-peace forces (chronicled in Eric Goldman's The Tragedy of Lyndon Johnson).

It is not only the context of the decision to prosecute Spock and his co-defendants which illuminates its source. The fact that a conspiracy indictment was brought confirms that the prosecution was not the result of a routine law-enforcement decision within the Justice Department. The conventional law-enforcement reasons for a conspiracy charge were dubious here. But conspiracy was indispensable if political considerations were uppermost.

The conspiracy charge is the hallmark of American political justice. It yields the greatest return of repression for the smallest investment of power. Consider the politically significant identity of the five alleged conspirators. A peace activist (Dr. Spock), a student (Michael Ferber), a leading anti-war cleric (the Reverend Coffin), a writer (Mitchell Goodman) and a political intellectual (Marcus Raskin). In one package the indictment wraps up representatives of the leadership groups in the U.S. peace movement. To be sure, the defendants hardly knew one another and their guilt was predicated on constitutionally dubious theories of parallel action. All this meant was that the convictions might be reversed on appeal. (So they were: on July 12 Spock and Ferber were found not to be co-conspirators by the appellate court while Goodman and Coffin were granted new trials. A dissenting judge contended that all the defendants should have been acquitted. Raskin had been freed by the jury.) The decision to proceed on a shaky conspiracy charge in spite of the manifest risks of appellate reversal and the development at the trial of the theory that anyone who encouraged, aided or abetted the charged conspiracy (the "diverse other persons" referred to in the indictment) shared in the conspiratorial guilt can only be explained in terms of the felt political need for a means of intimidating anti-war protesters on a broad scale.

In her final chapter, Miss Mitford concludes that the cards are stacked in political trials: the costs both in personal and social terms are cruel and indefensible. Justice is simply not possible in a political case. In all the political trials of this century the accused were swept off the boards because they were dissenters; what eased the path to conviction were "the popular fears and prejudices of the moment." The Boston five, Miss Mitford concludes, were victims of our anxiety about "law and order."

CAMPUS ROTC

All love is underground—at a drive-in movie, motels, even in city swimming pools:

on car seats, beds, in water the pill or condom or empty bleachers' Saran Wrap cannot order a total defense against a love-in.

It can happen in books too, hard words pulling us down, stripped to the bone.

Hand manuals do not hold or the snake, gliding:

such risky affairs,
in Asia under the moon,
in ditches and swamps and dark rice paddies, officers wade to signal triggers, bayonets thrusting: it's worse than attack aborted, retreat to the held belly of a hill before the loss and the dying, where love is underground.

PHILIP LEGLER

East Asian Backgrounds

IDEOLOGY AND ORGANIZATION IN COMMUNIST CHINA. By Franz Schurmann. University of California Press. 642 pp. $12.50. Paper $4.95.

VIETNAM: THE ORIGINS OF REVOLUTION. By John T. McAlister, Jr. Alfred A. Knopf. 377 pp. $7.95.

C. P. FITZGERALD

Mr. FitzGerald teaches Far Eastern history at Australian National University. He is the author most recently of Concise History of East Asia (Praeger).

The first of these books deals with recent and contemporary China, the second with the origins of the revolutionary war in Vietnam. In detail they do not cover the same ground, but in their general illumination of the problems of East Asia they complement each other. They lead to the reflection that if the makers of policy in China and Vietnam had known as much about the history of East Asia as they, as educated men, knew of the history of Europe and America, they would have been saved from committing many grave errors. It is inestimable what the world would have been saved.

The new edition of Professor Schurmann's work contains a supplement which covers the period from 1961 to 1967, the period of the present Cultural Revolution. The original edition was, as the author points out, essentially a description of Chinese Communist society as it was in the 1950s. It has been an invaluable tool for the research and study of China. Now the new edition with its supplement carries the same penetrating analysis down to the middle year of the Cultural Revolution. The book is divided into sections on Ideology and on Organization in various aspects: Party, Government, Management, Control, Cities and Villages. Each of these explores in depth the operation of the Chinese Communist system, the variations that passing years have produced, and the ways in which Chinese Communist practice differs from that of the USSR.

Chinese ideology stresses the importance of thought—the thought of leaders, Mao Tse-tung being the most significant. Theory without such thought as an interpreter is meaningless. Theory is unchanging, but thought is adaptable. The Russians believe that theory can be creatively developed, i.e., changed; this the Chinese deny. "There is no equivalent of thought (szuhsiang) in the Soviet ideological arsenal . . . the Russians . . . appear never to have understood the need for a basic transformation of the spiritual identities of individuals in organization." Professor Schurmann traces the consequences of this ideological difference through the varying activities of party and state, including the field of relations with other revolutionary Communist parties abroad. "Though they support pro-Communist movements, they do not organize them, as the Comintern organized Communist parties in the 1920's." This may be news to some of the statesmen in Western countries who attribute all revolutionary activity in underdeveloped countries to Chinese machinations.

Schurmann clarifies many underlying conflicts and changes of policy in the years of the Communist regime. For example, the management of industrial enterprises: Soviet models and the One Man Management system were found to 1.

ELEGY FOR IKE EISENHOWER

Crazy Horse
they said had a sacred vision stone he carried it grew very heavy and wore out his horses under him one after another and it protected him

when he was killed in a roomful of soldiers what happened to that magic stone?

his body was grass real grass on the plains swept away
by the farm wagons

2.

Ike turns to Crazy Horse inside the dark coffin crowding you Chief?
no sir we got room for lots more of your color down here General about this land, Horse,
I'd like to say right now we're awful sorry, but don't think (pardon my elbow while I shift my hip)
we haven't paid for it—no sir! we've paid with problems a plenty so I hear says
the chief wary wondering what comes next what touch But—(yes here it is Crazy Horse nods to himself) we're all americans now and that's why (to go on) this rather odd request:
one of my senior officers in Paris collected scalps well locks of hair really. now I'd like to be able to take him back a really distinctive little souvenir of this beautiful country
Ike says the young Indian who died from a bayonet run into the side you see this knife (producing it magically out of his deathrobe) I've always wanted me five of those little brass stars and he cuts them one by one like berries from Ike's epaulettes and five for my old man a holy man a poet a leader among my people all the same man
Here try one he says biting into one of the stars they're cool like chocolate mint wafers Ike demurs
my teeth you know

smoke? don't mind if I do.
so they lie there smoking the one pipe comfortably
the rest of the journey

JOHN RIDLAND

be inconsistent with Chinese methods and were finally replaced by party committees. (This system in turn showed many weaknesses at the time of the Great Leap Forward. A more recent tendency is to give enterprise managers the duty of furnishing the precise information which the more politically minded party men cannot provide.) Much the same story, early imitation of Soviet models and later introduction of methods more in accordance with Chinese ways of action, is found in the history of "Control," the activities by which the party and the state supervise the population and maintain themselves in power.

In the introduction to the supplement Schurmann says that if he were to give the book a new title he would call it "Ideology, Organization and Society in China." The original title reflected the importance then assigned to Ideology and Organization and to the fact of China's being a Communist state. Now, "due weight must be given to the resurgence of the forces of Chinese society. The adjective Communist must also be dropped. This does not mean that China has ceased to be Communist but that its communism has undergone a major transformation as the result of the Cultural Revolution." The conflict between Soviet and Chinese conceptions of ideology and organization is so basic that the single word, "communism," will no longer do to describe the two systems. Schurmann sees China as "more its national self than ever before in the history of the People's Republic . . . in its internal constitution its Chinese character is more than ever evident." This is the clearest and most penetrating explanation of the nature of the Cultural Revolution and the fundamental causes of the Sino-Soviet dispute, the two factors which have convulsed the Communist world and which portend great changes in international power relations.

The supplement analyzes this transformation. Many acute observations which the ordinary reader could easily miss in his day-to-day study of the news are brought to light. There is for example, no personalization of Mao Tse-tung in the sense that he is not shown as a hero. No Chinese biographies have been published; he remains remote as a personality to his devoted followers. "No one instructs them to emulate the life of the Chairman." They are urged to study his writings. It is the "wisdom" of Mao which has immortality, not the living man who must before long pass away.

An important aspect of the Cultural Revolution is the question of how far it was a response to China's fear of a coming war. Mao himself had spread the idea of imminent danger of war in early 1966. (This was the period of intensive bombing of North Vietnam, including the suburbs of Hanoi and Haiphong.) The leaders first purged, including Lo Jui-ch'ing and P'eng Chen, were militant advocates of active resistance to "American Imperialism." Schurmann believes that Mao Tse-tung opposed them because the Cultural Revolution, which he regarded as the next leap forward for Chinese society, would have been forestalled by the possibility of war. Hence Lo, P'eng and then Liu Shao-ch'i, all of whom had been "hawks," were the principal targets of the Cultural Revolutionary purge. It is a new perspective on the role of Mao Tse-tung to see him as the man who may have saved the world from another major war. This interpretation will be disputed by many; but they will have to refute the strong case which Schurmann presents.

Mr. McAlister's book does not treat the recent history of the U.S. involvement in Vietnam. He is concerned with the era of French colonial rule, the Japanese occupation and the first years of the postwar epoch. The history ends in 1946 with the French committed to their attempt to crush Vietnamese revolution. McAlister analyzes the development of the political and social situations which made revolution first possible, then inevitable. Under colonial rule the old power structure had been debased and rendered impotent; and the new elite of French-educated, modern-minded men who were trained to replace it was denied opportunity to exercise its talents or to influence the political life of Vietnam.

McAlister traces the failure of the pre-revolutionary protest movements. Some were futile attempts to restore the fallen independent monarchy; others, inspired by the new nationalism, were too local and too poorly organized to make any deep impression on the mass of the Vietnamese people. Only the Communists, led by Ho Chi Minh, learned from their own and others' errors, and gradually produced a widespread organization reaching down to the peasants.

As elsewhere, the mistakes of the rulers were as much responsible for the success of the revolution as the revolution's own efforts. The Japanese, seeing the end of their domination approaching, fumbled between differing policies, at times encouraging revolution, at other times backing reaction. The French were determined to restore their authority, though they had serious disagreements over method. Had the Vietnamese people been readier and better united, they might have won independence at one stroke in 1945; but they were frustrated by the effects of long-standing political divisions rooted far back in their history and deliberately enhanced by French colonial policy. Revolution was successful in the North, partial in the center and largely failed in the South.

The belief in two Vietnams, one assailing the other in a spirit of aggressive nationalism, the myth which has so long obscured the Vietnamese reality, was founded in great part on the French creation of "Cochin-China" (a term un-

ARTISTS LOOK AT CONTEMPORARY AMERICA

BLACK ARTISTS ON ART. Volume I, edited and with introductions by Samella S. Lewis and Ruth G. Waddy. The first comprehensive presentation of contemporary black America's artists and their creative ideas. 74 artists have been included in the volume which contains 228 reproductions or portraits of artists, one third in full color. Juxtaposing the artists' work with their thoughts on how it came about, the book offers an insight into the experience of the black artist today, as well as an awareness of his exciting contributions to our culture. A publication of Contemporary Crafts.

$14.50, paper $7.50

IMAGES OF DIGNITY: The Drawings of Charles White. Foreword by Harry Belafonte. 96 reproductions of drawings. $10.00. Limited edition signed by the artist, slip case $25.00

WILLIAM GROPPER: Retrospective. Critique by August L. Freundlich. 8 full-color plates, 103 black and white reproductions. $12.50. Limited edition, slip case with signed lithograph by the artist $50.00

TIME & CIRCUMSTANCE: Forty Years of Painting. By Edward Biberman. Illustrated with 8 full-color plates, 110 black and white reproductions $15.00

THE WARD RITCHIE PRESS
3044 Riverside Drive, Los Angeles, Calif. 90027
Please send me:

___ BLACK ARTISTS ON ART (case) @ $14.50
___ BLACK ARTISTS ON ART (paper) @ $7.50
___ IMAGES OF DIGNITY @ $10.00
___ IMAGES OF DIGNITY (Limited) @ $25.00
___ WILLIAM GROPPER @ $12.50
___ WILLIAM GROPPER (Limited) @ $50.00
___ TIME & CIRCUMSTANCE @ $15.00

Enclosed please find my check for $_____ (California residents please add 5% sales tax)

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

known to the Vietnamese language and tradition) in what is now the core of South Vietnam. This region, centered on Saigon, was annexed outright to France. The old educated class, "the Mandarins," were almost completely replaced by the new French-educated class, which was without close contacts with the peasantry. Among the people, where old Confucian "mandarin" values were weak, there arose the sects, Cao Dai, Hoa Hao and others, including a fairly large number of converts to Roman Catholic Christianity. Almost all of these sects (except perhaps the Catholics) were opposed to the French rule, but there their unanimity stopped. Localism, the desire to attain a strictly local power in the districts where their followers predominated, was more powerful than any urge to national unity. These factors inhibited the growth of the Communist Party, which in the South was led by men of more doctrinaire outlook than that of Ho Chi Minh.

The center, the old Protectorate of the Empire of Annam, the region where some vestiges of monarchical authority were allowed to exist, and which now forms the northern provinces of South Vietnam, was in spirit and tradition, as in its form of government, sharply divided from French Cochin-China. The North, the Tongking of French times, was the ancient center of the Vietnamese people, the most heavily populated region; adjoining China, it was the heart of the revolutionary movement. These differences in region have counted for much in the long course of the Vietnamese revolution, but, as McAlister shows, they do not add up to "two nations"—or three. At least equally profound local differences existed in Nationalist China, between North, center and South. Yet revolution in China was ultimately everywhere victorious. The stimulus to the growth of the Communist movement which was imparted in Vietnam by French intervention on behalf of weak opponents was paralleled in China by the effects of the Japanese occupation and the attempts to set up regional puppet governments. It may be that revolution in both countries would have ultimately triumphed for social and economic reasons; but it is probable that the single common factor of foreign intervention and domination did much to speed up the process. Nationalism was forced into alliance with communism and finally absorbed within the revolutionary movement.

McAlister emphasizes the role of mass organization, grass-root contact, and the participation of the peasantry in the actual work of government as the fundamental strength of the revolutionary movement. A people whose traditional political life at all levels had been virtually destroyed could only be led to respond to a movement which gave them a new political structure at the village level. This is what the purely Nationalist parties have failed to do. The reason for this failure appears to be the unwillingness of urban rulers to yield power in any measure to the peasants. The introduction of a representative democratic system would have put power into the hands of the party which could rely on peasant support, i.e., the Communist Party. This is why no democratic system was tolerable to Nationalist politicians. However, had the French recognized the situation and decided, at the Japanese surrender, to establish as fast as possible genuine representative institutions, and then withdraw, power might not have passed so wholly to the Communists. The French policy of playing off one sect against another in order to secure French authority over all ended by discrediting every alternative and leaving the Communists as the sole and obvious champions of true independence.

The Communists attribute French mistakes to the economic interests of capitalist groups and their unwillingness to give up a privileged position. The Viet Minh represents itself as a party dedicated to the interests of the people and therefore ultimately sure of victory. This may be too simple. In Vietnam the force of national feeling and resentment against foreign domination have long predated the existence of the Communist Party. The Vietnamese people were for a thousand years under Chinese rule. They took much from China, as they have taken much from France, but they never lost the will and intention to drive out the foreigner when the chance came—and they succeeded. The Chinese then recognized that the Vietnamese were best left to rule themselves and that, too, was a thousand years ago. One can only hope that the lesson will this time be learned rather more swiftly.

The new approach to the problems of revolution which these two books exemplify gives some stronger grounds for optimism. It is not now possible to plead ignorance of the nature, history and inspiration of the revolutionary movement in East Asia. Schurmann has shattered the image of the conspiratorial Communist monolith. And McAlister has demolished the idea that the Vietnamese War is but a simple case of one sovereign independent power making an aggressive onslaught on another. His historical analysis shows it to be, quite clearly, a revolutionary civil war.

Thrashing With Doom

VIOLENCE AND GLORY: Poems 1962-1968. By James Schevill. The Swallow Press. 148 pp. $6.50.

L. ALAN GOLDSTEIN
Mr. Goldstein is the editor of LOS. His poetry and fiction have appeared in several literary magazines.

James Schevill is best known for The Stalingrad Elegies, a sequence of dramatic monologues adapted from letters sent home by Nazi soldiers during the Stalingrad siege, and from Schevill's own conversations with German survivors. Those plain-spoken poems offer images as ghastly and memorable as any war poetry on record: the soldier who makes a snow-woman—

Her ice was my desire
Her white perfection
Glittered in my eyes, white breasts
white thighs

the legless amputee "like a chessman with a flat bottom/Moved across a board to the edge"; and the motorcycle courier driving through bandaged skeletons and "snow that's set on fire with blood."

Authenticity held the Elegies under control, and a respectful sympathy for the real people who had to endure those wounds of body and mind. The poetry is in the pity, Wilfred Owen said; the Elegies were not a conqueror's pity, or a victim's, but that Homeric mode that makes reader and speaker appallingly at home together in the worst possible world.

Schevill's new collection, Violence and Glory, extends the grotesqueries of war to its aftermath. Found material replaces Nazi documents to authenticate a peculiarly American confusion between peace and its opposite. As Schevill reads it in his "Ad Sound History" (a poem meant to be performed by voice) any popular magazine expresses in its advertisements our disabling syndrome. Nostalgia:

EARLY TIMES
——you can say that again—
Ear-ly Times. . .
true old style
—(you can say THAT again)——
Ear-lee tiii-mmmesss. . .

and an aggressive love of power:

Georgia-Pacific
digs deeeeep for profits a quarter-mile be-lowww its trees!
. . . this land works
twice as hard for US.
GEORGIA-PACIFIC knows where it's gro-wing
in the energy business.

The dark side of America's infatuation with its own past is what interests Schevill. He rides the mass American psyche like a bronco, registering all its passionate jolts and kicks for total liberation. Verse form sways with backward and forward movements: the burning of Charlie Mingus' bass; destruction crews on the Pacific Coast Highway; homosexual fantasies: the fondness of garbage men for expensive trash; the fame and suicide of Marilyn Monroe:

The pictures always laugh,
As your bust bursts out of its dress.
Fame strips you naked
And you cannot sleep;
life is a peep-
Show; the psychiatrist
Gives you a new prescription; stronger sleeping pills need stronger wills.
"Fame will go by
And,
so long,
I've had you,
fame."

In the long title monologue, "The Violence and Glory of the American Spirit," the speaker is Barney Stetson, a 90-year-old castoff watching the John Kennedy funeral on TV in a run-down hotel room. He returns in fantasy to the joys of his American childhood, and regrets how coming of age diverted him into an egotistic competition for glory and celebrity, a typical rivalry linking him with American Presidents and their assassins:

Murder for murder, a peaceful people always Breaking out in civil violence, seeking glory
Until the violence and the glory tangle Tight together . . . When Guiteau was hanged,
People in the crowd paid three hundred dollars
A head to hear him yell, "Glory!
Glory! Glory!"
As he fell through the trap . . .

Barney suspects dimly that the whole impulse of American history is murder and waste, but finally assents to the rightness of that social contract, envious of the deadly energy of the young.

Violence and Glory concludes with some verse biographies, a genre Schevill used with fitful success in his first collection, Private Dooms and Public Destinations. The final sequence in the book, "The Death of Anton Webern," reconstructs the accidental shooting of Webern by an American soldier in the last days of World War II. Artist, assassin, and everyone related to them both confess their mind in separate monologues as agents of an absurd misunderstanding. Like Webern's compositions, the single poems are short and make much use of significant pauses, brief intimations, strains of harmony and dissonance.

Symbolically, Webern's death in 1945 inaugurated our blind contemporary thrashing with doom. Old Barney Stetson had his frontier dream; Schevill suggests that nobody this side of 90 has the right to look backward beyond Stalingrad and the whimsical murder by American soldiers of a great composer. Webern's last words, we are reminded by this concluding poem, were, "It's over. . . ."

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

FAT CITY. By Leonard Gardner. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 183 pp. $5.50.

Stockton, Calif., and the world of small-time boxing provide the setting for this tough, swift, compassionate first novel about two young prize fighters. Gardner shows great skill at evoking a sense of small-town America and that peculiarly American joylessness of an empty present made bearable only by vague hopes for the future. All his characters, black and white, ring absolutely true; and at least one of them—a Mexican fight manager—is really memorable. This book, particularly the passages about the fight world, marks Gardner as one of the most interesting and talented new novelists around today.

AGAPITO. By Alvaro Cardona-Hine. Charles Scribner's Sons. 117 pp. $4.50.

The author is a Costa Rican poet who has lived in this country for some years; his novel is a 7-year-old Costa Rican boy's description of his world, addressed to and through the life of his father's peon, Agapito. It consists of a series of mushy metaphors which completely overwhelm the few which are unaffected and potentially moving. After pages of such observations as: "Our cows are islands of spice, full of a hidden vanilla that flows white in an avalanche of grace, under theories of maternity," one wishes that desperately poor, brave, sorrow-wracked Agapito would turn his young admirer over his knee and spank the maddening innocent sensitivity out of him. Such sentimental, gratuitous writing about the nobility of poverty is anachronistic, to say the least.

A BETTING MAN AND OTHER STORIES. By Brian Glanville. Coward-McCann. 223 pp. $5.95.

If Mr. Glanville's many novels are not always particularly substantial, they are almost always highly entertaining, and this collection of his short stories is thus disappointing. The backgrounds include middle-class Jewish life in London, sports, and expatriate life in Italy, but almost all of the stories move smoothly over tired plots hinged on predictable formula endings. The title story, about the sad pleasures of a rich and disappointed middle-aged London Jew, is the most engaging, but all have been written too often before by better hands.

A FAMILY ROMANCE. By Richard Wollheim. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 255 pp. $5.95.

This cleverly conceived and very well-written novel should be more absorbing than it turns out to be, and it's hard to say quite why. An English economist records in his diary the details of his re-

Announcing a Vital New Book
A SCIENTIST AND HIS EXPERIENCES WITH CORRUPTION AND TREASON IN THE U.S. MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENT
BY DONALD H. JACOBS
$30 in U.S. Funds. Postpaid. Duty Free.
THE JACOBS INSTRUMENT CO., LTD.
3010 Fifth St., Victoria, B. C., Canada

KNOW CANADA BETTER!
See world affairs from a different perspective!
Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.
$4.00 for eight large issues
Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'
A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon
The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.
Single copies—15c; 25 copies @ 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

lationships with X, his morose wife, and Y, his mistress. The proceedings are dominated by his unresolved relationship with his eccentric father, whose influence permeates his life in a manner which leaves him almost helpless. It gets very complicated; but the tension that sustains our early interest in its wordy, introspective narrator gradually fades away as his total humorlessness neutralizes even its calculated-to-shock ending. There is one fine, funny scene, which simply records an evening's conversation among a group of important, upper-class nitwits.

THE MOVEMENT. By Norman Garbo. William Morrow & Co. 407 pp. $6.95.

The Movement is a big, commercial novel, and not a good one: its plot follows the already tired scenario of rebellion at a large university: its characters are the usual assortment of passionately confused student radicals (here led by a mulatto), diabolically good revolutionaries, and absurdly stupid administrators; it ends in disaster when the rebel-held campus is bombed to the ground by U.S. Army jets. Mr. Garbo believes that the heroes of America are the people of the movement, and he believes this resolutely enough to make some of his writing impassioned. But until better writers who share his point of view—where are they?—address themselves to his theme, and until those who sympathize with the movement demand that the writers they read relate to it, the popular view of the New Left will have to be shaped by such well-meaning melodramas as this one.

MUSIC / David Hamilton

The performance of second-rate operas is attended by numerous hazards, as we shall probably have ample opportunity to learn if the resident opera companies continue to stage inferior 19th-century works. Prime exhibits in this area have long been the concert performances in which the American Opera Society revives obscure operas, usually with one or two stars (sometimes very capable singers and musicians) surrounded by a supporting cast ranging from capable to inept. On the rare occasions when all the leading roles are properly cast and a conductor of quality is engaged, a convincing case is made for the work revived, but the usual result is a musical shambles, from which only the soprano cultists come away satisfied: "Oh, the piece is a bore, but she was divine!"

One of the operas that came off well in such a concert performance was Boito's Mefistofele, performed by the Society in 1966, and it may have been this performance that inspired the New York City Opera's current revival, especially when coupled with the obvious suitability of the title role for Norman Treigle. Unfortunately, the factors that put the opera across in Carnegie Hall—the voices and stylistic feeling of Renata Tebaldi, Carlo Bergonzi and Nicolai Ghiaurov, and the taut direction of Lamberto Gardelli—are in short supply at the City Opera. One great bass is not sufficient to carry a flawed work, and the moral of the experience should be that you must pick your second-rate operas with care, especially avoiding the ones that require what the other company has and you don't.

It remains a mystery why the Metropolitan, with its fondness for such resplendent specimens of the third-rate as Gioconda and Andrea Chenier, and its roster of suitable singers, has not staged Boito's opera since 1926. The work has the reputation of being "intellectual," but this is surely a relative term, the result of comparing the libretto with the cozy domestic tragedy that Gounod made from Goethe's Faust; it can hardly represent a serious claim to stature alongside the operas of, say, Wagner or Berg. Although he preserves a modicum of Goethe's broader philosophical content by including the Prologue in Heaven and something of Part Two (the Classical Sabbath, and Epilogue), Boito's libretto is awkwardly constructed, full of static tableaux—the Easter celebrations of the Frankfurt citizens, the two Sabbaths—that occupy far too much time in relation to the drastically abridged drama. Indeed, one would hardly have expected the author of this text to go on to write two of the greatest librettos in history, those for Verdi's Otello and Falstaff.

And Boito is a curious sort of composer, whose sophistication is almost entirely harmonic; his melodic construction is tortuously bound to scale and arpeggio patterns, worked out in monotonously regular sequences and further hampered by the incessant repetition of very short rhythmic patterns. At the evening's start, the Prologue in Heaven offers the kind of consistently smooth interlocking of elements that marks the naturally gifted composer; the orchestral introduction, built on a symmetrical rather than functional harmonic plan, is an ingenious solution to the representation of timeless infinity, and must have been especially striking in 1868. Later in the Prologue, another effective harmonic idea is built to a really compelling choral climax, but the expectations thus raised early in the opera are rarely satisfied thereafter—and then most notably by the reprise of this same climax at the end. Fortunately, the idea is good enough to repeat (or, perhaps, because nothing between is nearly as good we welcome the return of the evening's best inspiration), but other motifs, such as the little major-minor third idea that introduces Mefistofele, are so trivial that they are quickly worn out by countless undeveloped reiterations.

Characteristically, one of the high points, the "Lontano" duet in the prison scene, has hardly any melodic content whatsoever; it is simply a canny harmonic progression overlaid with a repetitive (but, this once, effectively so,) lullaby rhythm. And many other "melodic" spots sound as if they were arrived at simply by picking notes from a series of chords that had been determined first. In sum, the level of invention is perilously thin throughout great stretches of the score, and only sumptuous voices, brilliant orchestral playing (there is some very distinctive scoring) and tight, skillful pacing will maintain interest.

These ingredients were, unfortunately, rarely present in the City Opera production. Although the official première (September 24) had been preceded by a public "preview," the orchestral ensemble was still very shaky, and a persistent disagreement between the conductor and his star bass on the subject of tempo did not attest to an optimum amount of rehearsal. (My sympathies were with Treigle's faster options, for a large part of the performance was slack, but such

OCTOBER

Shadows gnaw the wind;
wind questions the sun.
Children run from shadows to the shadow of wind.

What climbs the ravine?
The stream drops down,
dragging dead leaves down.
I have lost the sun in a leaf screen.

There are stars behind the sky.
A leaf explores a dead shrew drowned in a shoal, nudging sleek hide: play.

There had been meadow afternoons.
Now darkness climbs the drugged moon while that which climbs comes.
Winds downstream whisper leaf names.

JOHN UNTERECKER

matters should be settled long before the curtain rises.) Among the singers, only Treigle measured up to the musical and dramatic demands of the work, although he was hampered by producer Tito Capobianco's curious conception of the devil as a cringing, sexually frustrated creature, an idea totally at odds with Boito's straightforwardly sardonic character. Robert Nagy, for some years a comprimario tenor at the Metropolitan, made a loud and unsubtle Faust, moving awkwardly and sometimes shaky in his intonation. The roles of Margherita and Elena (Helen of Troy, in the Classical Sabbath episode) were doubled by Carol Neblett, an attractive girl with a potent if undisciplined voice, who has not yet mastered the kind of vocal acting and textual projection needed to sustain the reminiscence episode in the prison scene. (If Miss Neblett can resist the pressure to sing heavy roles too soon, she may, with work and discipline, become an important singer; otherwise, a few premature years of leading roles, in which the sheer tonal quality will suffice to impress a relatively undiscriminating audience, will be the likely extent of her career.)

Visually, this was an affair of projections, with hardly any solid scenery. It started off well, each ascent of the Introduction's harmonies being articulated by a different lighting effect: flashing colored lights, shooting stars, nebulae, astrological symbols, and eventually a quattrocento Deity, Virgin and angels—but the later musical climax was not matched by any corresponding visual activity. The scenes on earth were spare and conventional, the whole lacking the style and consistency of other Capobianco productions. As with the musical performance, undernourishment seemed the trouble, whereas Mefistofele, both musically and visually, requires a degree of feasting.

The courage of the New York Philharmonic in pursuing the acoustic modifications required at Philharmonic Hall, even when the initial adjustments offered little improvement, has been rewarded at last with something close to real success. The first concert (September 23) was inconclusive with respect to the "19th-century" sound that has traditionally been the backbone of the orchestra's repertory; works by Debussy, Copland (the Clarinet Concerto, brilliantly played by Stanley Drucker) and Prokofiev reached the audience with great presence and clarity of detail, if a little hardness of sound at climaxes. Two nights later, a more conventional program confirmed the impression that the "wrong end of the telescope" effect has been eliminated, so that the full orchestra now makes a real physical impact on the listener. A slight glassy edge remains in the loudest passages, and the bass still sounds weak from the floor seats (it always used to be better in the top balcony, and I suspect that now the cheapest seats should give a very satisfactory aural perspective). I hope the management will make whatever small additional effort is needed.

FILM FESTIVAL

HAROLD CLURMAN

Apart from its audience and its pleasantly sedate new locale, the Alice Tully Hall at Lincoln Center, the Seventh New York Film Festival has not been particularly festive. There is a kind of gaiety about the crowds that gather to see the mostly offbeat novelties. They constitute the most sophisticated and receptive audience among the entertainment marts. It has a sense of occasion. It is eager to learn what is going on: it expects something.

But how is one to find gratification in so much dreariness? Conformity in exhaustion was the hallmark in many of the eleven films I managed to see during the first ten days. I do not complain that they were weighed down by pain: in one form or another, unhappiness is the matrix and subject matter of dramatic art. But it has been repeated to the point of nausea that we are living in total disarray in an anguished world.

Advanced circles betray an almost ritualistic complacency in this regard. If the now-I-lay-me-down-to-die dirge were proclaimed in fury, sung in eloquent tides of indignation, or were issued out of a true caring, one might be moved to compassion. But no: the message of debility is enunciated in opaque allegories, in lackluster conundrums.

Tragedy is based on confrontation, not on collapse. In the defeat which most frequently ensues upon such confrontation a surge of will and desire produces action and provides humanity with its most wonderful adventures and greatest satisfactions. But the films I refer to are notorious for their lack of surface interest. They ignore the stuff of experience, and their generalizations do not arise from what has been lived through: they are instead abstract declarations of impotence—which we are expected to take for granted as the truth about la condition humaine.

The pictures I followed with the least impatience were in some respects the simplest, or to put it bluntly the most realistic. The Japanese Boy will serve as an example. The story is based on a case—reported by the police—of a "family" which earns its living by having its woman (or "mother") and the 12-year-old "son" pretend to be knocked down by passing vehicles whose frightened drivers they then blackmail into paying them money to avoid being hauled into court.

The film displays the mushrooming, man-eating industrialism of the new Japan, and within it an injured, twisted, confused people abruptly divested of its traditions of honorable deportment. This sudden cultural deformation is reflected in the three main characters, and chiefly in the boy. He has been separated from his original family and adopted by a foster father who, having been wounded in the war, has no further capacity or willingness to work and has invented the aforementioned means of supporting himself, his mistress and the boy.

The boy tries to escape the brutality of his job by returning to his home in the south where one of his grandparents still lives. This childhood home has become an idealized memory, but when the boy is prevented from making the long journey, he returns to his surrogate father and mother once more to ply the family "business." We see him dream of becoming or being redeemed by a "space man"; we see him rebel futilely and yet cling loyally to the wretched man and woman and his infant "brother"—the child of the adopted parents. We know at the end—when the trio has been arrested—that though he now is legally a "criminal," the tormented boy (who says he has no "thoughts" about anything) is still moved by the memory of a little girl he had not previously seen, lying dead in the northern snow, killed in an accident caused by one of his tricky

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 10-13-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York [illegible]
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, [illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

attempts to be knocked over by a truck.

Boy is certainly not a "great" or a "perfect" picture, but besides saying something about a specific environment it leads us to know something about family feeling even in the absence of family, and about the tenderness inherent even in degraded folk. It is not a pleasant picture but contact with it is somehow warming because it is made from the stuff of life, and is not an intellectual generalization about it.

I could also see Adalen '31 without flinching as I did from the inhuman coldness of most of the more "experimental" exhibits. It deals with a strike which took place in a small Swedish town in 1931, an old-fashioned propaganda film sweetened by the director Bo Widerberg's use of suave color, his casting of pretty people with good faces, his gently sentimental humor and airy pastel sensuality. Someone described Adalen as a fairy tale of industrial strife. The strife is on the whole minimized and there is a certain note of self-congratulation for the Socialist government which took over from the conservatives after the strike. However, a wry reminder is added in a final "title" which tells us that "equality has not yet been achieved." Widerberg is a softy with a considerable gift for soothing pictorial effects.

There is much sterner stuff in The Joke, a Czech picture which must have been made under the now suppressed liberal regime. It tells of an embittered man, once a skeptical Communist, who under the Gottwald government was sent to a labor camp for "correction" (he had made a cynical remark in a letter to his girl friend about optimism being the opiate of the people, and he had betrayed a defiant inclination toward Trotskyism).

He has come to hate his country and, unlike several of his former friends, cannot reconcile himself to it. He is not made attractive or sympathetic—only understandable. We are given to understand that his vindictiveness against the individuals who have hurt him is wrong, but that his animus against the blind and blinding bigotry, the punitive self-righteousness of the earlier government, is justified. This story of Czechoslovakia's past, depicted in the light of the more promising interlude, has by the new turn of history become the portrait of a depressing present. The acting and direction of The Joke have a kind of down-to-earth honesty and a feeling for the natural behavior of ordinary people which are characteristic of Czech films.

The hurt felt by those who have endured the rigors of various police states is evident in another Czechoslovak film (more Slovak than Czech), The Deserter and the Nomads, which was completed—and no wonder—in Italy. Despair with the cruelty of political upheaval—whatever the cause—is the theme. It ends on a semi-religious lament over all hostilities which lead to bloodshed. The most befriending aspect of this picture—alternately garish and lovely in color—is its confusion! The director, Juro Jakubisco, realizes that violence is also human, and strives to accept this fact as part of the whole drama of existence, but he still yearns for the promise of surcease from it. At moments one suspects that this can come about only through total annihilation of the species, or through some miraculous advent of a second Eden. Jakubisco has trouble bringing his picture to a close, torn as he is by the various drives which have inspired it. The most potent of these is a love for the hearty carnality of his Slovak compatriots and the beauty of his country's landscape.

Wretchedly bleak and coarse is the world which another ex-patriot, Walerian Borowczyk (from Poland), has made in Goto, Island of Love. It was filmed in France with a largely French cast. The imaginary police state here is ragged, totally abject, with no alleviation even from the irrepressible sexual impulse. The old instruments of culture have been discarded: music has been replaced by buzz saws and other unsightly contraptions which produce horrible sounds that the prisoners (and all Goto's inhabitants, including its ruler, are prisoners) must profess to enjoy.

This is a vision of a new hell. But once I perceived its pattern—of cruelty, moral and physical emaciation with no more relief in it than what may be provided by the most dismal of brothels—I became inured and indifferent. Everyone knows that the states epitomized in the hateful island contain much more than what the film reveals. Such metaphors do not provoke a protest against their models; they induce a kind of anesthesia.

In an ironic vein, Jean-Luc Godard is the most consistent of directors. His latest film Le Gai Savoir (Joyful Wisdom) is literally a decomposition. A young man and woman meet and talk about this and that. What is photographed for the greater part are bits of televised news, posters, ads covered with graffiti irrelevant to the product advertised but pertinent as a sign of the surrounding chaos. Composed as a pictorial and verbal collage, Le Gai Savoir adds up to a "poetry" of nothingness. Revolutionaries as well as members of the establishment are reduced to a parity of silliness: Mao, Castro, Stalin, Cohn-Bendit are all flung into the hopper. There is gallows humor in all this, but one cannot speak of anger, malice or even frustration in the context of this renovated dadaism. Acidly gay it may be, joyful never. It must comfort the depleted souls of the indifferent, the lazy and the "aesthetes."

We are now in the realm of the coteries. Its hierophants are bright enough, often talented, sometimes ascetically serious, occasionally witty, and almost always totally juiceless. They are fanciful without being imaginative. Their ideas convey the shadows, not the substance of thought. What remains after the fizz evaporates is self-indulgence in inertia.

Destroy, She Said, directed and written by Marguerite Duras, is an attempt to adumbrate the present impasse in the quest for identity. It is all very cryptic and arcane, and almost wholly without movement. Yet this picture—relieved by one or two filmic quips—pretends to usher in a new dawn, a great change in the future, the harbinger of which, probably, was the Paris student rebellion in 1968. We pray that this may be so, but such films contribute nothing to that change and in fact make confidence in its coming very difficult.

Still, I must confess: several of these boring films held my attention more than did the festival opener, the sexy sure-fire box office smash Bob & Carol & Ted & Alice. But I have not finished—there are other, and I trust much better, festival films to be discussed next week.

PERSONALS

WELL-KNOWN WRITER, BOOK-REVIEWER; editor analyses revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 628, c/o The Nation.

CONTEST. Send stamped addressed envelope for Rules of New Testament Prize Contest to Box 37, Huguenot, N.Y. 12746

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1316

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 See 19 down
4 and 1 down Looking for the bloodshot type? A welcome returnee is said to be one. (5,3,4,4)
10 See 29 down
11 Not properly brought up if sort of riled about a little weight. (3-4)
12 Allen perhaps piles one article helter-skelter on another. (5)
13 and 14 See 16 down
15 In support of art, perhaps. (5)
17 A relatively modern cult to somehow gain following in the field? (8)
21 Play up? Quite the opposite in the final stage. (4-4)
23 She seems to have a daily changing appearance. (5)
26 The habit of judges with an unruly 27? (8)
28 See 19 down
29 How the loser sometimes cries! (5)
30 How the standout player performs is not altogether how the duffer does! (7)
31 Trailer, perhaps, in color. (7)
32 The sentiment "Erin go bragh!" shows it might be coming on. (8)
33 Gets tough, perhaps. (6)

DOWN

1 See 4 across
2 A low blow of the Tritons might be associated with them. (7)
3 Wrong end to, this man should be feted.
5 Evidently the first person contended with a climber on it. (5)
6 With 1 across, this was a famous Texas greeting. (5)
7 One might get embarrassed in traditional London weather to hold the wood in the burner. (7)
8 They might be added on as passengers.
9 and 25 A rather large holding of air for the Spanish American? (2,6,6)
16, 13 and 14 across Act with ham and eggs, perhaps, of present concern to some. (3,3,5)
18 Avid for what girls used to carry back to front. (5-3)
19, 28 across and 1 across Evidently the time of the gull is full, but sweet. (3-3,6)
20 Loves being in automobiles. (8)
22 One of those 26 in your home, perhaps.
24 City officer 150 years ago. (7)
27 Other than drunk and disorderly version of 26. (5)
28 Act long enough for a senior member.
29 and 10 across The last city of 24 to forbid the original in actual surroundings, as a planned development. (5,7)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1315

ACROSS: 1 Matter of course; 9 Rock cod; 10 Retrace; 11 Juleps; 12 Piercing; 14 Dittoed; 15 Thief; 17 Ashen; 19 Ecuador; 21 Paraffin; 23 Cyanic; 25 Noticed; 26 Prevent; 27 Follows through. DOWN: 1 Marijuana; 2 and 21 down Tickled pink; 3 El Capitan; 4 Odds; 5 Carried out; 6 Utter; 7 Swahili; 8 Berg; 13 Rose window; 15 Teddy bear; 16 Fair catch; 18 Horatio; 20 Rondeau; 22 Focal; 24 Spit.

MEETINGS

ECOLOGICAL RAPE. Workshops and discussions, Friday, October 17 to Sunday, October 19 at Yale University, New Haven, Conn. Edward U. Condon, Arthur Galston, Alice Mary Hilton, Seymour Melman, Howard Levy, others. Registration at Timothy Dwight College, beginning Friday, Oct. 17, or in advance at Society for Social Responsibility in Science, 221 Rock Hill Rd., Bala Cynwyd, Pennsylvania 19004.

PUBLICATIONS

NEW—press movement Newsletter. Behind-scenes reports; objective criticism. Ten issues: $5. Sample—"Ramparts In Memoriam" collectors' issue—$1. UNDERGROUND, 74 Grove St., N.Y. 10014

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor, Self Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Like many Saints and others, Bin Dir Woor has promised, God willing to appear many times after death. Purpose, to promote human rights and World Democracy.

PERIODICALS IN ENGLISH FROM PEKING AND HANOI: Peking Review (weekly, air, $4.00), China Pictorial (monthly, $3.00), China Reconstructs (monthly, $3.00), Chinese Literature (monthly, $3.00), Vietnam Courier (26 issues, $5.00), Vietnam Illustrated (monthly, $5.00), South Vietnam in Struggle (26 issues, $5.00), Vietnam Studies (5 issues, $5.00). Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929 — 24th St., San Francisco 94110. Write for our FREE CATALOG, which includes imported books and lp records from China, and books from Vietnam.

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

"THE BELLS AREN'T RINGING"!—Are you going to sit still and let the New York Telephone Co. (A.T.&T., that is) overrate itself at your expense? Learn the facts and how a few consumers shook up the P.S.C. and the New York Telephone Co. by sending 50c for a 16 page booklet to: M. J. Herman, 134 East 60 Street, New York City 10022

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

It wasn't all smiles...

Adlai Stevenson was a man of peace and a dedicated opponent of unilateral military action by the United States. Yet he was also the man who defended before the United Nations such U.S. interventions as the Bay of Pigs invasion, the Dominican crisis and the Vietnam War. Many have asked the question: why?

Richard Walton has attempted to answer this question in THE REMNANTS OF POWER: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson. As principal Voice of America correspondent to the UN from 1962 to 1967, Walton had a unique opportunity to witness Stevenson's crisis years as our UN Ambassador. The result is an indictment of U.S. foreign policy.

The NATION has a long history as a magazine presenting the truth to the American public. We at The NATION feel that THE REMNANTS OF POWER offers valuable insights into one of our most distinguished statesmen and the foreign policy aims with which he came into conflict.

So that you can have this important book, we are offering THE REMNANTS OF POWER as a gift to each new one-year subscriber to The NATION. Join us now.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ Enter you for 1 year (48 issues) at $10 and understand you'll send me free THE REMNANTS OF POWER by Richard Walton

☐ Enter my name for 6 months (24 issues) at $6. Enclosed is $6

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 10-13

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

HONG KONG STEPHEN SALAFF

THE NATION

OCTOBER 20, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
OCT 21 1969
LIBRARY

Military Justice: LEARNING FROM THE GREEN BERETS

EDWARD F. SHERMAN

Modern Biology: A Terrifying Power

S. E. LURIA

Operation Sisyphus: WET BACKS, GROWERS & POVERTY

SHELDON L. GREENE

REVOLUTION

Jonathan Mirsky on the NLF

Emile Capouya on China

LETTERS

money back religion

New York City

DEAR SIRS: I read the article "Scientology: Total Freedom and Beyond" by Donavan Bess in your Sept. 29 issue. I found it quite agreeable and in parts rather amusing. Despite Mr. Bess's left-handed portrayal of the church's founder and laborious conceptions of the road to Clear, the unique character of our young religion came through.

The story of Scientology is really simple. As Dr. S.W. Jarvis, an English G.P., put it, "It is quickly told. (1) L. Ron Hubbard develops a philosophy about life and death; (2) people find it interesting; (3) people find it works; (4) people pass it along to others; (5) it grows—and continues to grow."

We really don't want anyone to believe our claims—a lot of claims are made and I think we have all had our share of disappointments. Our position is: Try it—if you don't feel you have gained, you are free to leave with an unconditional and full rebate . . . . Yours in God.

Rev. Kenneth J. Whitman
Minister of Public Relations

GIs for peace

DEAR SIRS: Many GIs on military reservations are eager to participate in the massive peace marches to be held Nov. 15 in San Francisco and Washington, D.C., but they need transportation. Funds are being sought to charter buses. We ask your readers to show their support by sending their contributions to New Mobilization/Operation Transport: 555 North Western Ave., Los Angeles, Calif. 90004, or 1029 Vermont Ave., N.W., Suite 900, Washington, D. C. 20005.

Donald Duncan,
Van Nuys, Calif.

Roger Lee Priest, U.S.N.
Journalist Seaman Apprentice
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Duncan is a former Green Beret, active in the anti-war movement. Mr. Priest is an active duty sailor who is currently awaiting court-martial for his publication of an "underground" GI newspaper.

the mocker mocked

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Bitter irony and tragedy! If Roy Cohn is convicted and destroyed, it will be due largely to the reprehensible and prejudicial technique of "purchased criminal-informer testimony," which he perfected and employed, as special assistant prosecutor, to obtain the convictions and executions of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg.

Cohn's current defense must rest on establishing the unfairness of such "purchased accomplice testimony," showing how it makes a mockery of justice. A jury which acquitted Cohn would, in effect, be finding him guilty of "legal murder," having made a mockery of justice in the Rosenberg-Sobell case.

Aaron Katz

none so blind

New York City

DEAR SIRS: The Pentagon chooses to interpret the present lull in Vietnamese hostilities (U.S. casualties in the first week of October were the lowest in three years), not as a political signal but as evidence that the North is preparing a new major attack. The only signal that Nixon, Laird and Bunker are watching for is a white flag over Hanoi.

Robert Little

EDITORIALS

The Three-Day Travesty

During the first three days of October, Congress reached a new abyss in representative government. Some 10 million Americans are afflicted with hunger or chronic malnutrition; 20 million Americans live in substandard housing. Yet in those three days the United States House of Representatives went through the motions of debating (at the rate of $5.3 billion per hour of general debate) and then passed a military authorization bill of $21.3 billion. This was $1.3 billion greater than the comparable bill passed in the Senate after two and a half months of debate, and nearly $500 million more than the Department of Defense had requested. Bearing in mind that a recent Gallup poll indicated that a majority of the American people feel the military budget is too large, the primary conclusion that can be drawn from this charade is that the military budget is nowadays the largest pork-barrel legislation in the history of the country—and, of course, of the world.

While the size and scope of the new authorization is outrageous when matched against the domestic needs of the country and the burdens of the taxpayers, the blatant stifling of the dissenting minority voices by the House Armed Services Committee should make thoughtful citizens wonder whether the lower House of the Congress, in its present form, represents the interests of the country in any way at all. The following incidents, which occurred during the three-day travesty, suggest that it does not.

¶The House Armed Services Committee, which had been conducting hearings on military posture since March 13, 1969, did not furnish its hearings (2,666 pages) to the House membership until three days before the debate began. A report explaining the $21.3 billion bill on which the Representatives were to vote was not available to them until two days before the bill was brought up on the floor.

¶The House Armed Services Committee, led by its master, Rep. Lucius Mendel Rivers, staged a display of histrionics which spanned a range from childish petulance to sneering innuendo. Early in the proceedings, Rivers questioned the propriety of "dignifying these amendments with debate." When Rep. Jonathan Bingham (D., N.Y.) attempted to discuss an amendment to delete production funding of the Navy's F-14 airplane, Rivers drawled, "We cannot be serious about this. Why do you want to take any more time on this? Why not just vote on this and get it out of the way?" When Rep. Richard L. Leggett (D., Calif.) introduced an amendment to decrease funds and slow progress on the advanced manned strategic aircraft (AMSA) because Defense had admitted that the Soviets were not building long-range bombers, Rivers produced his own Russian threat, but refused to discuss it. Defiantly he stated: "I will not discuss the AMSA. I will not discuss with you what the Russians have. On my own responsibility I tell you the Russians are building a bomber. You can take it or leave it." On the question of further procurement of the Cobra armed helicopter, Rivers roared out in his demagogic style: "We need those Cobras more than we need breath itself." One visitor to the gallery shook his head and muttered, "Surely the American people deserve more than this."

¶At the instigation of the Armed Services Committee, debate on the amendment to trim back to the Senate level a new and incredibly expensive continental air defense system was the height of absurdity. Rep. Henry Reuss (D., Wis.) was allotted 45 seconds in which to explain his amendment. If this program is funded, it will mean tens of billions of dollars in future expenditures. Rep. Otis G. Pike (D., N.Y.) later attempted to introduce an amendment which will remain lost to history because his whole 45-second allotment was spent attempting to find out how much time he had. It was this shocking maneuver that infuriated many members and caused Rep. Andrew Jacobs, Jr. (D., Ind.) to thunder, "Shame! Shame on this House!"

¶The C-5A program, which had for a year gained national notoriety, was voted on with humiliating dispatch. Rep. William Moorhead (D., Pa.), who had studied the C-5A for a year as a member of the Joint Economic Committee, was given 75 seconds to explain why additional planes should not be acquired.

¶A number of amendments that had been passed overwhelmingly by the Senate—amendments dealing with defense contractor reporting to the government and studies to determine contractor profits—were defeated. The contractor profit study stood a chance of passing. To prevent that, the Armed Services Committee introduced a separate amendment to delete the whole section of the bill that was being amended. In discussing the impending doom of his profitability study amendment, Representative Jacobs admonished his colleagues, "My, my, my, how badly, how badly some do not want to talk about studying the profits of defense contractors." One by one, the House members voted amendments down in ever more rapid succession. It was late Friday afternoon and the weekend beckoned.

¶Virtually all votes on these amendments were by division or teller. Thus, the Congressmen could satisfy the watchful eyes of the Armed Services Committee members and not have to worry about the constituents at home. There is no way for the public to know how they voted.

With the debate almost over, Rivers launched into a a bitter personal attack on Representative Leggett, one of the five dissenting members of the Armed Services Committee, who had attempted to introduce at least a modicum of debate on the $21.3 billion. This diatribe, like many of his other more intemperate statements, was subsequently deleted and cannot be found in the printed Congressional Record.

Many Representatives seemed almost totally oblivious to the growing malaise, the rising dissent and the increasing dissatisfaction outside their insular chamber. There was no meaningful debate, and basic questions of national priorities remain unanswered. The members of the House undoubtedly feel relieved: the ordeal is over—for this year at least—and their individual anonymities remain secure. Perhaps some of the more imag-

IN THIS ISSUE

October 20, 1969

EDITORIALS

394

ARTICLES

399 Military Justice.
Learning from the Green Berets
Edward F. Sherman

403 Operation Sisyphus:
Wetbacks, Growers and Poverty
Sheldon L. Greene

406 Modern Biology: A Terrifying Power
S. E. Luria

409 Hong Kong:
The Complaisant Haven
Stephen Salaff

411 Remember the Hatch Act?
Charles O. Jones

BOOKS & THE ARTS

414 The Levels of Manipulation — Jonathan Mirsky
414 Bang Bang with a Silencer (poem) — Anselm Hollo
416 Devolution of a Revolution — Emile Capouya
416 Adonai (poem) — George Bowering
418 Armies in the Night — John Gliedman
418 Repressed Consciousness — Robert K. Morris
419 Art — Lawrence Alloway
419 Poem — Simon Perchik
421 Film Festival II — Harold Clurman
421 It Is (poem) — Harvey Shapiro

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209
No. 13

inative legislators shuddered slightly over the statement by one of their colleagues that if the American people became aware of this performance, 80 per cent of the House probably would be seeking new employment next year.

High Cost of Nostalgia

The price for taking the battleship New Jersey out of mothballs, sending her to Vietnamese waters for a month, and then putting her back in mothballs was about $100 million. What's $100 million? In The New York Times (October 8) a physician protesting against the SST project compares its cost with that of a research center for the treatment of burns which is being disbanded because the government feels that it must save $250,000. Using the same yardstick, the New Jersey episode would pay for 400 such centers. "How shall we account to our children for this set of values?" the doctor asked.

That leads one to ask why the New Jersey was exhumed. Lee Dye gives the answer in the Los Angeles Times (September 29). Initially at least, it was chiefly a matter of sentiment. In the summer of 1966, in San Diego—where retired admirals and lesser Naval personnel abound—a group of such pensioners met to recall the past. The common bond was that they had all served on battleships, and their forgathering was as natural, and seemingly as harmless, as the annual meeting of the survivors of the great Northeastern blizzard of 1888. In the end, though, it poured $100 million down the drain.

The principal speaker, Marine Corps Brig. Gen. James D. Hittle, now Assistant Secretary of the Navy for manpower and reserves, delivered an eloquent address to the old sailors. Don't memorialize the battleship, was his plea, put it back into combat. The American Battleship Association did just that.

The Chief of Naval Operations deplored the venture, but he was circumvented. Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara was initially opposed, but the Under Secretary of the Navy (the office of Secretary was vacant at the time) requested authority to reactivate, not mentioning the views of the CNO. The American Battleship Association had mailed 6,000 pieces of literature urging recipients to write to their Congressmen. Within the Navy there was a great deal of professional opposition, but external pressure was heavy and, perhaps most important of all, Sen. Richard B. Russell, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, was in favor. Anyway, the cost of reactivation was to be only $23 million.

The equipment of the New Jersey was modernized, some retired Navy men were recalled to active service because no one else knew how to manage 16-inch guns, and an old Navy gun factory in Idaho was put back in service to make thirty-three spare barrels, which were shipped to the Far East at a cost of $60,000 each. By the time the 45,000-ton warship was ready for combat, the cost of reactivation had mounted to $50 million.

She was recommissioned at Philadelphia on April 6, 1968, and left for Long Beach, Calif., stopping at way ports where great crowds viewed her and the Navy public relations officers had field days. Finally she cruised off the coast of Vietnam, firing at suspected hostile installations on both sides of the demilitarized zone. But after a month the bombing of North Vietnam was halted, and this target practice ended. The New Jersey hung around South Vietnam for a while, but there was nothing for her to do and she was sent home into retirement. It had cost a lot—$100 million is probably a conservative figure—but the battleship buffs had had one more moment of ecstasy, before they too go permanently into mothballs.

Lockheed and the SEC

Nearly a year ago, the Joint Economic Committee found that the original estimates made by Lockheed on the C-5A jet transport had been exceeded by nearly $2 billion. As part of a general investigation of defense procurement, the committee then zeroed in on the C-5A as a classic example of cost overruns through careless procurement practices and policies. The case against the C-5A is, in fact, perhaps the best documented of any of the systems under attack in the authorization bill which Congress approved this month (see Congressional Record, October 2, p. H-8901). During the investigation, Senator Proxmire disclosed that the Air Force had helped conceal the large increased costs to protect Lockheed's $125 million issue of debenture bonds and the price of its stock on the market. Thereafter both Senator Proxmire and Rep. William Moorhead (D., Pa.) requested the SEC to investigate reports that twelve of Lockheed's executives had sold more than $1.1 million of their stock when the trouble over estimates had developed.

Representative Moorhead made no charges; he just released a staff study which correlated stock sales by Lockheed executives with adverse developments in the C-5A program, which did not become public knowledge until some time after they had occurred. Senator Proxmire also requested the Department of Justice to investigate. To date neither the SEC nor the Department of Justice has submitted any reports in response to these requests.

This state of affairs raises several questions. Why has neither agency responded to the requests? More than five months have elapsed. If the investigation is on-going, when will it be completed? If the investigation has been concluded, why has no report been released? Is publication of such a report being delayed until after the military budget has been pushed through Congress? In the recent debate on the military authorization bill an effort was made, by amendment, to withhold funds for procurement of C-5A aircraft beyond the number of fifty-eight (three squadrons) which had been previously authorized. The amendment was rejected. At issue was about $500 million which had been requested to manufacture a fourth squadron of twenty-three planes. The authorization measure must now go to conference and the appropriation has yet to be voted, so the issue is still current.

The Nation is informed, on what it regards as excellent authority, that the staff of the SEC has completed a report which the agency has not released. On October 7 the A.B.C. news network reported that a subcommittee chaired by Rep. John Moss had ordered an investigation to determine whether the SEC had expeditiously handled the requests from Senator Proxmire and Representative Moorhead, and also to determine what if any information the agency had uncovered of attempts by Air Force and company officials to cover up a large Lockheed loss until these officials had made sizable stock sales. What disturbs us—and it should disturb Congress—is the pattern of secrecy and concealment which has been part and parcel of the C-5A project since its inception. Prodded by the pending investigation from Representative Moss's subcommittee, the SEC should respond to the requests of Senator Proxmire and Representative Moorhead; and it should respond now—not after the appropriations have been voted.

What Makes News?

There is nothing like an unpopular war to bring to the surface a host of issues involving the military that, had the war appealed to the normal patriotic reflexes of the people, might never have emerged. Thus it is that the generals and admirals—mostly the generals in the current situation—are struggling in a bog of unfavorable publicity and disintegrating morale that would have been unthinkable even a few years ago. (See article by Edward F. Sherman, p. 399.)

Among the headlined stories of recent months have been racial disorders at Army and Marine Corps posts, the stockade "mutiny" in San Francisco, the Pendleton brig affair (uncovered by The Nation), the whole question of military justice, the question of the civil rights of soldiers, heretofore practically nonexistent, and a series of outright scandals. All of these cases have been given substantial attention in the printed and electronic media; whereas one suspects that, were it not for Vietnam, they would have been run in the back pages, if they were used at all.

The point about most of this unpleasant news is that it is not news. The scandal of the misbehaving sergeants is a case in point. The current Senate inquiry has heard testimony that an investigation had been made from 1964 to 1967 into the activities in West Germany of a group of senior sergeants, including William O. Wooldridge, the first sergeant major in the U.S. Army and one-time recipient of the Distinguished Service Medal (since mysteriously revoked). The investigation had been closed and the report filed only locally. The misdemeanors charged against Wooldridge were on such a scale that normal practice would have indicated a court-martial, either to clear the accused or to disgrace and punish him. There were American newsmen in the Augsburg-Munich area who must have known of the charges, but if anything leaked out to the public it was on an inconspicuous scale. Wooldridge remained in the Army and apparently continued the practices which are now under investigation by the Senate.

One reason for this cover-up within the Army and negligence by the press is said to have been a desire not to embarrass Gen. Harold K. Johnson, now retired, who as chief of staff had selected Wooldridge as sergeant major in July 1966, even while Army investigators were looking into the sergeant's activities. According to current sworn testimony, the internal Army investigations which ended in 1967 concerned the theft of more than $300.000 a year from slot machines in enlisted men's clubs. General Johnson now says he had no knowledge of the investigation until last spring, which would indicate that subordinates, either to spare his feelings or for reasons of their own, concealed from him information vital both to his reputation and to the performance of his duties. The unsavory case of gun dealing by the former provost marshal of the Army, Maj. Gen. Carl C. Turner, later chief U.S. Marshal, also tends to degrade the service.

The media are always looking for news of a type that will build circulation. Normally, the military are immune from the appetite for sensation. By focusing attention on the services, the disaster in Vietnam may be producing an unanticipated, unplanned windfall.

Secrets, Secrets

The first of the underground nuclear shots was detonated on October 2 at Amchitka Island in the Aleutians; it produced no earthquakes or other untoward results. Anyone who regards this as an endorsement of future detonations is pressing his luck and showing his ignorance. The most disconcerting element, however, is the political handling of the affair.

An ad hoc panel, under the auspices of the President's Office of Science and Technology, delivered a report on the safety of underground testing on November 27, 1968. The chairman was Dr. Kenneth S. Pitzer, president of Stanford University and a former director of research for the Atomic Energy Commission; the other members were similarly distinguished scientists. The panel observed that in the past small earthquakes had been triggered by large-yield test explosions and concluded that such an explosion might one day set off a severe earthquake, either immediately or after a delay of some time. It might, that is, make a seismic region more seismic, perhaps disastrously so.

The panel pointed out that the public should be informed of this possibility, even though laymen would not be able to assess the risk. Publication of their report would stimulate discussion among seismologists and other scientists, whose views could then be communicated to the public, especially in the areas which might suffer damage or loss of life in the event that heavy test shots did produce earthquakes of dangerous magnitude, or altered the regional stress pattern in such a way that a subsequent natural earthquake would be the more dangerous. Obviously no test that has been fired, either in Nevada or the Aleutians, precludes such possibilities.

Instead of releasing the report in time for professional discussion, both the Johnson and Nixon Administrations kept it secret. Dr. Pitzer urged on September 29 of this year that large underground tests should be postponed pending an "open, broad-based review of all aspects of this situation"; his recommendation was ignored. The report was finally released a week before the Aleutian explosion took place, when there was no longer opportunity for evaluation of the hazards. Pitzer told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that this was the first occasion, to his knowledge, that "an official governmental body has dealt in open session with the policy questions related to large underground nuclear tests."

There may be another reason for the brush-off Pitzer received. The current underground tests are for the purpose of developing ABM bombs. Speaking as an individual, Pitzer pointed out that our massive nuclear armament "is essentially neutralized by that of the USSR. The totality of nuclear weapons of the world hover as a threat to all mankind. Our present array of weapons will deter any rational attack. In my view, we should give a higher priority to our efforts in arms control and in nuclear nonproliferation than to the further refinement of nuclear warheads."

Such views are sharply at variance with the policy of secret decisions secretly arrived at.

High-Level Disaffection

Portland, Ore.

Opposition to the war in Vietnam is no longer confined to the campuses, the streets and meeting halls. It has reached the higher floors and penthouses of the Establishment.

A good deal of the high-power disenchantment with the American adventure does not get into the press, partly because many businessmen are as yet unwilling to be identified with the more militant dissidents, partly because their views might jeopardize current or future government contracts, and partly because they are traditionally close-mouthed.

A business reporter who has discussed the war with at least fifty top executives in Portland has not met five who are still hawks, although few of the critics want to be quoted. However, in recent weeks officers of two Portland-based nationally known corporations have expressed mounting dissatisfaction with the way things are going in Vietnam. Neither statement was reported in the presss.

In his annual report to stockholders, Howard Vollum, president of Tektronix, Inc., one of the world's largest manufacturers of oscilloscopes, wrote that a stimulus to business "would be the end of the Vietnamese conflict." He added: "War tends to siphon national resources away from more productive uses. Unlike companies that produce military materials or deal in direct government contracts, Tektronix has found wartime a business depressant. The economic benefits of peacetime are far secondary, of course, to the end of the human suffering."

An even stronger statement was made by Harry J. Kane, executive vice president of finance of Georgia-Pacific Corporation, which last year grossed over a billion dollars. Speaking to the Investment Analysts Society of Chicago early in September, Kane said: "We see domestic problems ranging from poverty and sadly inadequate housing, both urban and rural, to crime in the streets and threats of further campus rebellion. There are hopeful signs in the Administration's new domestic programs, but there are grave doubts as to their possible accomplishments as long as we are entangled so deeply in Southeast Asia. We cannot afford the casualties in the hundreds of thousands, the deaths of our young men by the tens of thousands, nor the billions of dollars this effort is costing us each month. The President has reiterated that the pull-out from this agonizing situation is his Administration's No. 1 goal, and it must remain so."

Battle-hardened critics of the American involvement see Mr. Nixon's talk of disengagement as deceit. If that is so, we can expect more business leaders to join the war foes, and it seems almost a certainty that their criticism six months from now will make today's language seem embarrassingly mild.

Nixon has declared that the national protests on the campuses and in the streets will have no effect upon his Vietnam program. He is disdainful even of Congressional critics. But the men of corporate power have always constituted a pantheon for Nixon, and as their voices of dissatisfaction increase in number and volume, he may find it imperative to bend with the wind.

RALPH FRIEDMAN

The Isolation of George Meany

Atlantic City

The blind alley into which George Meany's policies have led the AFL-CIO was amply illustrated at the recent convention here. On the one hand, Meany denounced President Nixon for slowing down civil rights enforcement, for anti-inflationary measures which hurt the poor and increase unemployment, and, above all, for appointing Clement Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court. On the other hand he insisted that the AFL-CIO leadership endorse the President's Vietnam policies. The vote of approval was almost unanimous—which is something Nixon couldn't get today even from the Republican Party.

By inviting Melvin Laird, Secretary of Defense, to address the convention, rather than someone like Robert Finch, Meany made clear that his hard-line position is intact. Only one delegate, a young man from California named Art Carter, challenged Meany's war views. Meany told him bluntly "to get out." The union president's insensitivity to youth emerged at a press conference when he was asked if he worried about its alienation from the labor movement. His curt reply was "No."

During the debate on expelling the Chemical Workers for having joined the Alliance for Labor Action, Meany again showed his basic views. He ridiculed the ALA platform, one of whose planks is "to develop policies and carry out programs that will enable the American labor movement to repair the alienation of the liberal, intellectual and academic community." "Well, I couldn't care less about that one," Meany snorted.

It must be added that this convention showed nothing like the enthusiasm for the war, or for Meany's remarks about it, that could be felt last year at Miami Beach, when President Johnson's and Meany's hawkish speeches received an enormous response. But Meany's belligerence on the subject prevented Hubert Humphrey from even mentioning Vietnam in his convention speech, and to talk about America's problems today without discussing the devastating impact of the war takes oratorical agility of the sort that cost Humphrey so dearly among the younger generation.

Having denied for years that trade unions practice race discrimination, the AFL-CIO delegates now hail as progress not a mandatory ban on discrimination but rather a statement which recommends "to local unions throughout the United States that for a stated period of time they should invite the allocation of qualified minority journeymen for membership in their respective local unions and should accept such qualified minority journeymen provided they meet the ordinary and administered requirements for membership." Since the majority of new employees in building trades do not go through apprentice programs, as Secretary of Labor George Shultz confirmed at a press conference, the convention recommendation can hardly be expected to have much impact on Negro employment in that area.

Fortunately, the AFL-CIO no longer speaks for all labor. The two most powerful and dynamic unions, the Auto Workers and the Teamsters, speak for themselves, and are more in tune with the times. And on local levels, there is far more concern for youth, public opinion and the war than was reflected at this convention.

Finally, if labor hopes to exert influence in the 1970 Congressional elections, it has no choice but to repudiate the current standards of "good guys" and "bad guys" set up by Meany's adamant policies. Michael Harrington won in Massachusetts with a position on the war exactly opposite to that of Meany, and the youth who are becoming more active politically will be a major segment of the voters in 1970.

Nor can the building trades policies of endorsing conservative Democrats, as in Detroit, New York and New Jersey, bring success to the trade unions or produce the Negro-labor alliance in politics that Bayard Rustin called for in his speech defending the AFL-CIO record on race issues. At almost every turn, the AFL-CIO can break out of its self-imposed isolation only by repudiating the policies of George Meany.

B. J. WIDICK

MILITARY JUSTICE

Learning from the Green Berets

EDWARD F. SHERMAN

Mr. Sherman, a member of the Law School faculty at Indiana University, is completing a study of military justice. He served two years in the Army as a captain in the Judge Advocate General's Corps, and holds a reserve commission as captain in that service.

Whatever the impact of the Green Beret case upon American military prestige or the image of the intelligence organizations, there is not much doubt that the system of military justice has suffered. Senators and Congressmen have received heavy mail complaining about the military conduct of the case—the secrecy, the seemingly unnecessary incarceration of the defendants, the offers of immunity in return for prosecution testimony, the withholding of evidence from defense lawyers, and the influence of the area command. These objections go to the fundamental structure of the court-martial system, which for the first time since World War II is being seriously challenged.

It will be ironic if the Green Beret case serves to bring about reform of military justice. The Green Berets, members of the Army's most elite outfit, have hardly been advocates for curbing the powers of commanders or expanding rights of due process for servicemen. But that is precisely why the case may be so effective for reform. Criticisms of military justice have been coming for years from opponents of the military; now they have been voiced by career commissioned and noncommissioned officers from the Army's most gung ho outfit. The Green Beret defendants alleged that they could not receive a fair trial by court-martial and requested that civilian authorities or civilian courts step in, a request finally granted by the Secretary of the Army, apparently with the authorization of the President.

It cannot be lightly passed over that loyal supporters of the military establishment have asked for civilian interference in the Green Beret case. The military have over the years guarded nothing quite so jealously from civilian intervention as the independence of the court-martial system. "It will be a grave error," stated Gen. William T. Sherman in 1879, "if by negligence we permit the military law to become emasculated by allowing lawyers to inject into it the principles derived from their practice in the civil courts." When Congress in 1950 replaced the old Articles of War with the Uniform Code of Military Justice (which still governs the operation of courts-martial), it buckled under pressure from the military, leaving commanders in control of court-martial administration and preserving the autonomy of the military justice system. The civilian secretary of any of the services and the President have the power, theoretically, to overrule military determinations concerning courts-martial and to reduce or remit sentences, but the power has rarely been invoked because of the prevailing belief that the military know best how to handle their men and run their courts.

The taboo on civilian courts is even stronger. There is no means of direct appeal from a court-martial conviction to a federal court, and federal courts have assiduously refused to take jurisdiction of cases brought by servicemen who challenged military determinations or alleged court-martial errors that did not involve the Constitution. Military law, as the Supreme Court said in a 1953 case, "is a jurisprudence which exists separate and apart from the law which governs our federal judicial establishment. This court has played no role in its development; we have exerted no supervisory power over the courts which enforce it."

The willingness of the Green Beret defendants and their supporters to criticize the military justice system and to by-pass the court-martial by appealing to the Secretary of the Army and the federal courts reflects a change in public attitudes toward the military. Only two and a half years ago, criticisms very similar to those made by the Green Berets' lawyers were raised by Capt. Howard Levy, who was court-martialed in May 1967 for refusing to teach Green Berets and for making anti-war statements. Captain Levy's court-martial, like the projected one for the Green Berets, was brought at the direction of a commander who was emotionally involved in the case, and command influence was apparent throughout the proceedings. Like the Green Berets, Levy was subjected to seemingly needless incarceration and restrictions pending trial; his mail and telephone calls were monitored; promises and threats were made to witnesses to obtain prosecution testimony; the press was excluded from the pretrial investigation, and the military issued its own self-serving version of the case; and certain witnesses and evidence were not made available to the defense. Levy was tried, as the Green Berets would have been, before a court chosen by the commander from among his officers, and neither Levy nor his civilian attorney was permitted to see a 180-page intelligence dossier on him which the defense believed contained important evidence. However, the climate was different in the spring of 1967; Levy's attempts to get the Secretary of the Army and the federal courts to intervene aroused little public interest and failed. He was sentenced to three years at hard labor.

Since the spring of 1967, there has been a dramatic change in public attitudes toward both the war in Vietnam (the Gallup poll, in late September 1969, showed that 58 per cent disapprove of the war, 32 per cent approve; these figures were almost exactly reversed in the spring of 1967) and the traditional immunity of the military from criticism. This has affected even the military's most protected preserve, the court-martial system. Courts-martial, which had rarely been reported in the press, became front-page news as the number of trials of dissenters rose; and with the expanded coverage came a public reaction against certain authoritarian and disciplinarian aspects of court-martial procedure.

In the spring of 1969, two very different court-martial cases attracted substantial attention, and resulted in unusual intervention by the secretaries of the services. The first involved the prosecution at the Presidio in California of a number of young soldiers who had staged a brief, peaceful sit-down strike to protest the shooting of a prisoner, and stockade conditions in general. In February, the first three to be court-martialed were found guilty of mutiny and sentenced to sixteen, fourteen and fifteen years' imprisonment. Protest against the convictions and sentences was widespread. Among others, a petition to the Secretary of the Army signed by a number of well-known law professors asked "whether the intense command interest in prosecuting these soldiers for serious crimes and the unusually severe sentences indicate that the court-martial proceedings did not result in a fair and impartial trial," and noted that "serious questions have been raised by these courts-martial concerning the administration of criminal law in our armed forces and the capacity of the present military justice system to insure basic due process rights to members of the military."

At first, the Secretary said it would be inappropriate for him to interfere, since the military appeals were adequate to insure that justice was done (he made a similar statement early in the Green Beret case). Then, under mounting public pressure, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, taking instruction from the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of the Army, announced the unusual step of cutting down the sentences to two years, although the military appeals had not yet been completed.

The second 1969 case involved the Pueblo crew. When the Navy completed its Board of Inquiry hearings concerning the seizure of the Pueblo, it announced that it would court-martial Commander Bucher and certain other crew members. Acting in response to a storm of adverse criticism, the Secretary of the Navy overruled this decision and dismissed the cases.

The Presidio, Pueblo and Green Beret cases, although different, have all had the effect of breaking through the precedent that the civilian sphere should not interfere with the manner in which the military disciplines its men. In each instance, the motive behind the public clamor seems to have been not so much that the defendants were innocent, as that the military was out to get them and that they would therefore not receive a fair trial in a court-martial. There appears to have been an underlying feeling that the military was using the court-martial, not dispassionately to determine guilt or innocence but to punish ideological nonconformity and make an example (the Presidio case), or to find a scapegoat (the Pueblo case), or to satisfy personal animosities and further institutional ambitions (the Green Beret case).

One might be tempted to conclude that the intervention of the secretary in each of these cases was appropriate and that this, therefore, is a satisfactory way to remedy court-martial injustice. However, that manner of redress provides only temporary relief in individual cases; it does not cope with basic deficiencies in the system. Further, the Secretary's dismissal of court-martial charges, as in the Pueblo and Green Beret cases, does not even insure that justice has been done in the individual case. If, indeed, the Green Berets committed murder, or if Commander Bucher was derelict in his duties to the point that he violated definite military criminal laws, then society, as well as the military, has an interest in their prosecution.

Intervention by the Secretary to dismiss the case accomplishes none of the objectives of a sound criminal law system. It provides no deterrence for similar crimes in the future; it leaves the accused in limbo with no chance to clear his name if innocent, or to serve his sentence if guilty. It does not insure fair and equitable administration of the law in the future, for the decision is made, not on the merits but according to primarily political considerations, such as the desire to shield certain organizations from embarrassment or to mute public clamor. It also tends to discriminate against others whose complaints about military injustice are similar but who are not fortunate enough to have a case that excites press attention and public sympathy. Finally, unlike intervention by a federal court to protect the constitutional rights of a serviceman, the Secretary's intervention is not guided by judicial precedent. Thus it is not surprising that, after the initial rejoicing over Secretary Resor's decision to dismiss the charges, no one, neither the Green Beret defendants, the military, the CIA nor the public, is really satisfied with the outcome.

But despite the unsatisfactory resolution of that case, it has served very usefully to release, at last, the cause of military justice reform from the ideological limitations of the hawk-dove controversy and to indicate that, unless changes are made in the basic court-martial structure, awkward and unsatisfactory interventions may have to continue. Like no other event in the post-World War II period, it has moved the Congress to look critically into military justice.

The defects in military justice procedures which became evident in the Presidio, Pueblo and Green Beret cases result primarily from old authoritarian and disciplinarian practices which the Congress failed to remove from the court-martial system in 1950. There had been 1.7 million courts-martial during World War II and 100 capital executions; 45,000 servicemen were still imprisoned when the war ended. Senators and Congressmen were flooded with complaints about "drum-head justice" and unduly severe sentences. A special committee headed by Gen. James Doolittle found that injustice and discrimination were prevalent in courts-martial cases and called for "a new philosophy in the military order, a policy of treatment of men, especially in the ranks, in terms of advanced concepts of social thinking." But by the time the various bills which were thereupon drafted had worked their way through the committees, the Uniform Code of Military Justice contained little to cure the evils. The code did extend substantial due process safeguards to servicemen in courts-martial (such as the right to a lawyer in a general court-martial and a broad right against self-incrimination), but it preserved the basic structure of the old system.

Several conspicuous defects in the administration of military justice deprive servicemen of a fair and impartial trial. The first, and most important, has been mentioned earlier. It is "command control," and its effect is that the individual commander who decides to prosecute one of his men controls the court-martial machinery and appoints the personnel. Our civilian law places particular importance upon the separation of functions and independence of individuals who administer the criminal process. The district attorney decides whether or not to prosecute; the grand jury must indict; the judge is an independent official, and the defense counsel is hired by or appointed for the defendant; the jury is picked from the defendant's peers by random selection from the community, and the appeals courts are independent tribunals. Under the court-martial system, the commander plays a part in all these functions. He decides whether to prosecute and can court-martial a man even over the contrary recommendation of an investigating officer; he can handpick the jury from among the officers under his command, and both prosecutor and defense counsel from his legal officers. And when the trial is over, he has the power to review the sentence.

The commander also has an amazingly broad range of administrative powers over the conduct of the court-martial. He frequently enters a pretrial agreement with the accused, promising to cut down the sentence if the man will plead guilty. He frequently grants immunity to other servicemen if they will testify against the defendant. He determines whether or not a defense counsel should be allowed to subpoena witnesses and obtain other evidence before trial. He appoints the court and in certain situations can excuse court members, even after the trial has begun. He can reverse a dismissal of charges that the court has granted on such grounds as denial of a speedy trial, and order the trial to proceed. He is the immediate superior of the staff judge advocate, who carries out a number of supposedly impartial functions in the court-martial, and has the power to rate him, to determine his assignments, leaves, etc. Although the commander is forbidden from attempting to influence the decision of a court, he is in a position to do so, quite legally, in countless ways. It is understandable, then, that the Green Beret defendants, charging that General Abrams had an intensely personal interest in the outcome of their trial, petitioned to have the case tried in a federal court.

The second most important defect in the court-martial procedure is the absence of a right to a grand jury hearing and to trial by jury. Although the code of 1950 provides for a pretrial investigation that is usually more thorough than what a civilian grand jury provides, the commander is not bound by the investigating officer's recommendation. Thus, although the investigating officer found no evidence to support charges of mutiny against some of the Presidio defendants, the commanding general overruled his recommendations and tried them for mutiny anyway. The right to trial by a jury of one's peers, chosen at random, is a basic assumption of civilian criminal law. A serviceman is permitted to request that one-third of the court chosen by the commander be from the enlisted men, but commanders then invariably appoint high-ranking noncommissioned officers, who are usually the most rigid disciplinarians in the service, and the right is rarely exercised. Thus courts-martial are usually made up entirely of officers, and they often reflect not only a heavily disciplinarian and class-oriented bias but also the attitudes of their commander on discipline, offenses and sentences.

The third defect embraces a wide variety of practices and procedures which relate to the extraordinary power which the military is able to exert over a defendant in a court-martial and which often affects its outcome. Servicemen have fewer rights of privacy than do civilians; therefore it is easier for the command to monitor telephone calls, censor mail, exclude visitors, and impose restrictions on a defendant. Although military courts have generally recognized the Supreme Court's opinion concerning the right to warning before interrogations and the exclusion of evidence resulting from an unlawful search or seizure, searches and "shake-downs" are permitted on a military reservation by authority of the commander, and therefore it is relatively easy for military police legally to obtain incriminating evidence. Military provisions for bail, both before trial and pending appeal, are inadequate. Commanders are vested with excessively broad discretion in the matter of release pending trial. The new Military Justice Act of 1968 provides, for the first time, that a convicted serviceman can be released during the period when his appeal is being completed, but leaves such release to the sole discretion of the commander. This has produced one of the most severe injustices of the court-martial system: servicemen have been made to begin serving their sentences immediately upon conviction; thus even when their conviction was later overturned, they have spent substantial periods behind bars. (Full military appeals are sometimes not completed for several years.) It is still too early to determine whether the 1968 Act will be administered to provide a liberal right to bail pending appeal, but results so far indicate the contrary.

A fourth defect is the allegation of extremely vague crimes, such as "disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces," or "conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces" (Article 134), or "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" (Article 133). These vague crimes provide a commander much more latitude in ordering a case to trial than civilian law permits a district attorney, and they would be held unconstitutionally vague and overbroad in a civilian court. They have traditionally been used by commanders to punish a wide variety of conduct which displeases him (Article 134 is known as the "Devil's Article" because the terms are so broad that almost any conduct can be found to come under it), and have been especially used in the period of Vietnam to court-martial dissenters. One of the more popular charges brought in such cases under Article 134 has been the making of "disloyal statements . . . with design to promote disloyalty among the troops."

A fifth defect in military justice is the inadequacy of the appeals system. There are three levels of appeal from a court-martial conviction: administrative reviews by the commander and legal officers; the Courts of Military Review, and the Court of Military Appeals. The right of the commander to review a court-martial conviction is an anachronism from the day when a sentence was not considered final until the commander had approved it. Although the commander today is permitted only to decrease the sentence, his power of review creates an undesirable influence on the court. It has not been uncommon for a commander to let it be known that he wishes courts-martial to impose the maximum sentence, so that he may or may not cut it down, as he sees fit; some officers still feel that this is the appropriate way for a court to function. As a result, court-martial sentences are sometimes outrageously severe, and the defendant is then dependent on the good will of the commander.

The Courts of Military Review are made up of three members, usually military legal officers. The code does not permit appeal to these courts for sentences of less than a bad conduct discharge or one year's confinement, and this limitation means that in many cases, the accused will receive only the review of the commander and a legal officer in his command. The Courts of Military Review have never displayed much independence from official military positions. That can be explained, in part, by the fact that they are appointed from the staff of the judge advocate general and can be removed at any time. Until they achieve tenure and develop some sense of independence, they will not provide the kind of impartial review to which a civilian is entitled in an appellate court.

The Court of Military Appeals, the highest military court, is composed of three civilians appointed for fifteen-year terms by the President. It is the outstanding achievement of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and can take the credit for producing the first body of military common law and for keeping the military abreast of Supreme Court decisions on criminal due process. However, the right to appeal to the court is discretionary with it, and it hears only a tiny percentage of the total courts-martial. Also, it has proved to be a cautious court and, particularly in areas of individual rights, it has lagged behind the Supreme Court. Perhaps the most serious defect in the Court of Military Appeals structure is its lack of the broad equitable and extraordinary powers available in civilian courts. Although it has recently claimed to have "all-writs powers," it has not granted relief in most of the cases coming before it that involved requests by servicemen for injunctive or other protection from illegal or unconstitutional military determinations. Since servicemen are generally unable to get federal court relief, it is especially important that the Court of Military Appeals be empowered and administratively enabled to grant a wide variety of remedies.

Those are the major areas to which the Congress will have to give attention, if it is to raise military justice to the level of civilian justice. The military will claim, no doubt, that the duties and responsibilities of the services require that commanders continue to control courts-martial, that juries be officers chosen by the commander and that vague crimes be invoked to haul servicemen into court. But the military has adapted to reforms imposed from the outside before, and it will do so again.

Even if the reform does not take place, the military justice system will probably not maintain its relative autonomy. The willingness of the Secretaries to interfere, under public pressure, is only one predictable consequence of maintaining the inequities of the court-martial. Two other developments, which have already begun in the federal courts, could seriously limit the independence and jurisdiction of the system. First, on June 2, 1969, in O'Callahan v. Parker, the Supreme Court ruled that a serviceman charged with a non-service-connected crime committed off post cannot be tried by a court-martial and thus denied the right to grand jury, trial by jury of his peers, and the other rights provided by civilian law. The Court made no bones about the inferior quality of the court-martial or its belief that a serviceman, under the circumstances of this case, should be given all the rights provided in a civilian court. Second, certain federal courts have in the last year displayed a greater willingness to accept jurisdiction of suits brought by servicemen who challenge the legality of various types of military determinations.

Both developments appear warranted by the present state of military justice. Unless reforms are made in the code, it is likely that still more cases will be removed from court-martial jurisdiction and that expanded review of military determinations by federal courts will bring the military under greater civilian control. The state of military justice is very much in flux, as the defects of an anachronistic system of criminal law have suddenly manifested themselves. The Congress has a clear duty to legislate sufficiently sweeping reform to overcome the disquieting fact that 3.5 million servicemen are bound by an inadequate system of criminal justice.

OPERATION SISYPHUS

Wetbacks, Growers and Poverty

SHELDON L. GREENE

Mr. Greene is general counsel for California Rural Legal Assistance and a specialist in litigation challenging the employment of nonresident alien labor.

San Francisco

The bracero program died in 1968, after a long illness. Under its provisions, 4.5 million Mexican temporary workers were brought into the United States between 1942 and 1963 as supplementary farm labor. Officially terminated by Congress in 1963—long after the World War II labor shortage which it was intended to ease had ended—it finally trickled to a halt in August 1968 when Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz denied a request by California tomato growers for 2,200 Mexican farm workers. He characterized this refusal of legal entry as "a historic step towards healing the migrant worker sore in California and in the entire United States." But current 1968-69 immigration records show the apprehension of 150,000 Mexican nationals who had entered the United States illegally, and the incidence of these wetbacks in American employment is perhaps triple the number caught. This would suggest that Secretary Wirtz's cure is at the most cosmetic.

Illegal entry by Mexican nationals has afflicted domestic low-income workers since World War II. In 1942, after Mexico had agreed to supply temporary workers under the bracero program, Texas farmers refused to meet agreed wages and working conditions. In response, Mexico for a time cut off the supply of workers, but U.S. Immigration authorities permitted thousands of Mexicans to cross the border illegally. They were then apprehended and "paroled" to Texas farmers, thus avoiding the terms of the international labor agreement. Farmers and border industries got cheap labor; domestic farm workers and El Paso garment workers and meat packers suffered wartime inflation but were forced to accept low wages if they wanted to work at all.

In 1954 the President's Commission on Migratory Labor studied the border labor problem and concluded: "The United States, having engaged in a program giving preference in contracting to those who had broken the law, has encouraged a violation of the immigration laws. Our government has thus become a contributor to the growth of an illegal traffic which it has responsibility to prevent."

That same year, the Justice Department launched Operation Wetback, a roundup of more than a million illegal entrants in an area stretching as far as St. Louis and Chicago. San Antonio alone harbored 331,000. The roundup seemed so successful that the Immigration and Naturalization Service stated optimistically in its 1955 report that it had ended the wetback problem. The boast proved premature.

The Border Patrol and the Investigation Section of the INS are diligent, outnumbered and outmaneuvered. The comparatively few illegal entrants who attempt to cross the natural, and for the most part barren, frontier on foot are easily spotted by the continual overhead observation of Border Patrol spotter planes; they are then picked up by ground patrols which run along exfoliated drag strips. Some few aliens risk their lives in airless car trunks and campers, or precariously flattened on a ledge beneath passenger cars. Such trips cost from $100 to $300. One recently ended in death by asphyxiation.

But for 70 to 80 per cent of the illegal entrants access is neither hazardous nor romantic. More than a million Mexican aliens carry visitors' permits. These salmon-colored cards, issued by the Mexican Government at a cost of about $80, authorize visits of seventy-two hours in an area not more than 25 miles from the border.

But the aliens, most of them, are not looking forward to a visit. The typical wetback meets an agent in Mexico who provides him with a routing or a contact. Once across the border, he is transported to a city, often Los Angeles, and there referred to a job. In some instances, the agents provide transportation by selling a group of wetbacks an automobile, in which they can better elude detection. Those who lack the cash are offered a "go now, pay later" plan under which the price of the car is deducted from future wages.

Once inside, the alien easily merges into urban or rural Chicano barrios. Anyone can get a Social Security card by filing an application; proof of legitimate entry or birth certificate is not required. Employers record the Social Security number and couldn't care less about the worker's status. It is a felony to induce an alien to enter the United States, to transport him or to harbor him from detection; but conservative legislators from farm districts have managed to exempt the employer of an illegal entrant from that chain of complicity, even when the employee is known to be a wetback.

Agriculture absorbs the bulk of the illegal entrants. During fiscal 1968, 38,950 of those apprehended were doing farm work. Wetbacks are preferred by most farmers because they are thought to work harder than Americans and to complain less about conditions. The minimum wage for farm work in California is $1.65 an hour; wetbacks in labor camps are lucky to earn $1.35, not enough to live on in California but four times the Mexican minimum wage. The rich regions of California are dotted with the grim labor camps which formerly housed braceros. Wetbacks now live in many of them, hidden well off public roads on land posted against trespassing.

While most wetbacks seek farm work during the busy seasons, substantial numbers are kept on the year around, or find off-season jobs during the very periods when domestic farm workers, residents of the area, are unemployed and dependent on public assistance. Winter unemployment in farm regions runs as high as 16 per cent of the domestic labor force; in California alone idle farm workers require $15 million in public assistance. Ten thousand wetbacks were caught in the five states that make up the Southwest in February 1969. From this figure one can assume that from 10,000 to 40,000 low-income families were displaced from jobs by wetbacks during the winter months, at a cost in taxes and loss of domestic wages amounting to tens of millions.

Surveys show that the prevalence of wetbacks also depresses wage levels, and encourages employers to ignore the laws governing wages and working conditions. Union leaders find it difficult to organize in areas saturated with wetbacks. A nationally reported example is the stubborn resistance Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has encountered in its efforts to sign contracts with the California table grape growers. Strikes are not a compelling argument with employers who can rely on Mexican nationals, and the union has been forced to organize a nation-wide consumer boycott of table grapes to achieve its purpose.

Displacement of local workers by wetbacks is no longer a predominantly rural problem, since illegal entrants increasingly gravitate to more permanent jobs in the cities. From 1,500 to 3,000 of them are caught each month in the Los Angeles metropolitan area. Recently, the Border Patrol uncovered a smuggling operation which specialized in supplying wetbacks for industrial jobs in Chicago.

Despite the seemingly impressive figures on apprehensions, the wetback problem is not being brought under control. The program is hampered from the start by a shortage of manpower and equipment. As one patrolman in the Stockton, Calif., area put it: "We stake out Route 99 and the smugglers hear of it and take another road. There aren't enough of us to cover all the main highways all the time." On any given day, approximately 300 officers are on duty in the five Southwestern states.

A more basic problem than the size of the Border Patrol is the ease of entry afforded by the visitor's card and the absence of administrative controls on its use. The zone of travel permitted by these cards (with no record kept of entry and departure) was recently reduced from 150 to 25 miles from the border and that is making it easier to tag violators en route to the big cities. Since the reduction, systematic road checks on approaches to Los Angeles have turned up hundreds of aliens with no residency documents.

However, Border Patrol officials complain privately of the Justice Department's failure to require fingerprints as part of the permit procedure. Lacking that identification, it is almost impossible to spot previous violators when they reappear at the border, and wetbacks who have been returned to Mexico re-enter again and again, visitor's permit in hand. Also, since no record is kept as to when a seventy-two-hour visit begins, a Mexican who has eluded detection for weeks or months can depart unquestioned.

The very volume of violators has dictated an informal handling of those caught, and this also fails to discourage the increasing traffic. Illegal entry is a crime for which the violator may be prosecuted in the federal courts and formally deported by the INS. Re-entry after such a deportation is a felony. But resort to these remedies is infrequent. The present policy is to allow the illegal entrant to leave voluntarily within three days of apprehension. Often he is permitted to get to the border on his own. Or he may be taken to a detention center in El Paso, Tex., or El Centro, Calif., to await bus transportation to the interior of Mexico at U.S. Government expense. Not only does the wetback get a free trip home but back wages are collected for him by Border Patrolmen. Voluntary return is likened by an INS administrator to a "game warden who discovers a hunter without a license and helps him carry the deer he's killed out of the park." Multiple returnees are seldom prosecuted and are formally deported only after the fourth, fifth or sixth entry, unless they are caught assisting other wetbacks to cross the border. A formal deportation procedure takes no more than fifteen minutes, and does not require the services of an attorney, but the INS claims that there are insufficient hearing officers to handle all the possible cases and that in any case deportation wouldn't stop the alien from trying again. Authorities do not even officially notify a grower when illegal entrants are found on his land.

Fortune

United States attorneys and judges regard illegal entry as an economic crime of low priority and most Americans sympathize with the wetback, who is after all a very poor man trying to get ahead. Few jurists or juries appreciate the relationship between illegal entry and the plight of the domestic poor. Federal prosecutors have little time even for wetback smugglers, accepting only aggravated cases for prosecution. Despite the high apprehension rate in Northern California—3,500 in August 1968—there has been almost no prosecution of smugglers or transporters. Officials suggest that strict enforcement, involving due process for each alien, would choke court dockets, overburden U.S. attorneys and tie up patrolmen as witnesses. The more pessimistic add that extensive prosecution would ultimately fill the prisons to capacity—a line of reasoning not applied to marijuana cases. INS investigators are hampered by the taciturnity of wetbacks, who refuse to say how they entered the country or who helped them to do so. Aware that failure to cooperate will not land him in jail, the alien has no inducement to reveal what he knows of the smuggling operation.

Recent lawsuits brought in California by domestic farm workers against growers using wetbacks allege that such employment is an unfair business practice calculated to lower their wages, diminish their employment opportunity and force them to seek public assistance at the taxpayers' expense. While employment of illegal entrants is exempt from the legal sanctions against harboring wetbacks, farm workers charge that growers are nevertheless criminally implicated, since offering wetbacks employment and shelter from detection is aiding and abetting in the crime of illegal entry. This resort to self-help law enforcement by the poor is a reflection on the failure of the Justice Department to perform its duties.

The ambivalence of the INS in the area of illegal entry is striking. The search for violators is persistent but ineffectual, and it seems clear that more could be done. The service operates on a budget of $86,450,000, more than half of which is committed to the four states bordering Mexico. Detention and transportation of apprehended illegal entrants alone costs $1.6 million, yet no funds can be found to hire more hearing officers and increase the number of formal deportations. Nor is there money to increase the Border Patrol and investigation staff, despite increased illegal entry and the much heavier work load demonstrated by the higher apprehension rates.

An obvious need is the fingerprint identification of seventy-two-hour permit holders. INS officials argue that it would be impractical to match the fingerprints of apprehended wetbacks against those of 1 million cardholders. Yet the need to check at most 500 fingerprints a day, the ostensible average number of wetbacks caught in the peak months, is small compared to the FBI's work load of 32,000 identifications a day from a file of 15 million sets of prints.

The replacement of cards at four-month intervals would make it easier to revoke the cards of violators. A requirement that holders of the unlimited entry permit post a bond to secure observance of the terms of entry, a device authorized in related immigration laws, could be an effective deterrent. Other steps could be taken to provide more effective enforcement. A recent act which authorizes a federal magistrate to handle petty crimes could undoubtedly speed the prosecution of numerous smuggling offenses as misdemeanors. Formal deportation following the second illegal entry within two years, the power to assess administrative fines in lieu of prosecution (thereby attaching a portion of the wages earned), and even the right to confiscate the vehicle used in the transportation of illegal aliens, as is done in narcotics smuggling, would also discourage the border hoppers.

Important remedial legislation is before House and Senate. A bill to prohibit the intentional employment of a person illegally in the United States was introduced on March 26, 1969 by Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. Michael Feighan. The measure is co-sponsored by nine Senators and twenty-three Representatives. But even if passed, it will not result in many prosecutions, since the present difficulties of proving smuggling will be compounded when the federal attorney must submit his case to a jury. However, the abrogation of the employment exemption, combined with occasional well-publicized prosecutions and stiff fines, should cure many employers of hiring wetbacks at bargain rates. Similarly, a bill introduced by Senator Mondale would amend the National Labor Relations Act to make it an unfair labor practice to employ aliens unlawfully present in the country, or to hire nonresident commuter aliens during a labor dispute. Any of these measures, applied for several years, would provide increasingly effective deterrence to illegal entry.

Even so, the problem of the wetback will remain as long as the Mexican-American border is open, the border economies remain interdependent, and American earnings are five to ten times the Mexican wage. But in our increasingly technological society, with its chronic unemployment among low-income unskilled and semi-skilled workers, it is a problem which cannot be ignored. The continued use of nonresident Mexican labor in border areas, a concession to the artificiality of the border, should be coupled with affirmative enforcement of wage standards and labor laws to provide domestic workers with earnings commensurate with living costs, at least equal access to jobs, and the freedom to bargain collectively.

Moreover, urban and rural areas distant from the border have no interdependence with the Mexican population and economy. Lack of enforcement in such places, except for the futile apprehension-return cycle, is really a subsidy to certain industries and subverts the Administration's policy to "move people off the welfare roles and onto the payrolls."

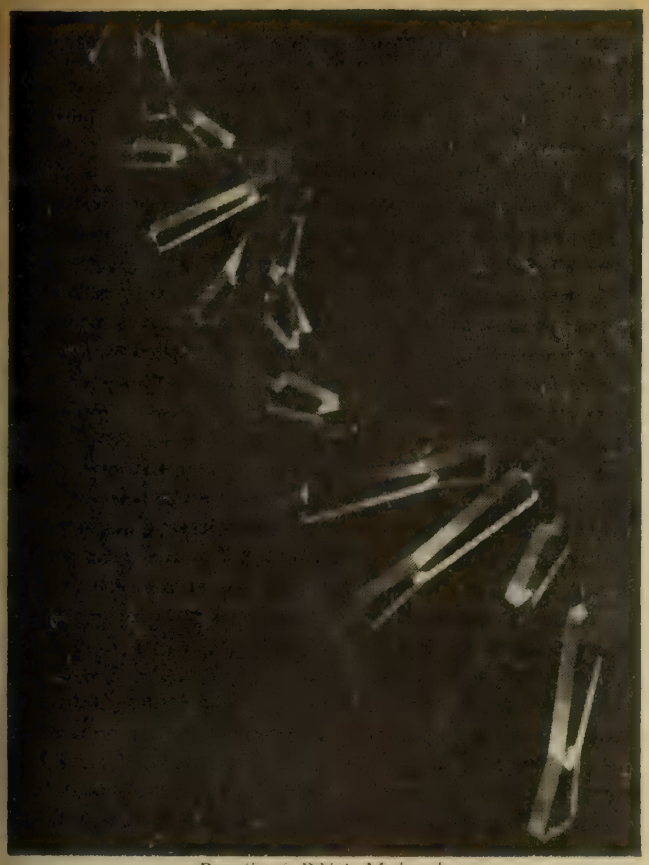
Despite the good record of the Border Patrol, administrative deficiencies in coping with the inflow of illegal entrants cannot be explained entirely by a lack of imagination or a lack of funds. It is not pure fantasy to conclude that the policy of the Justice Department on illegal entry is to do just enough to avoid wholesale criticism, without arousing the serious anger of anti-union employers who favor an abundance of cheap labor.

Modern Biology: A Terrifying Power

S. E. LURIA

Mr. Luria is Sedgwick Professor of Biology at M.I.T. He is the author of General Virology (John Wiley & Sons).

In the past twenty years, one has heard much talk of a biological revolution and of its consequences for mankind—not only in medical and economic achievement but in the nature of man itself. Man may soon be able to influence his own heredity directly, rather than only by the indirect process of eugenics. Scientists and science writers discuss such prospects with an uneasy mixture of optimistic predictions of benefits to come and dire warnings of possible catastrophes—as in Desmond Taylor's The Biological Time Bomb. Here I shall attempt to examine briefly the scientific basis of the expected developments, their probable nature, and the responsibility they present to both scientists and the public.



What has happened in biology in the last two decades is not a revolution but a scientific fulfillment. Modern biology started about 100 years ago with the foundation of Darwin's theory of evolution, which ties together all living organisms, past, present and future, into a single historical process of parenthood. The achievement of the last decades is the understanding of the nature, function and changes of the organic substrate of evolution, the genetic material, which is the stuff that carries from one generation to the next the set of instructions that dictate what an organism is, how it responds, and what kind of descendants it will in turn produce.

By 1952 the material of the genes was identified chemically as consisting of nucleic acid—generally (except in some viruses) desoxyribonucleic acid or DNA. In 1953 Watson and Crick proposed for the structure of DNA a model—the famous double helix—which not only proved to be correct but opened up entire new approaches to the study of the chemistry of heredity. Within the last sixteen years biologists have come up with the following satisfactory picture of what genes are and how they function.

A gene is a certain stretch in a long DNA fiber contained in the chromosomes of the cell nucleus. It carries in chemical imprint the detailed instructions for making both new copies of itself at each cell division and disposable "subcopies" or messages, which are used as instructions for synthesizing all the machinery of the cell. The messages are molecules of another kind of nucleic acid called RNA.

Gene structure and gene function are not immutable—if they were, evolution and development could not take place. On the one hand, the structure of genes can change by mutation, a relatively rare accidental change in chemical composition. Natural selection then brings about evolution by selecting for reproductive success those individuals endowed with particular genetic constitutions. On the other hand, the function of the genes in a cell is regulated by the environment, including the action of other genes in the same cell, the chemical messages from other cells, and also the external environment such as food and temperature. Thus while all cells of a complex organism have identical sets of genes (barring rare mutations), they function differently because some of their genes (which may number from a few thousand to several million, depending on the organism) receive different environmental signals.

The relevant point for this article is that all the essential features of the genetic process, insofar as they have been clarified, have turned out to be interpretable in strictly biochemical terms. No new principle or phenomenon has emerged to justify the assumption that some unique "vitalist" principle is at work in biological processes. This point is essential to a grasp of the present status and future course of biological technology. What molecular biologists have done is to make the genetic mechanism directly available to chemical experimentation. Arthur Kornberg and other biochemists have purified DNA from bacteria, viruses and from animal cells, including human cells. They have then caused it to produce more copies of itself in the test tube, under the influence of enzymes extracted either from the same organism or from other organisms. At the time of this writing, Ghobind Khorana is perfecting the chemical synthesis of a gene in the test tube. The chemical mechanisms of gene mutation have been clarified. The process of making gene messages, and the use of these messages to produce the individual pieces of cell machinery, have been duplicated and analyzed in the test tube. The nature of the chemical signals—the regulatory substances that turn on and off specific genes—is now known, at least in bacteria. Biochemists have purified some of these regulatory substances and demonstrated their actual attachment to the specific genes that they block or unblock.

Detail of DNA Molecule

Obviously such knowledge, which reaches to the most intimate level of the hereditary mechanism, can generate a new and powerful genetic technology. The traditional technology was applied in agriculture and husbandry to breeding desirable varieties of crops and animals, and in medicine to understanding, diagnosing and treating such genetic disorders as hemophilia, diabetes and phenylketonuria. Social application of classical genetics in the form of human eugenics has been advocated but seldom carried out. The selective elimination of genetic defects by restraining procreation on a voluntary basis has never found much favor. Positive "germinal selection"—that is, the spreading of exceptionally desirable sets of genes through sperm banks and artificial insemination—was advocated forcefully by the great geneticist, H. J. Muller, but has encountered many objections, including the ethical problems of who is to decide what is desirable in human heredity. In any case, germinal selection gives at best improved odds for superior progeny: the lottery of genetics—the random distribution of chromosomes and genes of each parent into different sperm cells or eggs—makes this process slow and inefficient.

In Brave New World, his nightmarish utopia of a conditioned humanity published in 1932, Aldous Huxley foresaw for the year 600 "After Ford" a type of eugenics based on artificial fertilization, twinning induced in the test tube, chemical conditioning of the growing embryos, and psychological conditioning of the growing children. Some of the embryological techniques imagined by Huxley, and others even more powerful, are rapidly approaching reality. For example, artificial fertilization of human eggs has been recently achieved in the test tube by Edwards and his co-workers in England. The separation and reshuffling of the cells of fertilized mouse eggs in course of division, followed by reimplantation and normal birth, has been accomplished by Beatrice Mintz. And more than twenty years ago, the nucleus of an unfertilized frog egg was replaced with the nucleus of an adult cell—a process that could produce at will large numbers of truly identical twins. It may soon become routinely feasible with mammals, including man. Thus, at least in principle, Huxley's made-to-order human being has become feasible much sooner than he anticipated.

But these embryological methods represent only a relatively clumsy, unrefined technology when compared to the one promised (or threatened) by true genetic surgery—the artificial correction, replacement, removal or addition of genes, based on the discoveries of molecular biology. A coupling of genetic intervention with embryological surgery would open the way to truly awesome possibilities. The actual applications are admittedly still very distant; but I believe it is not too soon to become aware of the prospects.

Here are some of the relevant facts. In bacteria, which are used most frequently for this kind of research, it is already possible to introduce genes or groups of genes as purified pieces of DNA molecules. Under appropriate conditions, these genes enter the cells with a high chance of replacing the corresponding resident genes. Thus a bacterium that is sensitive to streptomycin, for example, can be "transformed" to being resistant to streptomycin by replacement of the appropriate gene. The descendants of such a transformed bacterium are all resistant. When this process of gene replacement is carried out with unsorted DNA fragments it is very inefficient; but there are methods, still being perfected, for sorting out DNA fragments to correspond with individual genes or groups of genes. I mentioned before that the chemical synthesis and copying of genes in the test tube is also becoming possible. It is clear, therefore, that the ability to manufacture large amounts of any specific gene may soon, like all purely technical achievements, become only a matter of investing sufficient money and personnel.

The introduction of specific genes into human cells, especially in the cells of the germ line that give rise to sperm and egg, is still far from actuality. But developments that may lead in that direction are already at hand. Thus, at least in bacteria, some mild viruses can pick up one or more genes from the cells in which they have grown and transfer them to other cells. Then these genes may either replace the resident ones or become added, more or less permanently, to the gene set. In some cases the added genes upset the regulation of their new host, for example, by inhibiting the function of certain other genes.

Besides viruses, there are other, even less destructive, agents called episomes or plasmids, which in bacteria can transfer and add genes from one cell to another. It would not be surprising if similar phenomena were soon to be discovered in the cells of animals and of man, where they would provide a way to add or replace genes. In fact, some viruses that produce tumors in animals (and possibly also in man) have certain properties of the gene-transferring viruses. A major barrier to genetic intervention will be, of course, the difficulty of manipulating the germ cells. It is conceivable, however, that gene-carrying viruses could be made specific for the germ cells. Even the injection of DNA molecules into eggs in the course of artificial fertilization may become possible.

What kind of applications can we foresee for the discoveries that I have just outlined? By and large, they fall into four groups: medical, bio-industrial, social and military.

In medicine, we may envisage replacing the present treatments of genetic defects—for example, insufficient production of a hormone such as insulin—by supplying the proper gene to certain cells from the outside, or by implanting functional cells, or by causing the corresponding gene to become activated in other cells of the body which normally do not produce the hormone because of regulatory repression. Manipulations of this kind could also, for example, alter the immunological reactions that cause the body to reject foreign tissue, an achievement that would make organ transplants much more successful.

In the bio-industrial field, it might be possible to use direct genetic manipulation instead of selective breeding to manufacture more desirable or healthier strains of a variety of organisms, from yeasts to cereals to cattle, by implanting or removing specific genes or chromosomes.

With social applications, we enter the truly controversial field. If it becomes possible to manipulate the genes of the human germ line or to achieve artificial fertilization and nuclear transplantation with human eggs, we would be faced with the terrifying responsibility of deciding what we—the human race—intend to become. At the start, we may simply remove defective genes or replace them with their normal counterparts. Then we may start to fool around by introducing supposedly "desirable" genes. We may even be tempted to manufacture many identical copies of a supposedly "superior" individual; for example, by introducing identical nuclei from its cells into series of enucleated eggs, which may then be implanted in the wombs of foster mothers.

At this point, ethical and legal problems of a completely new nature and magnitude arise. Who is to decide what is desirable or undesirable, superior or inferior, in a man? The doctor? The state? And beyond that, what ethical and legal criteria would apply to human beings who are not born by a natural process but are the product of deliberate genetic manipulation? When does a "repaired" or "manufactured" man stop being a man (whatever that means) and become a robot, an object, an industrial product?

I shall refrain here from speculating on possible genetic weapons. Whereas the obstacles in the way of supposedly constructive genetic surgery are very great (but not insurmountable), the obstacles to destructive uses may be smaller, if only because any one of many possible noxious results may be "desirable" in the military sense. Thus, for example, we may witness efforts to invent viruses that can spread in an enemy population genes that produce sensitivity to poisons, or susceptibility to tumors, or even transmissible genetic defects—in other words, genetic genocide. The development of pathogenic germs resistant to certain antibiotics has been going on for years in the biological arsenals of "civilized" countries.

Finally, we should not ignore the possibility that genetic means of controlling human heredity will be put to massive uses of human degradation even outside the military context. Huxley's nightmarish society might be achieved by genetic surgery rather than by conditioning, and in an even more terrifying way since the process would be hereditary and irreversible.

The situation that I have tried to project, based on biological developments which are either current or reasonably predictable, is not unique to biology. Whenever a science develops to the point of generating new technology, it presents society with a mixed bag of opportunities and risks. The question that faces society is not that of feasibility. Once the scientific principles are established, technological application is almost certain to come. Thus, faced with the prospect of a new genetic technology, we must ask ourselves as soon as possible whether and how it will be used and what can we do about it. Optimists and pessimists differ. Robert Sinsheimer, of the California Institute of Technology, stresses "the chance to ease the internal strains and heal the internal flaws directly." Rollin Hotchkiss, of Rockefeller University, warns that in putting the new genetic technologies to supposedly constructive uses, "the pathway will, like that leading to all of men's enterprise and mischief, be built from a combination of altruism, private profit, and ignorance." But they both stress the need "to prepare now for the new reality" and "to caution an impatient altruism, curb an overenthusiastic self-interest, or offset an uninformed interventionism." These concerns have to do, of course, with the constructive possibilities. The destructive ones, military or otherwise, would be welcomed only by the most narrow-minded, Neanderthal type of rabid nationalist or totalitarian.

What can we do about it? The least rational and least effective approach would be to advocate a moratorium on science in order to prevent the rise of potentially misapplicable technologies. The human cultural enterprise depends on freedom of inquiry. Science, like the arts, has become an inseparable part of the intellectual adventure of man. What is needed, rather, is a rational machinery, both national and international, to determine sensible policies and priorities in the application of scientific knowledge. The present absence of such machinery is sadly reflected in the way decisions are made on major programs such as the man-on-the-moon venture. Even more relevant and more frightening is the apparent inability of organized society to cope with the menace of overpopulation, a threat greater than that of nuclear self-destruction.

Whether or not a rational decision-making machinery can be achieved within society as it is now structured, either in the United States or in any other country, remains to be seen. A recently published report of a Panel on Technology of the National Academy of Sciences deals with some of the issues in a constructive way. Its limited range of recommendations, however, provides little comfort to those who feel that the problems of technology and human life require radical action by informed and responsible governmental bodies.

Basically, we need to create a society in which technology is purposefully directed toward socially chosen goals. This is a political rather than a scientific task, and scientists can hardly be expected to provide the solution. What they can and must do, however, is face the problems within their own sphere of activity.

On the negative side, scientists can make a conscious effort not to promote or encourage technological development without having first faced and resolved in their own minds the social implications. On the positive side, scientists must assume the responsibility to tell society, in a forceful and persistent manner, what science is discovering and what the technological consequences are likely to be. We ought not to be deterred by the widespread and increasing ignorance of the public, including governments, in scientific matters, but rather should strive to break through that barrier. Long-term educational programs may be inadequate because time is short. Faster ways must be found to convey the practical implications of the modern world of science to the scientifically uncivilized public consciousness.

If these responsibilities, however limited, are to be met, most scientists must undergo a major change of attitude. I believe that such change can be brought about because the present and forthcoming realities—whether those of an overpopulated world or of a humanity that can remake itself in whatever image it chooses—are stirring and disturbing the imagination of more and more scientists. Still, active leadership will be needed to develop and crystallize within the scientific milieu an enhanced concern for the social consequences of science and for the responsibilities of its practitioners. Even more important, this leadership must find the way to awaken the public and their elected representatives from the complacency that lies behind the distorted priorities of present-day society.

HONG KONG

THE COMPLAISANT HAVEN

STEPHEN SALAFF

Mr. Salaff received his Ph.D. in applied mathematics from the University of California in 1966. Since then, he has been a Visiting Lecturer in Mathematics at the Chinese University of Hong Kong and has contributed articles on Japan, Okinawa and Hong Kong to the Far Eastern Economic Review.

Hong Kong

Hong Kong is now enjoying an economic boom, and Britain is confident enough in its future stability to have guaranteed credit for a cross-harbor tunnel linking the island for which the colony is named with the Kowloon peninsula. China has quietly offered, in the South China Morning Post (April 18), to supply its Five Rams brand of portland cement at a competitive price for the tunnel. Another multimillion-dollar expansion project for which local developers are trying to get funds is the extension of the airport runway to handle the jumbo jet; several new tourist hotels are already being built to accommodate the extra crowds of tourists which the jumbos will carry.

The builders of the tunnel will be careful not to obstruct the warships of the U.S. Seventh Fleet which steam into the well-situated natural harbor from maneuvers in Korean and Southeast Asian waters, and from combat posts off Vietnam. These ships have for years been dropping anchor at the rate of thirty to forty a month. In addition, military and commercial planes bring troops daily from Saigon and Danang. The American servicemen arrive in Hong Kong for six days of rest and recreation (R&R) and the commercially oriented colony welcomes them because tourism is its second industry, and, according to Hong Kong Government figures, two out of seven tourists now arriving are R&R men. Each of them spends on the average $350, and the 220,000 troops who visited here in 1968 thus shelled out more than $77 million, one-third of Hong Kong's total tourist income. Time (May 31, 1968) estimated Hong Kong's R&R windfall to be $100 million a year.

There are two conflicting views of Hong Kong in the British Establishment. One, according to the Far Eastern Economic Review, sees it as "an embarrassing colonial anachronism hung around the unwilling neck of a Britain intent on withdrawing from Asia." The other, that of "businessmen and manufacturers with a solid stake in the colony's future," looks upon it as a "challenge" calling for imagination and resourcefulness, so that "Hong Kong can play a role in the future of the Chinese people." The factions agree, however, that the colony must continue to run on its traditional laissez-faire economic basis, supporting its own population without substantial corporation taxes and without help from London. And the second group is only a little behind the first in its determination to make as many fast bucks as possible, in particular by wide-armed greeting for R&R.

But Hong Kong depends also on the People's Republic of China for half of its foodstuffs, much of its clothing and household staples, and part of its critical water supply. Reciprocally, Chinese goods are sold at rock-bottom prices in the Hong Kong "China Products" stores and from these abundant sales and re-exports through Hong Kong to Southeast Asia and beyond, China derives fully half of its foreign currency. Substantial remittances from overseas Chinese to their families and clansmen reach the mainland via the Hong Kong branch of the Bank of China. Peking also uses the colony as the mainland entry point for the thousands of Japanese, German and other businessmen who attend the Trade Fairs in Canton, nearby capital of Kwangtung Province.

London Illustrated News

Thus Hong Kong's position as a tax-free port contains economic advantages for both China and the capitalists of the West, and on the shrewd guess that China will not call a halt for some time to come, investors from the NATO countries and Japan, and from among overseas Chinese, are putting large sums into tourism, transport and industry. Hong Kong's sister colony of Macao, whose continued existence under the Portuguese flag is a symbolic blow to the freedom fighters trying to exorcise the Lusitanian bogy on the African continent—is experiencing a similar growth. That is also a sign to investors that China does not intend to change the status quo.

China's policy toward Hong Kong and Macao is related to its primary foreign policy demand—that the United States withdraw the Seventh Fleet from the Taiwan Strait and acknowledge that Taiwan is a part of China. Officials and analysts feel that the present territorial position in Hong Kong and Macao will last at least until the Taiwan problem is resolved in a way satisfactory to Peking. The benefits which R&R in the meantime bring to Hong Kong caused one leading U.S. consular official there to predict: "Communist China won't break its rice bowl in Hong Kong by throwing the Fleet out of here." It is of course quite possible that if the British had been unable in May 1967 to suppress the uprising that attempted to alter the internal power balance, the Hong Kong patriotic Chinese (a designation followers of the CPR prefer to "Communist," which they never use) would have begun strongly to oppose the R&R program. But everyone now seems prepared to forget the strikes and police suppression, and the revenge bombings which followed, and the pro-mainland sector is trying to rebuild its own financial and commercial machine. It is allowed to have its own businesses and newspapers and to study the thoughts of Mao Tse-tung in patriotic schools, but the police come down hard on anti-Hong Kong Government activities and demonstrations. The patriotic press opposes R&R, but the one feature story on the subject it has printed so far this year did not mention the war in Vietnam. It was an attack on "Western ways" among the youth—the corrupt Pop music and dancing culture, and the Anglo-Chinese schools, which have duped "70 per cent of Hong Kong's approximately 12,000 bar girls" into the trade by providing them with a debilitating "slave" education.

Chinese patriots sometimes rationalize the R&R program as just one in a long string of indignities perpetuated by foreigners at the southern gate of China. Given this historical outlook and the CPR's line on Taiwan, one can perhaps understand why Peking's "serious warnings" on U.S. intrusions into Chinese sea and air space and its protests to the United States in Warsaw about the occupation of Taiwan are regarded as reasonable and sufficient opposition to American military exploitation of Hong Hong on behalf of the Vietnamese War. To help their Vietnamese comrades, Chinese patriots are glad to sell Mao buttons and quotations to American sailors visiting Hong Kong from the war zone, but the rank and file, well disciplined and under the tight control of mainland and mainland-trained cadres, is instructed not to make anti-imperialist propaganda among the U.S. troops. The leadership knows that if anti-war leaflets were distributed to the visitors, some of them would inevitably insult China, and fights would break out. This would spoil the present mood of profitable amity. Thus there are no anti-Vietnamese War demonstrations in Hong Kong, and no resistance organizations like Japan's Beheiren to incite and aid dissenting servicemen into deserting.

Wanchai, located near the island's Central District, is the hub of the R&R circuit. It is a typical Chinese quarter, packed with small shops, peddlers, schools and street restaurants for the residents. Sailor bars, R&R tailor shops and pizza houses are thoroughly intermixed with the normal Chinese street life. The frustrated, vulnerable sailors who roam Wanchai are touted by pimps, rickshaw pullers and pornography hustlers, but are ignored by as many coolies who hurry past carrying heavy loads on their shoulder poles. The American sailors and the Chinese population are far apart culturally, but the Chinese are patient and acquisitive. With shore patrols and military police sitting on the whole area the open clashes which might be expected in such an incongruous situation have not occurred. Wanchai is also one of the patriotic strongholds, and the movement's newspapers, department stores, schools and union offices are to be found on every large street. But the patriotic Chinese have boxed themselves off politically from the servicemen, and often a left-wing union office peacefully occupies the upper floor of a building that houses a sailor bar on the street level.

It pays for Britain to profess that the R&R program is militarily trivial and that, in any case, if the U.S. troops were forced to leave Hong Kong they would simply "go somewhere else." Harold Wilson has managed with this argument to divert the London anti-war demonstrations away from the Hong Kong R&R issue, but the rebuttal is obvious. To the U.S. military command, which must offer its warriors a chance to soothe their pains and cares, R&R in Hong Kong has a straightforward military function which cannot easily be spread around to other ports. As the Hanoi Vietnam Courier put it on February 3: "The gigantic military apparatus of the USA possesses enormous means supposedly capable, if not of inflating chockablock the morale of the GIs, at least of preventing such a rapid sinking as we have witnessed. Substantial material privileges have been granted to those in Vietnam: pay hike, rest and recreation in reputed and most attractive cities in the Far East and the Pacific including Hong Kong, Bangkok, Singapore, Manila, Taipei, Honolulu, Yokosuka, etc." The annual number of R&R arrivals in most of the cities on Hanoi's list is less than Hong Kong's 220,000, and with massive Japanese anti-war protests to climax in 1970, and clearly discernible centrifugal tendencies in SEATO lands, not many of them could support a big increase without serious political repercussions.

Related to the logistics of locating play space for the men is the problem of finding ports for the ships to which they are attached. All of the Seventh Fleet's powerhouse types—carriers, cruisers and nuclear subs—call on Hong Kong for the R&R visits of their crews. The Enterprise, the world's largest warship, with more than 5,000 men, arrived in May 1968 for its third visit, and many of the Fleet's other nuclear-powered carriers have been to Hong Kong. The same nuclear subs which cause violent mass protests on the Japan mainland and in Okinawa because of the radioactivity they are alleged to impart to the local waters, often tie up at buoy number A 11 on Hong Kong harbor's central fairway, without even the possibility that contamination will be mentioned publicly in the colony. The freedom to bring in the whole range of nuclear-powered vessels is a special advantage afforded by Hong Kong, and if the composition of the American military force in Asia shifts further toward the "seaborne nuclear deterrent," the Navy might value still more an invitation to put in at Hong Kong.

Last August, Donald Stone, vice chairman of SNCC, was asked to address a mass rally in Naha, Okinawa. He encouraged the people under U.S. military occupation there to persist in their efforts to rid themselves of the huge American base, no matter how many dollars it has been pumping into their sadly depressed economy. It would "make whores of your women, pimps of your men, and it will seduce your souls. Once you begin to flirt with American dollarism you are lost. It will in the end mean the death of all that is beautiful, vibrant and alive in you." Stone's eloquent plea to the Okinawans would strike home to many of those British and Chinese who have been taking R&R blood money in Hong Kong. But it will not trouble their hearts in the night, because it could not be printed today in any newspaper in the Crown colony.

REMEMBER THE HATCH ACT?

CHARLES O. JONES

Mr. Jones is Maurice Falk Professor of Politics at the University of Pittsburgh. He was a member of the Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel in 1966 and 1967, and is the author of several books on American politics.

We get used to thinking that certain groups of people don't really deserve the full rights of our society. Children's "rights" are hardly even discussed—they are kids after all. The rights of high school and college students are suddenly very much in the forefront and many question whether they should have the freedom of real people. Blacks still must struggle daily to maintain the glimmer of recognition which they have won during the last decade.

I have no poll data on the point, but I have a hunch that most people put government employees in this category: public servants are just that—servants to us all. And servants do not deserve the privileges of their masters.

The present Hatch Act, limiting the political participation of government employees, is a good example of law based on the assumption that some people merit fewer rights than do others. The Act states very simply: "No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal government or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns." Actually a similarly broad prohibition has applied to persons in the Civil Service since 1907 (under Civil Service Rule IV). The Hatch Act was passed during the depression, in the wake of criticism that WPA funds were being used for political purposes. In addition to extending coverage, the Act provides stiff penalties for violators.

What does taking "any active part" mean? The law specifies that it does not include voting or expressing opinions. For the rest, however, employees are barred from activities that the Civil Service Commission "has heretofore determined" (before the passage of the Act) should be prohibited: serving in any capacity for a political party (including as a delegate to a convention), soliciting contributions, addressing a political club or meeting on a partisan matter, poll activity (including driving voters to the polls), becoming a candidate for office, distributing campaign material, initiating or circulating party nominating petitions, organizing a political meeting.

So the government employee knows that he does not have all the rights that others enjoy. But because the law merely assumed that he should be denied these rights—giving no clear rationale for specific denials—the employee is faced with an impenetrable "mishmash" of rules and regulations. In this connection, I recommend Pamphlet 20, "Political Activity of Federal Officers and Employees." Written as an authoritative source of information on the subject, it is a welter of confusion. The government employee must wade through the provisions of Civil Service Rules, the Hatch Act, coverage of the Act, prohibited activities, and the criminal code on political activities. Permitted activities are not mentioned. Indeed, until very recently, the Civil Service Commission did not even list permitted activities on its warning poster at election time. Surveys show considerable ignorance of the "do's and don't's" (e.g., 45 per cent of those enjoined thought they could drive voters to the polls). The result is inactivity for the timid ("when in doubt, don't") and very thin ice for the bold.

To say that the Hatch Act is confusing and ambiguous, and that its implementation is too negative, is not to say that government employees should be able to participate without restraint in political activity. It has long been recognized that the public has a right to impartial administration of government business. However, if one starts from the assumption that government employees have in principle the same political rights as any other group of citizens, one automatically becomes cautious about restrictions, weighing each one carefully in terms of the Constitution, the advantages to be gained for the public interest, the effect on the Civil Service. That viewpoint protects against blanket prohibitions or the blind acceptance of past practices.

A revision of the Hatch Act, based on the recognition and protection of employee rights, is sorely needed. An employee should be able to find out precisely what he can do in politics, what he can't do, what he need not do, and why. Every effort should be made to preserve the integrity, efficiency and impartiality of the Civil Service without limiting the rights of employees. For example, the criminal code now protects employees from coercion or intimidation for political purposes. Section 602 of Title 18 provides a fine of $5,000 or three years' imprisonment for any official or employee who solicits or receives political contributions from a fellow employee. We all know of, or have heard of, violations of this section of the law —political dinners being the most common device—but who knows of any prosecutions? Complaints must be referred by the Civil Service Commission to the Department of Justice, with accompanying evidence for criminal prosecution. John W. Macy, Jr., former chairman of the Civil Service Commission, summarized the experience under this provision in a hearing before the Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel: "To my knowledge there have been very few cases. . . . I am unable to cite any." Leo M. Pellerzi, former general counsel of the Civil Service Commission, pinpointed the difficulty: "You have to have evidence to show it and it is very difficult. . . . A criminal provision imposes on the Department of Justice a burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt."

The Civil Service Commission has recommended that the Hatch Act be revised to strengthen the prohibitions on coercion and use of official authority for interfering in elections. This would involve unifying some of the provisions now spread across the Hatch Act, the Civil Service rules and the criminal code. It would also provide a civil penalty for coercion, whether in solicitation of funds or services. Instead of "burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt," Pellerzi testified, "a civil provision imposes upon the Civil Service Commission a burden of substantial evidence and it makes a tremendous difference in your ability to prosecute violations."

Effective protection from coercion would reduce the need to limit employees' rights, since a major evil would be controlled. The present theory appears to be that, since coercion is not effectively regulated, an employee's only protection is the list of "don'ts" compiled by the Civil Service Commission. When asked to do something, he can hide behind the law. Such a procedure shackles the employee; to be protected he must sacrifice political rights. Surely there must be a better way to insure impartiality in public administration. Serious effort should be made to restrain those who would coerce, rather than all civil servants.

Though the philosophical and constitutional reasons for changing the Hatch Act are indeed compelling, other arguments have merit. Government performs more functions, is more a part of our lives, with every passing day; and no prediction is safer than that government will continue to expand. Intelligent, competent and imaginative people are needed to staff government at all levels. Will such persons be attracted to the service if they must needlessly sacrifice political rights?

The spread of the federal government implies a greater quantity as well as a higher quality of employees. Current provisions of the Hatch Act extend coverage to those in state and local government "whose principal employment is in connection with an activity financed in whole or in part by Federal loans or grants." Estimates vary, but the current conservative guess is that federal grants-in-aid will quadruple in the next five years, from $15 billion to $60 billion. Most state and local employees may soon be covered by the Hatch Act—indeed, we may all be working for the government eventually! It is fascinating to contemplate a democracy in which no one could run for office or participate in campaigns.

The existing Hatch Act officially differentiates between partisan and nonpartisan activities. Another reason for revising the law is that such a distinction cannot be made. Employees are permitted to run for nonpartisan local public office if the issues involved are not identified with a national or state political party. Many partisan elections in this country are labeled "nonpartisan"—for example, elections to the Chicago City Council are legally nonpartisan, but anyone in that city can give you the party breakdown of seats. Even when an office is less closely identified with political parties—e.g., a local school board—the issues are seldom nonpartisan. Education is certain to be a part of every party's platform, and of every legislative, gubernatorial or Presidential candidate's speech.

Though it is always dangerous to predict how the Supreme Court will act, an additional argument for revision is that the present law would probably be declared unconstitutional if a case ever got to the Court. The Hatch Act was upheld in United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947) by a 4 to 3 decision, the majority viewing its provisions as a proper exercise of power to protect the integrity and neutrality of the civil service. The decision was narrow, however, and issued by a "short" Court. Still in contention are the rights of employees under the First Amendment—speech, press, assembly and petition. Considering the Court's concern in the past two decades for First Amendment freedoms, it seems plausible that the Hatch Act would not survive today.

The recent California supreme court decisions may anticipate U.S. Supreme Court action in this area. The little Hatch Act in Alameda County was ruled unconstitutional in 1964 and the state provisions were ruled unconstitutional in 1966. In both cases, the majority argued that the restrictions were too broad and too vague, thus violating the First Amendment. If one were to project the California court's argument to the national situation, it would go something like this: Congress cannot lightly restrict First Amendment freedoms as a condition for public employment. It can do so only if it establishes compelling cause, and even then other means for achieving that cause must be unavailable. These are reasonable conclusions, but they have not guided the development of legislation in this sensitive area.

Preservation of an impartial civil service is, indeed, a compelling cause. Evidence on the bad effects of the spoils system is available in the record books or in the contemporary management of a good many cities. Testimony in Chicago and Cook County disclosed that "city employees who are patronage appointees must man their precinct, canvass, pay their dues, purchase tickets, refrain from opposing the party line in any open or blatant or embarrassing way." The chairman of the Cook County Civil Service Commission testified that absenteeism among workers in a county hospital was at least 80 per cent for two days before an election, on the day of the election, and on the day after.

Thus some regulations are necessary to preserve the civil service merit system. The question is how to accomplish it and yet preserve the greatest possible degree of freedom for employees. Reasonable men will differ on precise prohibitions, but if they agree that political rights should not be denied without elaborate justification, the result will be a vast improvement over existing regulations.

The immediate prospects for change are not good. A twelve-member Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel, established in 1966, issued a report calling for major revision. The commission had conducted hearings, surveyed government workers, reviewed the complex legal questions, studied regulations in other nations, analyzed everything written on the subject. The hearings, research and findings are all published and available to Congress, but no commission report has ever enjoyed less Congressional attention. Legislation was introduced in the House and Senate in 1968, but no one seriously thought anything would be done in an election year.

The case for change is so overwhelming that one naturally asks why nothing happens. The reasons are not hard to find. Members of Congress are instinctively cautious about any legislation proposing reforms that would affect the election system. They want to hold their seats, and few of them really know how they won them—though in answer to any such question, they will recite the formula for their last campaign. Since they are so insecure, any proposal for change can bring an attack of nerves. Campaigning for re-election is difficult enough, they argue, without changing the rules of the game. So, as with legislative redistricting, or electoral college reform, or campaign finance regulations, or any number of ballot changes, Representatives and Senators approach the issue of increased political freedom for government employees by weighing the implications for their districts and states. They know how things work out under the present law; any change is a gamble. Will employees organize against them because of their stands on issues affecting the civil service? Will they run their own candidates against the incumbents? Are they likely to support one party? Which party would be more hobbled by enforcement of laws against coercion?

This prudence, combined with the existing political split between the White House and Congress, produces the ultimate formula for inaction. It is difficult enough to change the election system when one party is in charge. But give the White House to a veteran Republican like Richard M. Nixon, and the Congress to a majority of tough partisan Democrats, and the result is no result.

So the underclass in American politics—government employees—is destined to remain just that for the time being. They can never enjoy full rights of citizenship if the integrity of the merit system is to be preserved. But existing regulations are excessively restrictive and err in the direction of denying rights, whereas we have long held that in a democracy the error should be in the other direction. Reduced freedoms for some should never be a substitute for inadequate information, ignorance and uncertainty. The issue is complex and politically sensitive, but Congress should face the tough task. It should make protection against coercion effective, clarify the bases for prohibition, emphasize rights where possible, unify the scattered provisions bearing on the subject, abolish the distinction between partisan and nonpartisan, make penalties coincide more flexibly with violations, and increase the budget for enforcement. It would be unfortunate, but regrettably typical, if Congress waited for the Supreme Court to declare the Hatch Act unconstitutional before taking such action.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Levels of Manipulation

WAR, PEACE, AND THE VIET CONG. By Douglas Pike. The M.I.T. Press. 186 pp. $5.95.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

Mr. Mirsky, a frequent Nation contributor, is co-director of the East Asia Center at Dartmouth College.

Several years ago on a lecture tour of Australia I found myself on the trail of Douglas Pike, an American Foreign Service officer, long-time resident of Vietnam, and author of a recent book called Viet Cong. I had just returned from my third visit to Vietnam, and was surprised at how much Pike and I disagreed, even where our experiences seemed alike. Our divergence troubled me until I read the "Personal Preface" to Pike's newest book, War, Peace, and the Viet Cong. There Pike tells all. "Vietnam has become the great intellectual tragedy of our times. Why this is so I do not understand. Living in Vietnam for eight years has contributed nothing to my enlightenment" (my italics).

The thesis of Viet Cong identified the organizing skills of the National Liberation Front as the key to whatever successes America's enemy may have achieved. Viet Cong had looked very scholarly—although its sources were usually uncited—and Bernard Fall, among others, had praised the book. Like much American political "science," Viet Cong tricked itself out in a welter of statistics, elaborate tables and foreign terms. Yet despite its aura of scientific objectivity the principal conclusions of Pike's book were indistinguishable from those held by Washington.

Much of the present volume, War, Peace, and the Viet Cong, consists of superficial résumés of the policies of contending groups in Vietnam and on the international scene, combined with equally superficial, and occasionally arrogant, evaluations (not merely descriptions) of Vietnamese society. More interesting are Pike's analyses of the NLF's make-up and goals, interesting because of what they reveal of the author and his policy-making associates.

Pike's view of Vietnamese society is a product of scholarly confusion and Western arrogance. He oscillates between seeing the Vietnamese peasant as mindless lump and as primitive democrat in a country bedeviled by "centuries of bad political habits." Thus: "A traditional Vietnamese villager does not understand that he can manipulate the universe, can make things happen or not happen. He does not see himself as a force in the world. He is, of course, but he does not realize it." In a subsequent description of village life we find:

> Extensive research into village attitudes during the past eight years clearly indicates that local self-determination, the right to have a voice in choosing the men that run the village is one of the four "minimal needs" of the Vietnamese villager, and this desire stems from historical forces . . . there was no election in the village except in the form of the subtle but very powerful village consensus. . . . This system is a form of political participation regardless of how it may appear to a foreigner. A Vietnamese villager felt involved: he knew that what he thought and wanted carried weight with the council.

Involvement in village affairs and awareness of the individual's importance has shown itself throughout Vietnamese history, not least in the late 19th century when peasants fought the French and their Hue court collaborators. This struggle, this awareness of an ability to "make things happen," was ably described in Truong Buu Lam's Patterns of Vietnamese Response to Foreign Intervention (reviewed in The Nation, August 5, 1968). It has so distinguished Vietnamese villages that, on American advice, Ngo Dinh Diem recalled locally elected authorities and inserted his own men, a tampering with Vietnamese life unequaled by either the French or the Japanese. This village organization, destroyed by Washington, comprises part of the heritage of the Vietnamese.

The notion that villagers possess no sense of their own worth, that Vietnamese society needs to acquire "good political habits," leads naturally to the conclusion that manipulation is the key to success in Vietnam—and that until recently the NLF's successes could be traced to this factor alone. Indeed, according to Pike the Vietnamese villager positively dislikes the NLF: "The villagers supply the NLF because of threats and coercion . . . why this is so, why support comes from basically hostile people lies in the fact that the NLF's strength through the years has been organizational."

Rejection of the Ho-Mao-Che theory that guerrillas require popular support has freed our national spokesmen from having to apologize whenever the Marines get caught burning down a village, or some American-sponsored general proves more than normally venal.

BANG BANG WITH A SILENCER

watching the screens all that dying

the mind goes faster won't stop to wait for words

"maybe there will be a time"
two pairs of feet in the snow
"you remind me of someone"
"me"
"I used to know"

taxi clock ticking

no connectives or interval music airfields and freezing winds walk faster comrades into the time that will be

ANSELM HOLLO

Fashionable new theories make the idea of popularity—our enemies' and our own—obsolete and unnecessary.

Consider, for instance, Charles Wolf of the RAND Corporation, writing in United States Policy and the Third World. Wolf pays tribute to the popular support which he finds "in the populist symbols and sentiments of the American tradition." But why should we assume that others are like ourselves and press our values on them? Let us rather examine the situation and act according to local conditions. Political scientists like Wolf (and Pike) "know" that the NLF and similar groups elsewhere succeed in mobilizing an essentially inert peasantry by scaring the hell out of them:

> Given the characteristics of transitional societies in the less developed countries, an effective insurgency and guerrilla activity can grow and gather momentum among a population that is passive or even hostile to the movement . . . by the same token, successful counter-insurgency programs can be conducted among a rural populace that is passive or even hostile . . . to the government. . . . What an insurgent movement requires for successful and expanding operations is not popular support . . . but rather a supply of certain inputs (e.g., food, recruits, information). . . .

The job of an effective counterinsurgency program, then, lies in raising the cost of the "inputs" so that the population finds it more painful to support the partisans than not. The people must be made "unambiguously" aware of what happens to those who aid the guerrillas, and that government punishment is "deliberately imposed because of behavior by the population that contributes to the insurgent movement." Here is a lesson supposedly learned from the enemy: obedience develops out of selective terror. As early as 1965, I encountered in Vietnam a small group of Americans, dressed in black "V.C. pyjamas" who were practicing on villagers forms of violence which they claimed to have learned from the NLF. They were pioneers in the swing away from what they called "the popularity contest." Recently an Australian officer refused to participate in such "black" operations and underwent court-martial. (New Statesman, August 29.)

Pike regards the Saigon government as legitimate and the NLF as a "disloyal opposition," wreckers and destroyers who bring "divisiveness" to Vietnamese society. An excellent analogue exists in the American student movement. It is very important that no blame attach to the collegiate institutions, which may "make mistakes" but on the whole are seen as a market place full of stimulating competition, a market place the "disloyal" students are trying to befoul. Ignoring social causes and concentrating on what amounts to thuggery enables Pike to peddle "manipulation" to political scientists who feel their own worlds being shaken.

> Since it seeks not to adjust the political machine but to smash it, the NLF is in tune with the nihilism of the second half of the twentieth century, the spirit of rebellion for its own sake, the blanket condemnation of all establishment, the drive to harness the alienated, and the injection of violence into the forefront of political change regardless of cost.

There is so much wrong with that sentence that at least an entire issue of The Nation would be required for adequate refutation. One can only offer some observations.

Pike accuses 20th-century "nihilists" of relying on violence above all. On college campuses where students are accused of violence it is becoming commonplace to invite "the authorities" to deal with the situation. At Dartmouth, for instance, where sixty people occupied the administration building, several hundred police and National Guardsmen armed with guns and dogs were called in. Although weapons were unnecessary, the overkill was impressive. Similarly in Vietnam: the United States has now killed (not wounded) more than a million Vietnamese and laid waste the countryside. (See, for instance, "The Tombs of Ben Suc: Too Blind Stupid To See," The Nation, October 23, 1967.) What may be a "measured response" or "limited war" for us is total for the Vietnamese.

To continue for a moment on the inversion of values, the subject of refugees offers melancholy insights. Before the Tet offensive of 1968, the Senate's subcommittee on refugees estimated the existence of 4 million refugees, or about a third of South Vietnam's rural population. For several months this figure was denied or whittled down. Latterly, however, the "generation of refugees" has been turned into an advantage—for our side!

At a recent conference I heard an AID official describe with enthusiasm the new forms of agriculture now practiced by farmers who have "moved near the cities." Cash crops, he crowed, were enriching Vietnamese peasants. He looked only slightly ruffled when I reminded him that they had been forced from their chemically poisoned and bombed paddies by American air strikes and that the "cash crops" were of interest solely to the large American bases, contributing little to the diet of Vietnamese who now depend on hundreds of thousands of tons of American rice.

But the refugees are of more importance still to Roger Hilsman, ex-Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, and Samuel Huntington, chairman of Government at Harvard.

In testimony to a Senate subcommittee on September 30, 1965, Hilsman acknowledged that the refugees owed their homelessness to "American bombings and shelling." But one must never look too long on the dark side: "It seems to me they offer a positive opportunity for furthering all effective counter-insurgency programs." Professor Huntington, expressing little regret, insists the refugees are a phenomenon to be proud of. Writing in The Boston Globe on September 17, 1968, he explained that driving the peasants off the land constituted an "American sponsored urban revolution [and] . . . undercut the Vietcong rural revolution. . . . While wartime urban prosperity hurt some, the mass of the poor people benefitted from it." The survivors of Ben Suc would probably be interested in hearing about those benefits.

But Huntington at least recognizes that this thing Pike calls "nihilism" is indeed a "Vietcong rural revolution." It is perfectly clear that the successes of the NLF must stem from more than "mobilization," from more than their military victories.

Since 1930, Vietnamese peasants have increasingly experienced acute land hunger. By 1950, according to surveys sponsored by Washington, 80 per cent of the Southern peasantry worked as tenants. As more peasants became tenants more land fell into the hands of absentee landlords until, as a Michigan State study stated (in 1959): "Where one percent of the owners held 36% of the total rice land in 1934, they now own 44% of the total." The NLF early initiated programs of land to the tiller. These programs contrasted with the American-sponsored "reforms" of Ngo Dinh Diem which actually reclaimed "liberated" land and charged the peasants back rent. John Montgomery, writing in the ultraconservative Orbis (Summer, 1968) defined the situation: "Any real crash program would be hotly resented in Saigon and it would be resisted locally by the province and district chiefs whose principal sources of support remain the landlords and other wealthy classes."

It is at this point that the frustration of landless peasants inevitably combines with the anti-foreignism which so astonished the French in the last decades of the 19th century. The NLF do not appear as a disloyal, nihilistic opposition to the South Vietnamese peasantry whose cause they have taken up.

Devolution of a Revolution

SOCIALISM IN CUBA. By Leo Huberman and Paul Sweezy. Monthly Review Press. 221 pp. $5.95.

EMILE CAPOUYA

Mr. Capouya, a frequent Nation contributor, is a free-lance writer and publishing consultant.

In 1960, Paul Sweezy and the late Leo Huberman published Cuba: Anatomy of a Revolution. In that book, a sympathetic account of Cuba's history and prospects, they suggested that the newly established Castro regime was essentially Socialist in character. At that time their general conclusion was not widely shared. The traditional Marxist Left was inclined to regard Fidel Castro as an adventurer after the classic pattern of the caudillo. Liberal opinion tended to consider him a bourgeois reformer who aimed at transforming the semi-feudal character of Cuban society into something assimilable to the dominant welfare capitalism of the technologically advanced countries of the West, whose socialism, of course, is merely of the creeping variety. (That school of thought eventually came up with the charge that Fidel Castro had betrayed the Cuban Revolution, an indictment repeated by President Kennedy as the justification for the invasion of Cuba.) Finally, there was the view that our man in Havana had been replaced by a gangster and cutthroat who, what with expropriations of foreign assets and public trials of Batista officials, was violating the norms of civilized life.

Peace to those critics. Within a short time after the appearance of Cuba: Anatomy of a Revolution, Fidel Castro explicitly avowed the Socialist inspiration of his regime. More to the point, the decrees of the rebel government concerning land reform, wages, prices, and nationalization of basic sectors of the economy, amounted to a program of Socialist dirigismo that was clearly revolutionary rather than reformist. Mr. Sweezy and Mr. Huberman were vindicated as prophets. They might well have been accepted earlier as accurate reporters and analysts: their testimony could have been received the first time around. Paul Sweezy is possibly the most eminent Marxist economist in the West, and one of the best qualified writers on economics of any persuasion. As for Leo Huberman, his career as a popularizer of Marxist theory, as a humane and conscientious advocate of socialism, is sufficiently well known. Between them, they ought to have been able to recognize a Socialist revolution at close range, and so they did.

In their new book, the outstanding analytic talent and the fundamental political honesty of both authors are exhibited again. Ten chapters are devoted to a general review of the economic and social evolution of Cuba during the past decade. The authors show a singular ability to ask the proper questions of the data, so that the reader feels he has an adequate notion of the direction and bearing of the measures taken in Cuba, and of the achievements and shortcomings of the regime up to the present. The eleventh chapter is a most valuable critique of the oligarchical nature of the Cuban state. Coming as it does from sincere partisans of the Cuban Revolution who are also exceptionally well informed, the critique is bound to be of the greatest interest.

In ten chapters, then, Huberman and Sweezy describe the process of recasting the economy and social structure of an underdeveloped country in the peculiarly harsh conditions imposed by the American blockade and quarantine. At the time of the revolution, Cuba had a one-crop economy, administered for the profit chiefly of United States corporations. The country exported sugar to the United States, and imported virtually every item of subsistence or luxury consumed by its people. That system kept most Cubans hungry most of the time, ferociously hungry during the tiempo muerto between cane harvests.

As is usual in such cases, the poverty of the great mass of Cubans was balanced by the luxury and power of a handful of native businessmen and politicians, and by the relative affluence of the small fraction of the population that made up the country's middle class. With the revolution, the rich fled to wherever their bank accounts were, the middle class in large part felt forced to choose exile, and the United States decided to starve out the island by embargo and economic blockade. The revolutionary government had somehow to feed a nation that had never been economically self-sufficient—on the contrary, it was a textbook example of colonial dependency—and whose principal export had just lost its market. To complicate matters, per capita productivity, industrial and agricultural, was traditionally very low in Cuba, and the struggle for economic survival had to be waged in the face of the disaffection or exile of the class that had been the repository of its technical and managerial skills.

Very naturally, the Cuban Government turned first of all to a program of diversification in agriculture and industry in order to escape the crippling effects of a one-crop economy. It soon became clear, however, that the credits for investment and the foreign exchange required for importing the necessary tools and materials were simply not available in sufficient quantity. It would take years before the new crops and manufactures could begin to pay for themselves. Accordingly, the government reversed its policy, concentrating instead on the traditional source of foreign exchange, the sugar crop. The new policy was adopted as an emergency measure, designed to pay the costs of the social programs embarked upon by the government from the beginning—public health measures, the literacy campaign, wage legislation, housing construction—in the hope that the country might achieve solvency at a considerably higher level of consumption of goods and services than had obtained before the revolution.

Once the most pressing social needs had been met, the government could begin to direct investment toward the diversification that would increase social productivity over the long run. The authors of Socialism in Cuba provide a most interesting account of the evolution of that policy, together with an analysis of its economic and social consequences. It is in that connection that their sympathetic and conscientious critique of the Cuban Revolution as a social experiment becomes relevant to the general problem of reforming human institutions.

The authors believe that, given the limitations of Cuban manpower and investment, the optimum level of production for the island's sugar industry is in the neighborhood of 7 million tons. To achieve that figure at the present time requires an enormous and concentrated effort, ranging from mobilizing all the available manpower—including students and bureaucrats—for cutting cane, to allotting huge amounts of fue

ADONAI

At night
I run with wolves in the dark snow of mountain passes.

Thinking St. Paul would have me do what women wept for what our lord fell to.

Running alone against the beast melting the snow killing the tree.

GEORGE BOWERING

and transport to the gathering and processing of the crop. Merely to achieve 7 million tons subjects the country to quite serious economic and social strains. Yet the Cuban Government has set a goal, for 1970, of 10 million tons, and made the achieving of that goal a test of its own fitness to rule.

In the opinion of Huberman and Sweezy, the economic costs of producing 3 million additional tons of sugar are exorbitant, and the social consequences —whether the government succeeds or fails in the attempt—are incalculable. In other words, the regime is exposing itself to an enormous political risk, and the Cubans to serious social disruption, for the sake of a goal that promises to cost more than it is worth in economic terms alone. At this point we confront the pathology of government in general, the arbitrary character of all programs dictated from on high, and the rigidities of uncontrolled bureaucracy.

The authors of Socialism in Cuba bend over backward to point out the pressures that have made it almost inevitable that the island's government become increasingly rigid and hostile to debate—the familiar pressures of war, inherited poverty and a low level of material and intellectual culture. Yet they are clearly appalled by the implication that Socialist revolutions in underdeveloped countries may all be fated to go through a period of economic and cultural vicissitudes that seriously compromises the possibility of pursuing the Socialist ideal.

Up to the time of Fidel Castro's overthrow of the Batista government, every Socialist revolution had indeed followed that course of devolution into narrow bureaucratic dictatorship. But Castro's "humanistic revolution," with its liberal manners and generous outlook, had promised something nearer to the heart's desire. The recent disappearance in Cuba of channels for expressing dissent, even within the overall assumption of the necessity for social revolution, looks very much like a tendency that is at bottom counterrevolutionary. Its significance is that reasonable criticism of a government program, such as Huberman and Sweezy's view of the 10-million-ton sugar goal, can find no voice in Cuba today. That is the condition that allows the typical diseases of the state to rage at their height. On this issue the authors' language is more decorous than mine, but the inference is there to be drawn.

The motive force of a genuine revolution is the talent and energy of the people, suddenly set free. Socialism has always acknowledged the fact theoretically; to the extent that it has succeeded, it has done so by acting on that principle with courage and imagination. The limits on the practical application of such an insight on the part of Socialist reformers and revolutionaries have been set in part by the historically determined nature of Socialist ideology. That is, socialism is itself a bourgeois doctrine, with an admixture of half-conscious distrust and disdain for the working class, a worship of certified expertise, and an unexamined faith in the virtues of certain forms of social organization that are more or less synonymous with bureaucracy. It is obvious that these tendencies reflect the self-serving instincts of an educated and otherwise privileged minority that habitually construes its political ideal in terms of the class experience that has shaped its social vision.

Now, the successes of the Cuban Revolution are the successes of a partially liberated people. Its achievements would be greater in proportion as the people came to enjoy the social initiative now monopolized by the ruling oligarchy. It is a very human failing to say thus far and no further to the forces of liberation, and at times the objective political realities may seem to dictate such a strategic halt. But the outcome is the loss of the revolutionary élan, which is no more than the energies of the people at work.

Time and circumstance may be more or less favorable to the adoption of the thoroughgoing libertarian program, but if there is a solution to the problem of achieving a civilized polity, it must always lie in the direct exercise of power by the people. The guiding principle is, act at once in the spirit of the ideal you mean to realize. That is a hard saying, certainly. But to seek liberation through coercion, in the traditional manner of political revolutions, is not really more convenient, and it is fatally self-limiting in terms of the goal it proposes.

Not the least important feature of this most valuable book is that it provides the justification, with its scrupulous account of Fidel Castro's revolution from a viewpoint not especially favorable to the anarchist perspective, for the very critique of political revolution that anarchists have traditionally offered. To the anarchist, politics is either the life of common action in its entirety, or else it is simply the customary misnomer for whatever narrow scheme of oppression governs men's relations in a given time at a given place. That critique may not be fully applicable, practically speaking, to the attempt to realize desirable social change in a milieu of the most severe technical and cultural deprivation. But the efficacy of Fidel Castro's intervention has been such that the Cuban people are now at a stage where they can think beyond the next meal, and they must be allowed to do so. Otherwise their leader may find that he has set the stage for another revolution, one that excludes his participation.

MEN AND EVENTS...

...in world and national affairs.

ADLAI STEVENSON:
Patrician Among the Politicians by BERT COCHRAN. "Penetrating ...it sets Stevenson against his times and measures him against the prevailing political climate. The book is, indeed, as much a history of postwar politics as it is biography."—John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate.

"A searching biography that sets Stevenson in his true historic context, analyzing the elements which determined his failures and his triumphs." —Alden Whitman, The New York Times. $10.00

BRING FORTH THE MIGHTY MEN:
On Violence and the Jewish Character by HOWARD SINGER. A challenging and controversial view of the effect of the Six Day War on American Jews. A rabbi turns war correspondent to analyze Israel's nationhood, U.S. attitudes, and the implications for Jews everywhere. $6.95

SWORDS AND SYMBOLS:
The Technique of Sovereignty
by JAMES MARSHALL. "A quite unusual book...few others written in this century on the great themes of political philosophy possess its combination of traits: honesty without intemperance, erudition joined to concision, an unrelenting realism about politics...(and) moral compassion." —Professor Chas. Frankel, Columbia Univ. $8.95. Also in paper, $2.95

THE FIGHT AGAINST HUNGER
by CHARLES MORROW WILSON
Food—and the lack of food—will probably determine the fate of our planet in the next century. An outstanding authority views the global struggle against hunger in its social, political and moral aspects. $6.95

THE POLITICS OF PARANOIA
by FRANK GETLEIN. The American political scene—observed irreverently and incisively by the gifted columnist of the Washington Star. This collection of columns touches on Messrs. Nixon, Nader, Reagan, and many others. $5.95

Funk & Wagnalls
380 Madison Ave., New York, N.Y. 10017
A Division of Reader's Digest Books, Inc.

Armies in the Night

THE RED ORCHESTRA. By Gilles Perrault. Translated by Peter Wiles. Simon & Schuster. 512 pp. $6.95.

JOHN GLIEDMAN
Mr. Gliedman is a graduate student in psychology at M.I.T. and is at present at work on a detective novel.

There are histories—Hannah Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem is one—which would be obscene if cast into the narrative form of In Cold Blood or Lawrence and Oppenheimer. There are others where the venture is less outrageous, but which nevertheless require great skill to carry off. Gilles Perrault's The Red Orchestra treads this fine line. A chronicle of the activities of Russian intelligence and its German antagonists in wartime Europe, it has all the verve and zest of a first-class spy novel. Its endless plots and counterplots—which are developed with consummate skill—dwarf the most luxuriant fancies of an Ambler or a Fleming. But the book is history, representing the fruits of some two years' research: it is about real people and events. And so, one must ask in all seriousness if The Red Orchestra is merely history reduced to a bon-bon, a confection aimed at exactly that taste for politics as adventure story which Godard excoriates in Weekend.

The answer, I believe, is no, but almost in spite of the author's efforts. For ultimately the material alters the method. Long before the end of the book, the reader is propelled into a world which smacks more of Koestler and Orwell than of even that master practitioner of the art of espionage, John Le Carré.

Like an expansive Russian novel, The Red Orchestra swarms with characters. None of them is presented in great depth: Mr. Perrault restricts himself to the role of raconteur rather than psychologist. But the portraits of the spies are real enough to create definite expectations about how they will hold up under the stress of their work, whether or not they will crack under torture. Characters in novels—even novels which attack the idea of character—are generally more consistent than people in life. "Whereas there may be, in the world, no such thing as character, since a man is what he does and chooses freely what he does," Frank Kermode observes, "in the novel there can be no just representation of this, for if a man were entirely free he might simply walk out of the story, and if he had no character we should not recognize him. This is true in spite of the claims of the doctrinaire nouveau roman school to have abolished character."

History is not so fettered; nor even the history-as-novel form. At times The Red Orchestra realizes the ideal of the nouveau roman. The expectations about character set up by Perrault the novelist are often smashed by Perrault the historian. Again and again the people in his narrative change in the most astounding and inexplicable ways.

After years of work, one of the leaders of the spy ring loses his nerve and does nothing for a year. Then the Nazis catch up with him and he tells them everything he knows in exchange for visits with his mistress. Later, one of his best agents—a prominent Communist leader in Weimar—cracks under torture and becomes a collaborator. In incredible contrast, a flamboyant South American playboy keeps silent during weeks of torture and dies a martyr.

None of these transmogrifications are more than noted in passing. But their cumulative effect is considerable. By the end of the narrative the spy novel has given way to something more like real life, a world in which the past counts for nothing not only because men are sometimes free to change but because they often react to impossible pressures in ways beyond their choosing and understanding.

Even those who die as heroes or survive without compromise do not fully escape this disorganization of character. Their fidelity becomes, in a way, as arbitrary as their comrades' betrayals. Fidelity seems more a miracle than an act of will. Indeed, the only people who demonstrate consistency are the Nazis in charge of breaking up the spy network. But these mini-Eichmanns—now living out their retirement in complacent, bureaucratic ease, complete with car, TV, and pension from the state—are merely footnotes to the larger drama.

Toward the end of Godard's Weekend, a sleek, fat pig is slaughtered. One man holds it while the other stuns it with a blow from a sledge hammer and then slits its throat. In a film filled to surfeit with illusions of violent death, this death is one of the few real ones. And the reaction to it—indignation, shock, perhaps anger at Godard for killing a pig just to make a thirty-second scene in a movie—momentarily exposes the sham of most fictional (and fictionalized) treatments of violence. They entertain only as long as we forget that they are true, or could have been true. There are no pigs in Perrault's narrative. But by the end of it, he has made us remember that these are real people. For a history which reads so much like a novel, this is a rather considerable achievement.

Repressed Consciousness

THE COLLECTED STORIES OF PETER TAYLOR. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 535 pp. $10.

ROBERT K. MORRIS
Mr. Morris has written a critical study of Anthony Powell (University of Pittsburgh Press), and has finished a book about the contemporary British novel, to be published by Southern Illinois University Press.

These twenty-one stories span thirty years and reach into regions Peter Taylor has made his own. I mean not only Nashville and Memphis (where most of them are set), nor even the heart and mind of the upper South's middle class, but into a particular kind of sensibility: a sensibility encased in memories that have saddened or weakened it without having totally destroyed or done violence to it. If there is a unifying thread binding these unflawed, polished pieces it is how human fallibility is mirrored in the breakup of the old, genteel order which simply, but quite disastrously, has fallen apart. The stories are singularly Southern but universal too.

Taylor's style is natural, low-keyed, deceptively artless. His sense of milieu is unerring and his knowledge of people uncanny. Pure character plays against pure incident, yet one never overshadows or jolts the other. Eudora Welty's extraordinaries, Truman Capote's grotesques, or Flannery O'Connor's gothics articulate twisted nerve endings, show "the skull beneath the skin." Taylor's characters are flesh and blood, not beautiful losers but well-groomed, civilized, plain ones who have, for one reason or another, lost something of themselves somewhere along the way. Nostalgia, failure, loneliness, the pains of growing up, the inability to communicate or respond, the gulf between people—these are his themes. There is scarcely a story here which is not undercut with irony, even in the intensest moments of its poignancy and pathos; scarcely one in which outwardly simple surfaces do not dissolve into underlying psychological complexities; or one in which an encounter, a familiar occurrence, an all too human gesture does not bring insight or awareness.

In several stories such illumination comes in a flash; in others it filters through the drawn blinds of repressed consciousness or is only on the verge of quickening after the last word has been read. In "First Heat" (like many of Taylor's titles a literal and metaphorical pun) a politician lies nude and sweating in a stuffy hotel room, rationalizing his failure to support a bill after he had promised to, and seeing in a shattering moment "beyond mere nakedness of body and spirit" the "ultimate nakedness" of lost integrity and self-respect. "Dean of Men," a monologue spoken by a college president to his rebel son, reveals by almost imperceptible steps and shifts the ancestral flaw of character that has turned the narrator, his father, and his grandfather into objects of betrayal.

"Reservations" starts off with the initially comic predicament of a Nashville debutante and her parvenu bridegroom on their wedding night in a seedy hotel; as the story develops the couple passes through abuse and disillusionment into a reconciliation more frightful in its deception. "Silently they were toasting their own bliss and happiness, confident that it would never again be shadowed by the irrelevances of the different circumstances of their upbringings or by the possibly impure and selfish motives that had helped to bring them together."

This note of betrayal, echoing elsewhere in the collection, is muted when Taylor goes expressly after other things. "At the Drugstore," "Their Losses," and "Miss Leonora When Last Seen" are all superficially concerned with how the past has betrayed the present. But the "regret for lost opportunities," the nostalgia for "vanishing towns" and the "atmosphere of a prosperous civilized existence," the painful dwelling on "the old days, the old days" are barriers to awareness and understanding.

Taylor shows charity, warmth, patience for those who fall back on what can no longer be real in order to avoid confronting what is. Yet such people can only survive as anachronisms, as victims of their own ambiguity. Escape into the past is crippling and deadening (the imagery of "Their Losses"); one must engage the present, "escape into reality"—even if, as in "At the Drugstore," it leads a man visiting his home town after many years into intimations of mortality; leads the middle-aged professor of "Je Suis Perdu" into acknowledging "that he was no longer going to be this or that. He was"; or leads "an old bachelor brother" in "Heads of Houses" into realizing he "was without any life of his own."

That last phrase could serve as an epigraph to what for me is Taylor's best story. In "A Wife of Nashville" betrayal again leads to understanding, but Helen Ruth awakens not only to herself but to a sense of the other. Her servants (who come in succession, stay on for varying periods of time, yet always find some pretext for leaving) are fluid symbols for the continuing deception she practices upon herself. Their passion to make a life of their own contrasts with Helen Ruth's dependency on her husband and children and her feelings of separation, lack of involvement, loneliness. Their crude, transparent, inexpert lies are counterparts to her one great and dreadful lie—that of her happiness.

"A Wife of Nashville" is about the problem of lonely women in middle age. Revelation comes inevitably, if slowly, to a consciousness gradually opening through the years. The story shows how the gulf between people can be bridged through learning "that everything that happened in life only demonstrated in some way the lonesomeness that people felt"; it shows that invented strengths are as precarious and delicate as innate weaknesses. Happiness may be an illusion; betrayal may be a constant reality. Yet Taylor's stories are finally neither bleak nor pessimistic. Understanding brings his characters to illumination and their first real hope.

POEM

The only peaches I see are already packaged at some A&P :the tree recluse, sits by my desk :both waiting for my voice, Is that you, Simon?

shaking the leaves and draws :my clutch won't close :a claw charred from that black varnish

:too much darkness dried my hand :hunchbacked

I lean my other fingers, try to knock! one hand still alive, like an axe nails the other up, up rips at that dark sky still burning with the hand I never closed.

SIMON PERCHIK

ART / Lawrence Alloway

Happenings, of all art forms, are dependent on a photographic record, if the fugitive actions are not to be confined to the participants' memories. Claes Oldenburg's season of Happenings, 1961-62, the last of the classic first wave, was filmed by Raymond Saroff and will be screened by the Museum of Modern Art (date not set) during the run of Oldenburg's current exhibition. The filmic record is essential to supplement Oldenburg's scenarios (published by the Something Else Press). Peter Moore has photographed with remarkable patience almost everything in the way of Happenings, events and environments through the sixties; as a result, his archives are crucial to a study of the occasional aspects of recent American art. A shift in the forms of visual art, toward the ephemeral and the diffuse, has created a storage problem. Paintings and sculptures persist as objects, but an art of performance and problematic thresholds leaves no original body and can be preserved only in record form. Warehouses and libraries supplement galleries.

Allan Kaprow's "Days Off, A Calendar of Happenings" is a case in point of the uses of documentation. The calendar consists of inscriptions and photographs (including some by Peter Moore) of ten Happenings, all but one of them enacted last year (the exception, "Moving," dates from 1967). When a new Happening is scheduled there is an announcement like: "Those interested in participating should attend a talk by Mr. Kaprow at the Campus Center Cafeteria, the State University of New York at Albany," or wherever it may be. The kind of Happening that Kaprow produces now is totally unlike Oldenburg's more-or-less theatrical form. Kaprow says he "selects and combines situations to be participated-in, rather than watched." The experience of the participants and their memories are the aesthetic constituents of what Kaprow calls "the Activity Happening." The calendar perpetuates such occasions, though a calendar is, in function, expendable and the paper here looks it.

Kaprow describes the publication thus: "This is a calendar of past events. The days on it are the days of the Happenings. They were days off. People played." The kinds of activity are mostly physical and nonreflective; it is not that the action cannot be thought about but that this phase is postponed until the act, for example, of unrolling a mile of tar paper, has been performed. Here are the complete instructions for "Shape": "Shoes, bodies on streets, sidewalks, fields. Spray painting their silhouettes. Reports and photos in newspapers." One Happening called "Transfer" is dedicated to Christo, presumably because the activity here consists of rearranging and resiting metal barrels, objects which Christo used as material for art in Paris in 1961.

Documentation cannot transmit the zeal of the agents, but it brings out an aspect of Happenings which is often lost sight of, or is not known, by the original participants (except for Kaprow). Taking part in a Happening must include individual boredom, facetiousness and uncertainty, but the visual trace, the documentation, has another value. The activities in Kaprow's recent pieces have to do with labor (diverting water, moving furniture), monument building ("triumphal" stacks of barrels, walls of ice), the imprinting of human tracks, as in "Shape," and memorializing the gesture of sitting, for instance, with chairs carried around outdoors and instant Polaroid snapshots of each stop left in situ. Kaprow's early Happenings were overtly mythological; now the games concern the body in action and its occupancy of space, a kind of playful human engineering. The calendar, memorializing one of Kaprow's most brilliant periods as a Happenings master, is itself an object of tough grace, with a profusion of grainy, factual and enigmatic photographs. It is obtainable for $2.37 including postage from the Museum of Modern Art (it was commissioned by the Junior Council) and the original collages of photographs, laconic scenarios and dates are on view through October at John Gibson Commissions, Inc., 27 East 67 Street.

STATEMENT OF OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND CIRCULATION (Act of October 23, 1962: Section 4369, Title 39, United States Code)

1. Date of filing: October 1, 1969.

2. Title of Publication: THE NATION.

3. Frequency of issue: Weekly (except for omission of four issues).

4. Location of known office of publication (Street, city, county, state, ZIP code): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

5. Location of the headquarters or general business offices of the publishers (Not printers): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

6. Names and addresses of publisher, editor, and managing editor:

Publisher (Name and address):
James J. Storrow Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Editor (Name and address):
Carey McWilliams
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Managing Editor (Name and address):
Robert L. Hatch, Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

7. Owner (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a partnership or other unincorporated firm, its name and address, as well as that of each individual must be given.) Name: The Nation Associates, Inc. (no stockholders), 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014; Carey McWilliams, Pres. and Treas., 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014; James J. Storrow Jr., Vice-Pres. & Secy., 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

8. Known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages or other securities (If there are none, so state): None.

9. For completion by nonprofit organizations authorized to mail at special rates (Section 132.122, Postal Manual) (Check one)
The purpose, function, and nonprofit status of this organization and the exempt status for Federal income tax purposes.

☐ Have not changed during preceding 12 months.

☐ Have changed during preceding 12 months.
(If changed, publisher must submit explanation of change with this statement.)

10. Extent and Nature of Circulation	Average No. Copies Each Issue During Preceding 12 Months	Actual Number of Copies of Single Issue Published Nearest to Filing Date
A. Total No. Copies Printed (Net Press Run)	40,030	36,170
B. Paid Circulation
1. Sales Through Dealers and Carriers, Street Vendors and Counter Sales	3,340	3,110
2. Mail Subscriptions	28,130	25,290
C. Total Paid Circulation.	31,470	28,400
D. Free Distribution (including samples) By Mail, Carrier or Other Means	380	380
E. Total Distribution (Sum of C and D)	31,850	28,780
F. Office Use, Left-Over, Unaccounted, Spoiled After Printing	8,180	7,390
G. Total (Sum of E & F—should equal net press run shown in A)	40,030	36,170

I certify that the statements made by me above are correct and complete.
Carey McWilliams, President & Treasurer

It is not usual for Mr. Gibson to show original collages, even collages compiled of documents. He specializes in projects rather than completed works, and also with the records of works that by their nature cannot be seen easily, or at all. Through November, for example, he will be showing scale models, collages and photographs of Christo's "Packed Coast," a million feet of Australian coast line which is to be packaged this month. At the Museum of Modern Art, through November, two of Gibson's artists are presenting "A Report: Two Ocean Projects," a show which places transient art works by Dennis Oppenheim and Peter Hutchinson in an underwater environment. (One of Oppenheim's pieces consists of a square of salt, the dissolution of which he recorded.) Earthworks (Oceanworks?) because of their inaccessibility, like Happenings because of their once-only status, exist only briefly in terms of discrete originals. Thus documentation is essential to disclose and to chart their occurrence.

The expanded role of documentation has become an essential element in the definition of art. It is an extension of the area of artistic control, and it brings new information to an old argument about the relation of originals to reproductions. Works of art consist of both unique and translatable elements. Some things resist reproduction (the interplay of scale and facture in a painting, the collective élan of a Happening crowd) and can be experienced only in the presence of the work itself; but other information can be transmitted by reproductions. Many iconographic, formal and intentional aspects of art survive in reproduction. Norbert Wiener in The Human Use of Human Beings (the book that should be read in place of its cheap derivative, Marshall McLuhan's Understanding Media) has this to say on the subject: "Cultivated taste may be built up by a man who has never seen an original of a great work and . . . by far the greater part of the aesthetic appeal of an artistic creation is transmitted in . . . reproductions."

The only reservation one might have is that reproductions are read best by those who know some originals, though not necessarily the ones being reproduced. Wiener's slight overstatement, however, is preferable to the exclusive praise of the uniqueness of originals at the expense of all translations. The unreproducible parts of a work are frequently secondary refinements. It is certain that Breughel communicates to people who have not been to the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna. Kaprow's calendar could convey more to a reader than some participants could be expected to derive from a performance. The expertise everyone has developed in reading modern reproductive processes impinges at this point on what Walter Benjamin called the "aura" of the original. In fact, documentary reproduction can be the only route of access for some art. Current uses of reproduction as a constituent of art make creative play out of everybody's familiarity with mass communications.

FILM FESTIVAL II

Harold Clurman

One of the more engaging exhibits at the New York Film Festival this year was Mandabi (The Money Order), directed by Ousmane Sembène, who is said to be a famous novelist. It is the first African film I have seen.

Its background—the city of Dakar—has the fascination of all towns in which Western civilization imposes its benefits and their attendant scars on a quasi-primitive people still living in age-old habit. The languages spoken are the native Senegalese and French, those higher in the social scale speaking the foreign tongue.

Mandabi is a tale of simple folk caught in the complexities of an industrially developed environment. Two worlds mingle without either absorbing the other. The result is both colorful and painful, though the pain appears to be mitigated by the warmth which emanates from an essentially innocent and wholesome population deeply rooted in the loam of basic human needs, instincts and desires.

Deing, the film's central personage, is a good-natured, lazy, impoverished man who, being Moslem, is blessed with two adoring "slave" wives. They feed him abundantly and serve him so that he may always find himself comfortable. How they manage this despite their husband's impecunious idleness remains a mystery.

One day a nephew who works in Paris at menial jobs sends Deing a mail order for 20,000 francs with the request that Deing take a part of it for himself, but that the bulk of it be deposited in a bank for safekeeping till the nephew's return. But Deing never gets to cash the money order: he hasn't a card of identity or a birth certificate, and is obliged to run from one official bureau to another to obtain them.

Meanwhile, his wives buy things they need on credit—this includes water—while neighbors and relatives, having heard of the money order, borrow coin and goods from the women. Deing is cheated right and left and finally is robbed of the funds due him by a French-speaking cousin. At the end he cries out helplessly, "Are there no honest people in Dakar?"

The only ray of hope shines at this juncture through new faces who gather about Deing, affirming, "We—all of us together—will turn Dakar honest, make it clean." The note is sounded in a minor key, more aspiration than protest: it has a wistful resonance. One feels that Deing will have to suffer the indignity of his situation for a long time.

Color becomes this film. That is not true in most cases. Almost all major film productions nowadays are, for commercial reasons, shot in color. More often than not the film hues are not color at all, merely pigmentation. It lends faces an unnatural rubescence, lacking true delicacy of tone and subtlety of shading, as if they had been illuminated by a luxuriant neon god.

Color adds little to Pierre and Paul, a French film directed by Rene Allio, who was responsible for a better picture, The Shameless Old Lady. The theme is the crushing effect of the costly gadgets that are the pride and bane of our consumer society. A hazardous affluence beguiles Pierre, the foreman of a construction company, into the purchase of every electric gewgaw which he considers a perquisite of the good life. The expenditure of time and money involved in acquiring these knickknacks overwhelms him, driving him to impotence and near madness.

This theme is becoming prevalent (Godard has dealt with it in several of his recent improvisations); it is part of the overall malaise which feeds current radical trends. "Progress" is making nervous wrecks of us. One of the things in the picture which also struck me was that when Pierre recalls the gentle pleasures of his father's day the scenes of the past are rendered in black and white, giving them a special softness.

The oppressive weight of the business world is the subject of Ermanno Olmi's One Fine Day. His previous black and white films, Il Posto (The Job) and The Fiancés, were superior to the present one. But here too Olmi is marked by an honest sobriety of intention and statement which is to be cherished in a medium whose practitioners lean toward the obviously eye-catching, the sensational.

Color, though modestly employed, does Olmi a disservice. The merits of his film, however, should not be overlooked. His faces are not conventional film faces. The acting is subdued; feeling is conveyed without histrionic stress. One is in the presence of life as it normally manifests itself, one observes people quietly experiencing their daily travail. Olmi does not preach or promise alleviation: he records. The scenes which picture sales conferences and a new brand of boxed food are projected with humor that eschews caricature.

With all this what does Olmi say? The serious and ambitious businessman ends wearied unto death, a lover and husband less inspired than his youthful employees who have themselves become disaffected from the mercantile machine in which they are willy-nilly enmeshed. Worse still, the former chief of the advertising agency around which the story is woven, having decided to retire after a heart attack, finds himself desolate because nothing has prepared him to enjoy what

IT IS

The smell of enlightenment Meaning:
I have been there
Before
And brought nothing Back.

It's a continuity tape
Of the harbor and the bridge
And my life walking past.

In your true and terrible form,
Angel of this world.

HARVEY SHAPIRO

VACATIONS

UNREDISCOVERED Caribbean Island between San Juan and St. Thomas, Cal 28 sloop, six berths, sunfish; bareboat; daily $65, weekly $400. Captain extra. Waterfront cottage $10 daily. Gaile Vincent, Culebra Island, Puerto Rico 00645

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

PERSONALS

A POINT OF VIEW YOU MAY NOT HAVE CONSIDERED. Public relations man; heavy creative thinking experience; direct mail, layout, graphics. Liaison with professional groups. Box 629, c/o The Nation.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90034.

CONTEST. Send stamped addressed envelope for Rules of New Testament Prize Contest to Box 37, Huguenot, N.Y. 12746

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

WELL-KNOWN WRITER, BOOK-REVIEWER; editor analyses revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 628, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 10-20-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

he knows is there to be enjoyed—a free and easy life. The film fails only in that it does not achieve sufficient poignancy. But this too may be Olmi's plan. He does not aim at pathos—only at blank truth.

Pier Paolo Pasolini is another Italian film maker who wants to say something. A certain murky religiosity combined with revolutionary impulses often confuse his pictures and public. This is less true in his latest effort, Pigpen, than in his previous Theorem, but the result is not altogether sound.

It offers a parallel between scenes of cannibalism and rapine among the starved of the Middle Ages with the rapacity of the wealthy in modern states of which West Germany is representative. That the scale of accusation is intended to be wider than the one country is indicated by the disabled and porcine lord of a palatial manor who sports the ribbon of the French Legion of Honor. The whole capitalist world is the target of Pasolini's obloquy.

Hitler was a recognizable monster; the masters of the new Germany whom Pasolini indicts are neither obedient nor disobedient, neither aggressive nor benign: they are slobs. The wealthy of the older generation who managed to retain their possessions by lying low under the Fascist regime and who now increase them, still have cultural pretensions (chamber music fills the sterile solitude of the millionaire's mansion), while the later Nazis who now trade in buttons and cannon are coldly corrupt technicians, totally unconcerned with anything but contraptions that produce money. Despite their ostensible antagonism these two factions form a partnership in the post-bellum upsurge.

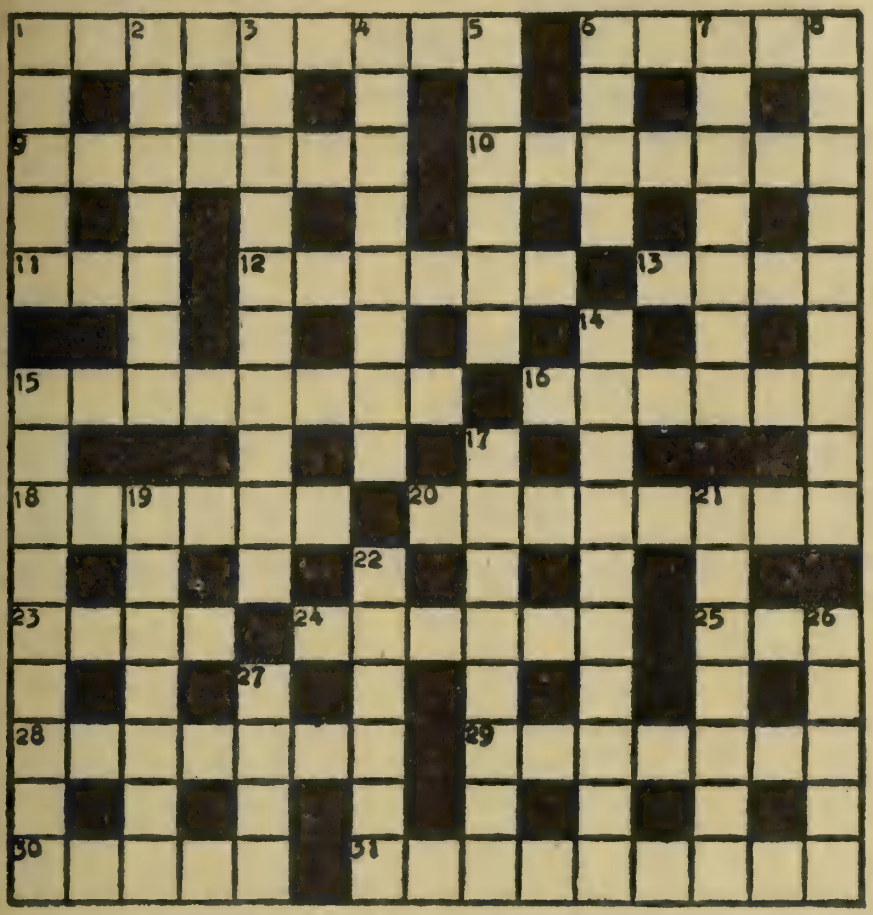
The younger generation, nourished neither by the ancestral grandeur nor by the largely verbal rebelliousness of the leftists, dwell in a sort of coma, interrupted only by wallowing in the recently replenished pigsties of the estate. Such gentry will ultimately be devoured by the pigs—which is what happens to a nearly catatonic youth, the son of the elder mogul of the film. Compared to him, Pasolini finds the hungry medieval savage who murders and eats the flesh of his victims something like a mystically heroic figure. The majestic background in excellent color gives the picture an epic quality.

Robert Bresson, like Olmi an uncompromising master, is not at his best in color. The morose understatement of his film demands black and white shadows. A Gentle Creature (Une Femme Douce) tells of a rather mute, poor and repressed girl who is taken over by the owner of an apparently prosperous pawnshop, taken over, that is, in a marriage the girl does not desire but to which she succumbs because of her poverty, her lack of will, and the insistent appetite of the young bourgeois who through marriage will own her.

Perhaps Bresson chose an extraordinarily pretty former model to play the girl because her lack of acting ability makes her all the more the inert prey of the consuming male whose jealousy and failure to offer true contact beyond the frolic of the bed ultimately drive her to suicide. The young husband narrates the story of their relationship with some evidence of sorrow but hardly any of understanding. Such marriages—they are legion—erode sensibility and thus become sheer destruction. But unlike Bresson's other pictures this one suffers somewhat from the frigid obtuseness it depicts. We recognize and assent to the "message," but are barely stirred by it.

In The Ritual Ingmar Bergman once again presents a fiercely incisive parable, in a mode somewhere between naturalism and Expressionism, in which artists, no matter how corrupt they may be, are, humanly speaking, the superiors of repressive officialdom. The four actors—two of them members of the well-known Bergman "team"—are all excellent, the black and white photography sharply to the point. Though the emotional range of the picture is narrow, the piece holds and hurts. But I never come away from a Bergman film—except for his Smiles of a Summer Night—without wondering, though not complaining, why sex is never conveyed as anything but anguish, and why indeed there is so little delight in love-making in most Swedish films.

I regret missing My Night at Maude's, said by many to be provocative, in which a lady ready for love discusses Pascal because the man she hopes to seduce insists on that intellectual exercise. There were some other films I wish I had missed. As for Oh, What a Lovely War, I leave it to Robert Hatch: it deserves more than the little space I would be able to give it at this point.



Next week—back to the theatre.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1317

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Like the climes of Byron's night. (9)
6 General accord? (5)
9 A proposition about quiet offered by a Greek poet. (7)
10 One of the simplest instruments of the autocar in America. (7)
11 One might slip on one at 26. (3)
12 One that closely resembles Quasimodo, possibly. (6)
13 See 23 across
15 Indian chief mentioned in prose narrative additionally. (8)
16 Wild acres east of the ridge. (6)
18 Declining to be an errant being, and be inside by the sound of it. (6)
20 Leaves to take a degree, and on direction. (8)
23, 24, 25 and 13 across At one time in the vicinity of such as 26? (Central orbiters might have given such directions.) (4,6,3,4)
28 March in such a state? Terrifying! (7)
29 Double description of order at some eating places? (4-3)
30 Observed one of the Kennedy tribe is missing, evidently. (5)
31 Avoids a possibly fateful day in the proceedings. (9)

DOWN

1 Dove into them in full dress, it sounds! (5)
2 The gap of p to Q4, possibly. (7)
3 and 5 A French district supplies Macy's and Gimbel's perhaps. (10,6)
4 In or otherwise around the castle? (8)
5 See 3 down
6 Possibly first, second, or third tackle? (4)
7 Were his remarks the 2 type? (3,4)
8 A monorail isn't exactly so vast. (9)
14 Big fists commonly found in noble surroundings? (5,5)
15 Both female and male can bring up a poor horse in the city. (9)
17 Carried off a duet with the first four letters out of order. (8)
19 One might the car in the garage, or abandon the project. (4,3)
21 Defeat at the polls. (7)
22 Sounds as though a little oil is needed. (6)
26 and 13 One might resort to it in the Rockies. (5,4)
27 Well this is what some cheese it! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 1316

ACROSS: 4 and 1 down Sight for sore eyes; 11 Ill-bred; 12 Ethan; 15 Easel; 17 Campaign; 21 Show-down; 23 Lydia; 26 Robes; 29 Uncle; 30 Notably; 31 Arbutus; 32 Entering; 33 Inures. DOWN: 2 Conches; 3 Edwin; 6 Hello; 7 Firedog; 8 Riders; 9 and 25 El Rancho Grande; 16, 13 and 14 Law and order; 18 Money-mad; 19, 28 and 1 across All-day sucker; 20 Caresses; 22 Habitat; 24 Decatur; 27 Sober; 28 Doyen; 29 and 10 Urban renewal.

PUBLICATIONS

Available Now!
WOMEN: A Journal of Liberation
$5 for 5 issues
Subscribe: 3011 Guilford Avenue
Baltimore, Md. 21218

DIRECTORY OF SOCIAL CHANGE. 200 Communes listed. Magazines, $2.00. TMU Box 1264-NR, Berkeley, Calif. 94701

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832-A, Kansas City, Missouri 64141.

PROTESTANT VISIONS OF THE VIRGIN MARY. 500 pages. Unique. Historic. Entrancing. Desparately needs a non-subsidy publisher. Write or wire: B. Wm. Palmer, 15 S. Second St., Haines City, Fla. 33844

KNOW CANADA BETTER!
See world affairs from a different perspective!
Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.
$4.00 for eight large issues
Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $5 postpaid.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'
A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon
The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.
Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Millard Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

We Welcome LIFE To Our Prison

The Marine brig at Pendleton, that is.

Our issue of September 15th carried the story of the mistreatment of U. S. Marine prisoners confined in the brig at Camp Pendleton, California.

This story was subsequently picked up by all the wire services, the national press and the television networks.

Perhaps more importantly, after investigation proved that all of the charges of brutality appearing in our story were substantially true, immediate action was taken to begin to remedy the situation.

LIFE? Their story appears in the October 10th issue, nearly a month later. It's a good story, too. Pick up a copy at your newsstand.

But while you're about it, why not subscribe to the magazine which broke the story first? This is a sample of what we do, this week and every week. You really ought to be in on it!

BONUS OFFER: If you join us for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION [redacted] Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me four bonus issues at no additional charge.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... [redacted] .....Zip .....

N10-20

AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY JEROME ROTHENBERG

THE NATION

OCTOBER 27, 1969 35 cents

5-7DR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
OCT 27 1969
LIBRARY

United Nations
THE MELANCHOLY RITUALS
RICHARD J. WALTON

The Chicago 8
WIRE TAPS: DISCLOSED OR LEAKED?
PHILIP W. MOORE

Negro Colleges
Escape from the Dark Cave
JOHN U. MONRO

Frank J. Donner on J. Edgar Hoover
Ned O'Gorman / 'The Lives of Children'

LETTERS

corporate labor

Champaign, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: "Labor and Foreign Policy" by Ronald Radosh [The Nation, Sept. 8] is full of unstated and questionable assumptions, half-truths, and pseudo-sophisticated misunderstandings. I shall skeptically await some documentation in what you indicate is to be a forthcoming book.

One general key to the inadequacy of Radosh's analysis is to be found in his characterization of the mainstream of the American labor movement as "corporate unionism." This seems to him to mean that the unions are perverted creatures of and controlled by American corporations, rather than properly dedicated to overthrowing the individual enterprise or capitalistic system. . . .

While American unions have "accepted" capitalism, worked within it, and worked to humanize and restrict it (both through collective bargaining and political means), their actual goals and programs are not that different from the Socialist unions of most of the Western European countries today, except for France and Italy. . . .

As for American unions generally going along with U. S. foreign policy . . . one can as readily fault the labor movements in most countries in the two World Wars, and at present as well. An ideologically united world labor movement is impractical, I believe, though Radosh seems to assume there should be one. Phillips L. Garman
Professor of Labor and Industrial Relations University of Illinois

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Mr. Garman both defends and denies the existence of corporate unionism. The basic purpose of unionism is to protect the interests of wage earners: economic, social and political. . . . Corporate union leaders reveal their limitations when they fail to wage fights for crucial demands, whenever these demands conflict with the limits of reform set by the large corporations and government spokesmen.

During World War I, Samuel Gompers decided not to call for an eight-hour day, because Newton D. Baker and Woodrow Wilson defined that demand as "revolutionary." . . . During World War II, Sidney Hillman supported FDR's use of the Army to bust the North American Aviation strike, since it interfered with the defense effort. The corporate unionists proved all too willing to abandon their original commitment to the workers when they were told not to rock the boat. These and other points will indeed be documented in my forthcoming book. . . .

It may certainly be true that the goals and program of American unions differ little from those of most West European Socialist unions, or for that matter, the Communist unions of France and Italy. But all of these bodies are social-democratic, and follow a similar corporate orientation. In May of 1968, the French CGT thus worked to curb revolutionary demands for workers' control of production and occupation of factories, and tried to channel the workers' momentum into traditional trade union considerations. It was this essential conservatism of the CP unions, in fact, that Irving Brown played upon when he skillfully manipulated to create a split in their ranks.

As for an "ideologically united world labor movement," it was exactly the desire of Jay Lovestone that all labor follow the path set out by the AFL leaders: creation of a world labor movement pledged to the line of the State Department. . . . Ronald Radosh

correction

We regret the misspelling of the word dirigisme in last week's review by Emile Capouya of Leo Huberman and Paul Sweezy's Socialism in Cuba. The Editors

EDITORIALS

Presidency and President

Appealing for love, sympathy and unqualified support, Lyndon B. Johnson pleaded, "I'm the only President you've got." It was the American version of the "cult of personality," and it failed. Now this wrongheaded view of the democratic process is being raised again, by a chorus of diverse types. Hubert Humphrey, having said quite distinctly at the Midwest Democratic Conference that Mr. Nixon's honeymoon was over, informs us after a nice talk with Dick that "we have only one President at a time." David S. Broder, who nowadays is the voice of the Establishment among political commentators, does a piece about how easy and wicked it is to "break" the President. This theme is picked up in the House, and Dean Acheson warns us of a major constitutional crisis "if we make a habit of destroying Presidents."

This "breaking the President" bogy needs to be looked at both in general and in the current situation. Most of us were taught to respect the office of the Presidency and, when we can, the incumbent. Whether or not the second is possible depends more on the President than on us. Every President enjoys an enormous lead time of approval and support and can count on great backlogs of public favor if he knows how to make a halfway intelligent and honest appeal to the public. These are the facts we must start with.

Long before he reached the White House, Mr. Nixon gave many Americans what they regard as good reason to distrust him. So he assumed the Presidency under a cloud of political and partisan misgivings as to his sincerity—even that measure of sincerity an active politician is expected to exhibit. Yet both the public and the politicians gave him the benefit of the doubt. He could not possibly complain that he did not enjoy an extended "honeymoon." His detractors remained silent and the press leaned over backward to be fair. So the long summer days passed at San Clemente, with the mood of the country seemingly quiet and serene. We suggested at that time that the Administration was misjudging the underlying temper of the people, and so it has turned out.

For the present loss of confidence the President has only himself to blame. As a candidate he made promises which as President he did not keep. That is scarcely a novel failing, but in Mr. Nixon's case the promises were so sweeping and direct that a total failure to live up to them could not go unobserved. "The next President," Mr. Nixon declared, "must take an activist view of his office. He must articulate the nation's values, define its goals and marshal its will. Under a Nixon administration, the Presidency will be involved in the entire sweep of America's public concerns." This and other statements of purpose have been blandly ignored.

Mr. Nixon has never been strong on principle, and political tricks and posturing do not suffice. He has not been candid, his press secretary is the least informative in recent history, and his director of communications seems to view his job as that of running an advertising agency. Three months were allowed to go by without a press conference. It is little wonder that the press began to complain that the Administration lacked leadership. Yet, having to such an extent isolated himself, Mr. Nixon in effect asks us to continue to trust him blindly. As one example, having made only token departures from his predecessor's policy toward Vietnam, he bids the country be patient while with the help of President Thieu, whom he cited as one of the world's great statesmen, he brings us an "honorable" peace.

Still other considerations explain the country's rising impatience. According to the textbooks and hoary tradition, the President is the best informed, if not the wisest, of men in public life. On the same theory, he gets the best advice. But is he, and does he? Consider Dean Acheson's exhortation. In the same breath in which he tells us to back the President and keep quiet, he also tells us that President Johnson was badly briefed and got the wrong intelligence evaluations; moreover that he, Acheson, had to tap second-echelon personnel to learn the hard facts he needed to advise President Johnson about Vietnam. If McCarthy, Clark Clifford, Acheson and others had not shaken him out of his complacency, Johnson might have continued to escalate the war.

Is Mr. Nixon any better informed? Can Lodge and Bunker give him better advice than they gave Johnson? Is he reading the public mind any better than Johnson did before the ax fell? Could anything be more maladroit than Mr. Nixon's declaration that "under no circumstances whatever" would he be affected by demonstrations and protests, followed by evidence that he is affected to the extent of throwing General Hershey to his critics, issuing transparently dishonest data on draft calls and, in the view of some observers, going into a flurry of overreaction to the October 15 moratorium?

There is no fault in the Presidency that could not be cured by qualities of real principle and leadership in the incumbent. If he doesn't get the support he feels he deserves, he should ask himself why. What has he done that was wrong, what has he failed to do that would have been right? The finger points at him, no one else.

The Snowballing Effect

Critics of the American mode of decision making tend to overlook one significant fact. The country is culturally diverse. It operates at different levels of understanding, of reference, of assumptions.

Precisely because it is that kind of country, opinion on complex issues forms slowly. On the surface not much seems to be happening, or it all seems pointed in one direction, with little counter-movement. Then a dissent starts, matures slowly at first, then often staggers everyone by emerging explosively as a near-majority opinion. From there it has only a little way to go and it is the majority opinion. Everyone is appropriately surprised and forgets the phenomenon until next time.

Why is the peculiar way in which opinion forms in this country so often forgotten? Why is it that normally bright individuals, even those supposedly expert in public relations, so consistently fail to spot the cloud that is no bigger than a man's fist?

I. F. Stone notes that "when Howard Zinn in The

JAN 6
MAY 1

IN THIS ISSUE

October 27, 1969

EDITORIALS
426

ARTICLES

430 The Urban Coalition: Who Gives a Damn? Malcolm Kovacs

432 The Chicago 8: Wire Taps: Disclosed or Leaked? Philip W. Moore

434 Negro Colleges: Escape from the Dark Cave John U. Monro

440 United Nations: The Melancholy Rituals Richard J. Walton

BOOKS & THE ARTS

444 Reality at White Heat Jerome Rothenberg

444 Translations of American Indian Poetry

447 Dennison: The Lives of Children Ned O'Gorman

448 Hoover: On Communism Rader: False Witness Frank J. Donner

450 Rudofsky: Streets for People Sherman Paul

451 Theatre Harold Clurman

452 Films Robert Hatch

453 Records David Hamilton

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209
No. 14

Nation a few years ago first proposed immediate and unconditional withdrawal [from Vietnam], he was a political leper." ("Vietnam: The Logic of Withdrawal," The Nation, February 6, 1967.) "Leper" is perhaps too strong a term, but certainly there was no mad rush to join the "withdrawal now" forces, such as they were. But today Zinn has an army at his back; in one form or another almost everyone is for withdrawal. The question is how.

The Nation is attuned to this problem because we live by it. When Fred J. Cook wrote "Juggernaut: The Warfare State," it seemed quite unlikely that in a few years his handling of the military-industrial complex would become a journalistic cliché, with everyone joining the act, falling over themselves to repeat what Cook had said —and often unaware that he had said it first.

The Establishment, so-called, could save itself a lot of time, energy and money by reading the small-circulation journals of critical opinion. It would not have to adopt their views, only use them for purposes of prognosis. The small journals are not always prophetic, but a few days of research would convince anyone that they forecast what is to come far oftener than do the big-circulation media. The basic reason is that the big fellows live for today's circulation and advertising.

The big journals will continue to do what they have always done. But what of the politicians? They certainly would benefit, at no risk whatever, from reading the low-circulation papers, which is where the ideas are spawned and the movements begin. Essentially, Mr. Nixon is in trouble because throughout his political career he has identified foresight with bigness. John F. Kennedy was the last President who did pay a little attention to the "intellectual" press; but he made his decisions—the Bay of Pigs, for instance—on other premises. Mr. Nixon has a chance to do better, but the chances are he won't.

'Custeristic'

Mark Rudd, leader of the Weatherman faction now in control of the national SDS, justifies his policy of seeking violent confrontation by saying that white Americans "have to start fighting, take risks, take some of the damages, of the costs, off the backs of black people and Third-World people, and do some damage." But when the Weathermen demonstrated in Chicago earlier this month, in rivalry with rallies held by the moderate wing of the now-sundered SDS, it was the latter whose meeting was co-sponsored by the Black Panthers and the Puerto Rican Young Lords. And Fred Hampton, Illinois chairman of the Black Panthers, denounced the Weathermen as "anarchistic, opportunistic and Custeristic."

That last epithet is significant, for Custer is scarcely a symbol of racial fraternity, and it focuses on what is most wrong about the Rudd approach to world problems. The Weatherman faction is made up of a body of middle-class youth—now rather wickedly seeking to enlist high school children as their shock troops—who have generated within themselves a sense of guilt from privilege, which they would now expiate by leading the oppressed races of the world to revolutionary victory. Considering the comparative numbers involved, that is perhaps the most elitist venture in the history of revolutionary abortions. And the black, brown and yellow races have had enough of elitism.

The Weathermen have adopted an ominously vague slogan: "Bring the war home." If it means anything, it threatens a state of such violent chaos in the States that the military will be forced to withdraw their regiments from Vietnam to curb the destruction here. A country which imposes order by military force is necessarily a dictatorship. It may be that Rudd sees the road to freedom and justice as passing through tyranny, and it may be that he can persuade high school students to agree with him. But he will not persuade blacks, Mexicans and Puerto Ricans, who have knowledge of suppression and need not invent ways of living dangerously.

In a sense the Weathermen are right to decry their privileges and to denounce their schooling. They know themselves to be the sons and daughters of the Middle Class, in whose name all authority in this country asserts its legitimacy. They expect to pay for their deeds of extremism—they are not hypocrites—and indeed they calculate that the payment is itself the first step toward their goal ("just the fact that we are willing to fight the police is a political victory"); but what if the strategy proves wrong, if victory cannot be won in the name of Che Guevara? When a Weatherman takes off his football helmet and his denim jacket, he becomes a white kid headed uptown. What can a black kid take off?

And this attempt to equate the jungles of Latin America with the industrialized cities of the North, to find parallels between a peasant population and a unionized, affluent working class, suggests that their teachers have not shown these youths how to draw analogies. They have heard the despairing voice of Marcuse; they have not grasped the power of the syllogism.

America, it is just possible, can be mobilized to repudiate the futile policies that have deranged its values in the last thirty years. But America cannot possibly be led by the nose by a group of ill-informed youths shouting irrelevant insults and wielding clubs at available targets. In Chicago, they achieved the almost impossible task of making Mayor Daley's police look like public servants. And in Chicago they broke the neck of a city official. By that one act they compromised, at least for a time, the whole protest movement in America.

Viva Curran!

The high point of the National Maritime Union's fifteenth convention, held in New York earlier this month, was the almost unanimous vote, to ringing applause, whereby the 475 delegates of the 50,000 members pocketed $525 apiece in "subsistence," plus first-class roundtrip-fares, for spending fourteen hours in three days at the Commodore Hotel. The first order of business was the appointment of all committees by Joseph Curran, who has been president of the NMU during its entire thirty-three years. All resolutions must pass through these committees, and only those recommended may be discussed. To delegates who complained that their resolutions had been ignored, Curran replied, "New subjects come up under New Business." But the catch to that was that just as the agenda was reaching New Business, Curran announced: "And so we come to the end of this convention." The delegates promptly adjourned.

Curran's aim this year was to legitimize a presidential decree by which he had taken the NMU away from the seamen—whom he can no longer control—and established his machine anew on a catchall membership. Thus 7,500 brassière and shoe employees, gravediggers, car salesmen and Panamanian workers can now vote on seamen's contracts and for the officials who will service vessels from New York to Yokohama. In the NMU the entire membership votes for every officer.

Those who can vote, that is. By requiring that seamen accumulate 800 days of sea time, the NMU relegates 40 per cent of its maritime members (all of whom pay $160 a year in "service fees") to second-class status, with neither voice nor vote. Meanwhile, shoreside workers are given their NMU books on the spot.

James Morrissey, leader of the opposition, suggested that seamen and land workers each elect their own officers and determine their own policies. This was a criticism of Curran's empire and, while criticism may be seen elsewhere as a sign of organizational good health, in the NMU it is considered treason. Curran castigated the dozen or so members of the opposition as "lower than scum . . . paid provocateurs." And Morrissey was given no chance to reply.

Curran has a tremendous machine with unlimited funds. It pays him a salary of $92,050, it supplies him with a limousine and pays its chauffeur $18,048, and it is setting aside for his retirement a plum of $650,000. There is just one buzzing anxiety to disturb the emperor's repose: all that power and affluence depend on the patient silence of 50,000 members. And each of those workers has a brain in his head. (See "Curran's NMU" by Dorian J. Fliegel, The Nation, January 30, 1967.)

Once the Headlines Vanished

Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.) has been struggling for years to put a $20,000 ceiling on annual price support payments to larger growers. Last May he succeeded in getting the limitation written into the House bill by a vote of 224 to 142, largely because, on a state by state, county by county basis, he was able to correlate hunger statistics—"hunger" was in the May headlines because of Sen. George McGovern's investigations—with large subsidy payments. But the Senate deleted the limitation, as we predicted it would ("The Sweet Smell of Subsidy"; The Nation, June 16), and last week efforts to restore it failed by the close vote of 177 to 181. The measure now goes to conference and Mr. Findley will have a final chance this year to achieve his objective when the House considers the conference report.

Actually he had the necessary votes, but when the leaders of both parties learned how the House would vote, strong pressure was applied to get ten Congressmen—each leadership delivered five—to vote against the measure. The Republican leadership wanted to please the states and interests that benefit from large subsidy payments, including Sen. James Eastland, senior member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, who last year pocketed more than $100,000 in subsidy payments from his cotton operations. The Democratic leadership felt compelled to obey the desires of such committee chairmen as Poage (Texas) Agriculture, Mahon (Texas) Appropriations, Teague (Texas) Veterans Affairs, Rivers (South Carolina) Armed Services, and Colmer (Mississippi) Rules. Once the hunger headlines had vanished, the bipartisan squeeze play could be carried out backstage.

Not That Simple

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare is in trouble over its blacklisting of scientists (see editorial, "'Security' in HEW," The Nation, July 28) and, unlike the CIA and the military, it is not in a position to hush up scandal on grounds of national security. A panel headed by the departmental Under Secretary, John G. Veneman, Jr., is investigating. A suit has been filed in Federal District Court in Boston to compel the department to make public its files on persons, including many prominent scientists, who have failed to pass its security checks. A former HEW administrator says, "The whole security business in the department is a mess and has been for years."

Richard D. Lyons of The New York Times obtained one blacklist, compiled by the National Institute of Mental Health (mental health!) listing the names of forty-eight "ineligible" scientists. Estimates of the total number of proscribed scientists range from 200 to 500. Yet several former Secretaries—Abraham A. Ribicoff, Anthony J. Celebrezze and Wilbur J. Cohen—whose word cannot be doubted, say that they never heard anything about blacklisting in all their years in the department.

When one reflects on the varieties of skulduggery that permeate large, complex organizations, this obliviousness at the top is quite plausible. Moreover, only a fraction of what has been going on may be brought to light by the unearthing of a few blacklists. And the tangible blacklists may have done less harm than those blacklists—or "graylists"—which were never reduced to writing.

In the government, especially, it is important to keep the institutional, the bureaucratic factor in mind when surveying a situation of this sort. A prudent subordinate is likely to refrain from calling a Cabinet officer's attention to something which it might embarrass him to know. Down at the lower levels the rule is: when in doubt, don't put this or that scientist on an advisory panel. True, he might make the panel more effective, but if it should turn out that he has displeased some Congressman with his views on the Vietnamese War or one of a dozen other "controversial" issues, there could be trouble for the functionary who failed to bar him. Some blacklists exist only in the heads of people of this kind, based perhaps on mere suspicion or hearsay.

The Veneman panel has an important and difficult job ahead of it. The cure lies not only in investigation but in the hope that more Secretaries and administrators will insist on knowing more of what goes on in their departments, encourage input of information from below, cultivate relations with the press (particularly the critical press) and take pains to guard against what they know are the pitfalls of every bureaucratic setup.

WHO GIVES A DAMN?

MALCOLM KOVACS
Mr. Kovacs resigned recently as associate director of the Washington Urban Coalition. Last year he completed graduate work at the London School of Economics.

Remember the Urban Coalition? Created out of the mixed motives of idealism and fear of riots, it made its public debut in August 1967, with an emergency convocation of some 2,000 national leaders from minority groups, big business, labor, religion and local government. Meeting shortly after the Detroit and Newark riots of that summer, the leaders discussed the "urban crisis" and adopted a statement affirming their dedication to a greatly improved lot for blacks to prove that the American system can indeed work for everyone.

The assembled leaders were charged to return to their cities and there set up local Urban Coalitions as prodders, pushers, coordinators, toward the end of upgrading minority status in such basic areas as housing, jobs, businesses, transportation and health care. Each local Coalition was to act as a powerful liberal alliance of a city's power structure to press for needed changes in both the public and private sector. The key element that was to make this strategy effective was to be business leadership working actively with and for the black community. Businessmen were recognized as the powerful and previously untapped source of strength for professional Negro organizations and black community groups in traditional alliance with liberal religious and labor leaders.

Since that meeting, John Gardner has assumed leadership of the national Urban Coalition, a large national staff of some sixty persons has been added, and Coalitions have been attempted in some forty cities. The Coalition has generated a great amount of interest and idealism as perhaps one of the most important private initiatives to make needed social changes. The national Coalition's steering committee and task forces include some of the nation's most powerful leaders. The Ford Foundation and big business have generously supported the national Coalition.

But talking to reporters at a breakfast meeting earlier this month, Mr. Gardner expressed deep concern over the nation's lack of momentum in the solution of domestic problems, said of the Nixon Administration that it is "still awaiting an urban policy" and acknowledged that local Coalitions were finding it difficult to organize genuine community-wide attacks on urban ills because some businessmen and other white leaders have "a deep reluctance to take off their coats and meet with people from the other end of town." He warned that the country was approaching "a final state of affluent misery—Croesus on a garbage heap."

This bleak appraisal, in such sharp contrast with the lofty phrases and high-minded intentions voiced by Gardner and others at the inception of the Urban Coalition, can be documented from the experiences of one local Urban Coalition, in this case Washington, D.C. The capital is, perhaps, not a typical American city—no city is typical in any strict sense—but its urban problems, the devices it has employed to solve them, and the results to date are repeated in city after city where Coalitions have been established.

The Washington Urban Coalition was formed shortly before the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., sparked the Washington riots of April 1968. Key figures active from the start were the Rev. Geno Baroni, head of the Catholic Archdiocese's Urban Affairs Office and head of a Catholic Church-supported, nonprofit housing group; the Rev. Philip Newell, a white Protestant activist associated with the local Council of Churches; Isaac Frank, head of the local Jewish Community Council; Sterling Tucker, then executive director of the Washington Urban League and now vice chairman of the Washington City Council (to which he was appointed by President Nixon earlier this year); J. C. Turner and Philip Daugherty, both from the local Central Labor Council leadership; Glen Watts, head of the Communications Workers and then also chairman of the Health and Welfare Council; William Calomiris, head of his own real estate firm and then president-elect of the Board of Trade, and Marion Barry, black community leader and a director of Pride, Inc., a successful job training program for "dudes." Washington's conservative Cardinal O'Boyle was an early endorser of the Coalition idea, but never participated actively although he sat on the board of directors.

The Coalition's first president was Walter McArdle, president of a small Washington-based printing company who was active in Catholic affairs, the Board of Trade and the local branch of the National Conference of Christians and Jews (NCCJ). These religious, labor, business and black leaders were the basic membership of the Coalition's ad hoc committee which grew into the Coalition's board of directors of some thirty members. McArdle was made president after several bigger businessmen had declined to serve.

As soon as the Washington riots began, Mayor-Commissioner Walter Washington called a number of Coalition members to his office to ask for their help with food, shelter and job assistance to persons hurt in the riot. Several Coalition business and church leaders did provide relief assistance in cooperation with the local Health and Welfare Council and community groups. This emergency action is the Coalition's proudest—and almost sole—achievement.

From its inception, the Washington Urban Coalition has remained on the side lines of the political process. The main reason for this inactivity has been that the Coalition was controlled by status quo whites who were seldom challenged by the black board members. For most of its existence, an inner circle of very moderate types from the NCCJ has kept the Coalition passive. The dominant figure has been Gerald Siegel, The Wash- ington Post's counsel, a shrewd pro-business moderate who served as an assistant to Lyndon Johnson in the fifties.

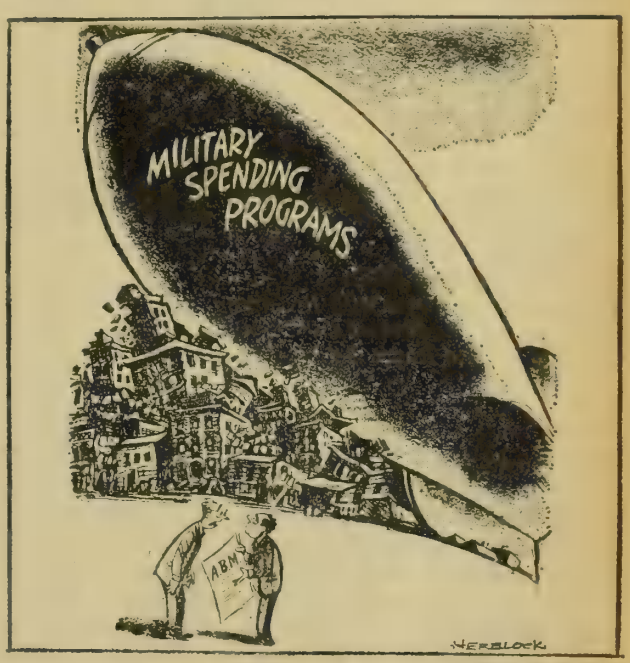
Once the riots were over, the Coalition whites were unsure what to do next. After some discussion, it was agreed to hold community meetings in different black sections of the city to hear what black community representatives wanted an Urban Coalition to do. Many blacks were skeptical about these visits from whitey, coming so soon after the riots. Marion Barry, among others, was active in the community hearings, at some risk to his own position with Pride's bitter clients. The businessmen who took part in these meetings, like Arthur Newmyer, head of Newmyer Associates, who had come to the Coalition from NCCJ, found the experience educational. They came to understand a little better the desperate needs of black communities and the puny efforts of black community groups because of their limited resources. But there was no immediate follow-up to these meetings, no action on specific requests for assistance. As a result, many blacks who attended have come to feel that their cynicism was on the mark.



Seven months after the Coalition was created, it replaced its white acting executive director, local NCCJ executive director Donald Sullivan, with a black Washington Urban League official, Horace Morris. His appointment came after a board argument over what color the executive director should be. Led by the black Rev. David Eaton, then of Washington's Federal City College, blacks and white liberals argued that a black staff director must be appointed if the Coalition hoped to relate at all to the black community. In addition to Morris, a professional staff was hired to help run the Coalition's proposed task forces in housing, transportation, police, and other areas mentioned at the community meetings. After months of delay, task force chairmen were found and task forces assembled. However, the purpose and authority of the task forces were never made clear to either their chairmen or their members. Because of this fogginess, several task force chairmen resigned, including Negro board member Ted Hagans, who was also head of the all-Negro Chamber of Commerce.

Early this year the Coalition held a weekend retreat for board members and staff. With the help of black trainers, Coalition board members in small groups came to know one another much better and to understand more about where other people stood. Out of the weekend grew a determination by most of the forty persons present that the Coalition must begin to carve out a role for itself, beginning with a response to President Nixon's crime message on the District, which had been issued during the retreat. Many blacks criticized the President's proposal for 1,000 more D.C. policemen, pointing out that past quotas were unfilled and present policemen were being used ineffectively. But by the next board meeting the euphoria of the retreat had dissipated, traditional authority relationships had resumed and action was postponed. The Coalition took no position on the crime message or on other important matters facing the city: home rule, the current subways versus freeways dispute, the police use of Mace. Another example of inaction is the Coalition's failure to grant some $120,000 to black community groups. This money was left from funds raised at the time of the riot and was designated for use in worth-while black projects. Some forty community groups applied, and staff recommendations were made. More than a year and a half later, only two small grants have been made.

In the spring of 1969 the Washington Urban Coalition was one year old. Both whites and blacks felt embarrassed that almost nothing had been accomplished since the riot relief effort. More important, as the first anniversary of Dr. King's death approached, fears of renewed rioting grew in the business community. Businessmen held several private meetings with black leaders who were asking that city stores be closed to respect Dr. King's memory. Determined not to lose any of their pre-Easter business, the merchants refused. Instead, several downtown department stores broadcast a short speech by Mayor-Commissioner Washington on their store loudspeakers and the Washington Urban Coalition voted at its April board meeting to create a so-called Martin Luther King fund. The Coalition board pledged $50,000 (from the unspent riot relief money of a year earlier) to the King fund for aid to black housing, business and job programs. President McArdle declared in a press conference that the Coalition would try to raise up to $2 million. The King fund is still unborn, having been quietly forgotten after the danger of trouble seemed to go away.

The monthly board of directors meetings have had consistently low attendance and achieved little. Several times they have been canceled for lack of a quorum. Even the executive committee of eight members (with only two blacks and no women) has not always been able to get a quorum.

President McArdle's one-year term expired last spring, but by late summer he had still been unable to find a replacement. (In the meantime, McArdle completed plans to move his city-based printing firm to the suburbs, apparently without noting any inconsistency between such moves and the steady exacerbation of urban "problems.") By his own count, more than fifteen prominent Washingtonians declined the office. In addition, Coalition treasurer William Calomiris had been unable to get a fund-raising chairman and the Coalition's money was almost exhausted. Thus the board voted reluctantly in early September to acknowledge financial realities. The Coalition gave immediate notice to most of the professional and secretarial staff. This board meeting was a mixture of praise for the Coalition's past usefulness (never defined) and the beginning of a burial by the whites of the idea that the Coalition would do very much in the future.

New York Post

"By the Way, What Are We Developing To Protect Our Cities?"

The Coalition has just now prevailed upon a local shoe store executive, Frank Rich, to take over as president. Rich does not have much political punch (his business is not one of Washington's big ones), but at least he has some liberal intentions. He will inherit the only senior staff person left, executive director Walter Lewis, another former Washington Urban League staffer who served briefly as assistant secretary at HUD at the end of the Johnson administration. Present Coalition plans call for a reduced budget of about $50,000 a year, with most of this money going to staff salaries and office rent.

Part of the reason for the Coalition's failure is that most of the city's power is not in local hands. The only elected body in the District of Columbia is the school board, and this has only been the case for the past year. Most of the power over city affairs is in the hands of the local Board of Trade and Congress, many members of which are hostile to or uninterested in the majority of the District's population, which is 73 per cent black.

The fault lies also with Mayor-Commissioner Washington for not trying to use the Coalition to build support for city programs he is trying to get through Congress. The Mayor has succeeded during his two years in office in being as inoffensive as possible to the business community. In return he has received very few scraps from the master's table: the District's revenue position is still insecure, home rule has not made any noticeable progress, the Mayor has not built an effective political base for himself or the city in his dealings with Congress.

The national Urban Coalition can also be blamed. John Gardner is adept at uplifting concerned whites with fine rhetoric on the need to work for social change, but he is rarely on hand when it comes to the practical struggles needed for changes. He and his staff have used the gentle but ineffective approach of flattering local Coalition businessmen rather than attempting to draft them.

The generally conservative Washington business community's attempt to involve itself with social change was half-hearted and short-lived. With a few exceptions like lumber company executive John Hechinger, ex-City Council president, and Joseph Danzansky, Giant Food Company president, the business community has been much taken by promises of the hard line from the Nixon Administration as "the solution" to urban problems.

The Urban Coalition in practice has been an effort with little to show for it, except to have diverted blacks and white liberals from the hard political job which they have to do in a world where businessmen are more often enemies than allies.

The decline of the Urban Coalition is not, after all, a phenomenon unique to Washington; the same history comes from cities across the country. There have been no outbursts in recent months, but the conditions remain and so does the danger. Now Gardner, with his expressed disappointment over the President's domestic policies, with his image of Croesus on the garbage dump, is at least acknowledging that the threat persists and the remedy has not caught hold.

THE CHICAGO 8

Wire Taps: Disclosed or Leaked?

PHILIP W. MOORE

Mr. Moore is a lawyer with Businessmen for the Public Interest. Last year he directed the Convention Litigation Project, sponsored by the Roger Baldwin Foundation.

Chicago

Early last March the Supreme Court set up new rules governing the use of wire-tapping evidence in federal prosecutions. The government must now disclose all illegal wire tapping to the defendants. The trial court, in turn, must hold a hearing on whether any or all of the wire tapping was illegal and on whether the evidence used against the defendants, or intended to be used, was a product of illegal wire tapping. If the evidence was a product of illegal wire tapping, it cannot be used in court against the defendants.

These rules are a significant departure from past practice in federal court, where previously the government did not have to admit to wire taps, or disclose the content of its tapping. One would hope that the new rules would restrict the government's wire-tapping activities generally, but such is not the case in the conspiracy trial of the Chicago 8.

The new Supreme Court requirements came down just as the federal grand jury in Chicago was concluding its investigation of the convention disorders. During the previous month reports from the grand jury had indicated that indictments were imminent, but shortly after the new wire-tap rules were announced, the press reported that the conspiracy indictments had been held up. According to these news stories the federal government did not want the conspiracy defendants to review the transcripts of their wire tapping. In particular, the government was concerned with public disclosure that it had been wire tapping foreign embassies to the United States.

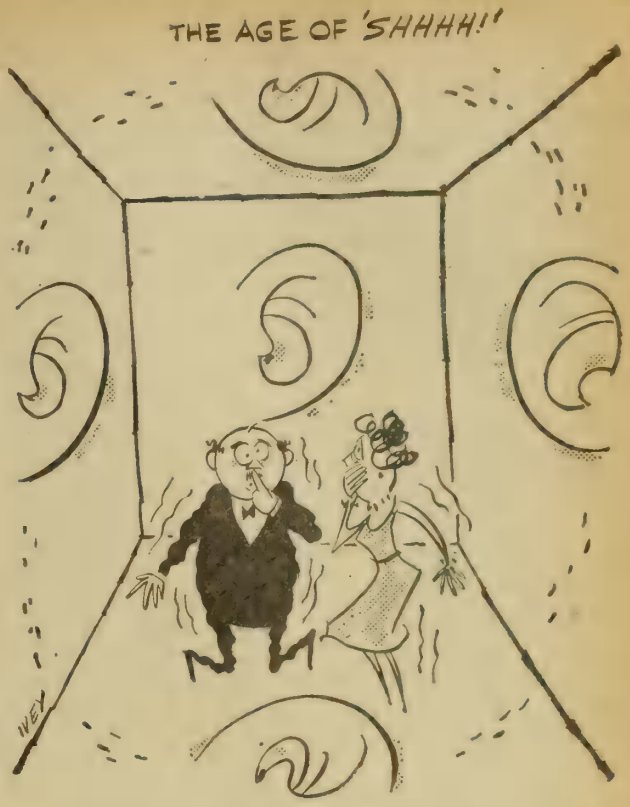
New motions seeking to modify the Supreme Court ruling were filed by the government. And the new Attorney General issued a new opinion authorizing widespread wire tapping in the interest of "national security." The government's strategy was to argue that the conspiracy wire tapping was legal inasmuch as it was done in the interest of national security. On March 20, ten days after the Supreme Court rules were known, the government indicted eight leaders of the political Left for conspiring and crossing state lines to cause a riot in Chicago during the convention. These eight are: Rennie Davis, Tom Hayden and David Dellinger (National Mobilization); Jerry Rubin and Abbie Hoffman (Yippie); Bobby Seale (Black Panther Party) and two university professors, Lee Weiner and John Froines.

On the first court date after the indictments, attorneys for the defendants filed motions asking the government to disclose all of its illegal wire tapping and to suppress all evidence derived from illegal wire tapping. They called for a hearing on the nature of the wire-tap evidence that the government was intending to use against the defendants. The attorneys were relying, naturally enough, on the new Supreme Court rules to support their motion.



In an unprecedented move, the government admitted extensive wire tapping against most of the defendants. In all earlier wire-tap cases the government admitted wire tapping only after the trial and after the evidence had been used against the defendants.

The government turned over two tapes of admittedly illegal wire tapping, but has refused to surrender any of the other tapes (there are said to be seven), on the ground that concern for national security made the taps legal.

The trial judge, Julius Hoffman, has refused to rule on the national security argument or to hold a hearing on the nature of the government's wire tapping against the eight. He maintains stubbornly that the trial should proceed first. If the defendants are found not guilty, he argues, there is no need for hearings. He overlooks the fact that if the defendants are found guilty and a hearing discloses that illegal wire-tap evidence was used against them, he will have to hold a new trial. Moreover, he ignores the more important consideration that even if the defendants are found not guilty, they will have been subjected to a trial in which illegally obtained evidence was used against them.

The undisclosed wire tapping is admittedly illegal, except for the new proposition that national security confers legality. And since the court will not hold a hearing, the only person who makes the determination that national security is involved is Attorney General Mitchell.

Wire tapping is today widespread. Since the early 1960s the administrative definition of "subversive" has expanded so greatly that virtually any dissent can subject the dissenter to governmental eavesdropping. J. Edgar Hoover admits to tapping only forty phones in the country. It is difficult to believe this figure, but if it is true, it must mean that local agencies are tapping a great many more. The eight defendants in the conspiracy trial would account for 20 per cent of the tapping to which Hoover admits, and yet Attorney General Mitchell has indicated that wire tapping is an accepted method of law enforcement everywhere in the country.

If the determination of national security is left to such as Messrs. Mitchell and Hoover, there is still no protection against illegal wire tapping. The only time that judicial protection against wire tapping is invoked is when the government attempts to introduce wire-tap evidence against the defendants. And now in the conspiracy trial Judge Hoffman has not seen fit to invoke that protection.

There are problems enough with the use of wire tapping in court, but wire tapping has a multiplicity of other applications unrelated to court evidence. The very existence of wire tapping is itself a repression of dissent. Government officials are able to leak private facts about a person that would damage his standing and diminish his effectiveness in leading dissent.

A Chicago columnist, Mike Royko, reported not long ago that a former FBI agent took him out and tried to disclose some private facts about Martin Luther King, Jr., which had no bearing on his ability to lead the civil rights movement and no legal relevance whatsoever. Nor did these disclosures bear in any way on national security. The facts were disclosed in an apparent effort to embarrass King's leadership and diminish his standing with the press. Royko did not run the FBI's gossip.

The government has admitted illegally tapping the phones of Jimmy Hoffa and Cassius Clay, but in hearings that sought to reverse their convictions the courts found that none of the evidence used against them came from the illegal taps. If the wire-tap evidence had no relevance and was not used in court, then why did the government wire tap at all? This is particularly disturbing when public disclosure of the wire tapping brands the defendant as subversive, even if the government could not use the information to convict him.

Electronic eavesdropping in some of its forms has no use other than pure spying. In a memorandum anticipating the Democratic convention Chicago police noted that they had a "capability to monitor and tape Citizens Band and walkie-talkie transmissions in the area—(dissident groups)." Certainly radio communications by demonstrators were intercepted, but it is also likely that, in a period when phones were out of commission because of a strike, communications between campaign staff members were also intercepted. Apparently, the only people who determined which groups were "dissident" were members of the Chicago police.

Wire tapping is a form of search; it is a search of oral conversations. In any other type of search or seizure, the police must get a warrant before it can proceed. Moreover, the victim is aware of the search at the time it takes place or shortly thereafter. In wire tapping, no court exercises prior restraint over the search and the victims are not aware of it at the time it takes place. And since the products of the search are rarely introduced in court, the victim has no way of challenging the search at a subsequent time. Its fruits are simply filed away in the victim's records for whatever subsequent use the police may make.

That is the essential danger of current wire-tapping practices. Under the guise of national security, the government may compile information on private citizens. If the concept of national security legitimizes wire tapping, and thus protects it from judicial or public review, then we may all expect our phones to be tapped. And if the government is the only judge of whether or not a phone should be tapped in the interest of national security, we shall have no control over the use of wire-tapped information.

Of the many issues being litigated in the trial of the Chicago 8, perhaps none is so crucial as the general theme: governmental repression. These eight are being tried under a repressive law in a repressive city by a repressive judge. But what is most disturbing is that they are also being tried by the underbelly of the government. The witnesses against them are paid informants who posed as demonstrators, some, perhaps, being provocateurs; they are the cops who spent the summer of 1968 tailing these defendants, and they are the agents who have listened to numerous, usually irrelevant, phone conversations. You would think that if these defendants had been committing crimes while the cops were listening in, they would have arrested them then. Instead, they compiled the information, in case someone like Mitchell should decide to use it in a political trial. And in a political trial it is political, not legal, considerations that will prevent wire tapping.

NEGRO COLLEGES

ESCAPE FROM THE DARK CAVE

JOHN U. MONRO

Mr. Monro, dean of Harvard College from 1958 to 1967, is now director of freshman studies at Miles College, Birmingham, Ala.

Birmingham

At Miles College, in Birmingham, I am responsible for trying to develop and conduct a freshman program for some 300 young men and women, all black, who come to us from the local schools in Alabama. It is fifteen years since the great Brown decision of the Supreme Court ordered the desegregation of the schools, but hardly one of our 300 freshmen has ever had a white teacher before, or been to school with white classmates. Alabama is now fiftieth on the list of states in per-pupil expenditure for schooling (about $400 per child per year, as compared with about $1,000 in New York State), and in the South —as in the North—black schools seem to get the short end of the budget allocations. So it is no surprise that after twelve years of school, the students coming to Miles seem to be, on average, at about the 9th or 10th grade level in mathematical and language skills.

I recall very well that in my previous incarnation, when I was a dues-paying member of the white community, I had a hard time taking seriously the notion that I and my well-meaning, liberal-minded, church-going friends were bigoted racists. And a couple of years back when I first heard young black people accusing us good white folks of "genocide," I considered the accusation dangerous, and also rather paranoid and absurd. But I see things somewhat differently now. I find it a particularly rich experience to live and work in a black community, mainly because in the black community you develop a clarity of vision about the realities of American life.

I have learned how important it is to listen to the metaphors with which black poets have tried to describe the pain that they feel. For example, one day six years ago a strong, gentle young black man, a Harvard undergraduate, laid on my desk a copy of W.E.B. Du Bois' Souls of Black Folk. He said: "If you really want to know what I'm thinking, and what makes me move, then you must read this book." So, of course, I read it, and admired it in an intellectual way. But now, six years later,

I know what my young friend meant and what an honor he conferred on me by inviting me in.

Day by day, in my new incarnation my respect grows for W.E.B. Du Bois. As a Harvard man, I find it incredible that Harvard had Du Bois as an undergraduate and gifted graduate student seventy years ago, and let him go. It sometimes seems to me that our national history might have been different otherwise. But Harvard saw Du Bois as a Negro and let him go. And it seems to me a great national tragedy and loss, and characteristic of us as a people, that we now categorize Du Bois as a Communist, and so turn away from a life and work which would help us to understand our national guilt and our present convulsions. Here is how white America looked to Du Bois:

> It is as though one, looking out from a dark cave in a side of an impending mountain, sees the world passing and speaks to it; speaks courteously and persuasively, showing them how these entombed souls are hindered in their natural movement, expression, and development; and how their loosening from prison would be a matter not simply of courtesy, sympathy, and help to them, but aid to all the world.
>
> One talks on evenly and logically in this way but notices that the passing throng does not even turn its head, or if it does, glances curiously and walks on.
>
> It gradually penetrates the minds of the prisoners that the people passing do not hear; that some thick sheet of invisible but horribly tangible plate glass is between them and the world.
>
> They get excited; they talk louder. They gesticulate. Some of the passing world stop in curiosity; these gesticulations seem so pointless; they laugh and pass on. They still either do not hear at all, or hear but dimly, and even when they hear, they do not understand.
>
> Then the people within may become hysterical. They may scream and hurl themselves against the barriers, hardly realizing in their bewilderment that they are screaming in a vacuum, unheard, and that their antics may seem funny to those outside looking in.
>
> They may even, here and there, break through in blood and disfigurement, and find themselves faced by a horrified, implacable, and quite overwhelming mob of people frightened for their own very existence.

What makes Du Bois' metaphor of the black people imprisoned in the cave, behind the plate glass window, so terrible is that it is still true, today, right down to the bloody bit about what happens to the occasional black man who breaks through the barrier and runs into the mob of frightened whites.

Other poets have produced other terrible metaphors for our national curse. Langston Hughes spoke of Harlem, "here on the edge of Hell," "where a nickel costs a dime." Hughes, too, saw racial prejudice as a wall; when I was a young man, he said, "the wall rose slowly, slowly, between me and my dream, dimming, hiding the light of my dreams, rose until it touched the sky—the wall." For Richard Wright the terrible thing that thrust in between him and the world was the vision of a horrid lynching, a black man burned, and around the scene "upon the trampled grass . . . buttons, dead matches, butt ends of cigars and cigarettes, peanut shells, a drained gin-flask, and a whore's lipstick." Ralph Ellison's great metaphor was the Invisible Man, and I remind you that, though we usually think of Ellison as a moderate and literary man, the first thing his invisible man does, as we meet him, is beat within an inch of his life a blue-eyed white man who bumped and insulted him one dark night. Ellison has his invisible man run from the scene "laughing so hard I feared I might rupture myself."

Or take the metaphor of a sensitive young white man, Jonathan Kozol, who tried to teach in the segregated black schools in Boston, and was fired for having his students read Langston Hughes's poem, "Ballad of the Landlord." Kozol called his book, Death at an Early Age, and his subtitle was: The Destruction of the Hearts and Minds of Negro Children in the Boston Public Schools.

It seems wise to try to communicate what I am trying to say by resorting to metaphor, because the plain statistical facts of our racism are so well known, have been so well known so long, and have so little effect. In this free and rich society, if a man is black, just because he is black, this is his table of probabilities:

Twice as many black babies as white will die before age 1; because they are black. Four times as many mothers will die in childbirth; because they are black. Between the ages of 30 and 60, twice as many blacks will die as whites. There is three times more chance that a black student will drop out of school before 6th grade, and about one-half the chance that he will finish high or college. In the South, only 15 per cent of young black men and women of college age will get to college, as compared to 50 per cent for young white people; this means that each year some 75,000 black young men and women of college ability, reaching college age, just do not get to college at all; because they are black.

The tabulation goes on, as long as it is familiar. We could go into the matter of jobs, of income levels, of opportunity for real management positions; we could go into housing, what it's like to be confined in a ghetto; we could go into the bloody figures of the military draft for fighting in Vietnam, and the great white sanctuary of college and graduate school; we could document the behavior of white police in black neighborhoods.

In my freshman Social Studies class at Miles I must each day try to explain the American social and political structure to fifteen black young men and women, who, it develops, already know more about the dirty side of that system, and how it really operates, than I can ever know. One big, strong, black young man in that class whom I have come to respect particularly is Fred Rogers. Mr. Rogers is a steady man of 24, who has served five years in the Army, three of them in Vietnam. He knows all about the percentage of Negro combat troops in Vietnam, and the high percentage of Negro young men in the daily body counts. He lives in a part of town where there is no sewage system, and no paved streets; where black people live in rickety shacks, Negro schools are third rate, and where the prospect is, if he finished on through college, he can hope maybe some day to be a schoolteacher, if he is careful not to offend anybody. In Alabama he would make better money as a carpenter, or in the steel mills. But he has no real chance of getting a job in business or industry commensurate with his power as a man—his intelligence, his energy, his force.

Fred Rogers is an expert on the brutality of the American social and economic system. He comes to class each day, sits down front, and stares at me unblinking and unsmiling as I try to explain to him and his black classmates how the American social system works.

Mr. Rogers is unfailingly polite and does not say much, but when he does come on, it is like a ton of bricks. And, of course, his presence tends to affect the whole class, my own preparation and presentation of the material, and the response from the other students. I am sure that as a white man trying to present this material, I often annoy and frustrate Mr. Rogers. He seldom shows his annoyance, which is a tribute to his patience and manners. But in that class we are always operating on the edge of annoyance and frustration, and because it is tough and tense, it is the best educational mix in the world.

One day in class we were discussing the phenomenon of "culture," when Mr. Rogers weighed in. "As I listen to this," he said, "it seems to me that I am a man living in two cultures. Or anyway, I was brought up and I live in a black culture; and to get along, I have to learn how to cope with the white culture. And these two cultures are different; in fact one seems very hostile; and it is damned hard."

Given what he has been through in Vietnam, what he lives with every day in Bessemer, and the struggle he faces in the years ahead just to get a decent, self-respecting job in our society, I must say I find Mr. Rogers incredibly moderate. What he has been through, and what he confronts, just because he is black, entitles him to regard me, or any other white man, categorically, as the enemy, as part of the evil force oppressing every hour of his life. The miracle—the daily miracle of Miles College and the Birmingham black community—is that Fred Rogers and his classmates, and parents, have not yet come to hate white people categorically. They are still moderate—tough and independent and alert and taking no nonsense—but still willing to talk and listen and work through institutions. The moderation is not for eternity; we are in a terrible race with the erosion of good will in the black community. This fact, already all too visible in the North, is now becoming visible in the South. By a miracle, we still have time, but not much time, and the opportunity to do what must be done is slipping away.

Do I mean by all this that "integration is dead"? That is a central question. In an interview with Look Mrs. Betty Shabazz, the widow of Malcolm X, said: "Blacks have been trying to integrate for nearly four centuries, and they have failed. Integration has failed. We have been forced into separate neighborhoods and separate lives, and now we have to go our own way. Now we blacks are going to rule ourselves."

I note certain similarities between Mrs. Shabazz's position and Fred Rogers' position, and what may be a difference. Fred Rogers is planning, somehow, for all the difficulties, to break through and make it in the general national community; and he is planning, at the same time, to turn his energies and talents to the strengthening of the black community. He sees a strong black community as a power base from which he can hope to have some impact on the white community, for himself and his own career, and for others. He would not call what he wants "integration"; what he wants is equality of education, of job opportunity; he wants justice, a say in the government, and freedom to move about like any other self-respecting citizen. There's an important difference between "equality" and "integration." For one thing, the idea of integration, as most white people think of it, bores Fred Rogers stiff. He finds most white people cold, hypocritical, inhumane, selfish, impersonal, driven by altogether stupid ambitions involving status and material wealth—in a word depersonalized and "hung up." After two years at Miles College, living in the black community of Birmingham, I think Mr. Rogers sees the white community just about right.

What is more important, Fred Rogers has begun to learn how the United States really works. What white America respects is not weakness but strength; America respects not rational pleas for help but rather any serious threat to vital parts of the system; and most particularly any threat to profits and sacred property. I am old enough to remember the great national labor struggles in the 1930s. We learned then that our great industries—Ford, General Motors, big steel—were not responsive to the needs and concerns of the individual workers, until the workers, with a prolonged, brutal effort, pulled their thing together, and developed the institutional strength to stop the great factories and shut off their profits. Then the working man got attention, and he got respect. He became then a respectable threat; an organized, institutional threat.

The American black community will start making real progress in the United States when it discovers the analogy between its own position and the position of unorganized labor a half century ago. It will not work in our society to think of the black community as a separate nation: the metaphor is just wrong. But it will work to think of the black community as a great, national, black union. Let me push the analogy one step further. Whereas labor unions were in a position to command respect and attention because they could, and did, close down factories, the black community is in a position to command respect and attention because it can shut down great cities. That threat strikes a nerve in the power structure: it makes its money in the great cities.

So, I believe very strongly in some form of Black Power. I think that the only way any group of people gets along in this country is by strength and not weakness. I observe that our special national genius seems to be the organizing of social institutions, large and small, to accomplish all sorts of purposes. And I observe further that the black people have never gotten seriously into this universal national game, this organizing of effective units of institutional power.

A lot of people I meet, white and black, are scared by the idea of Black Power. I am bound to say that Black Power scares me a whole lot less than industrial power or military power, or the unholy marriage of those two; and scares me a good deal less than what we experience in Alabama as Wallace power, or in Chicago as Daley power. Indeed, it seems to me that the most serious social consequences for us lie not in developing institutional strength and responsibility in the black community—black unity—but in the continuation of a condition of black powerlessness, accompanied by tokenism and oppression. That way surely lie frustration and deepening anger, and terrible social explosions.

One obvious consequence of what I have been saying—obvious enough to me, anyway—is that as a society we should realize the importance of the predominantly Negro colleges, and find ways to make them strong and effective. There are some 120 junior and senior black colleges, almost all in the South, and they enroll more than 125,000 students, something more than half of all the black students going to college in the United States. This percentage is slowly diminishing as formerly all-white colleges warm up to their responsibilities. But the importance of colleges like Miles increases month by month. In his very constructive and thoughtful study of the black colleges published in 1965, Earl McGrath noted that some 40 per cent of the students come from families with incomes below $4,000; indeed 70 per cent come from families with incomes below $6,000. In the country at large, 80 per cent of all students going to college have family incomes above $6,000. The black colleges are reaching a seriously disadvantaged population that no other colleges even know about, much less can reach.

I have already said that the freshman class at Miles College seems, after twelve years of school, to be on the average at the 9th- or 10th-grade level. These figures are not at all atypical, and they do not say a word as to the intelligence or academic potential of the young peole; the figures testify only to grossly inadequate schooling. And I noted earlier that each year in the South some 75,000 black boys and girls who have the potential to go to college never get there.

This is the problem that the Negro colleges have been working on, day after day, devotedly, at bare subsistence levels of support, for a hundred years. And it will continue to be the big job for the black colleges in the years ahead. It is not a job the fast-moving, rich white colleges and universities can do, at least not by themselves.

My central point here is that all the colleges in America, black and white, working together, have a most serious task cut out for them in the years ahead. How they should be working together is not yet altogether clear. Some notable early examples of cooperative efforts are under way, and we are learning from them. Principally the nation must become aware that the black colleges, for all their weakness and shortcomings, will be essential to this effort. They are geographically positioned to be in closest contact with some of the most needy areas. They are accustomed to working with students who are badly prepared for college, and to moving them along to graduate school. Thus they are critical centers of contact and of a growing expertise.

Another critical task for colleges like Miles is to serve as centers for the development of some measure of institutional strength in the black communities of the South. A few recent events will suggest how important such a college can be. When the city and county were slow to develop a local base for poverty programs, Miles College launched the first Head Start program in Birmingham. It developed programs for retraining industrial workers. It is a center for the attack on adult illiteracy; within the year it undertook to manage the VISTA program in the county and in counties to the south. As a consequence of new voting rights, the area is beginning to elect a few black officials into local governments. Miles is trying to provide these new officials with information and research assistance as they attack their new jobs.

So, we must come to see the Negro colleges not just as impoverished and struggling educational institutions but as centers for the development of institutional strength, of coordinated efforts of many kinds, in communities which have dangerously little institutional strength or resources. It is no accident that at Miles College, we now stress more and more the importance, after a student has completed his undergraduate and graduate work, that he come back to the South and put his hard-won skills to work in the community.

So we must quit worrying whether it is the "right thing" to support the black colleges. They are here to stay because, poor though they are, they are performing a critical function, as educational institutions and as centers of community strength. The challenge is to find ways to beef up that effort and make it more effective; through organizations like the United Negro College Fund; through government aid, as through Title III of the Higher Education Act; and through carefully worked out, long-range associations between black colleges and white colleges.

From what I have said about the educational effort in the colleges and the importance of community organization, it follows that I am entirely sympathetic with the insistence of our black communities that they be given control over the schools that serve black children in black neighborhoods. To paraphrase Betty Shabazz on this matter: "White people would consider it insane if black people tried to run white schools. Now it's time for black people to make as much sense, and to take charge of the education of their own children." I say flatly, it is the clearest example I know of white racism, of white people's built-in sense of superiority, to assume that whites should have charge of black children's education. All the facts cry out in the other direction. White people have made schools a weapon of oppression against black children. Read Jonathan Kozol's Death at an Early Age.

Consider rural Alabama. The U.S. Civil Rights Commission last year revisited sixteen rural counties in southern Alabama, an impoverished farm area with a population of some 350,000, about three-fifths black. They found, among other things, that for people over 25, the median grade level of school-leaving for white people was eleven grades, and for black people 5.5 grades. The commission found also that, fifteen years after the Supreme Court decision ordering desegregation of schools, only 2 per cent of the black students were attending formerly all-white schools. I would add that the same percentage, about 2 per cent, or less, holds also in metropolitan Jefferson County, around Birmingham.

The commission found further than in Clarke County, for example, virtually all white schools were valued and insured for more than $100,000. No black school was valued above $20,000 and two were insured for $750. The commission asked the State Superintendent of Education, Mr. Ernest Stone, why Clarke County has white schools worth $100,000 and black schools worth $750. Here is Mr. Stone's verbatim reply: "Well, I would assume that the building which is assessed for $110,000 is a more expensive building than the one that is assessed for $750. That would be a reasonable assumption. Now, the state has nothing to do with the building of either one of the buildings. All the plans were promulgated by the local school system. It is a little something that we call democracy and we think it has worked pretty well."

This response will be something to think about if the federal government takes seriously the fervent demands of the South that it send to the states for education "blocks of money with no strings."

I do not find it strange or surprising, but simply inevitable, that black parents should be deeply angry at white racist management of their children's schools and should demand to run the schools themselves.

In the distribution of funds and people for the new effort of schooling, it is critical that we place a great deal of emphasis on strengthening the work in the early grades, in fact strengthen efforts like Head Start, to get the children started before age 6. It is evident, as Ivor Kraft noted in a recent article in The Nation ["Second-Class Schools in a First-Class Power," May 26] that improving our elementary schools will be a most difficult job. Most schools and most teachers put an emphasis on rote learning, on conformity, on obedience and order. And most teachers are little prepared to confront racial attitudes, either within themselves, or in the very young. Further, as Kraft observes, elementary schools don't have an internal force pressing hard for changes, as do the colleges. So I sense that another task for our colleges and universities, as responsible members of the nation's educational enterprise, is to try to affect in every way they can what goes on in the grade schools.

We must strive now harder than ever for desegregated education. I do not use the word "integrated," for it has certain connotations of cultural assimilation, and "integration" of that sort is simply over. But "desegregation" is clear. It means requiring the end of separate school systems, and educating young white people and young black people in the same schools, so that they can educate each other. No other item on the national agenda is more important.

The Supreme Court reached the right decision in the Brown case of 1954, but for the wrong reason. The Court spoke of the oppression and discouragement that fell upon the minds of young black students by the mere fact of separation, and of the need to relieve this circumstance if black children were to receive the even break guaranteed by the Constitution. What the Court would have done better to stress is the sickness of soul that descends upon white youngsters when they are separated and segregated, and brought up willy-nilly with a subconscious sense of white superiority.

There may seem to be a contradiction between what I said earlier about Black Power, about black control of black schools, and the need for desegregation that I now stress. The contradiction seems to me more apparent than real. We must arrive at a standoff, a confrontation, between black and white America based, not on appeals to generosity and tolerance but on conditions of real strength and self-respect and self-awareness on either side, and an awareness of and respect for the other man. The idea of a black "nation," the use of that word "nation," contains a helpful suggestion. In this crazy world a certain categorical respect attaches to membership in a recognized nation state; a foreign nationality carries more esteem, indeed, than white America renders its black citizens. I do not go all the way with black nationalists, because the metaphor becomes too confused when you think of a nation scattered in pockets large and small across 3,000 miles and surrounded by yet another nation. But the idea of a black community, of a great black union, united in righteous anger, and determined to work as one, is just right in the United States. It can become the basis for a position of real social strength and pride. Such a development does not at all rule out desegregation, or other contact with the white community. On the contrary, it assures that desegregation and interracial contact will produce mutual respect.

Another thing we must do if we are to have a rational future, is to teach all our people, young and old, in school and out, the long, tortured, truthful story of racial confrontation and oppression in our country. The failure of the schools, and especially the colleges, to see the central importance of this dreadful theme to our national life—and to deal with it—is the surest sign we have of the essential insensitivity, the habit-ridden conformity, of our educational establishment. We teach every exotic thing you can think of in our great universities: Northern Welsh Literature, Middle Irish, Origins of European Romanticism, Andean Archaeology, Beowulf, History of the Byzantine Empire, the Minor Works of Rousseau. And the Lord knows what idiotic refinements of established professional specialties in the sciences.

In our schools we devote months on end to the Iliad, that poeticized story of a two-penny comic-opera war fought 3,000 years ago in the Dardanelles. But our learned faculties cannot see—as history or tragedy—our own terrible racial epic, one of the most agonized struggles in human history, involving millions of men and women over nearly four centuries. That is, they cannot see it until the black students—like the G.M. workers of thirty years ago—stop the works. The students are dead right, and let us get on with it.

Like most Americans, I have been worried that the new student rebellions would produce an uncontrollable backlash; that we would have to grind our way through a long period of repression, and then further response from students, and then still further repression by police and National Guard. We must look forward to a difficult period, no doubt, for there are hundreds of campuses where faculties have yet to discover that the history of black people in America is a topic demanding some priority over ancient Greek dialects. But I am pleased and encouraged that the crucial confrontation is taking place in the colleges and universities, which, for all their conservatism and stuffiness, are still the most responsive large institutions left in this country. We shall go through some bad experiences on the campuses—at least as bad as those of the last two years. But we shall achieve, also, some constructive results. We are having some already.

I was much impressed by President Morris Abrams' thoughtful handling of the Brandeis sit-in; and by President Levy's determination that, come what may, the University of Chicago wants to work through to solutions with its own students, without calling in the law. There are special reasons for not calling in the law of Chicago to help solve student problems, but the underlying principle is nonetheless sound.

I am most of all heartened by the recent action of a faculty committee at Harvard, working its way to a series of suggestions as to how Harvard should proceed to develop a black studies program. To arrive at its recommendation, the faculty committee met regularly with black student groups and their representatives, and the report shows on every page that the faculty was listening and learning.

Two passages from Harvard came through like music in the black community:

> The absence of course offerings in many areas of Afro-American culture is emphatically a matter of more than academic or pedagogical concern to black students. Indeed, it seems likely that the absence of such offerings is the single most potent source of the black students' discontent at Harvard. The lack of such courses can strike the black students as a negative judgment by Harvard University on the importance of these areas of knowledge and research, and, by inference, on the importance of the black people themselves.
>
> More pointedly, there is the problem faced by the black student, who, coming to Harvard, may feel more or less consciously, something of a dislocation from the black community. Many students who addressed the committee expressed the need to legitimize, inwardly as well as publicly, their presence at Harvard while other blacks remain in the ghetto, confronting its problems, bearing its burdens. Herein lies one of the major sources of the demand for courses relevant to the black experience. What the black student wants is an opportunity to study the black experience and to employ the intellectual resources of Harvard in seeking solutions to the problems of the black community—so that he will be better prepared to assist the community in solving these problems. Such educational opportunities at Harvard would help the black student to justify his separation from the larger black community—and would attest that the separation was by no means radical or permanent.

And a final statement from the same report:

> In our opinion, the status quo with respect to Afro-American Studies at Harvard is not satisfactory. Quite a number of courses recognize the existence of black men in the development of America: quite a bit of expertise is already available. However, merely recognizing black men as integral segments of certain overall social processes is not good enough. We are dealing with 25 million of our own people with a special history, culture, and range of problems. It can hardly be doubted that the study of black men in America is a legitimate and urgent academic endeavor. If this be so and if we are determined to launch this field of study successfully, farsighted goals and programs are required. These goals and programs should maintain and even raise academic standards; should avoid considering the black experience in isolation; and finally, should have meaning for all serious students—black and white.

Amen, brothers! Amen!

THE MELANCHOLY RITUALS

RICHARD J. WALTON

Mr. Walton was the principal Voice of America correspondent at the United Nations for five years. He then resigned to write The Remnants of Power: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson (Coward-McCann). He is now at work on a study of the foreign policy of President Kennedy, to be published by Viking Press.

A symbol of peace, the glass tower of the United Nations Secretariat building stands tall and splendid alongside New York's East River. There and in the other modernistic buildings clustered around it, international civil servants and delegates from 126 countries go about their business: peace. The idealism of this place and these people draws hundreds of thousands of visitors each year, for the UN has become one of the world's great tourist attractions. At a time when the world is eager for the peace it so seldom sees, they come to visit the halls of peace and most of them leave with a sense of uplift, even inspiration.

So it was meant to be. Yet although the United Nations buildings are as striking as ever, and even busier, there is in these halls, undetected by the casual visitor, a deep and pervasive melancholy. It has come not because the United Nations often fails to find peace. What else but frequent failure can be expected in the quest for a goal that has eluded man since his first days on earth? Failure can be borne, but what cannot be borne is the growing fear that the United Nations is irrelevant. This institution, conceived in faith, often called "the last great hope of mankind," this institution born in the waning days of a cataclysmic general war, founded "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war," seems to be consigned to the most futile and frustrating of fates, empty ritual. There are more meetings than ever, the documents pile higher than ever, the parties continue their endless round. But what is the purpose? To try, to fail, to try again; no one can ask more of man or institution. But to be, in the words of one disillusioned Indian, "a glass house growing hothouse plants," would undermine the morale of any but the most bureaucratic.

The UN, after all, is nothing but the reflection of the world it is supposed to represent, and how does its highest officer, Secretary-General U Thant, see the world? He said in his 1968 annual report: "There has been a serious decline in the standards of international ethics and morality, with states relying increasingly on force and violence as a means of resolving their international differences. This tendency to return to force as a means of national policy strikes at the very basis of the United Nations; just settlement is sacrificed to superior might. . . . If this trend is not reversed, and if the principle of nonintervention in the free destiny of nations is not re-established, the future of international peace and security itself is indeed a very dark one."

That was a year ago. Has there been an improvement since? U Thant opened his 1969 report as follows: "During the past twelve months, the deterioration of the international situation . . . has continued." And the Secretary-General said later: "Furthermore, I have a strong feeling time is running out. This is true as much in regard to international peace and security, including disarmament, as it is true for economic and social development."

And the new president of the General Assembly, Miss Angie Brooks of Liberia, used such phrases as these in her opening address: "the gradual decline of the United Nations in the eyes of public opinion . . . the delusion that we are doing our best. . . ." She went on to say: "The sense of satisfaction, upon adoption of a resolution pleasing the purposes of one delegation or of a homogeneous group of delegations, has helped to perpetuate the mythology of achievement, so that many of us tend to go happily from one agenda item to the next without seriously considering the possibility or even probability that the resolution adopted will not be implemented."

Why this gloom? Almost everyone at the UN who will commit himself agrees with U Thant that the responsibility for the grim situation rests primarily with the United States and Russia. The two nations most important in creating the UN have in recent years not only disregarded the principles on which it is based but have brushed aside such attempts as it has made to influence them in its role of international keeper of the peace. Again, U Thant's words: "It is, certainly, a frightening commentary on the ominous state of world affairs that one superstate or the other can become exercised to the point of resorting to military action because of the liberalization of a regime in a small country like Czechoslovakia, or because of an internal upheaval in another small state, such as the Dominican Republic. . . . It is . . . a dismal outlook for the small and militarily weak states of the world—as the overwhelming majority of states are—if they can hope to control their own affairs only insofar as they do nothing to displease a powerful neighbor." Extraordinary words for Thant to direct at the two nations which can make his tenure as Secretary-General impossible.

There is a lovely irony in this situation. In April 1965, when American troops poured into Santo Domingo to crush the rebellion intended to return the democratically elected Juan Bosch to the Presidency, the Soviet Union burst out in righteous indignation against the United States in the Security Council, only to have the United States tell the Council to mind its own business, that the question was a matter solely for the Organization of American States, a puppet of the United States. And when Russian troops poured into defenseless Czechoslovakia, a righteous United States condemned the Russians in the Security Council, only to have the Russians tell the Council to mind its own business, that the question was an internal matter solely for the Warsaw Pact, a puppet of the USSR.

But if it is possible at the UN to equate Russia in Czechoslovakia with the United States in the Dominican Republic, there is nothing to balance against the American intervention in Vietnam. This intrusion, more than any other single factor, has cast the United Nations into despair. For years, as the casualties mounted, the UN has been forced to watch from the side lines; an organization whose raison d'être is the maintenance and restoration of peace could do no more than wring its hands. This distressed a number of Americans, including many who, though they should have known better, kept calling on the UN to act. But everyone at the UN knew that it was totally powerless. In the first place, the United States, certain that its domination of the Security Council would prevent any major embarrassment, went before that body solely to make propaganda statements. Further, it was apparent to the delegations that North Vietnam and China would not, could not, permit the UN to play a substantial role as long as they were not members. Nonetheless, U Thant for years sought behind the scenes to arrange peace talks. When he got Hanoi's consent to private talks, the United States shrugged off the arrangement. Despite these rebuffs, U Thant continued to assert, and later events swiftly bore him out, that America had only to halt the bombing of North Vietnam to get prompt peace talks.

However, Vietnam and Czechoslovakia and the Dominican Republic are only part of the story; the UN's problems are still more profound. Its writ is supposed to run the world over, but look at the map. From the day World War II ended, the great powers declared Europe out of bounds for the UN. The Monroe Doctrine has effectively kept North and South America outside its jurisdiction. With Communist China not a member, the UN's influence in Asia is marginal. That leaves only the Middle East and Africa. And the Middle East is a snake pit with neither Israelis nor Arabs, Americans nor Russians able to contribute to the area's stability. With Vietnam the UN can offer at least the legalistic excuse that North Vietnam and South Vietnam and China are not members, but what can it plead with respect to the Middle East? Israel is a creation of the UN, the two superpowers were among the first to recognize it, and Israel and its Arab neighbors are all members and thus pledged to settle differences peacefully. But again, the UN must stand idle as the Middle East seems to slide inevitably toward catastrophe.

Thus only Africa remains. The UN played a major role in hastening the pell-mell rush of African nations to independence in the early years of the decade, but that is now over. Almost all of Africa, except the bedrock racist southern tip, is today ruled by Africans. And with the racists the UN has made absolutely no progress in years of anguish. By overwhelming majorities the UN has passed hundreds of resolutions directed to South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and Portuguese-ruled Angola and Mozambique. They are ignored by those to whom they are directed and dismissed as "unrealistic" by the United States, Britain, France and their allies. Unrealistic they certainly are, for these resolutions often call on the Western industrial nations to back up with political and economic action their always eloquent pleas for self-determination by free, fair elections. There is nothing more unrealistic than to expect the industrial nations to risk their investments and trade for the sake of the dignity, even the lives of the blacks of southern Africa. To the dismay of the African delegates, President Nixon in his empty speech of September 18 to the General Assembly did not even mention Africa. And the Russians offer almost unbounded verbal support, but little else.

The result is obvious. Without the active support of the industrial nations, UN action would be worse than ineffective; it would be a joke. But what is the UN to do: overlook cruel injustice; or try to act, only to be stymied by the very nations that founded it? Thus many African and Asian delegates have become bitter —and worse, apathetic and complaisant.

Some Western diplomats and correspondents blame these Afro-Asian nations for the ineffectualness of the UN. They point to the steam-roller tactics whereby the Afro-Asian bloc rams through the General Assembly resolutions on such pet questions as colonialism and South African racism. But cynically or foolishly, they confuse rhetoric with action, for these resolutions are usually without real effect. Huge Afro-Asian majorities notwithstanding, power in the world—and thus in the UN—resides with the great powers.

It is true, however, that the Afro-Asian bloc contributes much less than it could, that it seldom uses what power it has. The Afro-Asian group, joined by such relatively disinterested nations as the Scandinavians, Canada, Ireland and a few others, could raise a powerful voice. Economic and military power, to be sure, would still be limited, but if such a large group spoke out with a single voice for peace and reason, if it challenged with common sense and human concern the hypocrises of the great powers, if it proposed realistic but imaginative solutions, the UN could at least, in Thant's words, be "a vigorous and articulate third force which could serve as the voice of conscience and mankind." That would be no little achievement.

But although the Afro-Asian bloc can pull together on certain colonial, racial and economic issues, it is seldom able to do so on other great issues. Perhaps its members fail to see why they as a group should play the risky game of interceding in the disputes of the great powers, perhaps they take a certain understandable satisfaction from great power discord, perhaps they don't want to jeopardize economic or political aid from one or the other of the superpowers, or perhaps they just see no point in trying.

It often seems that the Afro-Asian delegations are content to live in their seductively pleasant but make-believe world on the East River, perhaps because the real world outside those immense glass windows is so inhospitable. But it is one world and if the weaker nations won't even try to work together on all issues for the purposes of the Charter, they must share with the great powers some of the blame for the UN's impotence. Only if the Afro-Asian group can rise above the diplomatic busy-work referred to by Angie Brooks can it make more than a parochial contribution to the UN and world peace.

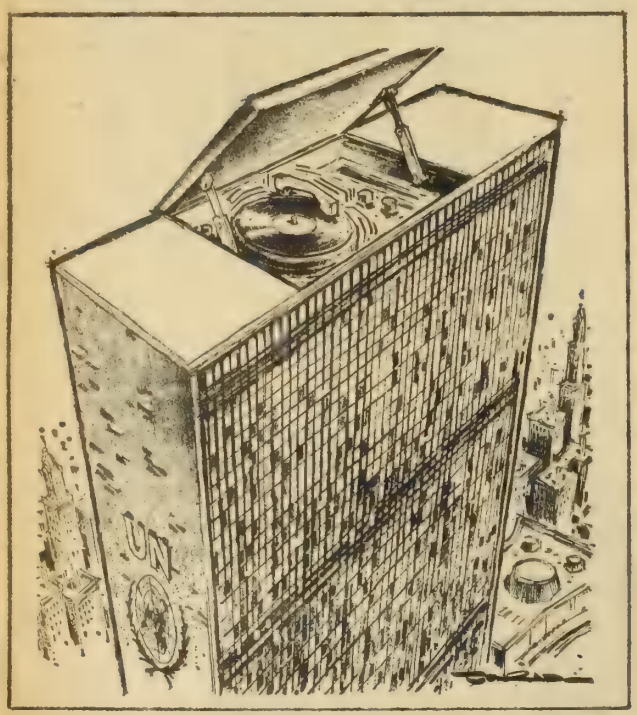
One such empty ritual is the annual debate on the seating of Communist China. There is absolutely nothing more vital to the United Nations, and to world peace, than the reintegration of China into world society. U Thant has often said in private, and less bluntly in public, that the absence of China harms the UN in every sphere of its activity.

Yet even though the importance of China's presence is beyond question, the annual debate has become perfunctory, a disagreeable chore rather than a great issue. Last November, as before in recent years, it was accomplished quickly, with little passion or conviction, even without much canvassing for votes, except possibly in a routine way by the United States and Nationalist China. Everyone knows that as long as the United States wants China kept out, it will be kept out; the merits of the case are thus irrelevant and not worth anyone's excitement. Since America's grip on its client states, mostly in Latin America but with a few others scattered elsewhere, shows no sign of being weakened by the Vietnamese debacle, it is a matter of waiting until the United States changes its mind—if it ever does.

The bitter humor in this impasse is that if the United States had not blocked China's legitimate claim to a seat in 1949, the Korean War might never have taken place, and would almost certainly not have assumed such disastrous proportions. And since American fear of China was plainly behind the U.S. intervention in Vietnam, it is possible that that political, military and moral disaster could have been avoided if China ha been a member of the family of nations.



That is not to say that only the United States wan China kept out. A good many nations have settled com fortably into the UN club and fear, with good reaso that China's presence would upset the pleasant routin They have visions of grim, implacable Chinese stalkin the halls in their Mao suits, insisting in the extrem language of Radio Peking that the UN mend its ways that it stop kowtowing to Washington and Moscow that it encourage revolution. Some say that Chinese rep resentation would mean a return for at least a decad to the bitter language of the worst days of the cold war That is probably an exaggeration, but even if true, i would at least bring some life to the UN. To quot Earl Foell, the able Los Angeles Times correspondent "the United Nations is more likely to die of gentility than of adversity." But since President Nixon, no friend of China, cannot be expected to do an about-face (although his anti-Communist reputation gives him much more freedom of maneuver than any Democratic President would have had), the presence of China will remain a matter for academic discussion.

All this would seem to be enough woe for the still young United Nations (although at 24 it has already outlived the effective life of the League of Nations), but there is much more. In the 20th century, political problems always mean financial problems as well, as the UN has learned to its sorrow. Only an accountant can make real sense out of the UN's complicated bookkeeping, but it is no overstatement to say that the world organization is almost broke.

Much of the difficulty stems from the contention of Russia and France and a few other, mostly Communist, nations that the General Assembly assessments for the Congo and Middle East operations were illegal because they had not been approved by the Security Council. These nations stuck to this position even though the International Court of Justice in an advisory opinion called the assessments mandatory. The resulting deadlock caused the General Assembly to be almost completely paralyzed in 1964-65. When finally a compromise ended the political crisis, Russia and France agreed to make "voluntary" contributions to end the associated financial crisis. But four years later they have not paid up.

In any case, there is still no agreement—despite six years of talks since the crisis began—on how to finance future peace-keeping operations. If the UN were to take on another expensive operation, it would have to improvise a method of payment, as it has done in Cyprus. For five years the UN has maintained a force on the island, keeping peace between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots. This time, the force was established by the Security Council, but because there is no agreement on peace-keeping financing, the UN has had to rely on contributions. How adequately they support what is, after all, a collective effort is indicated by the UN's Cyprus deficit of about $12 million at mid-December 1968.

This inability to agree on how peace keeping is to be paid for is a crippling handicap, for the membership will not be eager to take on another expensive effort without nowing how the bills are to be met. And if circumances make it imperative that the UN act swiftly, ithout agreement on financing, the subsequent haggling an only weaken the organization still further.

Los Angeles Times

"World Peace . . . World Peace . . . World Peace . . ."

Money is behind another of the UN's great disappointnents. On September 25, 1961, President Kennedy apeared before the General Assembly and proposed that he 1960s be officially designated the United Nations Delopment Decade. Within three months the General Assembly had adopted the idea unanimously.

The hope was that the rich and poor nations would vork together to raise to decent levels the lives of the nillions in underdeveloped nations. The goal was for each ndustrial nation to devote 1 per cent of its national income to foreign aid, but the decade is almost over and he project, launched with such hope, has been an utter failure. There are many reasons: the enormity of the problems, the lack of competent direction in the recipient nations, the scarcity of trained personnel, inflation. But the major reason has been the failure of the rich countries to provide enough money. The United States, richest of all nations and the one that invented foreign aid as we know it, has been the most serious defaulter. It is only thirteenth in percentage of national income devoted to official and private aid. It contributes barely half of the proposed quota, 0.57 per cent, with some of that going for military aid. (For whatever consolation it may offer, Russia's performance is still more niggardly.) It seems almost certain that foreign aid will shrink even more under President Nixon.

We near a time when responsible statesmen, not Cassandras, foresee not only that the gulf between rich nations and poor will grow wider but that there will be widespread famines, famines of Biblical proportion by the end of the century, because the increase in food production, remarkable as it is, cannot keep pace with the exponential growth of the world's population.

Yet while the rich industrial nations grow richer, aggravating the inevitable hatred of the have-nots, their own societies disintegrate. That is why C. P. Snow said at Westminster College last November: "I have been nearer despair this year, 1968, than ever in my life." But this is a commonplace at the UN where the poor nations, by far the most numerous, have been telling the rich for years that they desperately need help. To be sure, the rich make some response, but whether in commodity and tariff agreements or in funds for capital investment in public projects, it is almost always too little and too late. The industrial nations, whatever they may say, are still interested in the poor nations primarily as suppliers of cheap raw materials and as markets for manufactured exports. The United States, obsessed by the doctrine of free enterprise, is forever advising the poor countries to adopt policies that will attract private capital. Many countries do so, but private capital is interested in quick, high profits in the private sector and will seldom invest in schools, roads, hospitals, public transportation systems, the infra-structure so essential to a nation seeking economic viability. So in economics as in politics the poor nations at the UN feel themselves the victims of hypocrisy.

Mahood, The Times (London)

Although the bulk of the UN's major problems are caused by the policies of its member states, a good many have their roots in the institution itself. One would think that the UN might generate an excitement that would attract the young, the imaginative, the innovators. It may have been so in its early years, but today even though it is not completely without such appeal, it certainly does not match Washington in the early days of the New Deal or in the first weeks of the Kennedy administration. There is nothing like the Peace Corps in the UN and if a young idealist wants to change the world, he had better go elsewhere. The UN is a staid, middle-aged organization that wants to do good without rocking any boats. And it is certainly no magnet for the brightest young people being graduated from American universities. They know how difficult it is to get anything original through an international bureaucracy, past the great powers and past a majority of 126 member states whose collective views act as a sieve to winnow out all but the most conventional ideas. Nor do young American idealists fancy being fingerprinted and subjected to a security check by the FBI, which has long had free access to the UN. There are, to be sure, a few swingers around the UN but their influence is social not political.

If that makes the UN sound like any other bureaucracy, the impression is essentially correct. True, it provides a cosmopolitanism seldom found elsewhere; its friendliness and altruism would be most surprising in other governmental bureaucracies; and its physical surroundings are so beautiful as to be seductive. Yet most of the 5,000 or so employees have become increasingly submerged in routine, insulated by growing walls of paper from the world they ostensibly serve.

It's a cliché to bewail the proliferation of paper work in the modern world, but at the UN the bulk is awesome, as impossible to comprehend as the distance to Sirius, the Dog Star. In 1968 the UN print shop produced 525,823,676 pages, the equivalent of 2 million books

(Continued on page 454)

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Reality at White Heat

JEROME ROTHENBERG

Mr. Rothenberg is working on an anthology of Indian poetry, A Summoning of the Tribes, to be published as the first issue of The Buffalo Translation Series (University of Buffalo, New York State Council of the Arts). He is the author of numerous books of poems, and the editor of Technicians of the Sacred (Doubleday-Anchor). He has been doing experimental translating from Navajo and Seneca on a Wenner-Gren Foundation grant.

The awkwardness of presenting translations from American Indian poetry in the year 1969 is that it has become fashionable today to deny the possibility of crossing the boundaries that separate people of different races and cultures: to insist instead that black is the concern of black, red of red, and white of white. Yet the idea of translation has always been that such boundary crossing is not only possible but desirable. By its very nature, translation asserts or at least implies a concept of psychic and biological unity, weird as such assertion may seem in a time of growing dis-integration. Each poem, being made present and translated, flies in the face of divisive ideology. The question for the translator is not whether but how far we can translate one another. Like the poet who is his brother, he attempts to restore what has been torn apart. Any arrogance on his part would not only lead to paternalism or "colonialism" (LeRoi Jones's term for it from a few years back), it would deny the very order of translation. Only if he allows himself to be directed by the other will a common way emerge, true to both positions.

To submit through translation is to begin to accept the "truths" of an other's language. At the same time it's a way of growing wary of the lies in one's own, a point of vigilance that translators and poets should be particularly keyed to. I learned, for example, that the Senecas with whom I lived call the whites "younger brothers" and themselves "real people." To understand the Seneca experience (including where I stand with relation to them) I have to submit to terms like these and to get to a truth about them which includes the Seneca truth. As I do, it becomes clear to me that the very nature of "Indian" and "white" (words basic to the process I'm describing) is itself a question of language and translation.

If the term "younger brother" would later be neutralized or come to suggest contempt, what relationship did it originally express in a culture that didn't practice primogeniture and individual ownership of land—in which forests and clearings (the men were hunters, the women gardeners) were a common ground for brothers as children of one mother and members of one clan? Whether by birth or adoption didn't matter either: descended from a single mother (ultimately the Earth), "older" and "younger" was for them a matter of precedence in time and place, their relative experience of the shared environment. Thus the Senecas as older brothers recognized the rights of both to start with, but the whites (children also of the "old-world" patriarchy) came to the land prepared for dispossession and fratricide. In the overthrow of the older —refusing adoption to the real-personhood of the Indian way, while asserting their own great-white-fatherhood—they triggered a disruption of the natural (ecological) order that's now making all of us its victims.

A "real" person in these terms is one who hasn't forgotten what and where things are in relation to the Earth. Earth-rooted, he is royal too, not by precedence of birth, but insofar as he has and shares a knowledge of the realm. He has only to maintain a true eye for his surroundings and a contact with the Earth, to recognize himself as the inheritor of reality, of a more real way of life. At any rate that seems to be the claim implicit in the language and confirmed by the events that have followed its denial.

The issue, writes David Antin, is reality. The real person (reality-person, in fact) lives, like the "primitive" philosopher described by Radin, "in a blaze of reality" through which he can experience "reality at white heat." This is a part of the tribal inheritance (not Indian only but world-wide) that we all lose at our peril—younger and older alike. Remember too how many elements are active in that situation, where we would concentrate on the words as being particularly the "poem" (many Indian poems in fact dispense entirely with words): elements, I mean, like music, nonverbal phonetic sounds, dance, gesture and event, game, dream, etc., along with all those unstated ideas and images the participants pick up from the poem's context. Each moment is charged: each is a point at which meaning is coming to surface, where nothing's incidental but everything matters terribly.

Now, put all of that together and you have the makings of a high poetry and art, which only a colonialist ideology could have blinded us into labeling "primitive" or "savage." You have also the great hidden accomplishment of our older brothers in America, made clear in the poetry and yet of concern not only to poets but to all (red, white and black) who want to carry the possibilities of reality and personhood into any new worlds to come. The yearning to rediscover the Red Man is part of this. It acknowledges not only the cruelty of what's happened in this place (a negative matter of genocide and guilt) but leads as well to the realization that "we" in a larger sense will never be whole without a recovery of the "red power" that's been here from the beginning. The true integration must begin and end with a recognition of all such powers. That means a process of translation and of mutual completion. Not a brotherhood of lies this time but an affiliation based on what the older had known from the start: that we're doomed without his tribal and matrilocal wisdom, which can be shared only among equals who have recognized a common lineage from the Earth.

PRELUDE: What the Informant said to Franz Boas in 1920
(Kwakiutl. Translated by Armand Schwerner.)

long ago her mother had to sing this song and so she had to grind along with it the corn people have a song too it is very good
I refuse to tell it

WHERE THE SONG WENT WHERE SHE WENT & WHAT HAPPENED WHEN THEY MET

(Seneca. Translated by Jerome Rothenberg and Richard Johnny John.)

the song went to the garden (heh heh heh)
the song poked all around the garden (heh heh heh)
she went to the garden (heh heh heh)
she went to the garden (heh heh heh)
she went like crazy in the garden (heh heh heh) that's where she went (hah hah hah)

MOON ECLIPSE EXORCISM

(Alsea. Translated by Armand Schwerner.)

come out come out come out the moon has been killed who kills the moon? crow who often kills the moon? eagle who usually kills the moon? chicken hawk who also kills the moon? owl in their numbers they assemble for moonkilling

come out, throw sticks at your houses come out, turn your buckets over spill out all the water don't let it turn bloody yellow from the wounding and death of the moon

what will become of the world, the moon never dies wihout cause only when a rich man is about to be killed is the moon murdered

look all around the world, dance, throw your sticks, help out, look at the moon,
dark as it is now, even if it disappears it will come back, think of nothing
I'm going back into the house and the others went back

POEM TO EASE BIRTH

(Aztec. Translated by Anselm Hollo.)

in the house with the tortoise chair she will give birth to the pearl to the beautiful feather in the house of the goddess who sits on a tortoise she will give birth to the necklace of pearls to the beautiful feathers we are there she sits on the tortoise swelling to give us birth on your way on your way child be on your way to me here you whom I made new come here child come be pearl be beautiful feather

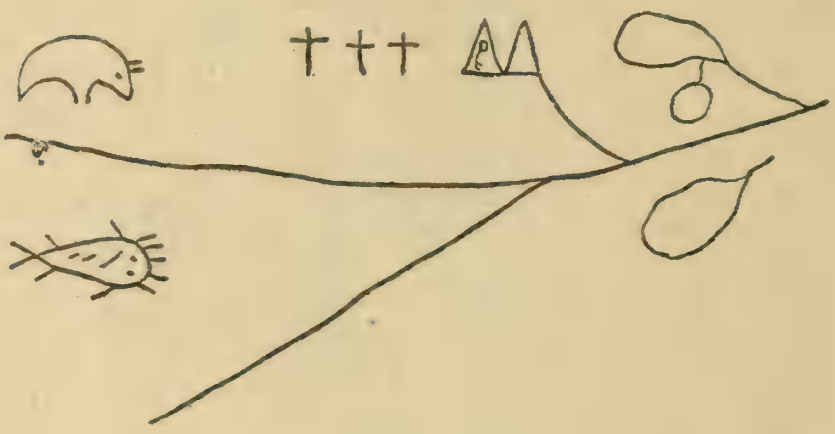
HOW THE VIOLIN WAS BORN: A Peyote Account
(Huichol. Translated by Jerome Rothenberg.)



CEDAR CEDAR was born.
Born among stones & rocks.
BIG STAG made him.
BIG BRAIN worked him.
But CEDAR CEDAR didn't have a soul.
Heavy was his heart. His heart was silent.

Then Tahomatz the BIG BRAIN sent Aimari the BIRD pure & fuckless Aimari came singing: entered the tree & became its pith.
And the tree's heart filled with music.
& CEDAR CEDAR sang. Quivered to caresses from the Wind.

DREAM EVENT
(Iroquois)

After having a dream, let someone else guess what it was. Then have everyone act it out together.

OJIBWA LOVE POEM

THE LITTLE RANDOM CREATURES
(Fox. Translated by Armand Schwerner.)

found a hole with a light in it, and saying Whose?
set a trap
with a bowcord for a noose.
A giant of light, something alive, dazzled the path on its slow way up, blinding
the little random creatures
o something alive was dying in the bowcord and it said
Allow me to choke to death
And you'll have night forever and they let the Sun go

POSTLUDE: Song of Cajamarca
(Quechua. Translated by W. S. Merwin.)

When the Inca made war to teach his law
He bore with him gifts and love
And nobody died but the madmen.
You say that your god is good
And you kill us.
You say that he is pious
And you conduct yourselves with us like thieves.

Extravagant Passions

THE LIVES OF CHILDREN: The Story of the First Street School. By George Dennison. Random House. 308 pp. $6.95.

NED O'GORMAN

Mr. O'Gorman is a poet, and the author, most recently, of Prophetic Voices: Ideas and Words on Revolution (Random House).

George Dennison is a teacher. He is a wise, generous, suffering man who for two years watched the lives of some children with valiant hope, reckless faith in their humanity, and wonder. (No teacher is worth a damn if he does not stand in awe of children's extravagant passion for life.) He let his students wander over the wild lands of their agony and joy and kept an eye always on their humanity, tempering his presence among them as if he were treading on holy ground. He now lives somewhere in Maine on a farm, for the First Street School is closed. Its small funds had run out and Dennison could no longer sustain the work and energy required to keep the school going. But I think that the men in New York who run the "schools" have everything to learn from him: how to teach, how to love, how to honor children, how to save the "schools" from their mortal, final sickness. (I put "school" in quotation marks to make it clear that when I write the word I mean the majority of public educational institutions in New York City, where children are herded to serve out their days in servitude to the system and the politicians.)

This book is a hard one to read. When I finished it I had felt the terror of public "school" education in the wounded children who had left their "schools" to come to the First Street School; but I heard too the noise of children as they inched toward freedom. Dennison had not merely to teach them anew: he had to prepare them to learn. To do that he had to let them think it possible to love themselves. The "schools" break a child down for they deny him time to luxuriate in a sense of being. The saddest children I know are children who despise themselves. If a child who would know everything—and all children are certain they can—discovers that he is forbidden to rejoice in that wild expectation he soon grows inward and sulks his life away.

George Dennison led his children on a journey to knowledge and it is the purgatory of that journey which he records here. The First Street School was a noisy place. But it was not filled with the noise of imposed order, that cry for air and light which one hears in all the "schools." On First Street the noise was healthy, coming from both teachers and students as they catapulted through the day looking for freedom and life. The children on First Street were the children of this city of the dispossessed who had learned to be wary of everything that smelled of order and teacher. Dennison made the First Street School true to life, and let the children seek for learning as if they were chasing a fire engine. (I would have perished the first day.) He was giving them a world where learning might be possible; that never had been possible in the "schools." He was offering them not merely freedom but the discovery of freedom.

Those twenty-three children, from 5 to 13, are described in an avalanche of detail, especially the older ones. They become heroes in Dennison's narrative, each one individual, but all caught up in a fantastic battle of wills and desire. I forget who was who but I do not forget how they struggled. I remember the wounds they shared: a simultaneous fear of and yearning for everything—knowledge, love, friendship and community, the world.

The First Street School tried to be a place where children might find a style of conduct and growth that could free them to learn, to live and to thrive. There is a Grecian tension in their tragic play and rage. Before anything else, George Dennison had to figure out how to cope with that rage. I teach, or rather spend my days with very small children from 9 months to 5 years old, and know that even in babies that passion most treasured by the angels as a hiding place for wisdom and vision is a child's rage for the world. Children of 13 are a greater problem than 4-year-olds. They are craftier and in the public "school" system they have learned to distrust, even hate, the process of knowledge. But there is always hope that the massing forces of the "schools" and the adult world nastiness are still muted enough at age 2 and 3 to give a young mind time to rejoice in the world given him new each day.

Dennison's children were already victims. In his school they came like visionaries to search for visions. They fought, played and lunged at knowledge. But before they would read, they would know themselves first. The children of the cities of the dispossessed (all our children?) must come alive to the world. They must not go gentle into the dark night of the "systems": they must learn to rage against the rules and grow strong within so that no one—not even a board of education—can molest them. It is the world a child knows first and would know when school is over. The books he reads, the problems he solves, the questions he asks and answers are cosmic ones, all connected in the mystery of the self. The children of the First Street School had never before been given a cosmos to receive them and their spirits. The First Street School was that cosmos.

George Dennison tells us that Dewey, Tolstoy and Rousseau are the genial spirits of his pedagogy. He owes most to Dewey:

> Dewey based much of his thought upon considerations of the fundamental human nature visible in the young. One of the remarkable facts of life (it is perhaps the only thing that saves us from ourselves) is that this indwelling nature, prior to its exposure to school and to the crushing effects of public life, reaches, in the vast majority of cases, a quite adequate development in the life of the home—reaches it in the most ordinary, routine, taken-for-granted way. Dewey referred to this routine development of the child as the starting point of education. Growth and development are a shaping of powers that already exist. . . . In short, we cannot speak of teaching and learning at all unless we speak of ways and means of sustaining the powers that are visible in the child when he first comes to class.

I would speak of the "interior life" of a child, of that holy, sacramental, vivid mystery that children know themselves by. George Dennison comes as close as anyone I have read to defining that mystery. He neither overdefines nor molests it with his biases. He reveals it, though he can do very little to make his charges love that mystery.

I wonder, of course, what I would have done with that magnificent bunch of children. I admit to being helpless with anyone over 5. But I think perhaps I would have been more the schoolmaster. I would have been less lenient with them when they cursed, fought and just plain disobeyed: but then it is wrong to say that Dennison was ever lenient. He let them move in the rhythms of their own sense of justice and pleasure and did not impose his sense of justice or pleasure upon them. I would have done so, I think, and I would have been, perhaps, just like "everybody else." I would have demanded that they sit still longer; I would have insisted on certain hours each day when they simply had to come to class, sit, listen and be held responsible for being a student! (All would have ended in disaster.)

I found myself questioning one thing in Dennison's method and that is his refusal to bring to the school his "sense of order," a sense of order based on his knowledge of life—an order contrary and even alien to the children's. Had he brought to First Street his vision with more practical force—i.e., ordering the day, setting up hours for required study, insistence on silence, etc.—then things would not have been so much a rout. And yet that rout was perhaps the only sense of life those children ever had.

In the rout Dennison discovered that a philosophy of freedom must be found to liberate the wounded children in the "schools" from the fate the "schools" and state have decreed for them. That philosophy, he tells us, is within the child. It can be loosed and made operative under the gentle rains and light of justice, patience, love, and in the ardent conviction in every teacher and in every board of education that of all the gifts that the gods bestow, the gift of childhood is the most blessed.

> My purpose is not to castigate the bureaucrats; but to recall parents and teachers to an awareness of one crucial truth, a truth that should be, but is not the gut-wisdom of everyone: that in humane affairs—and education is par excellence, a humane pursuit—there is no such thing as competence without love.

The Lives of Children records a failure. It did not survive, it did not succeed. Nothing else that we are left with seems to be succeeding either. The assassins are still in power in the "schools." We can merely try to save the lives of some children. Most are already lost. Read George Dennison to catch the saving rhythms of childhood, to find out something about a child's mind and about its flourishing. Dennison has written a tragic, saving book.

Thank You, Mr. Director

ON COMMUNISM. By J. Edgar Hoover. Random House. 158 pp. $4.95.

FALSE WITNESS. By Melvin Rader. University of Washington Press. 209 pp. $6.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

Title VI of last year's crime bill—a triumph for the law-and-order forces—provides that the successor to the present director of the FBI must be approved by the Senate. Its enactment into law was no power grab but an expression of a pervasive Angst in the traditional America for whom J. Edgar Hoover is the most important single culture hero—Angst about the fate of America without Hoover in high office. This concern, which is perceptibly mounting as Hoover's long overdue retirement approaches, closely resembles the terror of primitive peoples over the possible loss of a god. For his followers, Hoover's passage from the scene is the nation's punishment for its sinful neglect of his teachings and taboos.

In his forty-five-year leadership of the FBI, Hoover has contributed heavily to the creation of a system of cultural myths which importantly influence American life and politics: the chauvinist myth of "Americanism" as a divinely ordained political ideology and way of life, the concept of domestic "national security" as an interest which must always prevail over the right to dissent, the conviction that the nation is under permanent threat of internal subversion by sinister, godless Communists who will stop at nothing to gain their ends.

In recent years Hoover has projected his political outlook onto social issues—child-rearing, education, pornography, church attendance, etc. Hoover is an important sponsor of the cultural backlash now gathering momentum in the country. His pronouncements give his followers proof from a sacerdotal source that social change is really a concealed form of political subversion, a return to the Russian "nationalization of women" theme of the twenties.

Central to Hoover's role is his cultivation and exploitation of our anti-Communist mania. Whatever the means by which our history and culture have infected us (political paranoia, a sense of a unique mission, elitist manipulation, a Biblically inspired vision of an inevitable apocalyptic struggle with the forces of evil), we are sick with anti-communism. And Hoover has helped make us and keep us sick. This book, conceived as a sort of vade mecum to be treasured and consulted when the director bows out, is in its first part ("Communism Today") and in its second (quotations arranged by topic from the author's earlier writings and speeches), the same dull, illiterate, sloganizing, repetitious mixture as before.

But it does raise questions. Hoover's collected works now consist of four books on communism. Only this subject has the power to awaken the director's muse; other problems within the area of his official responsibility—for example, the rise in the crime rate, the role of violence (except political violence) in modern crime, the professionalization of crime—somehow fail to stir him. Why are Communists so much more appealing subjects than Mafiosi? The fact is that Hoover not only finds his political role far more congenial than his responsibilities as a crime fighter but uses his prestige as the nation's anti-subversive pooh bah to immunize himself from criticism for his failures as head of the nation's criminal investigation bureau.

Hoover's anti-Communist tracts—for that is what they are—have sold extremely well. Though barbarously written, emotional and propagandistic, each has been hailed with reverence not only by his uncritical worshipers but by reviewers who should know better.

The worshipful reception accorded all of Hoover's pronouncements, however fugitive, is partly the result of the public relations promotion of Hoover's image as the noblest Roman—patriotic, self-abnegating, incorruptible, super-vigilant and ordinary. While a handful—but only a handful—of other government officials also serve as champions or symbols of national values, none combines Hoover's varied roles: defender of the nation's security, wide-ranging social prophet, elder statesman. And the fact that Hoover's formal and official bureaucratic responsibilities are, though important, relatively limited, gives his views a special dimension of disinterestedness—the old warrior, forced by patriotism to speak out and warn against threats to his beloved country's welfare.

Hoover's personal following spans the American hinterland whose prejudices and resentments he echoes. But his authority on the subject of communism extends beyond this core audience. Scholars and newsmen may boast book learning or general information about this subject, but Hoover is widely respected because he is considered an expert (and holds himself out as such).

What makes Hoover an expert is the fact that he has clothed the FBI with extraordinary domestic intelligence functions. He has acquired this jurisdiction without authorization either by statute or Executive order. Hoover has assumed the power, to use his language, "to identify individuals working against the United States, determine their objectives and nullify their effectiveness." These functions—surveillance, electronic eavesdropping, infiltration, dossier keeping—are not a means to the end of law enforcement but political ends in themselves. Usurped power is exercised by Hoover wholly autonomously without esponsibility to or supervision by anyone n a governmental policy-making level, lected or appointed. In no major coun- ry in the West is domestic intelligence Hoover likes to call it "counter-intel- igence") conducted on a comparable cale and with such freedom from po- itical accountability. Nor for that mat- er can one find in any democratic coun- ry in the world an agency which com- ines conventional police functions and olitical investigative responsibilities un- elated to law enforcement.

Hoover's unchecked control over the nechanisms of political intelligence has ed to the institutional transformation of he FBI into an autonomous and self- erpetuating political police force which nakes a mockery of our democratic pro- fessions. But Hoover's self-created role is an authoritative interpreter of the political intelligence gathered by the agency is even more disturbing. This purely political function authenticates his role among the anti-Communist true believers as a guardian of the nation's security and gilds him with an almost magical prestige. It also explains the ex- pansion of his influence as an expert on communism. His intellectual limitations and political bias count for little in the face of his claims to inside information —gathered at enormous expense by an army of agents, infiltrators, plants, de- fectors and informers.

In his own fashion, Hoover is devoted to the Socratic principle that the unex- amined life is not worth living; and it is precisely his undercover invasion of the rights of a large number of us that has made him a political mentor of the rest. The connection between intelligence and political reaction has, of course, deep historical roots; but Hoover has given it a uniquely American expression. Today, the process by which he has ideologized his functions is becoming a model for a mushrooming urban intelligence net- work ("Red squads").

Hoover has developed a time- tested process for converting the fruits of his intelligence activities into the in- struments of ideological warfare. Basic to the entire process is a formula by which he alternately agitates his audi- ence about newly discovered dangers to the national security and then calms them with assurances that, temporarily anyway, he has the situation in hand— but unremitting vigilance remains a ne- cessity. He uses three official forms of communication to a national audience: his testimony before the House Appro- priations subcommittee (usually given in the winter but timed for release much later when it will deliver a maximum impact), the FBI annual report for the fiscal year, and the year-end report to the Department of Justice.

Of these the Appropriations subcom- mittee testimony is by far the most im- portant because it is Hoover's direct contact with an important power center and the official means of communication with his devoted Congressional constitu- ency. Hoover's testimony before the sub- committee is prepared and presented as a piece of theatre with ritualistic con- cern for effect. Questions are planted in advance to produce answers to meet the political needs of committee mem- bers—like the response this year to a question by a racist Congressman that HEW aide James Farmer was hired without a security clearance. Juicy tid- bits of inside information are periodical- ly thrown out to the slavering committee members and intermittently the whole performance goes "off the record" as the Congressmen are initiated by their revered hierophant into the sacred mys- tery of anti-subversion. When the show ends, the "Director," as he is invariably called, is fulsomely thanked. Not only is the testimony released by the com- mittee but Hoover reproduces it—in blown-up format—for mass distribution. (Hoover tries to preserve the House sub- committee as his sole Congressional forum. This year he refused to testify before Congressman Pepper's Select Committee on Crime.)

These official pronouncements are supplemented by editorials and mes- sages in the FBI house organ (FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin), speeches, articles in conservative journals, pamphlets— and books. All of Hoover's more tran- sient pronouncements (as well as the anti-subversive sections of his reports, approving articles and book reviews by others) are introduced into the Congres- sional Record—frequently the same item four or five times—by his House ad- mirers who also make timely speeches in his praise on his birthday and on dates marking the anniversary of his as- sumption of office.

The need to investigate the political activities of the Bureau, to evaluate its performance as a law-enforcement agency, and to prevent a continuation of the abuses of Hooverism obviously commands a high political priority. The real question is whether the director has so poisoned our political environment that such a re-examination is beyond political possibility.

The effects of the phobic anti- communism to which Hoover has dedi- cated his professional life are elaborated in a moving book by Melvin Rader. Rader, a professor of philosophy at the University of Washington, was identified as a Communist in an anti-subversive investigation in 1948, conducted by the Canwell Committee, Washington's Un- American Activities Committee. Rader undertook to establish that his accuser, George Hewitt, a professional informer of extraordinary ductility, was a liar. By time-consuming, expensive detective work, Rader proved irrefutably that the charges were false. A perjury prosecu- tion against Hewitt initiated by the Wash- ington authorities was frustrated by the illegal refusal of the New York courts to order Hewitt's extradition—primarily on the ground that the ferocious Reds in the state of Washington might do Hewitt physical harm. Hewitt died in 1950 of a nervous disorder which had already manifested itself in the 1948 hearings.

What is extraordinary about the Rader- Hewitt affair was the role of the Im- migration Service for which Hewitt had served as an informer in a score of de- portation cases. Deputy Director Boyd not only tried to pressure the local pros- ecutor to drop the perjury case against Hewitt but made available two other perjurious informers to testify at the ex- tradition hearings in support of Hewitt's claim that he had met Professor Rader at a Communist farm in 1938.

A clutch of ex-FBI informers also ap- peared at the tenure hearings conducted by the university in the wake of the POWER How it works!

For the first time since Machiavelli, an honest evaluation of the sources of political power — and the practice of power.

The games politicians play: rules, strategy, rewards. How to win — and how to know why you lost.

"A quite unusual book . . . few others written in this century on great themes of political philosophy possess its combination of traits: honesty without intemperance . . . an unre- lenting realism about politics (and) moral compassion." — Charles Frankel, former Ass't. Secy. of State.

SWORDS AND SYMBOLS
The Technique of Sovereignty
by James Marshall
$8.95 at all bookstores. Also in paper, $2.95
FUNK & WAGNALLS
A Division of Reader's Digest Books, Inc.

Canwell probe. These proceedings led to the summary discharge of three professors in January 1949, and the disciplining of three others in gross violation of academic freedom.

Professor Rader himself was exonerated by the university in the fall of 1949. A few months later it was revealed that Canwell's investigators had seized and suppressed pages of a hotel register which independently established the falsity of Hewitt's charge against Rader.

Some fifteen years after the Canwell committee affair the author was again involved in a clash with Canwell who, after repeated political defeats, had established a rightist bookshop and exposé operation ("American Intelligence Service") in eastern Washington. When John Goldmark, a Washington legislator, lost his seat in 1964 as a result of redbaiting, he and his wife sued Canwell and three others for libel. In the course of the trial, Professor Rader's politics again became an issue as another professional informer, Barbara Hartle, claimed that he had been a party member. The testimony of this witness was discredited by cross-examination which established that in the course of Congressional testimony she had named some 500 alleged party members—but not Rader. Ed Guthman, then press relations director of the Department of Justice and now national news editor of the Los Angeles Times, who had won a Pulitzer Prize in 1949 for his reporting on the Rader-Hewitt case, testified that Mrs. Hartle had informed him in 1954 that Rader, although solicited, had never joined the party.

The libel suit vindicated the Goldmarks and Rader—although the $40,000 libel verdict was set aside because of the impact of the Supreme Court decision in the New York Times case. The author triumphed over his ordeals because he was able and willing to fight back: he was supported by the powerful tradition of Northwestern liberalism and his own strong faith in the democratic process. What motivated him to take on Canwell and Hewitt was the realization that discrediting the committee and its star witness would be more than a means of personal vindication—it would be an opportunity to end a witch hunt.

One can only admire this resolute and tenacious professor of philosophy. Though his story has been told before (by Vern Countryman, I. F. Stone, Carey McWilliams, and in the pages of The Nation, November 12, 1949), Rader recounts it in a distinctive and powerful fashion which combines a low-keyed serenity about himself with an intellectual passion about the issues. A few more Raders around could reverse the tide of Hooverism.

No Loitering!

STREETS FOR PEOPLE: A Primer for Americans. By Bernard Rudofsky. Doubleday & Co. 351 pp. $14.95.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Iowa. His latest book is The Music of Survival: A Biography of a Poem by William Carlos Williams (U. of Illinois Press).

Mr. Rudofsky is an excellent photographer and book designer; his book is an art book, large, sleek, well illustrated. It may be used to good purposes as a picture book, for it will, as he modestly hopes, whet our appetites for "the world of foreign streets"—for the porticoes of Bologna, the Galleria of Milan, the ramparts (promenade) of Lucca, the suq at Marrakesh, the mazes of the white towns of Apulia—and may send us in search of fountains, stairs, street markets, street drama and spectacle. In search of: for these primary amenities (hence primer) are not, and never have been, ours. We need, as Mr. Rudofsky cites The New Yorker lamenting, "something to lift and brighten our fancy, and if we cannot have bridges and vistas and colonnades and canals and window boxes filled with flowers and a humane and smiling architecture, we should have a little street music. . . ."

Though no one would deny the substantial truth of this, the argument is as old as the condescension that accompanies it. One remembers Henry James's long list of things of high civilization absent in American life but also his awareness that "the American knows that a good deal remains; what it is that remains—that is his secret, his joke." Mr. Rudofsky is not in on the joke and doesn't really wish to be. He prefers, like a romantic in search of the picturesque, to take his camera to Europe, to write charming sketches of such colorful things as the Italian story-singer (already disappearing from the streets) and to rummage, not delve, in the social history of the distant past.

The only American city he considers is New York, which is not the only city in the United States; and then it is not present-day New York City that interests him so much as New Amsterdam, where pigs used to scavenge in the streets. His book cannot be placed seriously in the category of social history—it is too thin, too impressionistic, a book of savory gleanings, each chapter heavily illustrated and perfectly suited to the women's clubs, to the very passionate pilgrim he despises. Everything about the book—its design, price, style and tone—belongs to familiar low-grade (but expensive) popularization, and perhaps most of all its subject, which is not pursued with the intent to remedy by implementation a dire civic situation, but rather to gratify us with the sick pleasures of nostalgia and cultural masochism.

A book that begins, "This book is about the great outdoors . . ." and asserts that Americans don't "give a hoot for streets" is immediately suspect. This is not the language of serious discourse or of discourse to be taken seriously. Style of this order is a public nuisance as lamentable as our streets, and writers who adopt it are likely to clutter their books with spurious notions (Americans like ugliness, Rudofsky believes, because they feel beauty undermines their toughness) and downright nonsense ("It is a melancholy comment on what we perversely call American civilization that in order to recapture the taste of human dignity, if only for a few precious days, one has to cross an ocean"). Rudofsky knows very little about American civilization past or present. He thinks that, because pigs once ran in the streets, we are eternally damned and can never attain a requisite sense of amenity; we are, he feels, all of us, from the beginning to the end, greedy and without civic sense. The fault of our streets lies in our national character, which is irreparable. But if this is so, why advertise one's book as a primer? Why omit such important basic studies as that on piazzas by Camillo Sitte? Isn't it rather a travel book?

I think so. Rudofsky should have been advised to concentrate on Italy, the great good place with which he always contrasts America, and to put aside the attempt at comparative study. As a book on Italy his work has merit; that he yokes what he loves to what he hates is unfortunate. Or Rudofsky should have been advised to "study out the land," as Whitman said, to see if our streets have been as empty of people as he thinks and, if so, to find out where they have gone. Is there nothing in the design and life of college campuses (not unlike small Italian cities), in people's parks, in other forms of living and associating alfresco (picnics, camping, rock festivals, etc.) to give him hope? Why, even here in Iowa City one can still walk. The 9 blocks I walk to work, some shaded by trees (the elms were once our por-ico), include a small park where people of all ages eat, converse, contemplate, study and play (chautauqua was once held here, now there are rallies), a small creek which a few people with civic feeling tried to clean, a downtown business district made lively and interesting more than anything else by the variety of people, and the campus animated by people day and night. And this week, at Oktoberfest in nearby Amana, the people will certainly be in the streets.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

William Ball, ambitious, energetic, talented (I praised his production of Chekhov's Ivanov when he was still unknown) has also shown courage, determination and wisdom by organizing permanent companies in cities outside New York.

After the trials inevitably attendant on such efforts, he has finally established his American Conservatory Theatre in San Francisco where it has attracted wide attention, including admiring notices from several New York reviewers.

The A.C.T. presented some twenty productions last year in two San Francisco playhouses. It has now brought three of these productions to New York on a repertory plan for four weeks at the ANTA Theatre. The initial production, first given some years ago in Pittsburgh, is of Edward Albee's Tiny Alice. The least one can say for it is that it is easier to take than the stodgy New York production of 1965.

Stuart Wurtzel's settings are efficient and proper departures from realism. Stage business is constant, every turn of thought is given marked physical embodiment, sometimes cutely playful, always clear, frequently picturesque in a grand old (19th-century) fashion. The acting is muscular, with a kind of eager commitment which is sympathetic even when it is immature. One can detect the actors' training: the readings are unmistakably pointed, movement is executed with bold precision. The audience is not permitted to overlook a thing.

For a while one is held by the well-disciplined staginess of the production. Finally it all becomes insufferably tiresome, for two reasons: because the numerous theatric devices employed are basically shallow, and because of the text to which they are applied.

Tiny Alice is Albee's most pretentious and weakest play. Whatever it means—and the most freakish interpretations abound—its writing, symbols and events do not sustain the meanings ascribed. When Albee protested that all the various explanations (including mine) were mistaken, he set forth his own.

The play, he said, deals with "the relationship between sexual hysteria and religious ecstasy; the conflict between the selflessness of service and the conspicuous splendor of martyrdom. The lay brother [the play's central character] is brought to the point, finally, of having to accept what he had insisted he wanted —union with the abstraction—rather than the man-made image of it, its substitution. He is left with pure abstraction—whatever it be called: God or Alice—and, in the end, according to your faith, one of two things happens: either the abstraction personifies itself, is proved real; or the dying man, in the last necessary effort of self-delusion, creates and believes what he knows does not exist.

"It is, you see," Albee concludes, "a perfectly straightforward story, dealt with in terms of reality and illusion, symbol and actuality." I, for one, do not see. Those who think they do are fooling themselves: the play's actual proceedings fail to jibe with anyone's interpretation.

Gower Champion, a whiz at musical comedy direction, has staged Feydeau's (1907) A Flea in Her Ear for the second offering in the A.C.T. program. It may please—in fact, delight —some; it oppressed me.

Feydeau was the master mathematician of farce. His plays are perfect mechanisms based on a strict formula. Himself part of the happily corrupt middle class of France's Third Repubic, Feydeau wrote plays which are an oblique mockery of it. Their technique, as Feydeau himself described it, consisted in placing ordinary people in extraordinary circumstances. The more commonplace the characters, the funnier the situation. Max Beerbohm's aphorism, "The more sombre the background, the sprightlier skips the jest," is applicable to Feydeau.

In the Champion-A.C.T. production all the actors' faces are daubed with white chalk, giving them grotesque masks. Wurtzel's sets and costumes are black and white decorations. The acting is thoroughly camp with added touches of Keystone cavortings. The effect is as chichi as a fraternity romp.

It is not necessarily a fault that the Feydeau ambience has been annihilated, but the one substituted renders the play infantile. Except at a few moments, the actors' exertions put such a strain on the show as to make it heavy and unfunny. It is all like an elaborate libretto for a Promenade sort of musical—without the music.

Michael O'Sullivan's cracked limb and vocal oddity as the cleft-palate secretary provide a few shocked laughs, and Robert Gerringer in that part of his dual role in which he impersonates a half-wit hotel porter is also peculiarly comic.

John Osborne's purpose in A Patriot For Me (Imperial Theatre) is to expose the decadence and hypocrisy of established empires. When the play was written (1965) it was too soon to dramatize the Profumo case which scandalized Britain (and tickled the French), so Osborne resorted to a factual example from the annals of the Austrian Empire under Franz Josef. In the original London production, if I remember correctly, there was a passing allusion to the Dreyfus case, inserted to widen the play's frame of reference.

The story concerns a brilliant young officer who happens to be a homosexual (at first resistant to his impulse and then wholly given over to it). Through extravagant gifts to his numerous bedfellows he falls heavily into debt and is then blackmailed by the Russians into becoming their spy. He is found out and forced to commit suicide. (In the earlier version of the play it was not his homosexuality that was publicized as the reason for his military crime but the fact that, being partly Jewish, he had lied about his antecedents.) The point of all this is that the Empire's glorious army was tainted by homosexuals—the army's

PHOTO: DWIGHT W. WEBB

Richard Hofstadter
The Idea of a Party System

The development of the American party system which gave the world its first example of peaceful transit of a government from the control of one party to another.

294 pages $6.95

At your bookseller

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS
Berkeley · Los Angeles · New York

attorney general is also one—not to speak of its anti-Semitism and other publicly unacknowledged sores.

The thesis—in relation to the corruption of state establishments—may be acceptable, but the body of the play is wholly devoted to the sexual career of one particular, and not very extraordinary, officer. The most memorable scene is that of the ball, given by a Baron, at which a host of army men indulge themselves in transvestite gaiety. With regard to the psychology of inversion, the play offers nothing new or even sensational. Its dramaturgy has a rather old-fashioned complexion, reminiscent of romantic melodramas or musicals about the glamorous or the nefarious intrigues of royal families. The Student Prince is the saccharine model.

What characterizes Osborne's treatment of this stage style are its tiny pockets of venom (for instance, a wholly arbitrary and hateful speech about the Spanish obsession with death) and the smooth dialogue. Osborne's plays are all well written, but good writing, though a credit, does not make a good play. A Patriot For Me is not the better Osborne.

The present production under Peter Glenville's direction is more elaborate than the London one and for the most part I thought it superior. The casting is on the whole more careful in the choice of types: Robert Jordan as a young officer killed in a duel, John Horn as an insidious waiter, Staats Cotsworth as an obtuse colonel, Salome Jens as an attractive and resonant spy-seductress, Mariclare Costello as a charmingly pitiful whore, are all noteworthy. Maximilian Schell as the afflicted protagonist—he played the part in London—acts with intelligent proficiency, but does not succeed in making the role either significant or stirring.

The great disappointment to me was the drag ball. It misses the aristocratic authority of the late George Devine, who in London invested the part of the Baron with a dimension of command that lifted the scene to something more than a parade of queens. Dennis King plays the role as he has played others in the "highborn" category, except that here he wears a dress.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Richard Attenborough's Oh! What a Lovely War, proliferated from Joan Littlewood's revue macabre, demonstrates that not only World War I, but traditional pacifism itself, is quaint nostalgia. The picture tries by every device it can muster—irony, shock, pathos, anger, horror and love—to convey the message that war is no game, that it will not make a man of you, that the enemy (supposing he exists) is never in the opposing lines, that it is not fine to die for the fatherland. But people in significant numbers have not believed that cant in fifty years.

We go on fighting wars, of course, but not in the illusion that they are paid vacations to exotic lands; and I became a little weary of Mr. Attenborough's insistence that I admit the self-evident. In fact, by the time Vanessa Redgrave got her scene on a soapbox (a great many very famous actors—Gielgud, Richardson, Redgrave, Mills, Bogarde, Hawkins and others—get their scenes in this masque), I wished she would leave the fishwives to their illusions.

Those who arrange wars have never been misinformed as to the nature of war, but they find solace in strategy and statistics. Thus I found most telling in Oh! What a Lovely War John Mills's performance as Field Marshal Haig. That stubborn man of shallow imagination had got it into his head that, since the British Empire could field more troops than the German Empire, a war of attrition would necessarily end with at least a few Tommies still living when the last Fritz had died. The results of this calculation are displayed in the picture on a numerical wall totalizer of the sort used in national elections, and I imagined Herman Kahn, just off camera, nodding his head in agreement with the logic. (The figures were small, compared with his projected mega-slaughters.)

So much for message and moral. As film making, the picture seems to me excessively engineered. The basic set is Brighton; more specifically, one of its confectionery reception halls, the sea front and an amusement pier, renamed "World War I" for the occasion. The idea is that the public hears the siren voice of the barker, takes a ticket for the pier, runs happily to the games of skill or chance, the thrill rides and the gaudy shows—and they all turn real. At the end of the pier is Flanders and the counter of a shooting gallery is the parapet of a trench. As a visual metaphor, this is not bad; but the nature of such devices is that the better they are the less well they bear repetition. Very quickly they become predictable, and their machinery is so obtrusive that they reduce content to formula. It is exceedingly hard to act in the presenc of a really persuasive gimmick.

I feel sure that Attenborough mus have had it in mind to create a ghastl effect by contrasting, rapidly and re peatedly, the candy-apple frivolity o the seaside with the blood-rotted mu of the Western front. But just becaus he keeps the two elements in such eve balance, the impact of the battle scene is compromised by the charade o Brighton. It is intended that one b moved, and indeed there are fleetin moments of emotion (or at least o sentiment), but for the most part I wa conscious that energetic actors were quickly changing their costumes and trotting to the alternate set.

It was fun to hear the old songs again (the musical scores of our wars have certainly been deteriorating recently) and a fair treat to see almost every British actor with a title to his name promenading about and whispering malice in a splendid red uniform. But easy tears from elaborate machinery left me a little ashamed.

Wars past, wars future—the English seem preoccupied with apocalypse. The Bed Sitting Room (Richard Lester directing) concerns itself with events after an atomic war of infinitesimal duration and utter destruction. What was London looks like a couple of square miles of the Sahara, annealed in a blast furnace: nothing but hills, petrified rivers, caves, and plains of vitrified slag in loathsome sweet colors. It is a beastly set and quite the best part of the film.

The title, to get that over with, refers to the type of post-nuclear mutation that is in process. Ralph Richardson (on hand once more) plays what might be called the title role, since his Lord Fortnum is turning into that sort of dwelling; turning into it with much lamentation that he should be transmuted into a structure of such mean aspirations. A motherly woman becomes a clothespress and cries disconsolately that she is being raped when a man tries to take cover in her interior.

If this sounds rather coy, that is the overall effect. I got the impression that the one thing British that will prove resistant to radiation is the understated giggle. Lester's trouble is not that he is ridden by a gimmick but that he has been given an extreme situation (by the writers Spike Milligan and John Antrobus) without sufficient detail to animate it. Consequently he dithers and—that being his weakness (see How I Won the War)—turns cute. There are some promising beginnings: the underground mysteriously still runs on the Inner Circle and people have taken to living in the trains; a B.B.C. news announcer goes about with the frame of TV set and through it announces zany currences to solitary survivors; a girl pregnant for months beyond term; doctor prescribes a nourishing meal a man dying of starvation. But it is bits and pieces; nothing matures om idea to event, and over it all poured the self-satisfied drollery. course that could be the ultimate horror of fission—everyone turned into a crashing eccentric—but I don't think it likely or what the film makers had in mind. The famous names here, in addition to Sir Ralph, are Rita Tushingham, Peter Cook and Dudley Moore. The latter two ride about in a captive balloon and do nothing to diminish the romping.

RECORDS / David Hamilton

ERIO: Sinfonia. Swingle Singers. New ork Philharmonic. Luciano Berio, cond. olumbia MS 7268. $5.98.

epeated hearings of this 1968 Philharonic commission (see The Nation, ovember 4, 1968) confirm an initial pression that its main substance is be found in the quasi-Joycean verl-musical collage of the third movement; if the other three sections still em of low density, at times of even lessiaenic stasis, they at least put the Mahler movement" in high relief.

Berio's collage is based on the third ovement of Mahler's Second Symhony, whose beginning forms the inial continuity; later, the Mahler floats n and out of the texture, and returns efinitively at the end. Over this is eard a variety of quotations from the nusical literature (in the orchestra) nd overlapping verbal exclamations nd recitations, centering on Beckett's The Unnamable. The result is perhaps nost aptly described as a piece about nusic, for the pre-existent material is uxtaposed in terms more of historical eferences than specific musical properies. A major exception is the triple meter of the Mahler movement, which continues to serve as a kind of paste holding the rest together even when its original subtleties have been submerged in the multi-layered texture.

I am sure that the Joycean analogy was not far from the composer's mind, and the Sinfonia is an interesting exploration of such possibilities, despite the obvious difficulties of drawing analogies between the time-flow of music and that of literature. The aesthetic departure from the main musical tradition (and even from a good deal of 20th-century "tradition") is radical, even if the sonorous surface retains a very traditional character.

Even though the recording-session balance clarifies many details that were not easily audible at the concert performances last year, some textural obscurities remain, and I am now, after repeated hearings of the record, inclined to classify them as miscalculations. Nevertheless, the piece is full of typical Berio ingenuity, notably in the resourceful writing for the extraordinary Swingle Singers. As with too many recent releases of contemporary music, the record constitutes very short measure; the entire Sinfonia would have fitted on one side.

The Art of Artur Schnabel. Seraphim 60115. $2.49.

MONTEVERDI: Madrigals and other works. Vocal and instrumental ensembles. Nadia Boulanger, cond. Seraphim 60125. $2.49.

STRAUSS: Der Rosenkavalier (abridged): songs and operatic arias. Lotte Lehmann, Elisabeth Schumann, Maria Olczewska, Richard Mayr. Vienna State Opera Orchestra. Robert Heger, cond. Seraphim IC-6041 (three discs). $7.47.

These are very desirable reissues, from a large release under the Seraphim label. The Schnabel disc, exceptionally welcome, is a group of postwar performances, most of which have not previously been available in this country: Mozart's Rondo in A minor, K. 511, and Sonata in B-flat, K. 570; Schubert's Impromptus, Op. 90, Nos. 2 & 4 (the latter unfortunately cut, presumably to fit the original 78-rpm record); Weber's Invitation to the Dance; Brahms's Rhapsody in G minor and Intermezzos, Op. 116, No. 2 and Op. 117, No. 1. The Mozart Rondo is memorable for its elucidation of metrical ambiguity, the Schubert for the subtle polyphony that Schnabel traces in the passage work; if there are some palpable technical blunders in the Weber and Brahms, there is also an unusual control of textural balance and tonal color. These are important footnotes to Schnabel's more famous recordings. He is also represented in three three-disc collections in the same series: the Schubert Moments Musicaux in "Six Legendary Pianists" (Seraphim IC-6045), Mozart's G minor Piano Quartet, K. 478, in "Six Chamber Music Masterpieces" (IC-6044), and Beethoven's Second Piano Concerto in "Six Concertos" (IC-6043). Each set contains other excellent performances, but one could wish for a more rational packaging of historic recordings than this grab-bag approach.

The 1937 Boulanger set of Monteverdi vocal works is a document in the history of taste, for it represented the first major recording of that composer's music, and was an important stimulus for the Monteverdi revival that followed. Fortunately, it can still be heard with pleasure despite such anachronisms as the use of a piano, for Mme. Boulanger understood the rhythmic life of this music as few have understood it since. Hers is a fine antidote to "sewing-machine baroque" performances.

Heger's abridged Rosenkavalier suffers from cramped orchestral sound, some overhasty tempos, and brutal cuts, but retains the virtues of immensely flavorful performances from all the principals. Elisabeth Schumann's Sophie, in particular, is a technical marvel, and the songs she sings on one of the odd sides offer a very special fusion of verbal clarity with purity of legato line.

MENDELSSOHN: Octet for Strings, Op. 20. BOCCHERINI: Cello Quintet in C major, Op. 37, No. 7. Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. Argo ZRG 569. $5.95.

Mendelssohn's youthful fusion of technical mastery and inspiration is at its height in this quite perfect work, a locus classicus of brilliant string scoring. The eight-part fugal writing of the last movement is a particular delight, as integrated into a sonata-allegro structure and adorned with an almost incessant but always thematically relevant eight-note motion. The performance is very near to perfection itself—as is that of the tuneful but structurally unimaginative Boccherini work on the second side.

Other recommended recordings:

French Operatic Arias. Beverly Sills, soprano; Ambrosian Opera Chorus. Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Charles Mackerras, cond. Westminster WST 17163. $5.98.

CHOPIN: Polonaises, Op. 40, No. 2; Op. 44; Op. 53; Polonaise-Fantasie, Op. 61; Andante spianato and Grand Polonaise, Op. 22. Alfred Brendel, piano. Vanguard VCS 10058. $3.98.

WEBER: Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in F minor, Op. 73; Concertino, Op. 26. ROSSINI: Introduction and Variations for Clarinet and Orchestra. Gervase de Peyer, clarinet. New Philharmonia Orchestra. Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, cond. Angel S-36589. $5.98.

 (Continued from page 443)

—and more were printed commercially. Nearly a quarter million pages were translated into various languages. Much of this verbal inundation originated in the 2,580 meetings held by delegates. The number of individual speeches is beyond calculation, and since many of the speakers regard their words as imperishable, most of the meetings are transcribed verbatim or in extensive summaries. They are also recorded on audio tape (in several languages) and often on video tape. And this is just the output of headquarters. Even more meetings (3,331) were held at the UN's European office, the old League of Nations headquarters in Geneva; others at various permanent UN installations, and still others by traveling UN groups. Many of these meetings are useful, but many others are self-generating and trivial.

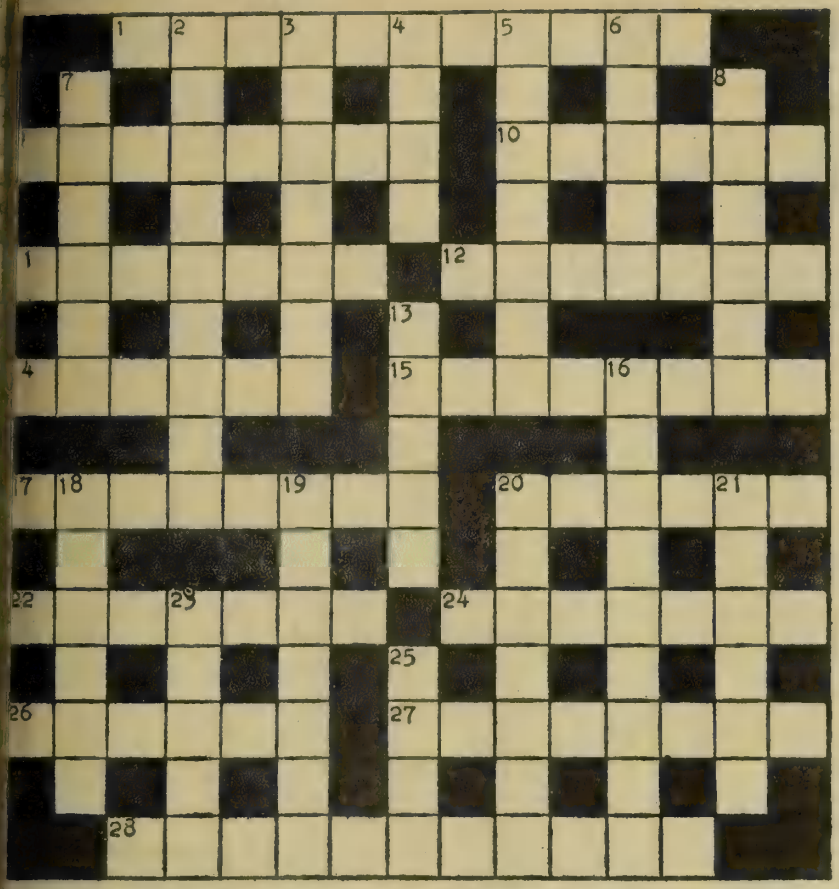
There seems to be no way to stop the flood. The Secretary-General has pleaded with the delegates to curb their passion for meetings, the delegates themselves agree that restraint is necessary, but there seems to be no one with the courage to stand up and say that a meeting proposed by a colleague is unnecessary. So they increase, even though there isn't enough physical space for them, even though trained personnel to service them, particularly interpreters, is not available, even though, despite incredible efforts, the UN Secretariat cannot keep up with the necessary documentation.

It is no wonder then that the UN is hoping to expand dramatically beyond its original 18 acres. The plans are not modest. They include a 3-acre park to be built on pilings in the East River, a square block for office and storage space, a large part of a block for the new home of the United Nations International School, and 2 blocks for a visitors' center and for office, apartment and hotel space for UN delegations—all at a cost of more than $50 million. Most of this expansion can, no doubt, be justified, for the UN has grown in membership by two and a half times since 1945, its members constantly give it new tasks in the economic and social fields, and it does not offer enough social and recreational facilities for the members, many of whom are Africans and Asians who do not feel welcome in the city. But it does seem ironic that at a time when the UN grows increasingly hollow at the center, it should grow more luxuriant at the edges.

This bleak picture is far from meaning that the United Nations is without use. The nations of the world want it, not only as the embodiment of an ideal that most peoples cherish but because it has achieved real successes, some permanent, some temporary: the Congo, the Middle East in 1948 and 1956, Korea perhaps, Kashmir, the independence of most of Africa, the nuclear test-ban treaty. More recently, Cyprus, treaties barring nuclear weapons from Latin America and from space, and the treaty to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. And despite a desperate shortage of money, the UN has done important and often overlooked work in the economic and social fields. Employing about 65 per cent of its budget and 80 per cent of its staff, the UN is building a tradition of international cooperation that the theorists—and U Thant—hope will gradually be to influence the political field.

The United Nations has still other uses. It is not t conscience of the world, for a committee cannot be conscience; yet the Secretary-General, because of unique constituency, can sometimes serve such a r and U Thant often does. However it is by no mea evident that his diplomatic thrusts have had any inf ence in major capitals. Indeed, the chances are th Thant has occasioned anger more often than actic

But if the UN cannot directly influence the actio of the superpowers, its very presence serves to modi them. Or as one long-time observer put it, the UN "do allow an outraged nation to cry help and the very c sometimes frightens the robber." Who knows wh the Russians might have done if they had not been hail before the Security Council? And where else cou Czechoslovakia have made its brief but poignant pr test? Also the UN undoubtedly had some benefici influence on developments in the Cuban missile crisi in the Dominican Republic, in Suez, and even in Vie nam, for the great powers cannot completely ignore th assembled voices of the nations of the world, even voices cannot stand up against armies.



The UN is sometimes dismissed as just a forum, n more than a diplomatic stock exchange, but even th is useful. How else could almost all the nations of th world be in immediate diplomatic contact, thus im proving the chances of avoiding crises based on mis understanding? The UN is also indispensable for sea ing agreements and giving them added weight an validity. It is one thing for a couple of nations to mak a bilateral agreement, but if the UN becomes a part to it, it is much harder to avoid compliance. Also (an this is no small matter), the UN allows a nation t compromise in an international dispute, when otherwis it would appear to be backing down. U Thant's appea to both sides to avoid a physical confrontation in th Cuban missile crisis allowed Khrushchev to pull back claiming he was responding to Thant's request an not to Kennedy's ultimatum.

Having acknowledged all this, the blunt fact re mains that the UN is not in the mainstream of big power international politics. Although it was born i the belief that balance of power politics and spheres of influences would become anachronisms, these twenty-four years have proved the visionaries wrong. The old brutal realities still exist and show no signs of depart ing. Collective security does not work because the powerful nations will not let it work. Their interpretation of national interest is too narrow. Thus hopes too long deferred have led to disillusion.

There is nothing wrong with the UN that the United States and Russia could not change overnight, for if they would lead, the others would follow. But in the immediate future they will neither respond to the collective will nor surrender their sovereignty, and without one concession or the other the UN is impotent. Meanwhile, the machinery of peace remains, waiting to be used. Until it is used, as one observer put it, "the United Nations is like the Church in the Dark Ages."

Crossword Puzzle No. 1318

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Revolutionary decoy France formed into a non-Union body? (11)
6 Has to hurt just above the lip, probably. (8)
9 She is rather possessive following the party, somewhat like a squirrel. (6) 10 Keep the faith, baby? Not with this! (7)
12 See 26 across
14 Moves a little, like several in the foot. (6)
15 A form of the word "doll" not found in the western hemisphere generally. (3,5)
17 and 25 down Spoils a room design created to aid the 15, in part. (8,4)
20 All the actors or just one of two stars? (6)
22 Given the wrong part to throw in the wrong direction? (7)
24 See 18 down
26 and 12 On a car do they imply fast colors? (6,7)
27 In such a state, small thy feeling, but large thy problem. (8)
28 Individual characteristics. (11)

DOWN

2 and 13 The astronauts were really wild! (3,2,4,5)
3 Even timeless they'd be good fronts! (7)
4 Acts like animals! (4)
5 Wrong to be so, according to knightly vows. (7)
6 Goat island? (5)
7 Change course with ease inside as one hears another vessel. (6)
8 You might get things gummed up again if you do! (6)
13 See 2 down
16 Good lookers might be so. (9)
18 and 24 across For example, sable shades might make one feel good! (6,7)
19 Specifies things as typified by 6 with corn on it. (7)
20 At the head of the column. (7)
21 Implies there's no stock in extravagant misdoing if it went right in the middle. (6)
23 Frost on a number reputedly doesn't pay.
25 See 17 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1317

ACROSS: 1 Cloudless; 6 Grant; 9 Thespis; 10 Ocarina; 11 Ski; 12 Ringer; 15 Sagamore; 16 Crease; 18 Ebbing; 20 Abandons; 23, 24, 25 and 13 Once around the park; 28 Georgia; 29 Take-out; 30 Noted; 31 Sidesteps. DOWN: 1 Cotes; 2 Opening; 3 and 5 Department stores; 4 Elsinore; 6 Gear; 7 Ali Baba; 8 Trackless; 14 Grand Dukes; 15 Sheboygan; 17 Abducted; 19 Back out; 21 Outvote; 22 Creaks; 26 and 13 Estes Park; 27 Aged.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832, Kansas City, Missouri 64141.

GROUP DATING—An alternate mating game. Info, magazines — $2.00. TMU, Box 1264-NR, Berkeley 94701.

FOR knowledge of, and insight into, the thinking of the U.S. homosexual, send $1 to: TANGENTS, 3473½ Cahuenga, Hollywood, Calif. 90028.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PERSONALS

POSTERS (over 175, many antiwar), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE—needs to love. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City 10017.

WELL-KNOWN WRITER, BOOK-REVIEWER; editor analyses revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 628, c/o The Nation.

A POINT OF VIEW YOU MAY NOT HAVE CONSIDERED. Public relations man; heavy creative thinking experience; direct mail, layout, graphics. Liaison with professional groups. Box 629, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Rollard Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

The Power Elite Revisited

In 1956, C. Wright Mills's The Power Elite exploded sociologists' most cherished myths about the American power structure. Thirteen years later, the explosion is still reverberating.

Having exposed the postwar intellectuals who "have abandoned criticism for the new American celebration," Mills was subjected to a barrage of criticism, some enlightening and some merely defensive. G. William Domhoff, author of Who Rules America?, and Hoyt B. Ballard of Texas Arts and Industries University have compiled a series of thoughtful essays on The Power Elite. Represented are liberal, radical and "highbrow" commentaries by critics as diverse as Paul Sweezy and A. A. Berle, Jr. Also offered are evaluations of Mills's critics by Domhoff and C. Wright Mills himself.

Take a fresh look at C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE. The NATION is offering this new release on one of America's most provocative social scientists to any new one-year subscriber to The NATION. Join us now.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will send you C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE, edited by Domhoff and Ballard, free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; ($2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 10-27

HAYNSWORTH & THE BAR PATRICK OWENS

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 3, 1969 35 cents

S-7CR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
NOV 1969
LIBRARY

Nixon's 'Southern' Strategy

THE AUTHORITARIAN PRESCRIPTION

WILLIAM D. PHELAN, Jr.

Color and Mayhem

UPTIGHT IN THE ARMED FORCES

WILLIAM ENDICOTT & STANLEY WILLIFORD

'The Rise and Fall of The Man of Letters'

DONALD FANGER

Robert G. Sherrill on Huey Long

LETTERS

not his war

Concord, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: President Nixon has stated that he does not intend to be "the first American President to lose a war," but . . . the war in Vietnam is not his to win or lose. This war was lost by his three White House predecessors as they involved this nation in a conflict which was doomed from the beginning. It seems to have taken the nation these many years to finally realize this fact.

Meldon C. Belknap

when is an invitation?

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: In his "The Center at Santa Barbara: Anguish on a Hilltop" [The Nation, Oct. 6], Robert H. Sollen refers to the July meeting of a group of leading scholars brought to Santa Barbara to consult with the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions on its current reorganization. He states:

"Some of the outsiders were invited to join the Center as senior fellows. It turned out that few if any were interested in joining as full-fledged fellows, but some have become associates. . . ."

This statement is wholly false. None of those at the July meeting was asked to become a senior fellow, nor has such appointment yet been offered to anyone else. The Center has asked fifteen distinguished scholars to become associates; only one has declined, because of conflicting commitments, and he is associated with one of the Center's ongoing projects. . . .

Mr. Sollen states that I have complained in the past about his reporting on Center matters in the Santa Barbara News-Press. That statement is wholly accurate.

Harry S. Ashmore
Executive Vice-President
Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: I was told by several persons associated with the Center whose word I have reason to trust that some of the scholars who met at the Center in July were asked to become fellows.

Moreover, statements issued by the Center left the distinct impression that the July group was expected to provide some new senior fellows. Ashmore himself strengthened this impression in a letter to me (with copies to my superiors) after I had written a couple of articles for the Santa Barbara News-Press regarding the Center reorganization.

"In your second day story," Ashmore wrote last June 23, "you use the curious phrase 'it was reported unofficially that they will give way to a new group of fellows to be brought in before the end of the year.' On the contrary, it was stated officially by Hutchins [Center president] that this was the case—and in that regard the announcement also contained some hard news of local interest you have not yet reported: 'In July eleven distinguished scholars from the United States and abroad will meet at the Center to consider further revision and expansion of the reconstituted study program. Additional appointments are expected in the fall.'"

The point I tried to make is that the Center has gone soft from lack of meaningful criticism and analysis by its friends (and enemies) and has in fact lost the ability (temporarily, let us hope) to cope calmly with such criticism when it does appear.

Robert H. Sollen

EDITORIALS

The Moratorium–Success Story

It may be a bit early to issue any hard-and-fast conclusions as to what the October moratorium accomplished, but it surely is not too early to say that it was a memorable achievement, and one of which its promoters may be proud. If it was government in the streets, as the President believes or pretends to believe, all one can say is that its moral content was much higher than that of government in the White House during this or the preceding administration.

Demonstrations on a national scale tend either to be too tightly organized, and thus unable to adapt to local conditions, or to fall into total anarchy. The moratorium was initiated and encouraged from its headquarters, which issued a few simple guidelines: keep it cool, use your imagination, do what you judge to be appropriate in your community. This technique worked most impressively. As for law-and-order, Mary McGrory was right when she called it "a miracle of civility." It was so parliamentary that even the opponents, often an inflamed lot, were for the most part conjured into politeness.

A demonstration of fully national scope—other than those of traditional holidays and observations—is a rarity. This one came closer to being nation wide than has anything of its kind in the past. The big crowds were where one would expect—in New York, Boston and other large cities—but people turned out in smaller communities too. New Haven, with a population of 152,000, poured 60,000 inhabitants onto the Green by police count. Even for a university town, a turnout of one-third of the population for an anti-war demonstration is phenomenal.

The October demonstration was also of broader composition than any of its kind in the past. A significant section of both labor and business was involved. In his excellent newsletter, Business & Society, Milton Moskowitz comments: "There's no question that the October 15 Vietnam Moratorium action has unleashed the greatest business support yet for the peace movement. At the Harvard Business School, prime training ground for management, one-third of the students backed the drive. A demonstration was organized for the Wall Street area. At least one major corporation told its community relations people around the country to invite students in to present their position. And the Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace stepped up its activities."

In The New York Times (October 22) Anthony Lewis notes with wonderment that the speakers on October 15 included not only professors and liberal politicians but such a man as Malcolm Baldridge, Jr., president of the Scoville Manufacturing Co., who in 1968 headed the Connecticut Nixon-Agnew Committee. The Alliance for Labor Action (United Auto Workers and the Teamsters), representing some 4 million members, endorsed the moratorium unequivocally: "We take our stand with those who are for getting out quickly and completely."

Success on this scale can be explained only on the assumption that the movement was already there, waiting for able management. Withal, an important component must not be overlooked. Edward B. Fiske observed in The New York Times (October 19) that the moratorium was viewed by a number of theologians and religious specialists as "not only a political protest but an event with profound religious overtones built around a fundamental new vision of America. . . ." This approach recalls the proposition, described in Daedalus in 1964 by the sociologist Robert N. Bellah, that an "elaborate and well institutionalized" civil religion, with its own doctrines, rituals and scriptures, has existed for some time alongside the sectarian faiths. This civil religion developed during the American Revolution, in the concept of a new promised land. Not the least service of the October moratorium was the testimony that this civil religion still exists, ready to revive when the nation's leaders deviate grossly from the path of sanity and rectitude.

APR 29

Second Moratorium–Questions

When President Nixon told the country that he would not be influenced "whatever" by the October moratorium, that he would not allow policy to be made "in the streets," he gave a boost to the movement that its most ardent protagonists could hardly have hoped for. The massive thrust came from the fact that the President was so palpably wrong in his reading of the constitutional liberties involved. In a letter to The New York Times, Prof. Milton R. Konvitz, an expert in the field, pointed out that the right of petition for the redress of grievances is not limited to the presentation of a document, but that the Supreme Court has decided (as common sense alone would seem to dictate) that a march, or parade, or a mass meeting, or a sit-in—provided that it is conducted in a peaceful and orderly manner and in a place where the participants have a right to be—is a legitimate exercise of the right of petition.

It may be that Spiro Agnew's abusive speech before a Republican audience in New Orleans on October 19 will give the same impetus to the November moratorium. The reference to the October 15 demonstrators and their supporters as "an effete corps of impudent snobs who characterize themselves as intellectuals," when they included seventy-nine university presidents and thousands of eminent professors, politicians and businessmen, is so wildly misguided that it can only boomerang on the speaker. Since Mr. Nixon cannot publicly disavow Mr. Agnew (if, indeed, he wishes to do so), the managers of the November moratorium have been handed some ready-made material for their cause.

But they have problems; in fact, everyone in this highly fluid situation faces difficulties and dangers. The success of the October demonstration was due largely to its orderly and earnest character. Agnew's speech can become a factor in the radicalization of the movement, to its probable disadvantage. If it has that effect, it will not be the only force pushing in that direction. There is not one peace movement but several. The Vietnam Moratorium Committee, which is planning the November 13-14 nation wide movement, is dominated by young people. The New Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, which plans peace marches in Washington on

IN THIS ISSUE

November 3, 1969

EDITORIALS

458

ARTICLES

462 Haynsworth and the Bar: A Jury of His Club Mates — Patrick Owens

464 Color and Mayhem: Uptight in the Armed Forces — William Endicott and Stanley Williford

467 Nixon's "Southern" Strategy: The Authoritarian Prescription — William D. Phelan, Jr.

473 Debtors' Power: Defense Against Gouging — Jean Carper

476 Tokyo: Choreography of Protest — Angela Carter

BOOKS & THE ARTS

478 Gross: The Rise and Fall of the Man of Letters — Donald Fanger

480 Williams: Huey Long — Robert G. Sherrill

482 Shikes: The Indignant Eye — Elmer Bendiner

482 Hair (poem) — Jack Anderson

483 Art — Lawrence Alloway

485 Theatre — Harold Clurman

485 Hunters (poem) — Ameen Alwan

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209 No. 15

the same days and a mass rally on November 15, is described as "a loose coalition of individual pacifists and anti-war groups," with for the most part middle-aged sponsors. The leaders of both groups have pledged unity, but the fact that there are separate organizations implies differences in orientation, and these exist also within the more youthful organization. Impatient elements may take over the latter's demonstrations in some places, and the very fact that another month will have passed makes maintenance of the peaceful character of the movement more difficult. If the President, in his November 3 address, continues to equivocate, a hostile countermove is the more likely.

The October demonstrations were supported by influential members of Congress. Several of these key supporters now ask that the President be given more time to move toward peace, but it is hard to see how he can do so fast enough for those who demand peace "now." He is beholden to the right wing of his party. He identifies the Thieu-Ky regime with the people of Vietnam. He has been quoted as declaring that he does not intend to be the first President of the United States to lose a war. He wants peace, but peace with "honor," by which is meant a peace which looks as much as possible like a military victory. These and other factors make it likely that the November moratorium will have ample grounds for exerting further pressure, but the situation may weaken the ability of the organizers to keep the movement on its initial course.

The motivation for the softer line adopted by Messrs. Fulbright, Mansfield and Aiken in advance of the November 3 address may be their recognition that "peace now," while a legitimate slogan for citizens seeking to animate their government to significant new procedures, cannot literally be accomplished. For one thing, there is no reason to believe that if Mr. Nixon proclaims a cease-fire on the part of the American forces the fighting will end. The Nation pointed out more than a year ago that if General Gavin's prescription for withdrawal of American forces to coastal enclaves were followed, the Vietcong would in all probability attack the enclaves. It is hard to see how peace can come while American forces in any significant number remain in South Vietnam, and yet they cannot be removed overnight. And peace will certainly not come while America continues to support the Thieu-Ky cabal of generals and grafters. Senator Goodell has been saying this in no uncertain terms, and it must be clear to the other promoters of peace in the Senate. It may be that they fear complications elsewhere than in Vietnam and Laos. Korea may be as much of a tinderbox as Southeast Asia (editorial, The Nation, October 6), and if an explosion should occur there, South Vietnam might, in retrospect, look like a minor problem.

Nevertheless, if the moderate spokesmen for the October moratorium withdraw somewhat from its sequel, they may take elements of the moderate rank and file with them, and negatively radicalize the remainder.

There are, thus, reasons for concern. But since the October moratorium proved so successful, the wise course would seem to be to play it by ear in November, adapting tactics and strategy to retain public confidence in the sanity and moderation of the leaders and the rank and file. The invitation to President Nixon to participate in the November moratorium is an astute idea. He is scarcely likely to accept, but this civility, if not met in kind, can only redound to the advantage of the movement.

Changing Times

Two incidents in California confirm what we had to say recently about changes in the old order of thought and feeling (editorial, The Nation, September 29, p. 300). As a result of a deliberate FBI leak to the press, Angela Davis, a black militant named as assistant professor of philosophy at UCLA, was publicly identified as a member of the Communist Party. Governor Reagan and his regents gasped, huddled and demanded that she be fired forthwith. But to their surprise the UCLA faculty voted 551 to 4 to rescind its 1950 ban on the employment of Communists and, moments later, voted 539 to 12 to condemn the regents for ordering the dismissal. Let it be noted that it was not at Berkeley, "the mother of protests," that this striking manifestation of insubordination took place but at the Los Angeles campus, which is better dressed and more polite. What Reagan and the regents forgot, of course, is that a new generation of professors and students has emerged since the famous fight of 1950 on the loyalty oath. It is now much harder to manipulate "anti-Communist" reflexes.

At about the same time, a judge of the San Jose Superior Court, presiding in a juvenile case, indulged in some outrageously intemperate and stupid generalizations about "the Mexican people." A member of "an old San Jose family," the judge had no doubt absorbed anti-Mexican feeling from childhood. Other judges have made equally vicious remarks about Mexicans at fairly regular intervals since 1850, when California was admitted to the union. (For example, the decision of the District Court of Appeals, October 4, 1944, in People vs. Leyvas, et al—the so-called Sleepy Lagoon case—deals with the subject.) But, again, the times have changed: today about a fourth of San Jose's population of 450,000 is Mexican-American. There, as elsewhere in California, the Chicano rebellion is being felt at all levels and the ferment is spreading. So it is not surprising that the judge's courtroom should have been picketed for three days, or that he finally had to be transferred to another court. Resolutions denounced his conduct, the Attorney General urged the Judicial Qualifications Commission to investigate, removal proceedings were projected, and newspapers which not many years ago would have approved of his remarks, or at least failed to note them, berated him editorially. It is not necessary, therefore, to suggest that other California judges should keep their prejudice under their robes: one may be quite sure that they are doing just that.

All this is not to imply that California has won the struggle against test oaths (the Davis case has not been finally resolved) or that its courtrooms will henceforth be wholly free of racial bias. But some at least of the old phobias and stereotypes are being challenged by strong and growing minorities imbued with a new outlook and determination. It is not always true that the more things change the more they are the same.

Never Say Never

Outside his immediate family, there are probably not many who find Mr. Nixon an endearing man; yet there is something charming about the way he takes adamant stands while placing one foot on a roller skate.

Having said that under no circumstances would he be influenced by popular protests against the war in Vietnam, he escorted General Hershey upstairs even before the moratorium had taken place. Having ordered Operation Intercept at the Mexican border to deprive students and other youths of their marijuana and to please the "support your local police" crowd, he has now sent representatives to a House Judiciary subcommittee meeting to say that the Administration endorses the proposal of a commission to study the weed. This is strong support for Representative Koch's current bill to that effect. The President has also come out for a re-examination, and possible reduction, of the fierce penalties now imposed on users of those drugs most in favor among students.

Mr. Nixon, we suspect, suffers from a common American weakness: he yearns to be loved. It is not invariably an edifying trait in public figures, but in his case it may save us all from the consequences of his desire to be boss.

Old Vice

A resurgence of nationalism means a reinstatement, at least in part, of old traditions. For example, Czechoslovakia asserting itself may be a spectacle quite different from that of Poland doing the same thing. The accusation lodged against the Jews in Poland by the Gomulka regime is that they are Zionist—i.e., acknowledging a loyalty to Israel and thus by implication guilty of disloyalty to Communist Poland. But according to E. J. Hobsbawm, himself a Marxist, writing in the British New Society, there is no substance to that charge. Today, he says, the Jews are being "systematically expelled" (a New York Times report states that they are leaving at the rate of about 1,000 a month; some 20,000 remain), and these include "people unaware of any Jewish links at all, but classified as such by the authorities through some Jewish ancestor." Most of them go to Israel, which welcomes them for their skills; and the exodus thus ironically strengthens the very Zionism that Gomulka's regime purports to be combating.

As Hobsbawm takes pains to emphasize, it is not because Poland is Communist that the Jews are being persecuted; it is because Poland has recaptured its pre-Communist past and in so doing reanimated the racist nationalism that darkened so much of its history. Meanwhile, Michael Connock, also writing in New Society, deplores the decline of the Polish cinema, after its sensational achievements of recent years. He points out that Alexander Ford, who reconstructed the Polish film industry after the expulsion of the Germans, is a Jew, and that he is one of the many who have been deprived of their jobs by the present regime. Anti-Semitism is an even-handed sort of vice; it invariably hurts the Jew but it can be relied upon also to hurt his persecutor.

The Draft vs. Social Justice

The draft is not only a means of forcing young men to fight in a war which subverts every American idea; it is also an instrument to protect the status quo against orderly social change. That is the contention of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, based in Kentucky. The mountain regions of Kentucky are among the poorest and most despoiled in the country, but anyone who tries to curb the ravages of strip mining or alleviate Appalachian poverty is likely to be labeled a Communist. And if he happens to be of military age and is opposed to the war in Vietnam, he is likely to be denied exemption as a conscientious objector and eventually jailed as a draft resister.

This is happening to two SCEF organizers, Walter Collins of New Orleans and Joseph Mulloy of Kentucky. Collins, who is black, has been organizing the poor and helping black people to register to vote, most recently in Mississippi. Sentenced to five years in prison and a $2,000 fine for draft refusal, he is out on appeal but restricted to the eastern half of Louisiana, so that he cannot continue his work in Mississippi. Mulloy, who is white, is well known for his challenges to the coal operators in Kentucky (see "Kentucky's Coal Beds of Sedition" by Paul Good, The Nation, September 4, 1967). He was arrested in 1967 under a state sedition law, charged with plotting the overthrow of the government of Pike County, which is in effect governed by the coal interests. The law was declared unconstitutional in federal court and the charges were dropped, but the following day Mulloy was ordered to report for induction. He too has been convicted of draft refusal and sentenced to five years and a $10,000 fine.

When a prominent draft objector like Dr. Spock is cleared (though on narrow legal grounds), people are likely to assume that the draft is being successfully resisted, but cases like those of Mulloy, Collins and many others show that the impression is superficial. A pamphlet titled "An Enemy of the People—How the Draft Is Used To Stop Movements for Social Change" issued by SCEF (3210 West Broadway, Louisville, Ky. 40211) tells an unpleasant story which should be more widely circulated.

Reporter or Informer?

According to a Chicago Daily News report under the by-line of Raymond Coffey (New York Post, October 18), the FBI is importing the process of Gleichschaltung into the land of the free. Under this term, which may be loosely translated as "coordination," Dr. Goebbels, Hitler's propaganda minister, organized the press, radio, cinema and theatre into "chambers" to which only licensed practitioners could belong. Jews and all persons suspected of the slightest taint of disloyalty to Nazism were excluded. The members of the chambers were expected to spy on one another and to report any lack of enthusiasm for the godhead of the Fuehrer.

The FBI version of this type of operation—which one hopes will not emerge from its larval stage—was dis-

(Continued on page 477)

A JURY OF HIS CLUB MATES

PATRICK OWENS
Mr. Owens is chief editorial writer for Newsday, the Long Island newspaper.

If, as is still possible, Judge Clement Haynsworth wins Senate confirmation and ascends to the Supreme Court, he will owe his good fortune to twelve men who have tendered him the most niggardly of blessings while carefully avoiding any comment on his ethics or judicial conduct. The twelve make up the Committee on the Federal Judiciary of the American Bar Association. They are powerful in the Haynsworth affair because they are recognized as the quasi-official assessors of the professional and ethical qualifications of prospective judges. They are now at the center of a growing storm among the nation's lawyers.

Haynsworth violated the ABA's own code of judicial ethics when he sat on cases involving corporations in which he owned stock. In one case, he went out (or sent his broker) to buy stock while the corporation was a litigant before him. He misled the Senate Judiciary Committee about his business activities in his early appearances before that group. Ranking officials of the ABA are distressed by this performance, and by the ABA's acquiescence in it through the Committee on the Federal Judiciary. But those prominent lawyers observe all the rules of Establishment clubmanship, especially when a conservative judicial nominee is at issue. On October 17, the ABA's board of governors decided that it lacked the precedent and the power to override the Judiciary Committee and seek an explicit opinion on Haynsworth's conduct from the Ethics Committee. This decision reportedly pained many of the people who participated in it, including the ABA's "modernizing" president, Bernard G. Segal of Philadelphia, and his immediate predecessor, William T. Gossett of Detroit. But the claims of due process, as one indignant governor phrased it, carried the day.

Ironically, the Federal Judiciary Committee that has stuck to Haynsworth is itself a product of efforts by Gossett and Segal to bring their association up to date. Most of its members are recent replacements for aging establishmentarians. ("You used to have to have prostate trouble to get on the committee," one of its ABA critics explained.) But when the committee held a special meeting in New York on October 11 to review disclosures about Haynsworth's conduct, the corporate ethic outvoted the judicial ethic. In a split decision, the committee reaffirmed its September 5 endorsement in a terse one-paragraph statement that avoided any discussion of the judge's actions or the judicial code's provisions.

Committee members knew that a reversal of their earlier endorsement would have killed Haynsworth's chances; the ABA's support is the judge's only shield against the chapter and verse citation of his misconduct that has been offered by Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana. Attorneys outside the ABA's official family have been actively protesting against the nomination. The 3,500-member New York Trial Lawyers Association asked President Nixon to withdraw the Haynsworth endorsement or the Senate to reject it; the thirty-three directors who attended the meeting voted unanimously for the request. Stanley P. Danzig, the Association president, was withering in his judgment of Haynsworth. "There is no need for a demonstration of a great financial stake in a corporation that is before the court to suggest the possibility of conflict of interest," Danzig said. "Even boys know this. When they pick an umpire for a pick-up ball game, they don't pick one with a side bet on the outcome." Like many other attorneys who make their living trying cases, Danzig is less disturbed by the existence of Haynsworth's conflicts of interest than he is by the judge's failure to disclose them to lawyers in the case involved. "A lawyer has a right to ask a prospective juror about his financial interest in a case," he said. "He has no less right to know that about a judge, but he can't ask. He has to rely on a judge's candor in making known such facts."

The Beverly Hills Barristers voted 28 to 3 to ask Nixon to withdraw the nomination. The American Trial Lawyers Association, with 23,000 members who make their living in court, voiced its own displeasure more sedately. ATLA initiated a poll of 700 of its leaders and 500 members chosen at random across the country. Leon Wolfstone of Seattle, ATLA's president, was circumspect in his discussion of the action, saying it was not meant to reflect on any other group. But it was clear that lawyers outside the ABA's leadership were in rebellion against its questionable procedures for screening nominees and prospective nominees for the federal courts.

Labor and civil liberties lawyers have been complaining about these procedures for more than a decade. Two political scientists have emerged from their more scholarly studies of the process to issue harsh opinions on the matter. Joel B. Grossman, assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin and the author of Lawyers and Judges: The ABA and the Politics of Judicial Selection, complains that the committee's orientation is overwhelmingly "conservative-corporate." Harold Chase, professor at the University of Minnesota, says: "These men [the committee] tend to be conservative in their approaches and attitudes. There is a clear Republican bias. Labor lawyers and liberals get a different response than do conservative corporation lawyers. But it isn't a matter of obvious prejudice. These are profoundly conservative men, for the most part, who see things differently from moderates or liberals."

The two men agree that the influence of the ABA committee has probably been far more baneful at district and circuit court levels than in filling Supreme Court vacancies. They point to a handful of disputed Kennedy and Johnson judicial appointments in which the ABA played a key role. In the most notorious of these, David Rabinovitz, a labor lawyer who had represented the United Auto Workers in the long and bitter Kohler strike, was eventually denied a district court seat after a bitter public wrangle in which the Wisconsin Bar Association moved in behind ABA. By contrast, Haynsworth was a strategist in the long and successful struggle of the Southern textile industry to ban unions, and he carried his bought-and-paid-for lawyer's prejudices against labor to the bench when he became a federal district, then circuit court judge. But he sailed through the ABA screening process all three times.

The ABA committee commonly works in secret, offering the President a preliminary assessment of a prospective lower-court nominee's qualifications. "We don't know," says Grossman, "how many get tossed out at this point." The Haynsworth case is exposing the ABA committee to an unusual amount of public scrutiny, partly because President Nixon, desiring to avoid leaks, does not solicit advance ABA checks on prospective Supreme Court nominees. The committee is working in the Haynsworth case for the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A look at the twelve-member committee that has twice endorsed Haynsworth confirms that, whatever rejuvenation Gossett and Segal may think they have accomplished, the "corporate" view reigns supreme. It includes no labor lawyer (one member, Charles Horsky of Washington, says he has represented some unions at some time in the past, but he won't say which ones or when); no lawyer for consumer interests; no lawyer whose income derives primarily from representing individuals in suits against corporations. There is, of course, no black lawyer.

Horsky, known as the committee liberal, is a member of the 110-lawyer Washington firm, Covington & Burling, that also includes Dean Acheson and that specializes in helping clients—corporations emphatically included—to do business with the government. The firms represented on the committee range in size from 110 members down to the five at Harry G. Gault's Flint, Mich., office. The twelve firms total 545 lawyers, including members and associates.

Four of these brag about their clients in legal directories. Norman P. Ramsey, who handled the Haynsworth investigation because he is the Fourth Circuit man on the committee, comes from a Baltimore firm that lists Bethlehem Steel, Du Pont, General Electric, General Tire and Rubber, Koppers Co. and Mobil Oil. Gault's little old Flint firm represents Sears Roebuck, Gulf Oil, State Farm Insurance and REA Express, among others.

Sherwood Wise of Jackson, Miss., heads a ten-lawyer firm that lists Mississippi Power and Light, the Illinois Central Railroad, REA Express, Delta Air Lines, Georgia Pacific, Ralston-Purina, etc. Robert H. Harry's forty-lawyer Denver firm lists Du Pont, Westinghouse, El Paso Natural Gas, IBM, J. C. Penney and Western Electric, all of which have more than a casual interest in who sits on the Supreme Court. The other committee members belong to firms that feel—quite correctly—they don't have to advertise their clients. It is certain that the lists are no less imposing. John A. Sutro comes from the most prestigious firm in San Francisco, Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, which is celebrated throughout the West for its skill at keeping the unions in hand. ("It's pretty well known that if you have a [labor] problem, we're the people to see," says Charles Prael, who heads the firm's labor staff.) The firm has represented Pacific Bell, Standard Oil of California and the giant Guy F. Atkinson Construction Co. on labor matters.

An old corporation lawyer like Haynsworth could expect to feel at home with this group. But just in case he felt the need of an extra welcome, it was assured by some most unusual circumstances:

¶Lawrence Walsh, the Wall Street lawyer who heads the committee, is the number-two man on the U.S. negotiating team at Paris. He was appointed by Nixon and serves at his pleasure. A committee repudiation of Haynsworth would have placed Walsh in the awkward and apparently unprecedented position of blowing the whistle before the Senate on a fellow Presidential nominee.

¶Of the four firms represented on the committee that advertise their clients, two cite clients involved in the Haynsworth controversy. Ramsey, the main Haynsworth investigator, is from a firm that represents a W. R. Grace subsidiary, Davison Chemical. Gault heads a firm that represents Maryland Casualty Co. Haynsworth owned stock both in Grace and in Maryland Casualty's parent company, American General Insurance Co., when he sat on cases involving the corporations. Horsky said in a telephone interview that he thought his firm represented W. R. Grace, but wasn't sure.

¶Still another member, Miles G. Seeley of Chicago, belongs to a firm that represents the Continental Illinois National Bank, which contributed both Treasury Secretary David Kennedy and Budget Director Robert Mayo to the Nixon Administration.

The committee members deny that they themselves are guilty of conflict of interest from such connections. "I really don't think I would be helping the President if I misled him as to the nominees," Walsh said when asked whether one Presidential appointee could pass a disinterested judgment on another Presidential appointee. (The answer is revealing, because it acknowledges a sense of obligation to Nixon, while it distorts the ABA committee's function in the Haynsworth case. Walsh and his committee are not quietly advising Mr. Nixon on whom he should nominate. They are faced, instead, with the alternative of repudiating or endorsing a nominee already publicly chosen by the President.)

Ramsey angrily asserts that his firm has done little business for Davison Chemical since it became a Grace subsidiary. He cannot remember ever handling cases for Davison. "I see no ethical problem whatever, in any way, whether I did or not," he added heatedly when asked about the relationship. Horsky says, philosophically, that big law firms like his have to have clients and that it would be surprising if some of these weren't sometimes involved in the courts.

Other ABA officials, even those who acknowledge distress with the committee's Haynsworth clearance, can see no impropriety or even irony in the circumstance that members of a committee charged with passing on the judge's ethics have financial relationships with corporations that figure in the charges against him.

Walsh's two hats have provoked more distress at the ABA's Chicago headquarters. "That is unfortunate, and I would wish he had avoided it," says one official. But the thought of calling publicly, or even privately, for Walsh to choose between the ABA committee and his Presidential appointment had not occurred to the official.

Walsh, for his part, says that he offered to resign from the chairmanship when Nixon sent him to Paris, and that Gossett did not accept the offer. Instead, Cloyd LaPorte, from former Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's Manhattan firm, was installed as acting committee chairman for the first half of 1969, when Walsh was out of the country.

Whatever happens to the Haynsworth nomination, the wrangle it has stirred up among the nation's lawyers seems likely to go on for some time. Many trial lawyers, in particular, are impatient with the ABA's conservatism. Like the two political scientists, they are unhappy about the bias ABA has so long betrayed in judicial selection. Some of them dismiss the Gossett-Segal efforts as window dressing or public relations.

One of the nation's foremost constitutional law scholars, Charles Black of the Yale Law School, offers a more fundamental objection. He doubts, he says, whether any group outside government should have any "quasi-official" role in the picking of judges. "I just have the feeling that no unofficial, fundamentally private body should have any special status in the process," Black explained. "The Constitution places the responsibility on elected officials in the Presidency and in the Senate, people who are answerable to the public for their actions, and that's where it should stay."

COLOR AND MAYHEM

UPTIGHT IN THE ARMED FORCES

WILLIAM ENDICOTT and STANLEY WILLIFORD
Mr. Endicott and Mr. Williford are staff writers on the Los Angeles Times.

Anyone driving onto Travis Air Force Base in Northern California must pass large signs on either side of the road that proclaim Travis "an equal opportunity employer." The same idea is repeated time and again in military regulations.

In Monterey, a young black soldier with an Afro haircut stood on the front porch of the USO near Fort Ord recently and told it differently: "We try to rap with the man, and he won't listen. Black NCOs, they're part of the system. They'll believe a white major before they will a brother. Racism is the Army." Three black soldiers standing with him nodded in agreement, and one added: "The laws are there, but the prejudice within the people is still there, too."

President Truman ordered complete integration of the armed services in 1948 and by 1954 it had been accomplished. Segregation was ended in base housing, in schools for service dependents, in post facilities such as swimming pools and social clubs. But customs persist, attitudes change slowly, and a young black bent on asserting himself doesn't care the slightest about Harry S Truman. After almost twenty years of relatively peaceful coexistence between blacks and whites, the armed services are faced today with growing incidents of racial turmoil and discontent.

A colonel at the Army's Fort Ord, after first saying "there is no identifiable trend to indicate we have a racial problem," later conceded that the potential exists. At Camp Pendleton, the largest Marine Corps facility on the West Coast, a spokesman was more direct: "It's building into an explosive situation." Gen. Leonard F. Chapman, Jr., the Marine Corps commandant, acknowledged the reality of the problem at a news conference in Washington last month, when he said that racial violence among Marines must stop.

It had broken out in mid-July, when a white Marine at Camp Lejeune, N.C., died of injuries suffered in an outbreak between blacks and whites. In early August, twenty-five soldiers were hospitalized at Fort Bragg, N.C., after a racial fight that involved about 200 Negro and white troops. Other clashes have been reported at a Naval air station near Providence, R.I., a Marine Corps air station in Hawaii and at several major Army bases from Fort Dix, N.J., to Fort Hood, Tex.

The troublemaker often cited is the young, single, black serviceman, and a larger dimension for the turmoil may be found in the racial disorders that have recently beset the colleges and high schools. That is the age group which feeds the military with most of its enlisted men.

A product of a society increasingly aware of minority civil rights, the young black is impatient and assertive in the presence of discrimination. He may wear an Afro haircut and read militant black literature. In many cases, he sees no justification for the war in Vietnam, and he often looks upon the black noncommissioned officer as an Uncle Tom.

Sgt. 1/C Walter Ambrose, a drill instructor at Fort Ord and himself a Negro, said that basically the younger blacks are alienated by the fact that the Army is white controlled. "They resent taking orders from whites," he said, adding that it is harder for him to train the new breed of black soldiers. "First of all they see me as a brother. Right away they get me in trouble. They feel I should be more lenient."

Civilian militant groups, such as the Black Panthers, also have an effect, particularly on the men who go on leave in the larger cities. "Sometimes they come back a little uptight," said one Marine. Many black soldiers have taken to wearing medallions, giving black power signs and the black power handshake. If not universally used by blacks, they are at least universally understood. Col. John E. Emerson, Jr., chief personnel officer at Fort Ord, said he had "not been able to identify any visible militant element" influencing soldiers. But a moment later, he spoke of that element as being on the decline.

The black career soldier tends to minimize the racial issue, while the young recruit, though he may not say that racism has affected him personally, is convinced that it exists. He is likely to look askance at any black man who says it doesn't, and this places the black career NCO in a dilemma. If he denies the racism, he is thought blind; if he admits it, he is judged to have accepted it and is looked upon with contempt.

The two areas most likely to produce racial friction are social situations involving girls and alleged discrimination in promotions. Most commanders will admit that in the last few months the post off-duty clubs have become increasingly explosive. "One of the problems is the Saturday night dance," explained Jack Bale, executive director of the Oceanside Armed Services YMCA near Camp Pendleton. "We don't have enough girls, period." Most of the white girls will dance with black Marines, he said, and some of the white Marines from the South resent it. When he sees trouble brewing, Bale immediately stops the dance.

"A white boy will dance with a Negro girl and nothing will be said," contends David Wingate, a retired Marine gunnery sergeant now living in Oceanside. "But the moment a black boy dances with a white girl, the situation changes 180 degrees. There are not enough Negro girls here for the black guys. There never will be. Most of the problem is with the young, single black men. They don't have wives to go home to. They can't find women companions nearby and they don't have a car to get away."

Most white GIs deny being upset when black colleagues have white girl friends, and many blacks say they have no problem from whites on the issue. But others think resentment often simmers beneath the surface.

The complaint of unfair promotions persists, though the older NCOs tend to minimize its importance. Most beefs come from individuals who believe that their own advancement was blocked by the wall of racism. Retired Gunnery Sgt. James Spurling, who lives in Oceanside, claims that the Marine Corps applies a double standard when handing out promotions. He cites his own career: "Twenty-one years and I'm still a gunnery sergeant."

Such charges are denied by Lieut. Gen. Lewis W. Walt, assistant commandant of the Marine Corps, who said recently at Camp Pendleton that the Negro Marine has done better on promotions than the white man. "We just don't make any distinctions."

Base commanders are quick to remind a questioner that current orders prohibit the listing of race on personal records. From this they argue that there is no way to tell whether a soldier is black or white when he is up for promotion. What they fail to add is that any soldier being considered for a rank above that of corporal must stand before a promotions board, usually made up of his company commander and/or another officer and a group of NCOs.

"Brothers try to get rank by working hard, but it goes to the other man," said Pfc. Samuel Evans, who has been stationed at Fort Ord for seven months. "I just don't see brothers get any opportunities. They try and they can't cope so, boom, they split and do what comes naturally."

Of course, there is some counter evidence. Staff Sgt. Alfred Bland is a Pendleton Marine and a Negro. "I'm a walking freak," he said. "I'm 22 years old and I'm an E6 [staff sergeant]. I've climbed the ladder kinda fast. I think for the work I've done I've been rewarded properly." About 10 per cent of all the NCOs in the military are Negro. Among the officers, however, they drop to 2 per cent.

Most officers deny unequivocally the existence of any racism in their command, but their own conversations, many black servicemen contend, betray signs of underlying racism. For example, a colonel at Fort Ord said race relations on the base "have never become a prominent issue—everybody is wearing the green suit." But then he spoke of "jungle beat music" in the base's off-duty clubs and how, before the entertainment pattern was changed, the clubs had been overrun with "darks." A white staff sergeant at Fort Ord dismissed the question of how he got along with blacks by saying, "Outstanding. Best friend I ever had was a colored man."

George Gardiner

Even efforts to foster amity often unwittingly emphasize racial myths. A recent editorial on human relations in the base newspaper at El Toro Marine Corps Air Station fell into that trap: "Tastes vary because of cultural backgrounds," it read. "Maybe you like grits, country music and auto racing. Another guy digs fried chicken, soul music and boxing."

Officers on most bases, while saying that they are alert for trouble, maintain that it is often difficult to distinguish between a racial incident and an ordinary fight. According to Col. J. J. Kelly, provost marshal at Camp Pendleton, people tend to see racial overtones now whenever a black Marine slugs a white Marine. There have been 145 assaults at Pendleton in the last seven months and, in the last two months, increasing reports of groups ganging up on single Marines. Kelly believes these attacks "are not necessarily racial."

Several weeks ago, however, seven black Marines were arrested in Oceanside as suspects in a series of muggings and armed robberies. Their victims were primarily fellow —but white—Marines. Kelly has instructed his military policemen to disperse large crowds, particularly in the area of off-duty clubs. "If we get word of a problem area, we increase our patrols in that area." One Marine at Pendleton said anyone in his unit returning after an 11 P.M. curfew is escorted to his barracks by MPs. The measure, he said, was designed to stop fights between blacks and whites.

On-base jails, brigs and stockades have been the scenes of racial trouble. In January, twenty-six men were injured in a fight between Negro and white prisoners at Camp Pendleton. Fort Ord had a similar outbreak about a year ago. This particular problem seems to have diminished recently, at least on West Coast bases.

A prison officer at Fort Ord said there had been no racial violence in the last eight months, but that some organizing was evident in the stockade. The Negroes, he noted, are a rather cohesive group. "There have been some reports that they have required some Caucasians to do services for them." One white prisoner complained to him: "The brothers make me shine their shoes." He also said that black prisoners often team up with Mexican-Americans. When the authorities notice such cliques, they usually shift the men around.

Off base, in any military area, there have always been barroom fights, but it now appears that these are becoming racially oriented. One white Camp Pendleton Marine believes a lot could also happen on the base. "I just got in from Las Pulgas at the enlisted club," he said. "They almost had a race riot. Something started a fight in the club and I saw ten or eleven colored guys chasing this one white guy. The sentry saw it and just fired a couple of shots in the air. Everybody scattered."

In Seaside, adjacent to Fort Ord, Negroes have staked out a downtown intersection called "The Pit" and made it off limits to whites. Said William Gullett, the city's assistant police chief: "If a white soldier wanders in there, he's apt to find himself in trouble."

Efforts are being made to stifle trouble before it erupts. At Camp Pendleton, T. O. Bartley, a Negro civilian who serves as the base human relations officer, has organized a committee to discuss personal relations, particularly the attitudes of various civilian militant groups, with the officers. "We do have a few Black Panthers on base, and they do talk to other Marines," said Bartley, who served in the Marine Corps more than twenty years ago. "The Negro can communicate easier with them than he can with his own commander.

"There should be more black officers, but we have no control over that. A black private first class hates to talk to a white commander who maybe comes from Alabama."

The Pendleton human relations office is one of the few of its kind in the military. It was opened in 1965 to deal with off-base problems of minority personnel, but recently has turned more and more to on-base grievances.

At Fort Ord, a survey of racial trouble spots is under way. "We're very conscious and aware of the potential," said Col. John J. Pidgeon, chief of staff on the post. "And we're very interested in seeing that such troubles do not arise." At Travis Air Force Base an office to improve communications among airmen has been created and filled by a Negro chief master sergeant, Gladstone Grigsby.

All the bases are particularly concerned about rumors which can, it is felt, be as dangerous as reality. A reporter who spends ten minutes talking to almost any serviceman at any military installation will hear a spate of stories about black men ganging up on whites, and vice versa. There are tales, undocumented, at Camp Pendleton that a Negro Marine was beaten so badly by whites that he had to be given a medical discharge and that a white Marine was held under a scalding shower by blacks. A story making the rounds at Fort Ord has it that about seventy black soldiers have formed a militant organization—provoked mainly by the allegedly unjustified incarceration of brothers in the stockade. L. Howard Bennett, the Defense Department's deputy secretary for civil rights, advocates that each base establish a rumor control center.

Richard Nichols, a 20-year-old black private first class at Fort Ord, perhaps best summarized the total problem: "There are some guys who are sorta militant—both black and white—and then you run into some guys who are O.K. They get along, but it's the feeling on the inside that you don't know."

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The Authoritarian Prescription

WILLIAM D. PHELAN, Jr.
Mr. Phelan, a former staff reporter on The Wall Street Journal, is a regular contributor to the Ripon Forum. He is completing a book on structural change in the American politico-economic system, to be published by Beacon Press.

An examination of basic structural trends in the United States suggests that the disintegration of constitutional democracy is well under way. President Nixon has not initiated these trends and he did not endorse their predictable consequences if he foresaw them. Nonetheless, the campaign plan which his associates are devising for the 1972 election is likely to aggravate the worst tendencies now current and to extinguish prospects for salvaging the situation. To grasp the overall argument at the outset, consider two broad propositions that relate changes in key governmental institutions to regional developments and particularly politics:

(1) In the evolution of America's government since World War I, and most notably since 1960, possibly the most significant trend has been the expansion and politicization of the Department of Defense, the Justice Department (including the FBI and, by extension, the rest of the intelligence and "internal security" apparatus) and the police.

(2) The strategy outlined by Kevin P. Phillips, assistant to Attorney General Mitchell, in his all but official Emerging Republican Majority, is a prescription for an authoritarian coalition. Mr. Phillips' political predictions can, in part, be self-fulfilling because his superiors control the Defense and Justice Departments and have great influence over public opinion. His plan offers much promise as a scheme to create a right-wing Republican dynasty. Socially, though, it is violently unconservative and, if successful, will accomplish the destruction of the American political system.

It is well known that the American defense establishment has expanded enormously during the past thirty years. Less widely recognized, however, is the extent to which the Pentagon has, just since 1960, acquired new functions and enlarged old ones:

The formalization of Pentagon-contractor links in the Defense Industrial Advisory Council (established 1962). More than half of the members are top executives from the fifty largest defense contractors, and they develop close personal ties to high Pentagon officials. Their recommendations can benefit some companies and damage others, and make or break individual reputations within the defense-industrial system. By coordinating the activities of defense industry associations, the council integrates the contractors for matters of common interest. Thus DIAC contributes to strengthening the defense sector relative to other elements of the economy and to the power of the politically most influential corporations relative to the rest.

The centralization of auditing in the Defense Contract Audit Agency (created 1964). The General Accounting Office (GAO) was established by Congress to post-audit all government departments. Some of its reports on Pentagon contracting in the early 1960s were extremely critical. At the time when the DCAA was being formed, the Office of the Secretary of Defense indicated that it would no longer be necessary for the GAO to conduct its traditional audits, because the Defense Department would be doing a more thorough job for itself. To eliminate "waste and duplication," the only effective, independent check on waste, duplication and corruption was weakened.

The integration (in 1961) of intelligence activities in the Defense Intelligence Agency. With the establishment of this agency the Department took an important step toward reducing its dependence on information and related services supplied by the State Department and the CIA. Although some foreign-based observers claim that in many countries the DIA is more important than the CIA, it is extremely difficult to obtain reliable information about the nature and scope of its activities. This year, however, it reportedly has developed an active program of surveillance and infiltration of dissenting political groups.

A substantial augmentation in the size and centralized control of Pentagon public relations activities. To check unattributed expressions of dissent within the department, a directive written in 1962 instructed all Pentagon personnel to report, before the end of each working day, every contact with journalists and the topics discussed. The press office can order department personnel to concur with decisions taken at the top or to decline comment. Subtle use of "inside stories" and access to key publishing executives enable the Defense Department to exert tremendous indirect power on newsmen. Critical reporters have been subjected to FBI investigation and private attacks—including complaints to their employers and to other men influential in the communications industry. Arbitrary classification of material as secret has been used to stifle investigation or the publication of critical reports. Each year, moreover, an enormous volume of material designed to produce a favorable impression of the Defense Department is issued.

Institution of advanced management techniques. The innovations of McNamara, Hitch and Enthoven have undoubtedly increased departmental efficiency. Yet when the largest federal department creates a major "management gap" between itself and the nonmilitary agencies of government, one must beware that it does not override other departments in general policy matters.

Extensive use of computers. The Pentagon has been in the vanguard with respect to applying computers to many aspects of its operations. Most of the nation's computer research and development is funded by the Department of Defense. As with advanced management techniques, innovative superiority in this area should be expected to diminish the influence of other institutions relative to the Department of Defense.

Centralization of much governmental purchasing in the Defense Department. In July 1968, the Department began to assume responsibility for all fuel and petroleum products used by the civil agencies of the federal government. Eventually the Defense Supply Agency will control all government purchasing in this area. An arrangement entered into by the Bureau of the Budget, the General Services Administration and the Defense Department provides for the Defense Commercial Communications Office (formed in 1962) to lease private line circuits to the Federal Aviation Administration. Other agencies have also been encouraged to go through the Defense Department for their telecommunications requirements. Though this has resulted in substantial savings, it has also increased the dependence of nonmilitary divisions of the government upon the Department of Defense. The Defense Commercial Communications Office is a small but striking example of a general tendency: the integration of interdepartmental operations in a structure that bestows hegemonic power on the Pentagon.

The further integration of the universities into the Pentagon research system through such links as the Defense Science Board. Powerful, prestigious professors and administrators serving on the Defense Science Board play a role in the academic community analogous to that of members of DIAC in the business community. Recruitment of professors for full-time Pentagon jobs is more common than it was ten years ago. Graduates of the Defense Department often acquire influential positions at universities. Perhaps the most notable of these is Charles Hitch, formerly dean of McNamara's Whiz Kids, and now President of the University of California. But almost every major university employs a high-level administrator with extensive defense or intelligence agency ties.

The emergence of long-range planning under primarily Defense Department auspices. The military theoretician, Herman Kahn, is a major figure in the new "futurist" movement. He and various other defense intellectuals have played a major role in some of the key research projects that have been initiated in very long-range planning. A generation ago two years was a long time ahead for most corporations and government agencies. At present five-year projections are made routinely in the Pentagon and the executive offices of dynamic corporations. To be termed "long-range" now, planning should involve a projection of eight to ten years. Companies and nation-states that plan skillfully to take advantage of long-term opportunities can achieve major triumphs over their competitors. To the extent that Defense Department goals and technocratic values are dominant among the futurists, however, their research is likely to benefit primarily the military and the leading corporations.

A rapid growth in arms sales abroad. Military exports increased sevenfold between 1960 and 1966; arms are now sold to approximately sixty nations. The rapid expansion in the export of weaponry has facilitated the integration of our military system with that of other countries. Since 1960, at least two significant clashes have occurred between nations using American weapons: the India-Pakistan conflict of 1965 and the Arab-Israeli war of June 1967.

The training and use of regular army units for domestic riot control and the management of political dissent. Beginning in a major way with Detroit and Newark in the summer of 1967, the Defense Department has become involved routinely in the maintenance of "civil" order. Not only did it take a significant part in handling the Pentagon demonstration and the disturbance after Dr. King's assassination; it was also intimately associated with preparations for the Democratic National Convention at Chicago. An Army public relations officer is reported to have stated at a Washington-area seminar that many of the garish and belligerent demonstrators at the Pentagon in November 1967 were agents provocateurs, trained by the military to convey the desired impression of the crowd in the mass media. Even if this particular report is exaggerated, it is clear that the Defense Department has the resources and determination to "adjust" political events to further its own objectives.

During this period when the Pentagon's organizational strength has developed so rapidly, politically motivated contracting has become an increasingly serious problem. In a system that opens only a fraction of contracts to competitive bidding, the best tests of influence peddling are the financial records of politically well-connected companies. From 1960 through 1967 five major corporations (1967 sales above $200 million) among the leading defense contractors increased their annual sales —through internal expansion and government-endorsed mergers—by more than 500 per cent. They were Litton Industries, Ling-Temco-Vought, Gulf & Western, Teledyne, and McDonnell Douglas. The chairman and chief executive officer of Litton is Charles B. Thornton, a member of the Defense Industrial Advisory Council, long-time associate of McNamara, and close friend of President Johnson. The top man at L-T-V is James J. Ling, one of Humphrey's most generous campaign supporters, a business ally of several of Johnson's long-time Dallas backers, and the holder of corporate control over several subsidiaries in whose management Abe Fortas and his former law partners have been particularly active.

Perhaps the most powerful outside director at Gulf & Western is Edwin L. Weisl, Johnson's most loyal ally in New York. Cyrus Vance went to the Defense Department from Weisl's law firm, and Weisl's son got a key post in the Defense Department. The chief executive at Teledyne, Henry G. Singleton, has long associations with both Thornton and Howard Hughes, who has been influential behind the scenes during much of Johnson's career. Teledyne's co-founder and a dominant director is George Kosmetsky, dean of the business school at the University of Texas in Austin. Finally, McDonnell Douglas is well linked to the Missouri branch of the Democratic Party. In addition to ties to Clark Clifford and Stuart Symington, it at one time included among its directors James E. Webb, until recently head of NASA, and a close adviser of both Johnson and the late Senator Kerr of Oklahoma.

The accelerating concentration of corporate power in the economy and the relentless centralization of decision making in the Pentagon make increased reliance on influence peddling almost inevitable. Singleton of Teledyne was a major contributor to Nixon's campaign, and Roy L. Ash, president of Litton, has become one of his key outside advisers.

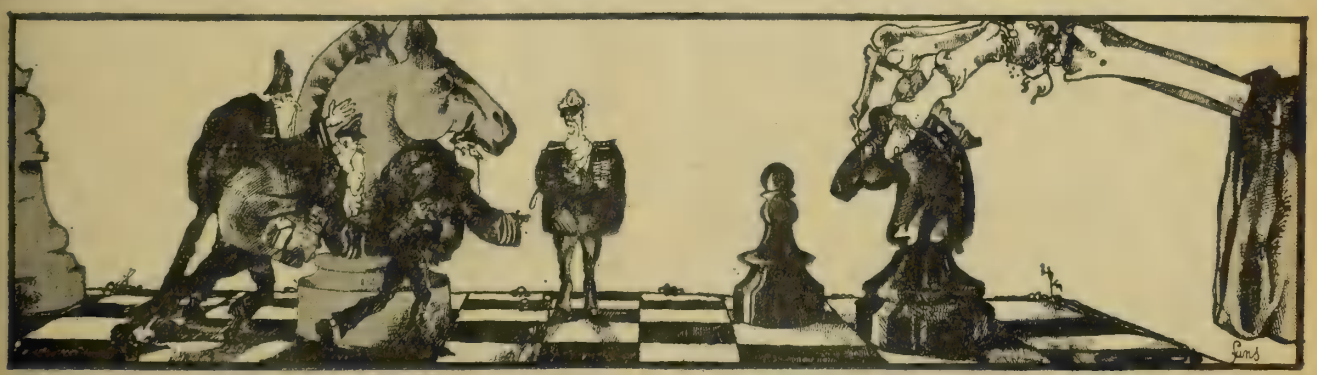
In the last year the mass media have frequently listed the extraordinary number of defense projects that Rep. Mendel Rivers, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has funneled into his Congressional district in South Carolina. Men from the South and Southwest control all four of the major "military-industrial" committees: Rivers, Mahon (House Appropriations), Stennis (Senate Armed Services) and Russell (Senate Appropriations). Moreover, the South and Southwest have great influence in the related areas of atomic energy and space.

Although a taboo apparently attaches to the subject, the most spectacular career in military boondoggling has been that of Lyndon Johnson, who began his political ascent as administrative secretary to Representative Kleberg, the ultraconservative owner of the King Ranch. After a stint as Texas director of the National Youth Administration (a job he got through Sam Rayburn, whom his father had aided when they served together in the Texas legislature), Johnson ran for Congress in 1937. His campaign strategy was to identify himself as closely as possible with FDR. Roosevelt was unpopular with a majority of Texas voters, but in a multi-candidate race Johnson's opponents could be expected to divide the anti-Roosevelt vote. Johnson established himself for all time as a devoted Roosevelt man by loudly supporting the President's most controversial maneuver of the period—the plan to "pack" the Supreme Court. Within six months after Johnson won his House seat (with 28 per cent of the vote), Roosevelt began to prepare for war. Johnson landed a place on the House Naval Affairs Committee and soon secured the first major military construction contract for Brown & Root, his primary financial backers throughout his career.



By the 1950s Johnson was the most powerful and relentless advocate of increased arms spending in Washington. Having advanced to the Senate, he was a member of the Armed Services Committee, chairman of the Preparedness Committee, chairman of the Space Committee and a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee for the Armed Services. Associates of Johnson and Rayburn held key executive positions, especially at Defense, in both the Eisenhower and Kennedy administrations. LBJ intervened repeatedly, on occasion at the highest level, to block investigations and suppress reports of gross mismanagement and possible fraud in connection with various Brown & Root contracts. As Vice President, Johnson helped to secure the huge TFX contract for the General Dynamics plant in Fort Worth. This plane, a disastrous failure in operation, had apparently been rejected unanimously in the prototype stage by technical specialists who favored a Boeing model to be built in the Northwest. Subsequently, Fred Korth, a Fort Worth banker for whom Johnson had secured the post of Secretary of the Navy, was forced to resign for a blatant conflict of interest.

When Johnson entered the White House, the most conspicuous features of his career to date had been his constant drive for higher defense spending and his involvement in an assortment of scandals in which federal funds had been squandered to enrich his associates. These included Project Mohole, the Houston Space Center, the Billie Sol Estes case and Bobby Baker. If effective checks on defense appropriations had been in force, Johnson would have been obliged to stay above suspicion after ascending to the Presidency. The merest hint of abuse would have triggered a Congressional investigation. However, during the last fiscal quarter under a Kennedy budget, Texas ranked eleventh in prime defense contracts; three years later (at the end of fiscal 1967) it ranked second, behind California. Its prime contracts soared 460 per cent in dollar value during a period when the national total increased 55 per cent.

Despite frequent and very severe criticism from the General Accounting Office for past abuses, Brown & Root was a partner in the four-membered consortium that held the major construction contract for Vietnam, a contract that produced costs and accounting irregularities of unprecedented size. Moreover, a close Johnson friend in San Antonio, H. B. Zachry, was awarded an enormous construction contract in Thailand.

During the heyday of the war escalation, major Johnson-related companies in Texas enjoyed appreciations in stock price ranging from 670 per cent to more than 1,500 per cent. The whole Southwest region greatly increased its power lead over other areas of the country. Phoenix and Houston have surged ahead of their Northeastern counterparts in terms of economic and political influence. Other factors beside defense spending have contributed to the change, but federal pump priming has been decisive.

The White House has now fallen into Republican hands, but the Southwestern military-industrial-academic complex is still represented at a high level. (One of its leading members is Deputy Secretary David Packard.) Secretary

Toronto Daily Star

Laird was among the shrewdest and most influential in the Congressional-military alliance. His term at the Pentagon will probably feature a strengthening of the hard-line military faction and the sophisticated use of Defense Department powers for partisan political purposes.

• • •

A man can learn a great deal about a country from studying its Defense and Justice Departments. Among modern Presidents there had developed a tradition of making one's campaign manager—or key political adviser—postmaster general. In that capacity he could keep his hand on the largest patronage spigot in the government. John Kennedy breached the tradition by appointing his campaign manager attorney general. The glowing memoirs of the New Frontier "action-intellectuals" have never adequately explained the General Aniline & Film case, various instances of political surveillance and harassment, and a number of other apparent partisan abuses at the Justice Department during Robert Kennedy's tenure.

Few things could rivet an ambitious politician's mind so completely to the techniques of his adversary as the election Nixon lost to Kennedy. In the foreground of the campaign devised by the JFK organization were magnificent image management and mastery of the media; in the background, ruthless machine politics, a carefully calculated and selective appeal to ethnic conflicts, and the fabrication of a "missile gap." The costly new defense projects passed in Nixon's first year as President are, in a sense, the functional equivalent of the massive, politically tinged military build-up of the first phase of the Kennedy administration.

At the Justice Department Nixon has gone far beyond the Kennedys. With the exception of Richard McLaren in the Antitrust Division, nearly all the key appointments were highly "political." The South and Southwest are represented by four major appointees. Ideologically, the leadership at Justice is far to the right of the GOP Congressional leadership or of any other Executive department except perhaps Commerce. But the most striking feature is the open and forthright espousal of a backlash-oriented electoral strategy. Mitchell, Kleindienst and Phillips make hardly any pretense of legal neutrality or restraint. Their overriding concern appears to be the furtherance of a clearly enunciated scheme for establishing a reactionary political dynasty.

Approximately half of the budget of the Justice Department is handed over to the FBI, where J. Edgar Hoover has reigned since 1924. Over the decades since then Hoover's special interest has been dissent and possible subversion by left-wing individuals and groups. Three factors appear to determine the level of anti-radical and anti-liberal activity possible at the FBI: the amount of general turmoil in the society; the degree of support provided by the attorney general and the President, and the number of actual instances of subversion, sabotage or terrorism.

At the height of the McCarthy era the attorney general was mildly sympathetic to political repression. Social turbulence reached a moderately high level—in response to the "fall of China," the loss of the nuclear monopoly, the Korean War, and economic dislocation. Notably lacking, of course, were public advocates of revolution, let alone terrorists or perpetrators of sabotage.

Today, social conflict has become intense. Nixon has long been keenly interested in and adulatory of the work of the FBI; he is a friend not only of Hoover but also of several of his leading lieutenants. Ensconced in the top posts at the Justice Department, moreover, are the most politically ambitious and repressive men since A. Mitchell Palmer whipped up the hysteria of 1919-20.

At the same time, tens of thousands of people are openly declaring themselves revolutionaries. Unlike the early 1950s recent years have been characterized by a rapid increase in acts of sabotage. Draft offices are ransacked, ROTC buildings dynamited, government facilities fire-bombed. There exists, in short, a demonstrable, if limited, physical threat to the state. Consequently, a justification can be put forward for a wave of massive repression. And the timing and scope of such a move is, at least initially, at the discretion of the political strategists in the Justice Department.

The Justice Department and the FBI represent only a tiny fraction of the nation's law-enforcement personnel, but much evidence of growing power and political sophistication has been gathered concerning local police departments. The Skolnick report to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence refers to "the emergence of the police as a self-conscious independent political power."

The report's description of the crushingly successful campaign by the New York Patrolmen's Benevolent Association against Mayor Lindsay's review board (composed of three policemen and four civilians) is instructive:

> According to a number of accounts policemen campaigned hard while on duty: patrol cars and wagons bore anti-review board signs, police passed out literature, and even harassed persons campaigning on the other side. Many have claimed that at the height of the campaign cars with bumper stickers supporting civilian review were flagrantly ticketed, while an anti-review sticker seemed to make autos almost ticket-proof. Billboards, posters, and ads were heavily exploited, and the campaign was heavily financed by the PBA and private sources. One poster depicted damaged stores and a rubble-strewn street and read: "This is the aftermath of a riot in a city that had a civilian review board." Included in the text was a statement by J. Edgar Hoover that civilian review boards "virtually paralyzed" the police. . . . At the outset, it was the distrust by minority group members of internal police review procedures which caused the demands for civilian review boards; the militant opposition of the police has only heightened this distrust. Thus, as might be anticipated, a cycle of greater polarization has been set in motion.

And yet, among large American cities New York stands out as one in which the police are under the most effective civil and legal control. The situation is far more serious in Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis and Los Angeles—to give just a few geographically diverse examples. In its conclusion on the police, the Skolnick report asserts:

> No government institution appears so deficient in its understanding of the constructive role of dissent in a constitutional democracy as the police. Thus, it should not be surprising that police response to mass protest has resulted in a steady escalation of conflict, hostility, and violence. The police violence during the Democratic National Convention in Chicago was not a unique phenomenon—we have found numerous instances where violence has been initiated or exacerbated by police actions and attitudes. Such police violence is the antithesis of both law and order. It leads only to increased hostility, polarization, and violence—both in the immediate situation and in the future.

Changes in the Department of Defense, in the Justice Department and in the role of the police should not be seen as unrelated developments. Hoover is often described as "the nation's top cop," and federal policy, particularly in the "security" area, is coordinated with that of local police departments. The vast new civil disorder control center at the Pentagon, as well as the growing domestic activities of the DIA, give the Defense Department an entree to the field. As computer systems become refined, a strong impetus toward further integration is almost inevitable. To some extent, the three transformations can also be seen as parallel responses to alterations in the basic economic institutions of the United States.

Surely one of the most insidious sources of instability —because it is so difficult for business and political leaders to recognize—is the corporate system itself. The tremendous expansion of American corporations, both at home and abroad, during the post-1945 period has created severe dislocations. These "problems of success" arise when specifically corporate objectives conflict with fundamental social needs or requirements for preserving stability. Here only the implications of foreign investment will be considered.

Private American investment in foreign countries has increased more than sixfold in the past twenty years. Subsidiaries and branch offices of major U.S. corporations and banks have become prominent in the economies of dozens of nations. In some of these countries tiny oligarchies control most of the wealth and most of the political power. Since the leading families own and direct the principal enterprises of such nations, American businessmen naturally develop contacts and friendships almost exclusively with them.

Besides the sharp increase in dollar value, foreign economic ventures during the last twenty years have been characterized both by a much greater involvement of the largest corporations and by a much broader geographic range than prevailed before 1950. The overseas ventures have thus become far more significant in the American political-economic system as a whole. Moreover, since the mid-1930s, special economic interests have become more closely linked to the new (or expanded) departments, agencies and commissions developed in the New Deal era. The internationalist investment banker and the Washington lawyer are classic types of "in-and-outers," who translate the power of leading economic interest groups into effective influence over policy making in the areas vital to these groups.

American intervention in the Dominican Republic is a good example. Especially since the end of trade with Cuba, the East Coast sugar refiners have been potentially vulnerable to social disorder or political change in the Dominican Republic. Government bureaucrats can therefore be expected to take the interests of American investors into account when formulating policy. But what was most striking during the crisis in the spring of 1965 was the extent to which men with direct personal interests in sugar (or with close ties to the industry) dominated the decision-making process. Of the dozen or so Americans who played leading roles as advisers and emissaries, nine had obvious private commitments to the sugar industry. Five were key figures throughout the crisis: Ellsworth Bunker, Abe Fortas, A. A. Berle, Cyrus Vance and Edwin Weisl.

These men furnished the President with information and represented the United States at meetings with Dominican officials. Structurally, this was a "rational" outgrowth of the strength and organizational needs of a specific set of corporations. Analogous instances of highly integrated special interest policy making could be cited in the relations between the United States and other foreign countries.

Endorsement of corrupt, repressive, oligarchic regimes need not be destabilizing as long as one can count on the docility of the masses or the effective suppression of dissidents. (If Diem's brutal authoritarianism had been politically successful, the United States would not have been led to intervene with its own troops.) But in Guatemala, the Philippines and various other countries, Left-nationalist insurgent groups are organizing. Frustrated expectations of rapid economic advance after a period of some improvement are one cause of unrest. Much broader familiarity with "Western" consumption standards is another.

Many potential new leaders show growing sophistication concerning the inequitable operations of the world commodity market and some of the disadvantages of American investment. Their hostility to the United States because of the devastation wrought in Vietnam is often intense. Increasing corruption and repression in the political regimes of various American allies, is, of course, an immediate and direct cause of discontent.

It is reassuring to believe that the American Government has learned valuable lessons from Vietnam. One must then ask whether current policy toward Greece, Thailand and Brazil reflects a basic change of approach. About a dozen regimes to which the United States has heavily committed itself are likely targets for significant internal Left-nationalist insurgencies in the next five years. Unless American foreign policy changes substantially, "one, two, many Vietnams" probably await us in the 1970s.

In recent years we have witnessed the "radicalization" and subsequent recall of American priests and nuns assigned to Guatemala. Revolutionary militancy has gradually developed in the American Negro population, and a broader range of people has become sensitive about South Africa (recently, the Episcopal Church withdrew its funds from banks furnishing credit to South Africa). United States-based research groups such as the North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA) have been conducting detailed studies from a radical perspective on the effects of American corporate involvement south of the border. And at San Francisco State College one major insurgent faction called itself the Third World Liberation Front.

Improved communications insure that people in the rest of the world—practically anyone who lives in a village that can afford a transistor radio—are quickly informed of developments within the United States. In this context we must consider the possibility, not that schemes devised in Third World countries determine what happens in the United States but, rather, that events in this country may eventually promote insurgencies elsewhere. In addition, further military intervention and damaging investment practices in Third World countries will gravely exacerbate American domestic conflicts. And then, an erosion of the position of the disadvantaged here will almost surely have foreign policy repercussions.

Ultimately, what is most disturbing about the Phillips strategy for achieving Republican hegemony through an anti-activist, anti-black, anti-urban, anti-Northeast coalition is the political pay-off provided by socially disastrous policies. His book does not display enough sociological insight into the consequences of his tactics to warrant charging Phillips with a totally cynical obsession with power. But consider how several controversial policies of the Nixon era fit into the strategy:

A high level of numerous expensive, counter-productive defense projects. These have four major political functions: (1) They increase the influence of the Pentagon relative to "liberal" departments like Health, Education and Welfare. (2) Given the disproportionate concentration of defense business in the South and Southwest, they provide continued impetus to rapid expansion in the regions Phillips wants to make a mainstay of the Republican coalition. (3) The highly political nature of defense contract awards enables an administration to reward its corporate and Congressional friends and to teach its foes a lesson. (4) New contracts maintain or increase the size of the defense-industry work force, a particularly promising component of an authoritarian Republican coalition.

A series of actions provocative to the black community. Almost every major black leader has been alienated by the present Administration and discontent is growing among apolitical Negroes as well as among militants. The cold, relentless advocate of the Phillips strategy must welcome the prospect of intensified conflict and violence. It promotes backlash and the substitution of scapegoating racism for rational political action—especially among key low-income white groups.

Anti-drug crackdowns concentrating on sellers and users of marijuana—at least in actual application by local police—and featuring no-knock predawn raids on college dormitories. Students know that the scientific case for the harmfulness of alcohol and tobacco is more solid than it is for that of pot. The occasional user or friend of occasional users is apt to regard predawn raids and harsh jail sentences as outrageous. For some individuals, moreover, higher prices for marijuana will make methedrine and heroin more attractive. While marijuana typically induces passivity and placidity, methedrine is associated with violent outbursts and heroin, of course, with a high crime rate.

But Phillips correctly notes that the under-25 segment of the population casts only a tiny proportion of the total vote. The young are more useful as stimulators of backlash. And more "crime" means more interest in "law and order," and a bigger swing to the emerging Phillips coalition.

Though Phillips presumably does not intend to make explicit recommendations to promote social conflict and crime, his strategy offers political justification for policies that will aggravate social problems. Those who criticize the Nixon Administration for doing nothing must evoke a smile from the sublimely confident Phillips. When the name of the game is reaction, all you need do at the beginning is make sure your opponents are given enough rope—the hanging can come later.

Rarely, one suspects, has the danger to liberty and political stability been so obvious. Many societies have collapsed or degenerated in response to unpredictable events, and in retrospect, one can often see why the citizens and leaders were caught off guard. In the case of the United States, however, the destruction of the political system is proceeding in an evident, easily understandable fashion. Skeptics who are fundamentally optimistic should struggle with the following questions: What commitments to corrupt, oligarchical governments have been eliminated in the past few years? What significant Pentagon projects have been rejected by Congress? Have there been any close votes in that area since the ABM? Has there been effective national protest against the electronic surveillance of people like Martin Luther King, Jr., or against the indiscriminate use of potentially lethal "super gas" (CS) and shotguns in Berkeley? Have responsible dissenters been able to dissuade left-wing adventurers from acts that promote the realization of the Phillips plan?

With each passing year, if the fundamental trends continue, less will be needed to initiate the final transformation. The new political system would not be fascism but rather military authoritarianism. The economy would be completely dominated by huge international, multi-industry, defense contracting corporations with secure connections at the Pentagon. The political regime would be maintained, not by the general consent of the governed but by a highly integrated FBI-CIA-defense agency-police system relying increasingly on the manipulation of public opinion, surveillance and coercion.

In an era of widespread international upheaval the key role of the military and of defense conglomerates in the new political order would almost guarantee a series of ruinous foreign adventures. Given the vulnerability of the total environment, it is doubtful that man could survive expansionist authoritarianism in the United States.

In one sense, Vietnam and America's urban and racial problems have received too much emphasis. After all, the United States has been involved in other unpopular and morally opprobrious wars. And slavery was worse than the present lot of black people. For this reason many academic liberals regard the widespread concern about military atrocities and racial injustice as a sign of marked improvement over previous historical periods.

But such fixation on personalities, events and issues tends to blind Americans to structural change and trends. The defense complex and the internal security apparatus are not conservative but rather a radical departure from American constitutional traditions. At present the fundamental problem in the United States is the grave institutional threat to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Every 18th-century American patriot would recognize what that threat is called. The word the founding fathers used was "tyranny." No more urgent task can enlist the modern dissenter than the breaking down of conventional ideas about "conservatism" and "the defense of the status quo." Before conservatives fully acquiesce in the new order, they should be shown how radically "un-American" it will be.

DEBTORS' POWER

DEFENSE AGAINST GOUGING

JEAN CARPER

Miss Carper is co-author with Sen. Warren G. Magnuson of a syndicated newspaper column on consumer protection and of a book on consumer problems, The Dark Side of the Marketplace (Prentice-Hall).

Low-income consumers in Philadelphia—at least some of them—are tired of being cheated. Organized as the Consumers Education and Protective Association (CEPA), they have taken to defending themselves against exploitation, primarily by exercising their constitutional right to picket, a tactic which Philadelphia's Better Business Bureau vice president, William A. Peterson, terms "not the American way of doing things."

Traditionally, it is true, the "American way" has been for businessmen to organize against the thieves in their midst and to prevent "unfair" competitors from siphoning off their business. That is the essential preoccupation of the Better Business Bureau, although most people think its aim is to protect the public. At the same time, the "American way" for consumers has been to sit quietly, hopeless and unorganized, and let the unscrupulous businessmen get on with their games. Or to organize into innocuous little groups of Midwestern ladies who sip tea and grouse over the lack of information on package labels in supermarkets. Or for individual consumers one by one to bring their grievances to the courts where the laws are so rigged against consumers that not even the most sympathetic judge can grant much redress.

But to organize consumers into a really effective power is indeed unprecedented, and there is no denying that CEPA, formed three and a half years ago, is effective. Without CEPA many helpless ghetto residents would have had their houses and possessions sold at public auctions to satisfy fraudulent debts in the notorious "sheriff's sales" of Pennsylvania.

One such couple is Mr. and Mrs. John Gallman, elderly and black. In 1963 a fast-talking salesman persuaded them to sign a contract for $650 to have their 14-foot-wide row house painted, tuck pointed and striped, a job worth perhaps $200. They also unknowingly signed a blank note which was later filled in for $1,632. Doggedly they paid off this ridiculous debt at $33.98 per month, until Mr. Gallman became ill and unable to work. Then the finance company closed in, although the Gallmans were only $67 delinquent, having paid $1,427.16 of the debt. The company's lawyer executed a writ of judgment on their furniture; their contract had included a "confession of judgment" clause which means that foreclosure is automatic at the note holder's whim, without court review.

The Gallmans were understandably reluctant to have their furniture, accumulated during thirty years of marriage, sold at public auction. So when the sheriff's deputies arrived to conduct the sale, the Gallmans refused to let them in. The police broke down the door, at which point Mrs. Gallman, a frail woman in her 60s, became hysterical and tried to defend her property with a barbecue fork. She was hurt in an ensuing scuffle and sent to a hospital. In the meantime, the sale was conducted and the furniture, valued at $2,347, was sold for $90 to the vice president of the finance company that had ordered the auction. In addition, Mrs. Gallman was charged with assaulting a policeman.

In the past, this would have been just one more case of consumer victimization of the sort quietly recorded almost daily in the courthouse records of Philadelphia. But it was brought to CEPA's attention and the organization collected thousands of signatures on petitions protesting the furniture auction and the assault charge. CEPA delegations visited the district attorney, asking that the charge against Mrs. Gallman be dropped. It was.

CEPA then turned its attention to the contractor who had charged the Gallmans the exorbitant price for a skimpy home-repair job. Daily, for about three weeks in freezing weather, pickets walked in front of the contractor's place of business until he agreed to lower the price to $962 and give the Gallmans a refund. CEPA pickets then moved to the Mid-Penn Discount Corporation, the finance company which had ordered the sale of the furniture. After one day of picketing its president was persuaded to return the Gallmans' furniture. "Although we had a legal right to do what we did," he said, "nevertheless as a sign of our regret over what happened to Mr. and Mrs. Gallman and to restore the good will our company has always had with the community, we will replace the furniture."

To grasp the extent of the gouging of low-income consumers in Philadelphia one must read the monthly newspaper, Consumers Voice, put out by CEPA. It carries a running commentary on consumer exploitation, with names and photographs of victims and accounts of CEPA's victories and occasional defeats. Similar exploitation of the poor occurs in other major cities, but Philadelphia is somewhat unusual, because of state laws. Garnishment is forbidden in Pennsylvania; thus, instead of attaching wages to satisfy debts, creditors attach property. This, coupled with the widely used "confession of judgment" clause, which prevents a debtor from having his day in court, produces a situation that almost invites exploitation. A consumer with a legitimate grievance is almost totally deprived of legal redress. It usually costs more to sue than the debt is worth, and the laws of Pennsylvania are stacked against the consumer. Thus lawyers are reluctant to take such cases on a contingency basis. Even a man with money to hire an attorney finds it difficult to get justice in consumer matters. For the poor and black, it is impossible. If they are to be assisted at all, it must be by organized pressure. Here follow some examples:

A young black man bought a new car, paid $1,313 on it and was completely current in his payments. Yet the bank repossessed it because, according to a bank official, they didn't like the new neighborhood in which the owner was working. Such repossession "at will," and in the absence of any default in payment, is perfectly legal, although it is obviously an arbitrary and discriminatory practice. CEPA picketing managed to get the man's car back.

Another man nearly lost his house and furniture over a $10 balance at a furniture store. Because he had not paid it promptly, he arrived home one night to find that the sheriff's deputies had broken in and sold $1,200 worth of furniture to satisfy the debt. Since some of the furniture was unpaid for and was being financed by the First Pennsylvania Bank, the bank, catching wind that it had been sold, then proceeded to put the man's house up for sale to pay them for the furniture that had already been confiscated by the sheriff. The sale was stopped after CEPA protested.

A third black family, Mr. and Mrs. Abram Simmons, who had been making mortgage payments for eleven years, fell behind when Mr. Simmons' work became unsteady. By borrowing from friends and cutting down on food, they scraped together enough money for the payments, but were short the extra attorney's fees incurred by their tardiness. Hoping to catch up, they sent a money order for $81.60 but still owed $91.19 in attorney's fees. The bank sent the money order back with the astounding note: "The sum is neither timely nor sufficient to stay the Sheriff's Sale. Your property was sold at sale held on October 7." A few days later the Simmonses got a seventy-two-hour eviction notice, telling them that if they were not out by the deadline, they and their six children would be "forcibly ejected by the Sheriff without further notice."

CEPA set up emergency pickets in front of the savings and loan company that had ordered the sale, and news of the injustice spread so widely that the person who had purchased the house refused to keep it and offered to sell it back to the Simmonses for the price paid. Another Philadelphia resident was so indignant that, learning the Simmonses would still need $600 in costs to get the house back, he agreed to pay them.

It cannot be said that the Philadelphia business community has taken gracefully CEPA's blunt demands and direct action, but it is learning that the group must be reckoned with. When CEPA first organized in 1966, its opening move, when it heard of an injustice, was to send a delegation to the business and ask for correction. CEPA found most businessmen were unreceptive. Some refused to see the delegations; others arrogantly shrugged off their pleas and demands with comments like: "The only thing that will stop that sale is money." The officers of the downtown banks of Philadelphia, financing some of the schemes that were wracking the ghetto neighborhood, surveyed this bunch of neighborhood men and women entering their lobby with unconcealed disdain. "Legally, we're in the right you know," they argued. "Take it up with our lawyers." (Banks and finance companies under law in all but four states do enjoy a virtually impregnable status; they are protected by the "holder in due course" legal doctrine, meaning that if they finance a scheme which bilks thousands of persons, they can still collect their money.)

Finding that businessmen were determined to stick by their legal guns, whatever the moral issue or the pain inflicted, CEPA turned to picketing. The first such demonstration was on Memorial Day, 1966. Some businessmen tried to laugh off the pickets; others called the police. Two companies succeeded in getting court injunctions against CEPA's picketing in 1967, but the injunctions were subsequently lifted. Defending CEPA, John O. Honnold, professor of law at the University of Pennsylvania, argued that picketing is an exercise of free speech, fully protected by state and federal constitutional guarantees. The judge agreed and added he could see nothing wrong with using economic pressure outside the courts, and in fact, that consumers might otherwise be powerless.

Learning that CEPA does have power because it can arouse public indignation against sharp credit practices, many businesses now receive CEPA delegates with respect. According to Max Weiner, founder of and driving force behind CEPA, although he bears the modest title of educational director: "All we have to do now, for example, with the First Pennsylvania Bank is to call them and we get an immediate appointment. There was the time they didn't think much of our group. But we picketed them three times and that made it clear we meant business."

CEPA's success can be attributed largely to the thorough and orderly preparation it makes. CEPA has been called militant, but that is not an accurate term, if one has violent confrontation in mind. There is no shouting, no pushing people around, no sit-ins, no fights with the police. For the most part, the pickets are Negro men and women who, before CEPA came along, were afraid even to phone a finance company or business to complain of being cheated.

Arrangements with the police department are carefully worked out before every picketing to make sure that protection will be on hand if there should be trouble. Businessmen, new to CEPA's methods, are often taken aback to discover that a quick call to the usually dependable arm of the law does not stop the picketing. Says Weiner: "Their first reaction when they see our pickets is to come out and say 'don't bother with the picketing; we'll get the cops and chase you away.' . . . But when carloads of police do drive up, talk to us and then go away, the merchant sees his defense, his shield, crumble away. We are not seeking confrontation on the picket line. We are not doing anything to make possible police intervention, such as keeping people off the street, etc. We are simply engaging in a constitutionally protected power and it is a terrific power when exerted."

The typical procedure is to set up at the place of business a sound truck from which Weiner or another member of CEPA explains the grievance and what the pickets are asking. The pickets, of which there are often no more than five or six, hand out leaflets. CEPA has found that usually only a few pickets are needed and that passers-by often take up the cause. Many Philadelphians have stormed into the offending store or written angry letters to finance companies and banks.

Strangely enough, CEPA was founded by a man who was once on the other side of the fence. Formerly a real estate developer who lost nearly everything in a 1962 flood, Weiner then joined a real estate agency where his job was to help refinance their mortgages. He was soon struck by the fact that a lot of this refinancing had to be done because the people were being mercilessly swindled. He saw the need for a consumer organization and was able to rally a few people to the cause, mostly on the ground, which is still the core of CEPA, that "if you help your neighbor recover his money or save his property, he will help you save yours when the time comes." It is not easy to keep people permanently in CEPA; once the problem that brought them in is solved they often have a tendency to drift away. However, CEPA has a strong nucleus of regulars, a membership of 4,000, some active, some inactive (everyone who registers a complaint for which he needs help is asked to become a member if he can afford the $2 fee), and seven branches around the Philadelphia area. Activity has stepped up as the organization has grown. CEPA members now walk picket lines on the average of three times a week.

CEPA is also expanding by trying to grow from a local to a national organization, and by taking up the consumer cause on broader issues. It has established a foundation through which it hopes to get grants to establish training centers for consumer leaders in other cities. These, it is hoped, would then become permanent organizations. In addition, CEPA International, a non-profit group, grants charters to others wanting to set up CEPA chapters. (Amazingly, CEPA operated on a budget of only $18,000 during 1968, counting salaries, overhead and publication of Consumers Voice. The income came from membership dues, contributions and the sale of Consumers Voice.)*

Branching out from the redress of individual grievances, CEPA envisions consumer picketing on a mass scale against a whole spectrum of consumer injustices. For example, it plans to picket the Philadelphia auto show against higher auto prices. "Imagine what would happen if people all over the country did that!" says Weiner in support of his concept of a nationwide CEPA. "We really could have an effect." He deplores the lack of real grass-roots consumer power. "The FDA comes out and says they can't protect the purity of our food in a recent report. Consumers should be up in arms over that. They should hit the streets all over the country in protest, bringing the issue to a living reality. The only way that will happen is through a national organization."

CEPA has picketed the district attorney's office to urge stiffer action against firms engaging in fraud ("We want to make these con criminals just as guilty as those who commit crimes in the street," says Weiner) and has demanded that the city council launch an investigation of fraud and exploitation among the poor in the city. The council did pass such a resolution nearly three years ago, but no action has been taken. Finally, CEPA in 1967 launched a consumers political party and collected enough signatures to get on the ballot, running candidates for city council and mayor. They got 6,675 votes. The Consumer Party is back on the ballot this year, with candidates for city controller and district attorney. Winning seems beyond hope, but CEPA would be happy if its candidates won at least 5 per cent of the votes, which would establish the party as permanent and assure its automatic inclusion on the ballot.

But whatever the results in an election, CEPA has undeniably brought consumer issues to the fore in Philadelphia, and Weiner feels that, just by running, CEPA is accomplishing its aims. The Democratic and Republican candidates for district attorney have been vying with each other during the campaign to emphasize their support of consumers. David Berger, the Democrat, running against Arlen Specter, the incumbent Republican, announced a consumer protection legislative reform program, including abolition of the hated confession of judgment clause.

The consumer movement, if there is such a thing, has never been known for its toughness or effectiveness. But when, after hundreds of years of apathy and disorganization, shy, middle-aged ladies, Negro at that, from the ghettos of North Philadelphia, have taken it upon themselves to walk up to the vice presidents of banks and demand an end to the gouging, no one can know what is in store. Consumers everywhere just might get fed up, and start asserting themselves.

* A booklet on the history of CEPA and its activities, written in response to the many inquiries for organizational advice, can be obtained from Consumers Education and Protective Association, 6048 Ogontz Ave., Philadelphia, Pa., 19141. $3.

Tokyo: Choreography of Protest

ANGELA CARTER

Miss Carter is an English novelist. Her latest work, Several Perceptions, won the Somerset Maugham Award for 1969, which enabled her to make her present trip to the United States and Japan.

Tokyo

I neither speak nor read a word of Japanese so my experience of this country is lacking a dimension, and often it is like seeing reflections in a mirror. The following is an account of what I saw, as far as I can tell, about four o'clock one Monday afternoon in September at Waseda University, Tokyo.

On that day of gray skies and gentle rain, the campus had the air of a place often under attack—broken windows, barricades, etc.—though the atmosphere of seige warfare was negated by the flow of everyday university life about and around the battered buildings. In the plaza at the heart of the campus, the statue of a benign academic in cap and gown seemed to preside over a meeting addressed by a young man with a loud-speaker. The walls were painted with slogans and hung with banners, all in Japanese, most colored red. The roofs were filled with students, who shielded themselves from the rain with umbrellas as they surveyed the scene below. There was not the slightest tension, although the distant sound of police sirens and mass chanting could be heard from different directions.

The street beyond the campus was lined with willows, and the beautiful young people walking under their umbrellas between the trailing boughs seemed to have stepped out of a Renoir. Some children in baseball suits ran across the road, throwing a ball into the air, and a schoolboy in the Maxim Gorki jacket and cap which is the uniform of Japanese schoolboys went past carrying a loaf of bread, probably home to his mother.

In the midst of this harmonious urban pastoral, and without at all disturbing it, the police climbed out of a number of gray buses and assembled in ranks. They wore blue rainproof suits which may or may not have been padded like samurai armor, but which gave their bodies a Michelin-man outline. They carried shields of curved steel which protected their bodies from ankle to neck, and wore helmets with plastic visors. They all carried staves and some held glowing objects on the end of sticks which I guessed to be gas bombs. There was no rancor in their demeanor; they looked busy and happy. Passers-by moved around the police and their armored car with neither fear nor curiosity.

The crowd of spectators—spectators as opposed to uninvolved passers-by, that is—had, however, begun to thicken and now included one or two radicals, who wore steel helmets and had wrapped wet towels around the lower part of their faces. A stand selling those freshly cooked tidbits which the Japanese snack upon continually did a steady trade on the corner opposite the campus wall. It continued to sell, and had customers to buy and eat, during all the succeeding events. One of its customers was a photographer in a visored crash helmet painted with the insignia of a Japanese newspaper who carried a small ladder around with him as he followed the drifting crowd.

If the crowd drifted, it did so in no unorganized manner, but more like those movements of pigeons from roof to roof which operate by some unguessable collective logic which the onlooker perceives but finally finds wholly mysterious. This body of students, a participant in the riot, functioned rather as a well-ordered entity than a crowd, a word that implies confusion. There was no confusion. The chief protagonists —the police and the student band soon to appear—were also single entities and performed as choreographically as a ballet and with only a little less grace.

However, one requires some word other than "riot" (which implies disorder), or "demonstration" (which implies passion) to describe this confrontation; perhaps there is such a word in the Japanese language. The appearance of the events was that of a hieratic dance, as ritually stylized as the Kabuki drama, and the impression was enforced by the medieval accouterments of the combatants on both sides. When the crowd had assembled in the campus and on the street, and as soon as the traffic was cordoned off, the chanting procession of militants made its way out of the university. I could still detect no tension.

The procession moved in an articulated fashion like a curious, segmented worm. The militants all wore crash helmets painted with slogans, and they advanced, heads down, at a jog trot. Each segment of the worm held a rope which went all round the group like a railing. The procession advanced down the street in a series of curves, still chanting; it circled a road island crowned with spiky palm trees, and finally approached the police, who stood behind their shields at the intersection. Above the procession waved red flags, black flags and some red and black flags, indicating the presence of Maoists, Trotskyists and anarchists of various denominations. The rhythmical chanting continued. The militants looked good-humored but a little bored, as if performing a drab chore. After it had feinted toward the police, the procession turned back into the campus; the crowd under its umbrellas drifted into a new formation to leave the way clear.

Now the massed police moved forward—an impressive spectacle which the background presence of the armored car did not render less archaic, for it could have been one of Hannibal's elephants. The nets they now produced looked more like flags and the globes on their sticks glowed a fluorescent pink. The crowd greeted them with a scattered hail of stones and some jeering, but, well-rehearsed as it was in its role of crowd, it did nothing to keep the chief protagonists apart. The chanting grew in volume. I saw the police sweep up into the campus, though the car stayed in the street. In a few moments, the police came back toward the street, dragging several students with them. There was more jeering, catcalls, cheering and chanting. The police now retreated to the intersection and, after a decent interval, the procession of militants made another, but smaller sally, not venturing so far out of the campus. It was still raining, and the air was sweet with the odor of tear gas. The girl at the snack stand continued to cook and sell. In a sidewalk café which the the procession had passed, a group of students played with yo-yos and the radio emitted Pop music. It was tea time; the waitress served free cups of green tea and I took one. This café was in a basement, so the police may have passed overhead again, I don't know. When I left the café, the streets were quiet and busy; members of the staff were making their way home through the campus and students were leaving class.

On the wall of a building was a poster advertising a film identifiable by its imagery as a documentary about the student riots in Paris. The scenes were those of the bloodstained upon the barricades, the sons of liberty —Delacroix images of the revolutionary in a Western culture that is conditioned to the existence of polarities, such as good and evil, capitalism and socialism, the status quo and the revolution, etc. Perhaps Japan's culture does not acknowledge, or perhaps even contain, such opposites. The Japan Times for September 23 said, in its account of troubles at Kyoto University in Kansai:

"The students appeared on the penthouse in a single column and started to sing the Internationale at 9 A.M., hoisting the banners of several Zengakuren factions. [See "Japan 1970: Year of Upheaval" by Jeffrey P. Freed, The Nation, October 13.] This was their way of signifying surrender, police said."

I was told later that confrontations between the radical students who occupy several Waseda University buildings and the police take place perhaps twice a week and have been doing so for almost a year.

INFORMERS (Continued from page 461)

closed at the trial of the "Conspiracy 8," where revisions of constitutional law are being proclaimed daily from the bench. It appears that beginning in March 1968, one Carl Gilman in the course of his job as a cameraman-reporter for television station KEMB in San Diego observed activities which he "considered to be a threat to the security" of the United States. He reported what he had seen or heard to the FBI and immediately was hired as a paid informer at $150 a month and expenses. He now had two jobs which he carried on concurrently. He was always paid in cash by an FBI agent.

Testifying in Judge Julius J. Hoffman's court, where the "Conspiracy 8" are now on trial, Gilman would give no details of his spying, except in the case of David Dellinger, the most prominent of the defendants. On July 25, 1968, at San Diego State College, Gilman was on hand to report a meeting at which Dellinger spoke. He testified that Dellinger told the audience to "burn your draft cards, resist the draft, violate the laws, go to jail, disrupt the United States in any way you can to end this insane war [in Vietnam]." The defense objected on the ground that a public speech could not be adduced to prove the existence of a criminal conspiracy. Judge Hoffman overruled the objection.

Whatever the outcome of the Chicago trial, Mr. Gilman has something to answer for. If the day ever comes when reporters and cameramen, whether working for the printed or the electronic media, get the reputation of moonlighting for Red squads and the FBI, their professions will have been dealt a staggering blow. People who are asked to pose for pictures in connection with a news event will wonder whether that is the actual purpose, or whether it is a mug shot to go into the files of the FBI. And when a reporter comes to a meeting or news conference, how will those in charge know whether he is there as a reporter or as a spy?

Later, another professional informer took the stand: Louis Salzberg, a news photographer, formerly employed by El Tiempo. He has been on the FBI payroll since 1967 as an infiltrator and spy. If Gilman and Salzberg are members of any guilds or trade unions, there should be an immediate inquiry into their status.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Tradition and Some Individual Talents

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE MAN OF LETTERS. By John Gross. The Macmillan Co. 322 pp. $8.95.

DONALD FANGER

Mr. Fanger, author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press), teaches Russian and comparative literature at Harvard.

Histories of literature, like histories of criticism and journalism, are made to be consulted but not read. This book, being a little of each, fits none of the patterns and is delightfully readable. No less than Leslie Stephen, to whom he applies the phrase, Mr. Gross practices a style that "represents in itself a notable mastery of experience." He is vigorously intelligent, broadly informed, complexly curious, and humane without excessive moisture.

His key term is intentionally and usefully vague. "Man of letters," as he notes at the outset, has gone through a series of meanings—first scholar, then author, then critic (often as author manqué)—only to drop out of usage after World War I, its functions to be parceled out in our own time among "academic experts, mass media pundits, cultural functionaries." The age that could find the term useful and even honorific—specifically, the century or so during which it continued to evolve—may thus be seen as an entity. So the investigation of the changing guises of the man of letters thus becomes, on Mr. Gross's showing, an index of the role and importance of literature in English life since 1800.

It is a vanished age he treats, characterized by a particular set of attitudes toward books and words and culture. The Everyman Library was hardly its chief or sole representative; still, the aura of its original decorations and mottoes ("Precious life blood of a master spirit . . . holdeth children from play . . . unacknowledged legislators . . . for that they come home to men's business and bosoms") is that of the man of letters himself, and may suggest in its remoteness how fast and how far we have moved.

Cyril Connolly (in Enemies of Promise, a book less unlike the present one than might appear at first glance) claimed Addison as the first man of letters, on the basis of the style he developed for the entertainment of the middle classes, with its "gentle irony, gentle melancholy, and gentle inanity." If Mr. Gross does not go back beyond the 19th century, it is because he is not so exclusively concerned with style. His subject is less literature than literary culture as it burgeoned after the founding of the Edinburgh Review in 1802, inaugurating an age when writing about literature attracted the widest audience and engaged an unprecedented number of talents, for whom an unprecedented number of outlets came into being. And the motley group of men he presents are there either because they were molders of educated opinion, or reflectors of it, like Francis Jeffrey of the Edinburgh, brilliantly exhibited as a man who brought new dignity to the whole notion of an editor—and at the same time as "a classic instance of the critic who comes unstuck through trying to play safe."

Familiar and half-familiar names jostle one another in Gross's gallery—Carlyle, Thackeray, Hazlitt, Arnold, Lewes, Lockhart, Bagehot, Stephen, Bennett, Gosse, Squire, Saintsbury, Raleigh, Orage, Eliot, Leavis—along with oddities like the Rev. George Gilfillan, author of the poem "Night" (in nine books), champion of the "Spasmodic" poets, tireless annotator of the British poets (in 48 volumes), and author of the best-selling Bards of the Bible. Gilfillan finds his place here not because of his quaintness but because of what his popularity recalls: that he represented a considerable audience "which still tended to think of poetry chiefly as an adjunct of religion, which frowned on fiction, and which in the not very distant past had been opposed to the idea of secular literature altogether."

The audience is the point. But, aside from unearthing circulation figures, there is little in the way of frontal attack that the investigator of a reading public can manage; he must, like Gross, by indirection find direction out. So, characteristically, after being invited to see Gilfillan as "the MacGonigall of criticism," any page of whose work, "opened at random, will yield its crop of absurdities," we come to the other side: "And yet if he was a preposterous figure, he was not exactly a contemptible one. He throbbed with the libertarian idealism of the Mazzini-Kossuth epoch (in America he would surely have found his niche as an Abolitionist), and refused to be intimidated by great names when his beliefs were at stake."

The same approach is applied to most of the figures here scrutinized, major as well as minor. Limitations of mind and character are trenchantly noted, but so are the particular skills and achievements that accompanied them. Different perspectives are frequently tried on the same figure, not out of uncertainty but in the interest of fairness and wholeness. A case in point is the resolutely non-academic treatment of Arnold Bennett, whose critical articles seldom find a place in the surveys written for college students. "And perhaps there is nothing very much to say about them, except to record that they have impact, more impact than a lot of the things which do get mentioned. Abrupt enthusiasm, the unconsidered opinion, the conversational zig-zag: these are what open readers' minds to books, at least as often as the formal critique." By the same token, Bennett's career, so easily dismissible as an instance of how commercial ambition can ruin a talent, turns out to be less paradigmatic than the standard view would have it. "The psychology of an artist cannot be reduced to the simple contrasts of a morality play." Bennett's deplorable grossness is actually what makes the finesse of his best works possible. As for easy schemes of rise and decline, "a creative talent . . . is usually more resilient than over-scrupulous critics will allow."

Gross as a man of the 20th century may be suspicious of wisdom, but he is not afraid of it; nor is he tempted to confuse it with cleverness. A personal presence informs his writing (inevitably, given his belief that "in criticism temperament usually counts for as much as ideology"). Rather than forcing or obscuring judgment, temperament adds a dimension to it. Much scholarship has gone into this book, but the design is cheerfully flexible; and the propensity of scholarship to assume rather than establish the importance of its projects is nowhere felt.

Eight chapters sketch the ambience in which the man of letters developed and the ways in which he flourished in 19th-century England; each considers a number of representative figures, defining qualities, tracing careers with a shrewd eye to submerged politics, and taking care to salvage the writing that possesses lasting value from what is deservedly forgotten. "The Rise of the Reviewer" details the establishment of the first great English reviews as a new and serious cultural vehicle, open perhaps to padding and pretentiousness, but at least free from the pettiness and corruption then common. Their success—evidence that a new audience existed, which the man of letters was henceforth to enlighten, admonish, appease and reflect—surprised even the founders. Jeffrey, Hazlitt, Hunt and Lamb are the main figures here.

"Heroes and Men of Letters," with particular trenchancy, presents Carlyle, Mill and Arnold as questers after an ideally maximal role for literature as a civilizing force. The pages on each are models of fresh observation and felicitously rendered judgment. Considering the excesses of Carlyle's style, for example, Gross goes on to observe:

> A mere propagandist could never have devised so potent a style. But neither could a mere stylist. Although there were times when Carlyle apologized half-jokingly for his expletives and his syntactic oddities, he knew what he was doing when he sent the words swarming over the barricades of conventional usage. "The whole structure of Johnsonian English breaking up from its foundations—revolution there as visible as anywhere else!" Unprecedented social realities called for new modes of speech.

"The Higher Journalism" next centers on the Saturday Review and the Westminster, with Lewes, Bagehot and Leslie Stephen as examples of mid-Victorian literary journalism at its impressive best. "Some Liberal Practitioners" then offers a series of case studies in the combination of literary and political careers; the names here are less familiar—Morley, Harrison, Birrell, Paul, Robertson—representative Victorian figures in whom not even Gross, for once, seems able to find more than an antiquarian interest.

"The Bookmen" is a different affair. Here are the bibliophiles, "vignettists, gossipers in libraries, adventurers among masterpieces," who came to the fore at the end of the 1870s, offering in their dilute aestheticism a relief from earlier earnestness and didacticism. The enormously prolific Andrew Lang is damagingly dissected as a cultivator of the fourth-rate opinion, alongside the prodigious Saintsbury, much more gifted than Lang but like him an example of how far erudition may be from intellect. Both, moreover, are significant in the way a concern for style was joined with an extreme conservatism in politics—a conjunction carried to the point of caricature by their friend Henley, whose case moves Gross to speculate: "It may be that those whose first aim is to 'appreciate' the world are the natural enemies of those whose first aim is to change it; it may be that, pushed far enough, the cult of Beauty inevitably merges with the cult of Violence in a common cult of the Irrational." Only the stability of English life, he suggests, kept the phenomenon from being ominous—as it was to become elsewhere soon enough.

"Popular Approaches" deals sympathetically and amusingly with responses—perhaps the most notable of them the founding and success of the Everyman Library—to the fact that "between 1880 and the First World War there must have been proportionately more popular interest in authors and the world of authors than at any time before or since." And the treatment of the last decade of the century ("Edwardians") extends the point in a different way, attacking the stereotype of the Decadence and reminding us that "the Nineties" were > only a very small part of what was in fact going on in the 1890s. They led on to a period dominated by writers who were closer to the Early Victorians than to their immediate predecessors in their readiness to enter the public arena as preachers, debaters, entertainers. However critical of the established order, men like Shaw and Wells, Bennett and Chesterton, put their trust in a popular audience; they might promulgate minority opinions, but not the idea of a minority culture.

All this changes after the war. The chapters called "Modern Times" and "Cross-Currents of the Thirties" attempt to chart the spin-offs from a disintegrating tradition. They are less successful, I think, than what has gone before. The same verve and incisiveness inform them, but the material is less tractable; selections and exclusions are bound to raise more questions; and the aphoristic placing of talents and movements, while still arresting, seems sometimes arbitrary, because there is so clearly more that needs to be accounted for.

"Modern Times," for example, begins with half a dozen pages on Eliot—major poet, eminent if evasive critic, and indifferent editor—whose achievement for Gross's purposes consisted mainly in teaching readers "to mistrust their own judgments," and in setting up the analytical New Critic as replacement for the old-fashioned man of letters. No discussion of Eliot's cosmopolitanism, of his activities as publisher, or of the very force of his presence on the literary scene. Instead, we hurry on to consider J. C. Squire and Desmond MacCarthy, diversions (as Gross admits) from "the real action" that was "going on elsewhere." Middleton Murry is well treated in 7 pages, Orwell rather spottily in 5. The subject is getting out of hand, splintering in a way for which history may be more responsible than the author. One looks in vain for a discussion of Hulme or Pound; it isn't hard to imagine technical grounds for excluding them, but the sense of loss remains. And later when Auden, Spender and (I should think) Cyril Connolly fail to find places in the sketch of the thirties, a little grumbling may be in order.

Not for long, though. The distracting rumble of artillery fire can already be heard at the end of the Orwell section with its praise for the way much of his criticism remains memorable "because it is the outcome of deeply-felt experience, not of academic debate." Those last two words introduce one of the longest discussions of a single figure in the book, 16 pages on F. R. Leavis, very much in the spirit of the emperor's new clothes. The damaging points are, on the whole, made to stick—"his frequent air of having triumphantly demonstrated what has merely been strenuously asserted"; the carefully fostered impression in the essays "of a literary world full of twittering playboys, where only Leavis and a few others really care"; the quasi-religious revelation of the great tradition; and the rest. There is interesting specula-

"Deserves wide reading"*

The Crisis of Industrial Society

By NORMAN BIRNBAUM
Amherst College

Thoroughly contemporary in its concern, this book calls for a re-evaluation of some of the most commonly accepted ideas of European social and political thinkers in regard to the Western industrial experience. "One of the most penetrating, responsible, and civilized analyses to come from the philosophical and political left in many years."—*ROBERT A. NISBET, University of California, Riverside

$4.75 at all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

tion on why Leavis' work should have seemed so peculiarly charismatic, but there isn't much concrete discussion (as opposed to assertion) of his influence. From this side of the Atlantic, at least, one may agree that the man is more scantily clad than he seems to think, but wonder at his being taken for an emperor.

No matter; it makes rousing reading, and is followed by an epilogue that manages to pose acutely a number of very important questions (and could have posed more if the changing nature of the writer, or some recent theories of écriture had been admitted to consideration): Doesn't literature itself seem less important than it once did? Isn't science attracting more of the best creative talent, which might formerly have gone into letters? How can the critic as nonspecialist survive with his pride intact, knowing "that there are people who know more than he does about things which he is supposed to know about"? Isn't it likely that our attention span is getting shorter, and the habit of reading itself further threatened by competitive cultural attractions such as the cinema?

These questions bear on the position of the "unattached critic," the serious journalist like Gross himself, who seeks to keep viable the social role whose history he has been tracing. The answer, and ground for hope, centers on the very real residual advantages of the role and on the cultural need our "unattached critics" seem uniquely to supply. What is admirable in academic work Gross is ready to admire and in good measure to practice himself. But the limitations of academic questioning, and the tendency of scholars to write for one another plainly alarm him. In a chapter called "Early English," which details the incorporation of English literature into English universities, he lists some of the problems:

> How do you organize the wholesale teaching of imaginative literature without putting the bird in a cage? . . . Candidates will be expected to show a knowledge of human nature—which, human nature being what it is, represents an open invitation to wander on at random, to drain the subject of intellectual content. And since nobody wants that, a strong countervailing current is inevitably set in motion. Teachers turn with relief to the small, hard, ascertainable fact; they become preoccupied with sources, or analogues, or backgrounds, or textual cruces [!], or other interesting but secondary considerations.

True enough—but for those whose nerve fails, or whose standards sag, or whose talent falls below the first-rate (and Gross cites many such among his men of letters), there will always be low roads of this sort, in whatever profession.

Nonetheless, it is well to be reminded that nobody quite knows what "purely literary research" means, or that "the fundamental uncertainties [in English departments] about what the subject is, and how it should be taught, have not by any means been dispelled by the increase in academic numbers or by advances in scholarship." And the professional journals can hardly be said to encourage the sort of honesty we find here:

> Most critics with any life in them must surely be visited by moods of Selbsthass in which every additional learned article, every new critical theory, seems just another nail in the coffin. What is it all ultimately for? How can anyone who tries to keep up with Wordsworthian studies find time to read Wordsworth?

But the point is not to attack academic criticism as such, for it has already been admitted that a great deal of it "is of a much higher order than most literary journalism, past or present." The point is simply to insist that a set of important problems not be ignored just because there are no easy answers to them.

Such services are not the least o this book's claims to attention and re spect. By his combination of learnin and uncommon sense, literary sensitiv ity and social awareness, nuanced judg ment and provocative speculation—in deed, by the very idiosyncrasy of hi method—Gross has achieved a numbe of things, any one of which might have entitled him (and us) to great satisfaction.

He has done a broad and original job of historical reassessment. He has, partly explicitly, partly implicitly, opened the door to further explorations; e.g., of the man of letters in America, past and present; of the differing attributes of the role in 19th-century France, Russia, Germany and elsewhere; of the relation of politics and literature in many parts of the 20th-century world. And, by example even more than by argument, he has made good his concluding claim that any healthy literary tradition, whatever it may call him, will continue to need the independent man of letters.

"The most remarkable of all the inventions of modern politics"

That's how Gladstone described the U.S. Senate. You won't think his comment farfetched when you read Lindsay Rogers's The American Senate. Originally published in 1926, it's now available in a Johnson Reprint edition, with introductory material by the author and Carl Marcy, Chief of Staff, Foreign Relations Committee. The American Senate. Cloth bound. $12.50. At your bookseller, or from Johnson Reprint.

"More real political insight...than in any similar description...now in print."
The Christian Science Monitor

"It is a pungent book with ironic touches and mordant musings here and there which are likely to stimulate both fresh thinking and occasional smiling."
The New York Times Book Review

"...an analysis of our national government to be ranked with Wilson's Congressional Government."
Springfield Sunday Union

Johnson Reprint Corporation
111 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10003

Sapsuckers

HUEY LONG. By T. Harry Williams. Alfred A. Knopf. 906 pp. $12.50.

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

If you were asked to name the one Southern politician about whom it would be absolutely impossible to write a dull or tedious book, you would say Huey Long. Right? Well, Prof. T. Harry Williams, who teaches history at Louisiana State University, has achieved the impossible. He has written an incredibly tedious and, before the last of the 906 pages has fallen, an excruciatingly boring book about Louisiana's famous Kingfish.

Long first made his name in Louisiana politics as a utility commissioner who forced a rebate out of a telephone company and made a tentative effort to bring Standard Oil into line. From there he moved to the governor's chair (1928-31) and then to the U.S. Senate, where he offended The Club by his filibustering. In 1935 he was mortally wounded by a crazy physician who shot him as he walked through the Louisiana capitol corridors. Long was 42. To many of the common people of Louisiana he is still sanctified as "St. Huey," but his legend is withering outside the state just as his political dynasty within the state is almost defunct.

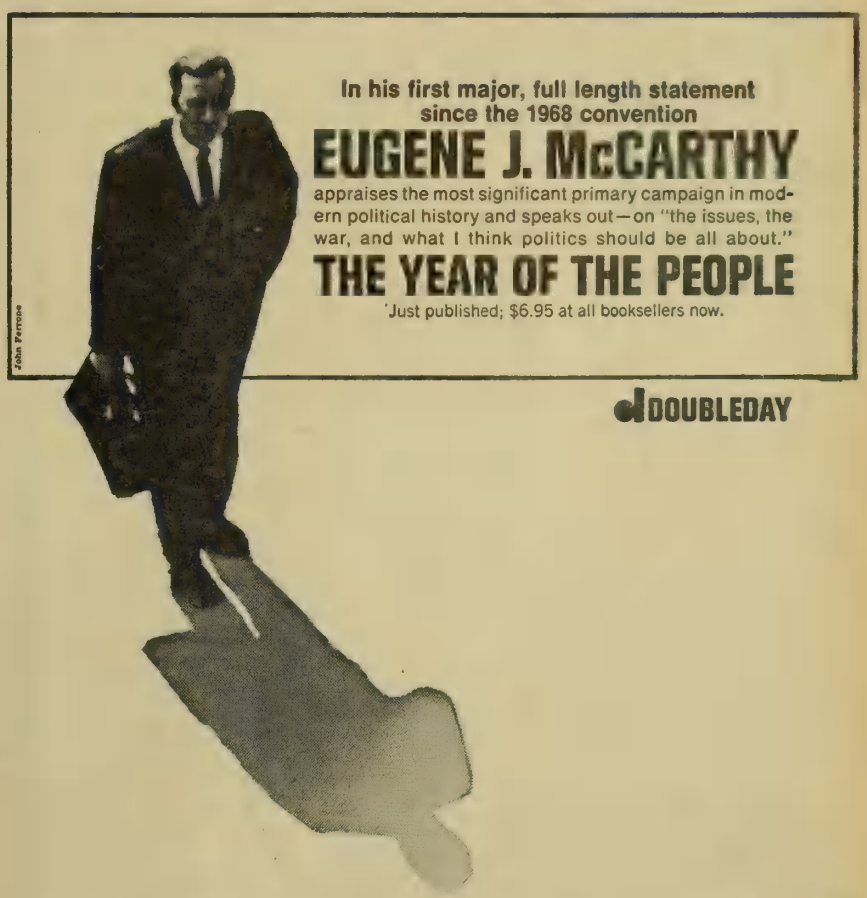
Williams now offers a monument to that career.

The author's vices as a biographer would be virtues if he were an archaeologist. He is endlessly patient in digging. He has been going around Louisiana, with some fast excursions into Washington, for the past thirteen years, recording interviews with 295 persons who knew or knew of Huey Long, or are willing to pretend they did, and reading every scrap of information about his subject. This Germanic researching is quite all right as long as you don't unload all your debris on the reader. But Williams seems to have done just that.

For instance, in 1933 old Huey, a cutup when he was drunk, was at a party at the Sands Point Bath and Country Club in New York and something happened in the men's room that resulted in his getting slugged in the eye. Apparently Huey had come up behind a man standing at a urinal and had tried to pee through the man's legs. His marksmanship was off, so the man's pants were drenched. The victim turned around and clobbered Huey. That's a funny story and it deserves telling, but it doesn't deserve the 7 pages Williams gives it. Nor do we need to be treated to the medical details of the operation performed on Long after he was shot, including the catheterization of his bladder.

Williams continually bogs down in this way because he has quite clearly lost perspective (as, indeed, has the entire state of Louisiana) of the present stature of Huey Long. This is understandable. In a state that is notorious for political thievery, bureaucratic rot, social stagnation and educational mediocrity, it is pretty startling when a politician comes along who steals somewhat (only somewhat) in the manner of Robin Hood, who makes the bureaucracy at least rotten for a purpose (road building; they grafted a lot of money out of the program, but at least they built roads), who sharpens the working class's awareness of the economic issues of the state, and who pumps money into the university system. Long did all that, and with his great flair for efficient demagogy he set a pattern that many Southern politicians, including George Wallace, have attempted to imitate ever since.

Historically Long was an important Southern politician. And because his soak-the-rich message was voiced at the bottom of the Great Depression he briefly became an important national politician, attracting followers all across the country to such a degree that he was viewed as a potential splinter threat in the 1936 Presidential election. Long apotheosized the Southern dictator, quite literally and quite specifically right down to the swarm of gun-carrying toughs who always accompanied him and who were willing to beat up citizens who exercised the American right of talking back.



As Williams points out, when Long left the governorship of Louisiana and became U.S. Senator, his hold over the state government did not lessen but increased. "In 1932 he secured the election of a completely compliant governor, along with his whole slate of other officeholders, and thereafter he increased the number of his followers in the legislature until he commanded more than a two-thirds majority in both houses, which enacted any law he asked for. . . . He would storm back from Washington and, through his governor, summon without advance notice a special session of the legislature. At these numerous meetings laws would be passed at a breathtaking rate and without much regard for such parliamentary niceties as committee hearings or floor debate." (This last mentioned routine is nothing unusual in Southern legislatures.)

"Controlling the executive and legislative branches," Williams writes, "and influencing the judicial branch—he campaigned to elect sympathetic justices—he would have dominated the whole power structure of the state. If the system had been perfected, and if it had endured—which is the bigger 'if'—it would have been the most daring and dangerous concentration of power ever established in an American state government."

Maybe. But even if it had been, Long was still not so important to the South or to the nation that we can today get much excited about what happened forty years ago in the backwashes of that region, at least not so excited that we will happily slosh through interminable accounts of old legislative battles and old political campaigns that seem to have no focus beyond the peculiar tribal mores of that state.

This is the fatal defect of the book: Williams has made little effort to lead the reader to any broader conclusion than the conclusion of one tarnished political career. Reading this book, one does not feel any necessity to pause and contemplate the mixture of individual perversities and regional perversities that frustrated this man who might have been a truly great leader. And one is not even prompted to say, "Here is the culmination of the tragic farce of American politics." Indeed, one comes away from this heap of monotony with no brightening generalizations, no afterthoughts, none at all.

Even less forgivable, Williams does not entertain the reader. The triumphant bad joke of Southern politics escapes him. He supplies all the material, but no punch lines. To be a good biographer one must be not only a good historian, which Williams certainly is, but also a passable poet (preferably of the Chaucerian school), receptive to poppycock and yarn and myth as well as fact. Williams doesn't know what to do with myth except to worry about it. He fusses around with the question of whether Long actually said he bought legislators like sacks of potatoes. Who cares whether or not he said it? He would have said it, and therefore the myth is as good as a fact. It was the poet in A. J. Liebling that made his biography of brother Earl Long so infinitely better than this thing; it was the master poet in Robert Penn Warren that made his All The King's Men, despite its fictional inaccuracies, the biography of Huey Long that will be turned to by those who want a feel of the period.

The book is not totally without revelations. It is interesting to learn, for instance, that Long's reputation as a battler of Standard Oil Company was not merited. That is, he apparently was more interested in using the Standard fight as a political theme (as Southern politicians use the Supreme Court theme) than in actually making Standard Oil change its ways.

It is also interesting to learn that Long's political support at the beginning came in significant measure from the local aristocrats and was not drawn solely from the unwashed. It is the kind of revelation that plays a nice harmony to something his son, Russell, an oil millionaire, said recently when he accused The Washington Post of smearing him and offered to pay the newspaper $500 if it would print "what my hometown bankers say about me." Southern Populism often shows its true nature in this fashion.

And while on the subject of Russell, I'll say also that it is interesting to have more information about Huey Long's disdain for his kinsfolk. "This state's full of sapsucker, hillbilly and Cajun relatives of mine," Williams quotes Long as saying, "and there ain't enough dignity in the bunch to keep a chigger still long enough to brush his hair."

HAIR

I want never to shave again, never to hand myself over to barbers.
I want to walk in my own meadow of uncut beard and hair: grass grown so long it trails behind, falls before, encircles me,
and covers up the street until wherever I am is a Roman field beneath which lies a buried city—this city which takes only my presence to bring it rest and silence.

JACK ANDERSON

Cutting Tools and Acid

THE INDIGNANT EYE: The Artist as Social Critic in Prints and Drawings. By Ralph E. Shikes. Beacon Press. 439 pp. $12.50.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

The glory of the modern world is the rebel. It is he who proclaims the existence of man's will—not the will to seek out a better hole in which to burrow but the will to remake the world. Rebels are eternal because revolutions are evanescent. The rebel who seeks to create a grand design in place of moral disorder is, in his way, an artist. And the artist—whether he caricatures the fat tyrant squatting as a blemish on his world or seeks to abstract the harmonies obscured in natural forms or in his own subconscious is, in his way, a rebel against chaos.

Albert Camus, citing Van Gogh's remark that the earth is one of God's sketches that turned out badly, goes on to comment that "every artist tries to reconstruct this sketch and give it the style it lacks." The true artist works in this passion for transformation. And without "an indignant eye" his work becomes mere decoration.

Ralph E. Shikes has presented here a gallery of artist-rebels. He has set them in their time and by doing so has shown that topical art—if it is true art—transcends its time and becomes perpetually contemporary. Shuffle the pages of this chronological tale of rebellion so that you view Reginald Marsh's scene of the depression of the 1930s after Hogarth's prints of Gin Lane; compare the "Sleeping Woman" of Picasso with the "Temptation of St. Anthony" by Pieter Bruegel the Elder. Surely these are spiritual contemporaries.

The timeliness of art is dramatized in this collection of more than 400 prints woven together in a text that is its own chronicle of the history of the modern Western world, a world of wars and martyrdom, of tyranny and revolution, of high hopes and prodigious defeats, of whores and heroes. Shikes's commentary relates each artist to his times and his targets. The text never overshadows the prints themselves. Shikes has let the artists themselves proclaim their messages, aspiring only to set them in proper frames and to light them well. That he has done superbly.

He has set upon himself two limitations. He has chosen only art that constitutes "social or political criticism of specific ways of life, institutions, conditions or circumstances, not of man's general spiritual malaise or discontents with his own psyche or general statements of man's fate." And he has limited himself in medium, choosing only graphic art—prints or drawings that could be reproduced in quantity to work some social purpose. The book is a collection of socio-political criticisms that outlive their immediate targets and transcend their time and purpose. The reader will relish what is here, for Shikes has taste as well as understanding. And he shares the indignation of his artist-rebels.

While the Spaniards raped and looted Holland and the Reformation thundered against the iniquities of the Papacy, Pieter Bruegel the Elder peopled his landscapes with surrealist horrors. He deflated the glories of war with his devastating print, the "Fight of the Money Bags and the Strong Boxes," and drew Justice as a blind whore presiding over tortures. Two centuries later, when the French invaded Spain, deaf Goya made heart-sickening prints of corpses, phantoms and grinning demoniac priests. A hundred years later, the Germans invaded France. The French suppressed their own rebels and Daumier saw peace as a skeleton with a bonnet piping a tune in a lifeless landscape.

Rouault working in the aftermath of the First World War devised his own stained-glass skeleton to dramatize the eternal comment: "Man is wolf to man." The apocalypse was drawn by Germans like Grosz and Dix, by Americans like Peterdi, Shahn and Baskin, and most devastatingly by Picasso in his vision of ancient symbols at Guernica.

Tyranny was chronicled by Urs Graf in the 16th century, lampooned by Gillray in the 18th century and by that Mexican artist of skulls and skeletons, Posada, in the 20th.

Yet the protests are not all horrendous views of death and destruction, for these rebels use the rapier as often as the broadax. The wit of Cruikshank and Gillray, Daumier and Nast and even Bosch is not somber. They satirize the foibles of fools and knaves. The fools have changed only their costumes and the foibles have not changed at all. The poor are in rags and the rich are bloated in both Holbein and Grosz. Since the end of the Middle Ages we have all been passively afloat on Hieronymous Bosch's "Ship of Fools," crying for a helmsman.

But the collection finally is neither dismal nor abject; it is a chronicle not so much of horrors as of the resistance to horror. Shikes's band of rebels used their acid and their cutting tools against the manifold idiocies of modern human society. These artist-rebels—like the rebel-artists, the world revolutionaries, who are outside the scope of this book—are our redeemers. The Indignant Eye is more than a homage to dead heroes; it brings them to life again, providing a sounding board for their deathless jeremiads and their delicious witticisms against the common enemy. Most of them speak plainly to the 20th century for they speak with our voices.

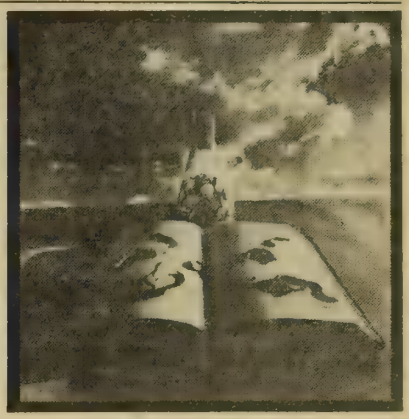
ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Ten years ago, the Museum of Modern Art put on a big theme show called "New Images of Man." It was arranged by Peter Selz (author of a book on German Expressionism) to promulgate the notion that the human figure was returning to art after exile during the temporary tyranny of Abstract art. In the 1960s Mr. Selz was riled to discover that, while the Expressionist revival he demanded did not take place, the human figure smiled, bounced and shone in Pop art. Selz's next attempt to further blood-and-guts art was an exhibition of Funk art at the University Museum, Berkeley, a couple of years ago. To condense matters somewhat, Funk is an Expressionist revival in terms of comic-strip imagery; or, the grandeur that was Baskin plus plastic paint. The exhibition now at the Whitney Museum is heir to both Mr. Selz's monsters: its title "Human Concern/Personal Torment."

Mistakenly, I think, the organizer of this show, Robert Doty, took it as his duty to prepare as broad a base as possible (i.e., repeat Selz). Thus he includes Leonard Baskin's academic Mannerism, David Smith's left-wing allegory of the 1930s, and Eugene Berman's Neo-Romanticism derived from Surrealism but vitiated by theatrical décor and costume design. He makes room for the gross Cubism of Rico Lebrun—a stew of bones in gravy, Ivan Le Lorraine Albright's overestimated deliquescence and George Tooker's symbolic realism (a psyched-up 1940s version of the preceeding decade's social protest). The exhibition rests, therefore, on a diffuse foundation of old rhetorics whose common factor is merely that they are non-Abstract. Thus when, in the course of this exhibition, one reaches the work of Jim Nutt, whose tough, urban, polluted anatomies are excellent, the sharpness of his comment and the snap of his handling are slightly muffled by the dreary company.

Doty's introduction to the catalogue is littered with the detritus of commitment arguments like a Pacific beach when the fighting has moved on: Sacco and Vanzetti, "the growing power of the Nazi terror" (i.e., the 1930s), Goya, violence in the mass media, Camus. To these set topics are now added imperialism and police brutality. Doty would have done better, probably, to concentrate on the new form of protest because it has a different platform and different targets from earlier protest art. Unfortunately, he decided that the function of his show should be the support of righteousness in American art. It is the Ugly American as Curator.



The text of the catalogue is an analogue in verbal form of the ambition and weakness of the show. See how Doty argues for the artist as America's conscience. After citing "the dichotomy of

The Antioch Review

IS PLEASED TO ANNOUNCE THE APPOINTMENT OF
MR. JAMES ARONSON
AS A REGULAR COLUMNIST.

Mr. Aronson's column, "Mediations," will appear quarterly and will provide regular, selective critical analysis of the American and foreign press. His first column, appearing in the Fall issue, will be devoted to a discussion of the increasing incidence of demands by newspaper writers and editors for greater control of the editorial direction of their papers.

ALSO COMING FOR FALL: A SPECIAL ISSUE ON THE POLITICS OF SCHOLARSHIP

Martin Nicolaus on the American Sociological Ass'n. Paul Lauter & Archibald Alexander on the American Council on Education. Alan Wolfe on the American Political Science Ass'n. Robert Fogarty on Change Magazine. Richard Ohmann on the Modern Language Ass'n. Thomas Spiro on The Rise and Fall of the House of Science . . . and more.

THE ANTIOCH REVIEW
$1.50 at newsstands or $5.00 a year from
The Antioch Press, Yellow Springs, Ohio 45387

But What About The Morning After?

Hundreds of thousands of Americans spent October 16 wondering about the effectiveness of the Vietnam Moratorium. Who has the power to shape policy in the United States? How are decisions made?

C. Wright Mills had some answers to these questions. In his famous book, The Power Elite, Mills shattered many myths about democracy in America and offered his views of the power structure. It is time to ask again: how valid is Mills's view of society? Who has power in America?

C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE is a collection of criticisms of the central themes of Mills's historic work. Collected by Domhoff and Ballard, these essays discuss The Power Elite from the liberal, radical, and "intellectual" points of view. Here also are Mills's answer to his critics and a retrospective commentary by G.W. Domhoff, author of Who Rules America?

Take a fresh look at the power elite. A new one-year subscription to The NATION will bring you 48 issues of social commentary and, as a free bonus, C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will send you C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE, edited by Domhoff and Ballard, free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico, $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 11-3

ffluence in America and terror in South-ast Asia" (my italics) he goes on to y: "the irony of the situation was not st on Peter Saul, Wally Hedrick, Duane lanson, and Sigmund Abeles." (Obvi-usly, Nick Fury, John Wayne, Captain merica and Gen. Curtis LeMay have iet their match.) Consider the historical rama, and the inaccuracy, of the fol-owing: "Christianity looked askance at ie nude and the medieval artist treated ie human body as a subject of shame nd derision." (What about manuscripts f the 13th to 15th centuries—ten survive ut of many more—which were packed ith sympathetically depicted secular udes to illustrate a remarkably long-ved instructional poem about the medic-al baths at Pozzuoli?) This example f the generality of Doty's thought en-bles one to formulate the theme of his xhibition as something like: The Human ondition as the Subject of the Engaged rtist in America in the 20th Century.

One problem of humanist revival rograms arises from the acceptance of particular moment of art history as anonical. For this show, it is the style epresented in Europe in the 1940s by ean Dubuffet and in America by, for nstance, Jackson Pollock's black paint-ngs of 1951, in which the presence of magery was organically related to the low of paint. Type-figures, such as nonymous heads, bodies characterized nly as male or female, young or old, onstituted an evocative iconography ontinuous with the behavior of materi-ls. This phase of natural image making, which had about it an existential im-nediacy, was the origin of much return-of-the-human-figure polemic. Types, em-odied in materials and indistinguishable rom that structure, lent themselves very ell to the alienation-dehumanization-rotest cluster of ideas common to both elz and Doty. In the present show Al-fonso Ossorio and Robert Mallary (work f the early 1960s) both make eloquent se of typologies close to the physiog-nomy of materials, but this solution does ot, in general, retain its former potency.

Partly as a result of Pop art, partly s a result of new interest in the func-ion of specific data in realism, protest rt now requires, at the least, a sense of he present scene. General gloom or in-imations of cosmic terror are not nough. Topicality is irrelevant neither o "concern" nor to "torment." Duane Hanson's "Riot" is interesting: the work has a "current affairs" subject (blacks nd whites fighting), but the object, six life-size figures, projects the eerie mix-ure of stasis and familiarity that belongs o all good simulacra. On the other hand, Joseph Hirsch's "Triptych," though topi-al in iconography (dogs, gas masks, girl victim, wooden barrier, Statehouse steps)

HUNTERS
commas

fall from the sky
AMEEN ALWAN

is realized in a dreary version of Jack Levine's schmear, dragged out to Cinema-Scope proportions. Thomas Blackwell's "Gook" is topical (what Mr. Doty calls "terror in Southeast Asia"), but the work collapses into a welter of Expressionist assemblage and Rosenquist-influenced paint patches.

My impression is that none of the works at the Whitney functions as political art with half the efficacy of those produced by the Equipo Realidad and the Groupe Cronica. These are alliances of European artists who collaborate on single works; they combine a sense of what can be stated visually with what needs to be said. Most of the Whitney's show is Expressionist revival or Funk art, and Funk carries a good deal of American Gothick with it, that nightmare-of-America imagery which is as often autobiographical as political.

Several relevant artists are missing, a serious weakness in so doubtful a show. Leon Golub, who has extended the Abstract Expressionist marriage of pigment and figure to a new scale in his recent work, is not represented. Nor is Joseph Kurhajec, though his fetishistic sculptures carry a much more evident charge of "concern" and "torment" than do those of Lucas Samaras, three of whose early boxes, looking a bit diminished in this context, are included. Neither Golub nor Kurhajec has dealers, so perhaps there was no one to nudge Doty. Claes Oldenburg is also omitted, though his early work is highly relevant. (A cheap imitation by Marty Greenbaum of Oldenburg's ray guns is no substitute.) Oldenburg's work may not be easy to borrow at the moment, but not everything is in his retrospective at the Museum of Modern Art. Rosenquist is absent too, the Pop artist whose space sense and iconography are closest to the present sensibility of protest.

In the 1930s and early 1940s there was a program for protest; and reform had specific goals. In the late 1940s and 1950s the impulse to protest was transferred from political scenarios to archetypal images and universal intimations. At present protest is a sensibility and an occupation, the latest profession, a kind of cool. The demographic images of the shape of crowds, achieved by Equipo Realidad and the Groupe Cronica, catch this mood admirably. Doty has failed to find its American equivalent.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

As directed by Gene Frankel, Arthur Kopit's Indians is an interesting play. There is a semantic ambiguity in this. I might have called it "a production," but then I would have had to differentiate sharply between the text and the performance. That is common practice when we speak, for example, of The Three Sisters—which I shall do in a moment. But a theatre event is not two things; it is one: what we perceive with eye and ear at the same time. In short, a play.

That is particularly true of Indians. Kopit's scenario is freshly conceived to show how the American Indian was swindled and slain (the remnants sequestered), while the whole shameful process was turned into colorful myth in Wild West shows and movies. In these, the Indians were either glamorized or traduced for audiences who didn't give a damn for anything but thrills.

There is a documentary base to Kopit's stylized account. The facts are presented through a double vision: on the one hand, Buffalo Bill's destruction of the buffalo which was the red man's food, his growing sympathy for the Indians, and his unsuccessful attempt to have the government redress the wrongs that were done them; on the other hand, his showman's desire to cash in on his career through the extravaganzas he packaged for cheering thousands all over the United States and abroad. The two aspects of the story—the cruel reality and the commercial use to which he put it—are deftly interwoven in Kopit's dramatic scheme. What is lacking is eloquence; the writing is thin.

Kopit's plan, to be fulfilled, also needed the flesh of a stirring theatrical embodiment, and it did receive that from Gene Frankel. The result is a play worth seeing. It has the special merit of giving the Broadway stage a "new look." I have heard the complaint that Indians is overproduced. The masks and figures which are the spirits of the dead that haunt Buffalo Bill's troubled conscience, the flashes of Indian dances which were performed in his Wild West show, the bucking bronco on which he prances onto the stage, the actors in buffalo skins, the strobe lights, the dummies of the white hero and two of the eventual victims of the army massacre, Sitting Bull and Spotted Tail—some spectators have thought all these excessive. They are in fact essential. Without them there would be no more to Indians than a bald historical recital. All Frankel's effects are integral to his creation and constitute its contribution to our stage.

Still, the show rarely becomes enthralling. There are two reasons. One I have mentioned—the lack of verbal power. The other is that, though Frankel's staging is well calculated, visually engaging, rhythmically propulsive, its imaginative and physical resources are limited by comparison with what the scope of the play might have been. When I say this—such a production in our presently restrictive theatre economy is surely very costly—I am thinking of what certain directors in Eastern Europe or even a Guthrie or a Brook might have been permitted to do with the offered opportunity.

While much better than serviceable, most of the acting lacks either epic or comedic stature. Stacy Keach works devotedly, strenuously and well as Buffalo Bill; even more impressive is Manu Tupou as Sitting Bull (his confrontation with the U.S. Commission has the needed wildness of savage pride), and in his baffled and tormented fanaticism Sam Waterston strikes the right key as John Grass, the spokesman for the Standing Rock Reservation.

All in all, a bright evening in the theatre; in the light of what our theatre has to offer nowadays, a momentous one.

There are some good moments in William Ball's production of Chekhov's The Three Sisters which is the final American Conservatory Theatre production at the ANTA Theatre.

Ball desires above all to be theatrical—a worthy ambition for which he has a distinct talent. But theatricality is not ornament to decorate, supplement or substitute for a text. It is illumination, an added dimension to the implied, stated or potential meaning in the text, creating a new entity for the stage. It is therefore to be judged by the same standards of vitality and significance that we apply to the text itself.

To improve Chekhov's "showmanship," Ball tampers with his text in ways that vulgarize it. One example is the treatment of the character of Vershinin. The subordinate officer, Baron Tusenbach, says of him: "He pays calls and says everywhere that he has a wife and two girls"; when Vershinin in the Ba production enters for the first time an on every other occasion when he is in troduced to a new person he automatica ly blurts out, "I have a wife and tw daughters"—which makes him stupid the one thing Tusenbach says Vershini is not. In Chekhov's play Vershinin re fers to his wife and two daughters onl when it is appropriate to the situation Ball's device gets a laugh; it's a gimmick There are too many laughs of this kin in the production. That is not what i meant by Chekhov's humor. Ball make "points" that are often clever but the damage the emotional line of the play its true tone and value.

Another instance of this is with Tusen bach himself. He is said to be ugly; i Ball's production he is made to look a fright. Tusenbach, as his name indi cates, is a Russian of German origi which may explain his romantic idealism (and perhaps masochism), but it is no necessary to give him a thick Germa accent. Stanislavsky was partly French he didn't speak Russian with a Frenc accent!

Separate scenes involving various characters in moments of confession are staged before other characters who are extraneous to these intimacies. People in this play, through delicacy, hide from one another rather than expose themselves.

It may be argued that such directorial liberties can intensify or improve a script, as cutting often does. New interpretations of "classic" texts are now and then valid, providing greater insight into them. (The Theatre at the Gate production of The Three Sisters in Prague —though it displeased the Russians and troubled me a bit—is a masterly one and theatrically admirable.) Ball's besetting sin is that he makes all his plays, regardless of their style, frisky; he insists on gaying them up. It helps Tiny Alice; I doubt very much that it helps The Three Sisters.

There are a few sensitive performances in this A.C.T. production: Angela Paton as Olga has quality, so too has Kitty Winn as Irina. Paul Shenar, a handsome man, is more interesting in character parts than in "straight" ones (though he served Tiny Alice better than did Gielgud). If he were not so absurdly made up, and if the eccentricity of his Tusenbach were less stressed, his interpretation might prove genuinely touching. William Paterson's Chebutykin looks like two different persons who don't get along very well together: a despairing Russian and a rather debonair English clubman.

The play remains beautiful, one of the most beautiful of the 20th century. I have seen it "killed" only once in my theatregoing experience and that, fortunately, was not on this occasion.

SERVICES

BOOK PRINTING — Paperbacks, hard cover, pamphlets. As few as 200 copies. Quality printing at Budget Prices. Free details. Box 285N, Floral Park, N.Y 11001

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

EUROPE has its Common Market. The U.S. has its COMMUNITY MARKET Over 30 groups dedicated to advancing Peace, Human Rights, Economic Well-Being—Supporting their efforts by selling together the products they grow, make, fabricate or write. Your purchases newest way in America to support these causes. This Christmas make a difference in the lives of people. Free Catalog. Box 268, Deerfield, Mass. 01342.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 101 W. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10001.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 11-3-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $8
☐ Two Years, $14
☐ 6 Months, $4
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State ..... Zip No. .....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1319

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Trade expression for a central position in the old days. (2,8)
10 Get the total amount back, with a strong taste of the western stock. (7)
11 Knows almost by instinct how to fit into a tin suit. (7)
12 There might be a penalty connected with such a news item. (8)
13 Jack is one with high public esteem. (5)
15 and 24 down One might not settle for anything less than this under the hammer. (5,5)
17 Their place isn't fixed. (9)
19 Saw game, perhaps, each to be so ambidextrous. (3-6)
21 Apollo's vale, being almost a state of feelings. (5)
23 Relatively gemlike? (5)
24 A little rocking might be a way of treating the leather. (8)
27 How a religious man's opening statement might go from the general to the particular. (1,6)
28 Raises the ante on egg rolling motion, if sudden. (7)
29 and 5 down Simply leaving no ulcers for such a type? (4-5)
30 Pinch sores roughly, and you'll get a little adverse criticism perhaps! (10)

DOWN

1 Is the paper perhaps carrying certain doctrines? (4)
2 This utensil especially has it, and stores for the farm animals. (7)
3 and 9 The best one when it comes to using a brace properly, and impatient to do so (5,2,3,3)
4 If injured, make the grade give this. (9)
7 Having one, he leaves a bridge problem with it. (7)
8 Removes the locks? Makes one 15! (10)
14 A good judge should be so on a contingency basis. (4,2,4)
16 Probably a short voyage—move up! (8)
18 Quickly strike out with what makes the car go around those that move idly. (9)
20 If you go along with them are you a cattle driver? (7)
22 Does one rule "no return within the month"? (7)
25 .ight .mplification by .timulated .mission of .adiation. (5)
26 and 6 across Sturgeon eggs aren't exactly like some plots. (4-4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1318

ACROSS: 1 Confederacy; 9 Mustache; 10 Gopher; 11 Perfidy; 14 Inches; 15 Old world; 17 and 25 down Marshall Plan; 20 Castor; 22 Miscast; 26 and 12 Racing stripes; 27 Lethargy; 28 Personality. DOWN: 2 and 13 Out of this world; 3 Facades; 4 Does; 5 Righted; 6 Capri; 7 Tureen; 8 Reseal; 16 Observant; 18 and 24 Animal spirits; 19 Assigns; 20 Capital; 21 Outage; 23 Crime.

PUBLICATIONS

FAMOUS LITTLE RED BOOKS FROM PEKING: MAO TSE-TUNG: Quotations 60c, Selected Military Writings $1.25, Five Articles 50c, On People's War 40c, Talks at the Yenan Forum 50c. LIN PIAO: Report to the Ninth National Congress 35c, Long Live the Victory of People's War 35c, Also, Constitution of the CPC 35c. As priced, or all 8 for $4.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929—24th St, San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG of books, magazines and records.

DEAR FRIEND EISENMAN: "Your HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM is wonderful. I plan on using it repeatedly. Everything you write in stimulating." D. F. Fleming — December, 1965. NOW READ "Volume Two, WHY I SHOULD BE PRESIDENT" by Abram Einsenman: "WITHDRAW FROM VIETNAM AND THAILAND". "FREE ABORTION. FULL EQUALITY FOR WOMEN". "GOVERNMENT UNDERWRITES WORK FOR ALL". "FIFTY BILLIONS FOR PEACE NOT WAR". "WOMB TO TOMB SOCIAL SECURITY". Send five dollars for autographed copy to THE SAVANNAH SUN, 234 E. 48th Street, Savannah, Ga. 31405. HARD COVER. TELLS ALL.

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832, Kansas City, Missouri 64141.

PROTESTANT VISIONS OF THE VIRGIN MARY. 500 pages. Unique. Historic. Entrancing. Desperately needs a nonsubsidy publisher. Write or wire: B. Wm. Palmer, 15 S. Second St., Haines City, Fla. 33844

SHOULD we apologize for dogma? Read THE CHRISTIAN PAGAN. Write Mimir Publishers, Inc., 1404 Monroe St., Madison, Wisconsin.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

100,000 signed ... Declaration during ... JOHNSON Administration.
NIXON ... allowing death and destruction ... continue and to increase.
Pressure and action against the war are needed.

Individuals Against the Crime of Silence

A Declaration To Our Fellow Citizens Of The United States, To The Peoples Of The World, And To Future Generations:

1 We are appalled and angered by the conduct of our country in Vietnam.

2 In the name of liberty, we have unleashed the awesome arsenal of the greatest military power in the world upon a small agricultural nation, killing, burning and mutilating its people. In the name of peace, we are creating a desert. In the name of security, we are inviting world conflagration.

3 We, the signers of this declaration, believe this war to be immoral. We believe it to be illegal. We must oppose it.

4 At Nuremberg, after World War II, we tried, convicted and executed men for the crime of OBEYING their government, when that government demanded of them crimes against humanity. Millions more, who were not tried, were still guilty of THE CRIME OF SILENCE.

5 We have a commitment to the laws and principles we carefully forged in the AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, at the NUREMBERG TRIALS, and in the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER. And our own deep democratic traditions and our dedication to the ideal of human decency among men demand that we speak out.

We Therefore wish to declare our names to the office of the Secretary General of the United Nations, both as permanent witness to our opposition to the war in Vietnam and as a demonstration that the conscience of America is not dead.

On September 23, 1965, a Memorandum of Law was incorporated in the Congressional Record of the 89th Congress of the United States of America, in which leading American attorneys, after careful analysis of our position and actions in the Vietnam War, came to the conclusion that the U.S. is violating the following accords: The Charter of the United Nations, The Geneva Accords of 1954, the United States Constitution.

To Protest—To Object—To Dissent has long been an American tradition. The following are a few among the many who have signed this declaration to be on permanent record.

JAMES BALDWIN
(FATHER) J. E. BAMBERGER, M.D. OCSO DANIEL BERRIGAN, S.J.
REV. PHILLIP BERRIGAN, S.S.J.
RAY BRADBURY
ROBERT McAFFEE BROWN
REV. WILLIAM H. DU BAY
JAMES FARMER
W. H. FERRY
ROSE S. FIELDS
DR. JEROME D. FRANK
REV. STEPHEN H. FRITCHMAN
... GAZZARA
DR. FRED GOLDSTEIN
NAOMI L. GOLDSTEIN
DR. RALPH R. GREENSON
PROF. ABRAHAM J. HESCHEL
BRIG. GENERAL H. B. HESTER, RET.
DR. STANLEY HOFFMAN
TERESSA B. HOFFMAN
CHARLES H. HUBBEL
PROF. DONALD KALISH
EDWARD M. KEATING
PHIL KERBY
PAULINE KRAMER
RING LARDNER, JR.
RABBI RICHARD N. LEVY
LOUIS LICHT, ESQ.
DR. ROBERT E. LITMAN
VICTOR LUDWIG
HERBERT D. MAGIDSON
SHIRLEY MAGIDSON
NORMAN MAILER
THOMAS MERTON
SIDNEY MEYER
EASON MONROE
PROF. HANS J. MORGENTHAU
HENRY E. NILES
DR. MARK F. ORFIRER
AVA HELEN PAULING
DR. LINUS PAULING
BISHOP JAMES A. PIKE
RICHARD M. POWELL
CARL REINER
JANICE RULE
ROBERT RYAN
DAVID SCHOENBRUN
LORRY SHERMAN
PROF. ROBERT SIMMONS
DR. BENJAMIN SPOCK
FRED H. STEINMETZ, ESQ.
DR. NORMAN TABACHNICK
D. IAN THIERMANN
BRYNA IVENS UNTERMEYER
LOUIS UNTERMEYER
DICK VAN DYKE
ROBERT VAUGHN
DR. MAURICE N. WALSH
DR. HARVEY WHEELER
A. L. WIRIN, ESQ.

I wish to sign my name to the above Declaration to the United Nations and want to go on record with this Declaration of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence.

signature

For clarity, please print your name after your signature address date

city state zip

Sign, complete and mail to P.O. Box 69960, Los Angeles, Calif. 90069. The office of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence will then forward the information to the United Nations.

Should you also wish to support additional publishings and communications, send $1 or more in cash or by check made payable to Individuals Against the Crime of Silence. ... This donation entitles you to the lapel emblem, the wallet-size registration card and four personalized letter replicas of the Declaration for you to individually send on to the President and your U.S. senators and congressman. Money is needed to speed our progress.

The strength of our numbers will regularly and effectively be made known. Your signature does have power.

TEAR OUT ON THE DOTTED LINE AND MAIL

WHAT THE CITY NEEDS ALAN STONE

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 10, 1969 35 cents

S-7OR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

Sulfur and Daley

The Lawless Air

RALPH WHITEHEAD, Jr.

Man in Nature

MODEL FOR A NEW RADICALISM

CATHERINE RIEGGER HARRIS

Red Man's Heritage

LAGOON OF EXCREMENT

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Some Men of Our Times

BERTRAND RUSSELL / Ronald Sampson

WOLE SOYINKA / Martin Tucker

H. L. MENCKEN / Robert Emmet Long

EDWARD R. MURROW / Desmond Smith

LETTERS

where it began

Collegeville, Minn.

DEAR SIRS: In his effort to blunt the effect of the moratorium, President Nixon directed a letter to a student in which he explained that if government policy is "made in the streets, democratic processes cannot continue." One wonders where Nixon imagines democracy began, if not in the streets—the streets of Athens, that is.

Clara M. Varnum

overweight

Omaha, Neb.

DEAR SIRS: Sandy Morrison's "By Road and Rail: Explosions en Route" [The Nation, Oct. 13] focuses attention on the deteriorating accident record of the American railroads. There are excellent reasons for it. . . .

Most rails are capable of supporting about 250,000 pounds, including the weight of the car, which means 150,000-pound cargoes; but some car manufacturers are experimenting with cars that will place 550,000 pounds of pressure on a rail. The natural result is a great increase in the number of accidents and in their severity.

Willis Park Rokes, Prof. of Government and Business University of Nebraska

selective reports

Glen Echo, Md.

DEAR SIRS: Jon M. Van Dyke is not very well informed. He says ["Prisoners From Hanoi: Were They Tortured?" The Nation, Oct. 6] the only "tortures" mentioned in the formal statements by Lieutenant Frishman and Seaman Hegdahl are solitary confinement and being exposed to mosquitoes.

Van Dyke apparently is aware of the news conference that followed the reading of those statements, so he should also have been aware that they further detailed examples of systematic mistreatment and brutality: being paraded and beaten at missile sites while severely wounded (Frishman); being forced to sit in a stifling room for two to three days without being able to sleep (again Frishman); and perhaps the hardest to bear of all, solitary confinement for months on end. Frishman has also recounted to that news conference, and to me and others in subsequent interviews, that his arms were tied tightly with ropes, despite an open wound on his right arm, and that the jagged bones of his broken arm were deliberately ground together by his captors. He also repeated that Commander Stratton's fingernail was "lifted and removed" during an interrogation session.

Perhaps Mr. Van Dyke does not think that all of this adds up to torture. I would disagree, violently.

Jim Anderson, Westinghouse Broadcasting Company

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: I would ordinarily have no reason to question Lieutenant Frishman's description of North Vietnam's prison camps. I find it odd, however, that the Department of Defense continues to refuse to allow the six pilots freed earlier to speak to the public. Several of these pilots have expressed a personal willingness to talk to me, but said they were under strict orders from the Pentagon's Public Information Division to say nothing. I have repeatedly requested permission to ask the other pilots the same questions Lieutenant Frishman answered, but the Pentagon has rejected or ignored each request. I will not be able to accept Lieutenant Frishman's account until the other pilots are unmuzzled.

Jon M. Van Dyke

EDITORIALS

The Nixon Jawbone

In the 1968 campaign Mr. Nixon enriched the political vocabulary with two words, "showboating" and "jawboning," denoting reprehensible practices which he attributed to the Johnson administration and hence, by association, to Mr. Humphrey. The Nixon Administration's own "Operation Showboat"—the Mexican border incident over marijuana—we discussed editorially in our issue of October 13. Mr. Nixon's handling of "jawboning" is equally ambivalent. It was bad, Mr. Nixon said, when Mr. Johnson used the Presidential publicity machine to press industry to follow governmentally established guidelines because labor leaders and businessmen necessarily promote the interests of their respective organizations.

In the absence of overriding force, that in fact is what they do. Nevertheless, Mr. Nixon of late has vigorously exercised his own jaw muscles on the topic. He did so particularly in his radio address of October 17 in which he commiserated folksily with housewives incensed at the price of hamburger and with children whose nickel candy bars are only half as big as they used to be. Over that same weekend Mr. Nixon jawboned separately at business and labor, exhorting them to emulate his Administration which, he declared, had manifested backbone rather than jawbone in putting the country's house in order by means of "responsible" fiscal and monetary policies. He did not deny that some degree of unemployment and suchlike unpleasantness would result, but expressed confidence that the American people were sufficiently mature to go along.

The President did not garner universal approbation by all this publicity and self-praise. Forty-five members of the House urged him to proceed against inflation with more equitable measures than the orthodox fiscal and monetary means he had been using. Walter W. Heller, chief economic adviser to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, called for a "pitiless spotlight on the bad guys" who set prices and wages without regard to public interest. No doubt Mr. Heller had fond recollections of President Kennedy's harsh (and for the time being successful) chastisement of U.S. Steel when it raised prices in defiance of a Presidential understanding.

In the course of his extensive jawboning, Mr. Nixon's biases have been nakedly revealed. He told the country that there was "a very simple reason why your cost of living got out of hand." The blame, he declared, falls fundamentally on "the past politics of your government," that is, on the Johnson administration. Some of the money was applied to "new" social problems, but the total spending was "very heavy" and we are now paying for it in higher taxes. For Vietnam, which accounts for between 35 and 40 per cent of an inflated military budget, he had only a word in passing.

The jawboning emphasizes Mr. Nixon's resolve to rely on the forces of the "free market" and refrain from imposing controls upon the economy. At the same time, as Mrs. Bess Myerson Grant, New York City's Commissioner of Consumer Affairs, pointed out, the President was silent on the need for massive tax reform. By disavowing wage and price controls, the bête noire of business, Mr. Nixon has allied himself once more with corporate interests.

DEC 2
MAR 13

The Issue Is Boulwarism

The walkout of 147,000 blue-collar workers from 280 General Electric plants on October 27 pits a big company against some big unions, but the strike is not a confrontation, in the classic pattern, between Big Business and Big Labor. As The Wall Street Journal pointed out, "most companies like the auto makers and the steel producers deal with their unions by presenting an offer, listening to the union's counter-offer, and then working towards a point somewhere in between, sometimes with the weapon of a strike." But the philosophy of Boulwarism —a kind of corporate theology promulgated by Lemuel Boulware, a G.E. executive since retired—has long prevailed in G.E. negotiations. It works as follows: G.E. negotiators come forth with a "fair, firm" contract, which is presented—and widely publicized—as the company's final offer. From this offer the company will not budge.

Throughout the post-World War II period, the Boulware strategy worked well for the company, primarily because it was dealing with divided unions and also because of factional struggles within them. Finally, in 1966, the thirteen unions at G.E. adopted a coalition strategy and, with the aid of some political pressure, were able to get the Johnson administration to help them force a small modification of management's offer.

Now, with providential timing, the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals, in a 2-to-1 decision handed down as the strike entered its second day, has in effect ruled that the Boulware formula violates the National Labor Relations Act. The action grew out of a 1960 dispute with the International Union of Electrical Workers. The NLRB held that the company had not bargained in good faith on three counts: refusing to furnish information requested by the union, attempting to deal separately with the union's locals, and presenting a personal accident program on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. This ruling of the board has now been upheld by the court. The decision is a heavy blow to the company, which had been applying the Boulware formula in the current negotiations, but G.E. officials announce that an appeal will be taken to the Supreme Court. In the meantime, G.E. can be expected to maintain a stout resistance; it has ample resources and many of its contracts are postponable. Only a few of G.E.'s plants are primarily engaged in war production, so the prospects for a "national emergency" injunction under Taft-Hartley are not bright. Not merely does G.E. have a big stake in the Boulware formula; it can also hardly afford to prove the truth of the unions' contention that "in unity there is strength."

The key to the outcome may be found in a new factor. Photographs suggest that a large proportion of the pickets are young, as they are nowadays in other major industries. G.E. is apparently gambling that these young, "affluent" workers will not hold out long. Hence the company has challenged not merely the unions involved but the leadership of those unions. Can the leadership con-

IN THIS ISSUE

November 10, 1969

EDITORIALS

490

ARTICLES

494 What the City Needs — Alan Stone

496 Man in Nature: Model for a New Radicalism — Catherine Riegger Harris

500 Red Man's Heritage: The Lagoon of Excrement — Robert G. Sherrill

503 Sulfur and Daley: The Lawless Air — Ralph Whitehead, Jr.

505 Academic Colonialism: Not So Innocent Abroad — Gerald D. Berreman

BOOKS & THE ARTS

509 The Autobiography of Bertrand Russell — Ronald Sampson

509 Lost (poem) — Roger Pfingston

510 Soyinka: Idanre And Other Poems — Martin Tucker

512 Yates: A Special Providence — Joyce Carol Oates

512 Hackberry (poem) — Nancy Price

513 Bode: Mencken — Robert Emmet Long

514 Kendrick: Prime Time — Desmond Smith

515 Films — Robert Hatch

516 Poems:
The Accident — Eric Barker
Poem — Lennart Bruce
Holy Ground — Marion Lineaweaver
Ancestral Scenes — Jerome Rothenberg

517 Theatre — Harold Clurman

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

NATION

Volume 209
No. 16

vert the "new breed" into militant trade unionists? This issue is far more significant than the talk about inflation and the wage-price spiral. Price increases are already built into the settlement offer that was made and rejected. Both sides are more concerned with "Boulwarism" than they are with inflation or with a few nickels and dimes on the table. A long and bitter strike was anticipated before the court's decision. Coming at a critical moment in the strike, the decision is not likely to weaken the company's resolve and it should strengthen the position of the unions. B. J. WIDICK

Spiro and 'Middle America'

In Newsweek (November 3) Stewart Alsop devotes almost his entire page to a talk he had with Vice President Spiro T. Agnew: his pink, healthy-looking face, his French cuffs with gold cuff links, his "small, controlled" smile and, most revealing, his family controversy with his 14-year-old daughter. Kim wanted to demonstrate against the war in Vietnam; whereupon Father took the time to explain why this would be wrong, and when Kim disagreed ended the argument with: "Kim . . . there will be no black arm band and no participation in a demonstration!"

Then Alsop tells us why, though Agnew may not be particularly original or profound (everybody seems to agree on that) he is formidable. He is to be taken seriously because his manner of speech and thought "precisely mirrors the style of the 'Middle Americans' who make up the great majority of the American electorate. . . ."

The theme is not new. Some thirty years ago Bernard De Voto explained in Harper's that despite the depression neither the Right nor the Left had a chance in America because the immovable bulk of the middle class precluded radical change. The argument is not wholly without substance, but it is easy to accord it more weight than it merits. Regarded with normal objectivity, its core of truth is seen to be enveloped by a much larger volume of gas.

To begin with, "middle" is essentially an ambiguous term. In a general way we know the group to which the commentators refer, but it cannot be defined in precise economic terms. A spoiled hippie living on a "retainer" from Scarsdale might come under the middle classification in terms of disposable income, but he doesn't belong. Moreover, within every economic class there are gradations of intelligence and culture which affect the way people think, behave and vote.

"Very well," say the commentators, "but we are talking about a 'syndrome.'" This idea owes its popularity to the late T. W. Adorno and colleagues in The Authoritarian Personality. Granted, again, that there is something to it—the people who hate hippies are likely also to hate Negroes and Jews. If you are a hawk on Vietnam, you are likely to line up with reactionaries of various hues on a whole string of issues. But by no means always—the number of exceptions from any syndrome you can concoct is startling. A Negro on his way up, for example, may fit the "Middle America" syndrome in many ways, except that he is black and, as a black, deviates sharply in important respects.

Another trouble with the "Middle America" model is that it is assembled for the most part by intellectuals whose knowledge of the people alleged to constitute the group is no more than marginal. The Stewart Alsops of American journalism do not live in Queens or in middle-class enclaves elsewhere. They may go slumming in these places for copy, but they do not live with the people and share little experience with them. And since they are frequently "put off" by the language and "life styles" of their anthropological subjects, they report on them loosely and inaccurately.

It is all too easy to misconstrue motives and impulses. Consider the "white backlash." It exists. It surfaced alarmingly in California in the last gubernatorial election. But it must not be forgotten that property owners in California get their tax bills a few weeks before the November election and in that year they got some very bad news indeed. So were they backlashing Pat Brown, or were they infuriated by the increases in real estate taxes? In this issue, Alan Stone (p. 494) suggests that a coalition may be formed one of these days to take a stand against expropriation by taxes on residential property. Such movements are in fact under way in some of the suburbs of New York City. They are soundly based. No one, in the idiotic real estate broker's phrase, "owns his own home." He owns it only as long as he can pay the taxes on it, and in his quite justified fear he may go hunting for a scapegoat against whom he has no irreversible animosity.

As a peripheral issue, there has been much talk about the "new breed" in the unions—graduates from the working class who are now supposed to be committed to middle-class ideology. It hardly looks that way on the picket lines patrolling the General Electric plants at this moment. These militants behave just like workers who see their working-class interests threatened.

The Nation is chronically suspicious of stereotypes. The "Middle America" stereotype is just as limited as any other broad characterization, and can do as much damage to good sense and penetrating analysis.

Time for the Senate To Act

No one knows what President Nixon will say to the nation on November 3, although almost everyone is speculating. It has been widely reported that even he does not know how to be sufficiently ambiguous to satisfy both the domestic critics of the war and the Thieu-Ky cabal, with its vested interest in keeping the war going indefinitely. Reporters have been curious about why Mr. Nixon announced the speech so far in advance. Aside from the dilemma in which the President finds himself, this question can now be answered with reasonable certainty. He felt he had to say something to take some of the steam out of the October 15 moratorium, and he hoped a forthcoming Presidential speech would serve that purpose. It is said that he had not thought of the election when he made the announcement and on this he may be given the benefit of the doubt, although it is hard to imagine Mr. Nixon, of all people, letting a forthcoming election slip his mind.

Since his options are so narrow, it would seem point-less to speculate on how he will steer between Charybdis and Scylla. The safest assumption is that he will sail a devious course. But another element in the situation is less confused. The Senate is in a better position to act forthrightly and must do so quickly if it is to assume, or reassume, the responsibilities it has been talking about for so many months and even years. It must act, or lose the opportunity.

The key figures in the Senate are Fulbright, Aiken and Mansfield. They are all men of stature, seniority and good repute. Their power transcends that of younger men like Proxmire and McGovern, who have rendered inestimable service but who do not carry the weight of the FAM trio. Personal factors cannot be ignored here; it might be in better taste to do so, but too much is at stake. Mansfield is a close friend of Aiken; they breakfast together frequently. The second Mrs. Aiken is said to be greatly smitten with the bright social lights at the White House, a fact hardly likely to escape the President. Hence Aiken's "give-him-time" speech, in which Mansfield joined. Then the two went to Fulbright, who agreed to temporize, at least to the extent of putting off until November 3 the Foreign Relations Committee hearings on Vietnam.

Whether agreeing to the delay was wise or unwise is no longer of moment; it was done. The vital point is that another delay could stultify further moves to restore to the Senate responsibilities it should never have surrendered. It should act on a broad Asian front, including Vietnam but not restricted to it. It should get into the Korean situation, which is perhaps the most dangerous of all: a flare-up there would have the most upsetting consequences. Korea should be discussed publicly and thoroughly. Hearings are already under way on the Laos situation. Not that hearings were needed to establish the facts: it is disgraceful that the media have cooperated with the Pentagon and successive administrations in soft-pedalling what every correspondent knew.

We have been at war in Laos for a long time. We finance the country and of course most of the money goes to support a worthless mercenary army. We have CIA staff there, and Green Berets; we run two airlines; we bomb continually and indiscriminately. That the war is partly "Laotianized" is beside the point. We have entangled ourselves in a situation which we helped to create in the first instance by backing right-wing elements; that in turn brought in large detachments of Communists from North Vietnam. Souvanna Phouma had some standing at one time as an authentic neutral; now he is entirely dependent on us.

Korea, Laos, Thailand, Vietnam should all be on the agenda, nor would a look at Indonesia be amiss. On Vietnam the Senate should hear new witnesses in addition to those "experts" (apparently they must be heard once again as a matter of ritual) whose positions are well known and whose testimony can be written up before they open their mouths.

The President is boxed in by these old-timers, by the Joint Chiefs, his Paris advisers, Kissinger, et al. Hubert Humphrey said recently that President Nixon is more out of touch than President Johnson ever was. There are disquieting rumors of more muttering in the Pentagon against the war than the President is allowed to hear.

The Senate is not handicapped to any such extent. It could call the real experts rather than the hallowed cold-war spokesmen; it could listen to businessmen, college presidents, Mayor Lindsay, Whitney Young of the Urban League, and many other spokesmen who represent significant segments of public opinion and whose access to the White House is limited. A thorough airing of the issues before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee would be an indirect means of bringing the information and opinion to the President's attention, and then of putting pressure on him to act. The committee has a backlog of resolutions to consider, including those offered by Sen. Charles Goodell and Sen. Frank Church.

If we are to restore proper constitutional balance in the formulation and execution of foreign policy, now is the time to do it, and the initiative rests with the Senate.

The Lonely Medical Runner

Dr. Henry Meyer of the National Institutes of Health started a race several years ago to avert a new outbreak of rubella, generally known as German measles. His objective was to develop a vaccine to prevent the disease, which is mild enough in children but very serious when pregnant women get it, almost invariably from their own or other children. Their offspring are either born dead, aborted, or come into life with one or more defects, including mental retardation, permanent heart damage, blindness and deafness. During an epidemic of rubella six years ago, some 20,000 babies were born defective and 30,000 were not born at all.

Epidemics of German measles come in cycles, usually every seven to eight years. That makes another one due either next year or in 1971. Dr. Meyer knew when he started his work on the vaccine that he was in a tough race. The odds were against finishing in time to stave off a new outbreak of rubella and a huge new crop of rubella babies. But with rare scientific skill and great perseverance he succeeded in producing a vaccine that is nearly 100 per cent effective.

Government press releases trumpeted the achievement late last winter, citing it as an example of what your tax dollars left over from war expenditures could do to save the lives of babies, albeit all of them American.

The Washington health establishment predicted that before the end of the threat of an epidemic, about 50 million children from 1 to 14 years of age would be immunized with the rubella vaccine. Children only were to be given the shot because the vaccine is considered unsafe for women who are pregnant or of childbearing age, since the vaccine could—no one knows for sure—give them a case of the disease. In any event, doctors said, giving the vaccine to children would protect most women because the youngsters were the prime carriers.

All's well that ends well. For the scientists concerned, like Dr. Meyer and the vast majority of public health officials, however, the end is still nowhere in sight. To mount a mass vaccination program—as all but the social welfare budget slashers in Washington know—costs money. Not very much. Far less than a minor design mistake by a missile manufacturer under a cost-plus government contract. Yet on the rubella program Congress and the Administration are moving with glacial speed.

Sen. Ralph Yarborough, chairman of the Senate Health subcommittee, after months of needling, has finally gotten authorization—but no money for the program. The House has not even held hearings. Meanwhile Dr. Meyer remains a frustrated long-distance medical runner. He knows where the finish line is, but the Administration and Congress keep moving it farther and farther away.

WHAT THE CITY NEEDS

ALAN STONE

Mr. Stone, an attorney specializing in trade regulation, is currently a graduate student in political science at the University of Chicago.

President Nixon's recent proposal to share federal revenue with cities and states is, at last, federal recognition that metropolitan areas cannot solve their fiscal problems with their own resources. But, instead of calling for a thorough overhaul of an archaic and unworkable fiscal system, the President's program merely seeks to supplement locally derived revenues with small amounts of federal money. The original sum to be shared by all state and local governments—$1 billion—is recognized as being trivial in impact when spread across the nation. But even assuming that the federal outlay would grow, it is clear that, under the President's conception, principal responsibility for the raising of revenue for the metropolitan areas will remain with local and state governments.

But in fact the fiscal plight of the metropolis can be solved only by the federal government; financing by small decentralized governmental units actually hinders the solving of metropolitan problems. Three kinds of questions must be analytically separated in examining metropolitan fiscal policy: Are expenditures adequate to meet needs and are receipts adequate to meet such expenditures? Are expenditures or receipts discriminatory with respect to area? Are expenditures or receipts discriminatory with respect to socio-economic class or group?

Need in this context is an ambiguous word; it can be defined either as what independent authorities think is needed, or (usually) according to the more restricted goals of local officials. In any event, most major domestic problems are metropolitan problems. To tick off just a few of the major ones, metropolitan needs include parks and recreational facilities, adequate and unpolluted water, schools, an end to air pollution, the provision of sufficient housing, medical services and welfare.

It is sufficiently clear that from the viewpoints of both the visionary and the local official these needs are not being met. To cite but one example in the area of housing, the July 1969 First National City Bank Monthly Economic Letter reported that in New York City during the 1960s, the growth in the number of households exceeded the growth of housing units by 27 per cent: the result has been an acute shortage of reasonably priced housing.

Officially sponsored long-range studies conclude that local governments will be unable to raise revenue for metropolitan needs. Mitchell Gordon's Sick Cities reports a study which estimates that capital projects in the New York metropolitan region from 1960 to 1985 will cost $42 billion—twice what can be raised there in taxes. Gordon cites similar studies for other metropolitan areas.

The basic fiscal dynamic in the metropolis is climbing expenditures and an increasingly disparate tax base. Alan K. Campbell and Seymour Sacks in Metropolitan America, a study of metropolitan fiscal patterns, show that from 1953 to 1963 state and local expenditures grew 126 per cent (in comparison, federal expenditures grew 24 per cent). This growth has severely strained local governments' ability to raise sufficient revenue.

Local governments suffer from several handicaps in imposing taxes which do not affect the federal government. First, constitutional and legal limitations have rendered many local areas virtually unable to develop new forms of taxation. (Municipalities have no inherent power to levy taxes and derive all such power from states.) Second, threats or implied threats by business to move from or not locate in a community cause local officials to exercise taxing restraint on business. Third, sales, income and gross receipts taxes are difficult to administer locally. They are administered, in fact, at the first level by a multitude of businesses and individuals, with almost no effective governmental supervision. Cheating by the unscrupulous is easy and there's not much that can be done comprehensively to prevent it; local governments cannot afford an army of revenue agents. Licenses, on the other hand, are easily administered but are not very productive. Therefore, principal reliance for revenue by local government continues to be the real property tax.

Real property taxes constitute more than 80 per cent of tax revenues raised by local governments. The property tax is a deplorable instrument for a number of reasons. First, it is notoriously regressive relative to income and strikes hardest at lower-income home owners.

Property taxes are also subject to numerous exemptions, among which the most widely known is church property. But there are many other exemptions, varying from area to area. In Illinois, for example, much property of the Illinois Central Railroad is tax-exempt. The Chicago Daily News found, in a recent survey, that the number of exempt parcels in Cook County had doubled in the last twelve years and that 13 per cent of the property parcels in the Loop, Chicago's major business district, are tax-exempt. According to Gordon, the total value of exempt property throughout the country in 1963 was $200 billion.

The continuing growth of exemptions causes those interests remaining on the tax rolls to push harder for their own exemptions. A hidden form of exemption not tabulated in the statistics occurs when business corporations set up their own municipal corporation to avoid local taxes. Reform of the morass of local exemptions through local legislation would appear an impossible task.

Another difficulty with local property taxation is that assessment valuation and market worth almost never coincide. Formulas vary from community to community and average about one-third market value. Even within any community valuation is largely a matter of judgment, and is thus inherently discriminatory.

Sales taxes which constitute the largest source of state revenue are of two types, selective and general. Due's study, Sales Taxation, found that both types are regressive and strike hardest at lower-income groups. Many local governments are forbidden to use income taxes. In any event, the employment by local governments of the income tax constitutes an inefficient duplication of the federal government's effort. Further, local income taxes are not very progressive because their rate spreads are quite narrow, in contrast to the federal income tax rate spread. Local sales and income taxes are difficult to administer and probably fail to catch a lot of taxable income.

Local indebtedness is an equally unsatisfactory revenue instrument. Local bonds, which rose from $14 billion to $51 billion from 1946 to 1960, are held largely by people in the very highest income bracket because of the exemption from income taxation that such bonds enjoy. The rise in debt has been so extreme that by 1960 city taxpayers were spending more to pay debts than they were spending for fire protection. The spectacle of hard-pressed cities raising revenue to pay the very rich (and thus magnify the regressiveness inherent in metropolitan forms of taxation) illustrates how unsatisfactory debt is as an instrument of the future.

Grants-in-aid to local governments from states or through states from the federal government are becoming increasingly common. On the plus side, they are largely financed from the federal income tax and are, therefore, on balance, progressive. They also tend to stimulate local effort rather than replace it. On the debit side, grants-in-aid are usually based upon matching grants from state or local governments. Thus they aid wealthier areas proportionately more than those which have greater difficulty raising revenue, and are inherently discriminatory. Second, the disjunction between revenue collection and spending may encourage local fiscal irresponsibility.

Not only are local revenue resources inadequate but the system is discriminatory both with respect to area and socio-economic class. Although the highest per capita incomes in the larger metropolitan areas and in the nation as a whole are in the suburbs, per capita expenditures and taxes are higher in the central city than in the suburbs. Notwithstanding this situation, as Campbell and Sacks found in a study of thirty-six representative metropolitan areas, per capita state aid is less in the central city than in the suburb, with the disparity in education particularly glaring (even though suburbs spend per capita more of their own resources on education).

This discriminatory pattern is further aggravated by the enormous costs imposed on the central city by suburban residents. Suburbanites who work in the central city receive police and fire protection, street provision, water, sewage, sanitation and other services for which they don't pay. Larry M. Elison, in his Finances of Metropolitan Areas, summarized several studies which showed that every new person living in the satellite area imposes more than twice the per capita costs on the central city government than does an additional person living in the central city. (This is due in part to the fact that residents of satellite areas are not added to the denominator, while the central city residents are.)

There are also discriminatory patterns between the various suburbs. Lower-income suburbs are in a fiscal bind while wealthy suburbs are able to produce tax revenues in excess of their needs.

Even this brief survey of metropolitan fiscal problems shows that the present system doesn't need a supplement of the sort proposed by President Nixon's revenue sharing plan, but a complete overhaul. The property tax is an anachronism from a time when wealth was based upon real property. It is discriminatory and regressive, and should be abolished. Other locally raised taxes are regressive and difficult to administer. The ability to tax locally is virtually in inverse relationship to a community's needs.

It follows, therefore, that the national income tax and other taxes from which the wealthy cannot escape (e.g., excess profits taxes) ought to be the principal source of metropolitan revenue. The revenue should be distributed to communities on the basis of need, not on the basis of matching grants. This implies that the federal government must be the judge of need, develop objective standards and assure that the funds are properly spent.

Thus decentralization and community control of projects are impediments to solving metropolitan problems, although, of course, community organizations should present needs and demands. Central control of income and expenditures eliminates the inefficiency, duplication and lack of coordination and waste which result from the proliferation of governmental units. The size of expenditures required to solve many of the most important metropolitan problems such as health or housing are beyond the scope of local government.

These proposals for extension of federal power into local affairs are currently a decidedly minority view among liberals and radicals who are hung up on slogans of "community control," "participatory democracy," etc. But it is precisely minority groups and the unemployed who have most to gain from campaigning for a greater federal role and an overhaul of local taxation, including abolition of the property tax. Therein lies the basis for a coalition between the people whose needs are greatest and the working class and lower middle class who suffer most from the burden of property taxation. Healing the bitter breach between these groups should be the great work of liberals and radicals. Certainly, a coalition of minority groups and disaffected students advocating decentralization are no threat to anyone in power. But a coalition of working people, the lower middle class, minorities and students is potentially a winning combination.

MODEL FOR A NEW RADICALISM

CATHERINE RIEGGER HARRIS
Mrs. Harris obtained her Ph.D. at the University of Maryland and taught at Howard University for some years. She now devotes herself entirely to writing and has recently completed a book on The Philosophical System of Karl Marx.

The American movement against the war in Vietnam, against the power of the present military-economic system, against certain actions and policies carried on by United States imperialism could become a movement for revolutionary social and economic change. That is so even though a good many of those decrying the war, and even of those fighting the whole of what is now being called "the death machine"—the military-industrial complex and the "national defense" system—do not have revolutionary intentions in the commonly understood sense. Some are relatively apolitical, their response of rebellion or of repudiation being primarily cultural. They are not directly seeking to make major changes in economic institutions or in the structure of the larger class society.

The emergence of somewhat disjointed but parallel trends nevertheless adds up to a growing movement against death and the various agencies of death which have weighed so heavily on the generations born into the 20th century. The perspectives of 19th-century radicalism are being considerably altered and broadened. World views and political views must now be at least partly reformulated.

What especially calls for inclusion in a modern radical perspective is the ecological problem and its relation not only to the political economy but to an entire series of cultural attitudes associated with industrialization and the age in which some spokesmen for science have announced—rather prematurely—the "conquest of nature." There is today an important and intensifying endeavor to cope with such problems as land and resources depletion, air and water pollution, the blighting effects of the means of transportation, and the many difficulties of urban living. Journalists in touch with the present scene note the appearance of a new "radical cause." Mary Wiegers, writing in The Washington Post (October 4), observes that "to the lexicon of militancy—black militants, campus militants, militant New Leftists—add 'militant conservationists.'" She says, "They're a growing breed . . . feeding on the new public awareness that man and technology are combining to destroy the environment.

"While creeping suburbia laps up green belts, land developers plunder the wilderness, industries pollute rivers and streams, and everything from autos to airplanes pollutes the air, the new breed takes on a new aggressiveness in demanding priority for its cause."

The movement for conservation and for environmental protection—even a good deal of militancy about this issue—is not entirely new in this country, nor is there a wholly new breed of concerned people. Yet it is an interesting fact that many persons who are relatively conservative—sometimes extremely so—when it comes to problems of social and economic organization and to national foreign policy may become quite "radical" or at least militantly reformist about this one problem. The driving factor in the present ecological movement is the increased pace of conspicuous deterioration. More people than ever before are becoming concerned. It is becoming more and more difficult to avoid seeing the connection between the central defects of the American profit-oriented private enterprise economy and the all too evident environmental destruction. In spite of the label attached to it by former Secretary of Interior Udall, "the quiet crisis" is refusing to remain so.

Furthermore, questions of public responsibility and the ethics of actions affecting the public domain are coming to the fore in the Vietnamese context. The war and defense priorities are seen to be related to the ecological situation as well as to other social problems. In a letter to the editor of The Washington Post dated October 9, Powell M. Hinson expressed a kind of progressive sentiment that is becoming more and more widespread: "If our nation is long to be first in any field except chaos, it seems to me that we must set our national goals to be first in clear air, pure water, clean cities free of poverty and planned injustice. As a nation we seem to find the money necessary to accomplish the feats we set out to do, e.g., Apollo. The critical point is committing ourselves to a difficult task. I think now is the time to make the commitments."

Conservatives and liberals, as well as radicals, are beginning to see, each in a rather specialized style, the connections between the various disorders in our national life. With so many differently oriented people becoming involved in a new progressivism, new questions must also be raised concerning old labels. We are bound to ask what is involved in being "radical," "revolutionary," against the system, against the Establishment, and against the vested interests of privileged groups and of possessing classes. It is indeed possible to be "radical" in more ways than one.

Political and social movements for change operate today within the large, enduring continuity of the nation. The nation has survived as a collective historical reality through many vicissitudes and upheavals, without losing the thread of at least some of its traditions and the valued realities of its territorial and cultural identity. A good deal of rethinking about problems of nationhood, national consciousness and its relation to various kinds of "liberation" can be expected as the movement for political, economic and social changes matures.

Earlier generations of revolutionaries included Socialists and radical anarchists—mutually antagonistic groups which nevertheless can both be called militant anti-capitalists. Both types were inclined to underestimate the magnitude of the changes which would be entailed in a general movement to overthrow large-scale corporate capitalism. Marx, the most powerful and influential thinker in the 19th-century revolutionary movement, believed that a qualitative break with the older capitalist form of economy would be required if civilization as he conceived it was to endure, and if man was to triumph over his internal nature as he had already, presumably, triumphed over external nature. He added that capitalism, by virtue of its inherent weaknesses, was forging the instruments of its own destruction.

Political radicals today are inclined to believe that Marx was more right than wrong. We are leaving behind that recent period of liberal and conservative complacency when it was maintained that Marx's prophecy of doom had been disproved by later developments within the capitalist system. During the early years of the 20th century, the liberal welfare-state reformers and pseudo-Socialists would argue that radical critiques of capitalism, however justified in the past, were no longer necessary. The right-wing advocates of capitalism seem in their own way to have been in closer touch with the internal realities of the historical system with which Marx was concerned. Faced with a revolutionary Socialist government in Russia and threatened by the spread of such regimes to other countries, they launched a counter-attack which reaffirmed the merits, even the sacredness, of the capitalist order. The American "free enterprise" economy was held to be pre-eminently successful in its primary function of economic production, conferring increasing material benefits on ever greater numbers of people. It was also the repository of important supra-material moral, patriotic and religious values which had to be protected and defended against the onslaughts of communism. Capitalist society, especially in the United States, became self-consciously aggressive and defensive to an unprecedented degree. Conservative capitalism continues in this condition today. The growth of right-wing and militaristic tendencies in our society is a symptom of the late, pathological phase of defensiveness, a reaction to multiple threats, economic, political and moral.

Capitalism grew more rigid in the cold-war period and became increasingly regressive and repressive. The labor movement had previously been an important component of radical, reformist and progressive movements in this country. It was now included within the new conservative-defensive united front, as were large numbers of academics, professionals and middle-class intellectuals. This late-capitalist coalition achieved for a time a high degree of practical unity. In spite of diversity within its ranks, the conservative coalition was united by a consensus that the central historic task of the nation was to mobilize against the external and internal menace presented by developing Socialist power. Writing in The Antioch Review, Spring of 1960, the historian David J. Trask referred to "the chilly atmosphere of the Cold War," adding that ". . . to some extent at least, the revisionism so rampant among American historians is a response to our national desire for validation in history against the challenge of the Soviet Union. Many American historians, often subconsciously, feel a mission to enhance the new national unity they deem essential if we are to survive the present international crisis."

Marx's strategy and tactics of revolution had focused primarily on the internal, national "class struggle" within the industrialized nations. Capitalism was to be conquered through political action by the "active labor army," the best organized and best educated stratum of the proletariat, supplemented by allies from other classes who had joined in the common cause. The struggle was to be a conflict between two opposed interest groups, the side of labor representing—for Marx—that of the popular, democratic majority. Another kind of educational and cultural struggle was also involved. The enlightenment of the working class as to the nature of its own true class interest was to provide the chief cultural lever of revolutionary political-economic change.

In his later years, however, Marx came to recognize that the British working class—then the most developed and the best organized in the capitalist world—was becoming accommodated to British capitalism. It was settling into a role of interest-group opposition within the national-unity complex of capitalist society. His response to this difficulty was to look to revolutionary and national liberation movements outside the chief centers of capitalist power for the initiative required to topple the internal power structure and to bring local labor into ascendancy. He wrote, in a letter to Engels dated December 10, 1869: "The English working class will never accomplish anything until it has got rid of Ireland. The lever must be applied in Ireland. That is why the Irish question is so important for the social movement in general."

The "Irish question" and a good many others of like nature are still with us. In the United States, the racial question is now in the forefront, the difference from Ireland being that the black ghetto population is entirely within rather than partly outside the confines of the national territory.

Our present difficulties are also complicated by problems that were not so acute in the earlier period. The problems of man in nature and of man in relation to the humanly created environment are becoming unavoidable. This broadening of the ground may prove to be of considerable political importance, and any new sociology of revolution must take it into account. Problems of nature, ecology and environment are clearly beyond the scope of any particular occupational group or economic class. Forms of cultural revolution and of philosophical revolution are required in ways which could not be imagined by Marx or by most of the earlier intellectuals on the Left. But a few exceptional and prophetic voices did speak at least partly to the 20th century, whose outlines could even then be projected on the basis of existing trends. Marx himself was by no means unaware of the problem of man in relation to the resources of land and nature. American capitalism, he said, was undermining its own natural territorial resources at a more rapid rate than were the capitalist economies of the old world.

The American Christian Socialist minister, Walter Rauschenbusch, more than forty years later, paid more inclusive attention to problems of ecology, nature exploitation, urban environment and soil depletion in his Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907).

One independent radical thinker of the past seems to speak especially to the cultural mood of today. William Morris conceived that a double revolution would be required. News from Nowhere showed Morris to be acutely sensitive—emotionally and aesthetically—to the growing ecological blight of industrial-capitalist urban civilization. In that utopian fantasy a second cultural, anti-machine, revolution was required, after the initial political and economic revolution had been carried through by the united proletariat in the classic Marxist style.

Today we are faced, as a nation and as a people, with an almost overwhelming double necessity. There is need for a cultural and economic revolution that will cope with two somewhat separate though interrelated problems in the total national situation. We must deal simultaneously with problems of man in nature and problems of man in relation to man. Superficially, it may seem that this combination of the problems falls on the present generation with an overwhelming and crushing weight. We may think of ourselves as having a double reason for pessimism, for political discouragement. Yet one may draw a more optimistic conclusion from this conjuncture of circumstances.

One of the weaknesses of anti-capitalist radicalism in the past was the theoretical division of the human and national community into two irreconcilable camps. A certain segment of the Socialist movement—notably the radical-Christian socialism represented by Rauschenbusch —was never happy about this dualism. Today a number of dualistic but post-Marxist antagonisms are being recreated in some radical sections of the broad movement now emerging. The ecological issue, however, undercuts all dualisms of a simple kind. Such simplicities are undercut also for other reasons, but I shall refer here only to the Man in Nature problem.

Persons from more than one class are becoming alarmed by the ecological crisis and also by the questionable sanity of our national-military and national-economic behavior with respect to the land and to forms of natural life. The business community is itself partiallly divided on these and other problems. A gasp of horror goes up from more than one section of the American community at each new pathology of Pentagon power. The army research project which seeks to train birds for global military tasks is more than a little insane; it recalls the earlier naval project for training dolphins to carry underwater weapons. News of a still more dangerous navy project broke into the headlines of The Washington Post on Sunday, October 12, when readers were informed that "A Forest in Wisconsin is Being Wired for Doomsday." Nor is the madness confined to the military. A report (September 15) issued by the Wilderness Society warns that Alaska is "threatened by massive exploitation and crash development within the next year, triggered by newly found oil reserves. . . . 'Time is of the essence,' say the oil companies, who are anxious to cash in on their new-found bonanza and are mounting an all-out effort to exploit the resources of the North Country with wide-open, uncontrolled development." Marx is again pertinent: "After me, the deluge, is the watchword of every capitalist class and of every capitalist nation."

Kontraste: Freiburg, Germany

It is at least conceivable that a new national coalition, cutting across class and party, and devoted to reclaiming America from the status quo of contemporary capitalism, may develop. This might be a defense of the nation on its home ground. It would, however, be misleading to expect such a unity to include—even at best—any easy or automatic consensus of reconciliation with respect to serious and divisive problems and conflicts relating to matters of class, race, economic organizations and general socio-economic morality.

There are important, sometimes concealed, psychological dimensions to the difficulties of the present situation, reactions which influence the social and political process as well as the personal lives of individuals in ways that are scarcely comprehended by anyone today. These reactions are stimulated by the war against death, and by fears of war to the death which might annihilate our species.

Anticipations of a modern Armageddon have arisen among moralists, scientists, poets and writers for quite some time. In Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach," "ignorant armies clash by night," a phrase recently appropriated by Norman Mailer and applied to the American national "war and peace" struggle. The danger of war in general, of race suicide through war, has been a prominent theme among some modern poets as well as among psychiatrists. It is now being taken up by some naturalists and ethologists, and by laymen influenced by the new field approach to the study of animal behavior. One of the most arresting philosophical and poetic expressions of the thesis that humanity has inherent defects leading to race suicide is found in Edna St. Vincent Millay's sonnet sequence, "Epitaph for the Race of Man," written before World War II. The poet wrote:

Alas for man, so stealthily betrayed,
Bearing the bad cell in him from the start,
Pumping and feeding from his healthy heart
That wild disorder never to be stayed.

In more recent times, another vision of disaster appears, side by side with that of fratricidal annihilation. It is an "end of society" conception, anticipating a more limited, less physical, social type of dissolution. It is often localized within a particular national area. This image of social dissolution and national destruction is found in the writings of a good many present-day Americans, black and white. James Baldwin's forecast of catastrophe, The Fire Next Time, is one instance.

In some cases, one seems to detect a kind of shock reaction, incurred by new social perceptions of a discouraging and fearsome kind. A fairly mild expression can be seen in a letter from Dr. George Livingston, an army physician, graduate of the U.S. Military Academy and a veteran of Vietnam. He wrote (Saturday Review, September 20):

> The analogy is depressingly clear between our failure to relate successfully to the Vietnamese and to the black people who comprise an "underdeveloped nation" within our own society. In both cases our behavior is racist in the true sense of opposing the overwhelming forces generated by a people's search for pride and identity. The price of our lack of perception is defeat abroad, and, if not corrected, may be the dissolution of society at home.

Dr. Livingston's primary shock seems to have come from his first-hand encounter with the alienation of the "superiority complex" of dominant American society.

Marx, in the 19th century, had regarded capitalist economic society as already in a state of near-total dissolution. All interpersonal social ties between man and man had been disrupted, leaving nothing but an economic nexus of exchange and interdependency. As social beings, the atomized selves had been blasted loose from their communal moorings by the industrial revolution. Partial, limited recovery from dissolution was possible under capitalism in certain situations of group action, but full recovery from the social disaster would not take place until the ultimate stage of communism—the fully equalitarian society—had been achieved.

The spectacle of the destructiveness of man in nature is producing another style of catastrophic prophecy today. "Can Man Survive?" is now a publicized question, the reference being to the ecological situation. Josephine W. Johnson links the coming disaster to our specific capitalist society, but is on that account all the more pessimistic as to the outcome. She wrote (The New York Times, May 10):

> It is the well-dressed, law-abiding, patriotic, and upright citizens who are taking our country away from us. In the name of saving us, protecting us, and civilizing us, statesmen and generals, scientists and engineers, businessmen and Congressmen, are making us into a people without a country, dead souls and exiles. And we are paying to do it.
>
> In the name of saving and protecting us, the Pentagon has become the symbol of the greatest power on earth today. There it sits, a terrible mass of concrete. . . . Nothing in the world is like this concrete monster. It is like the great god Moloch into which the children were thrown as sacrifice. It is our greatest unnatural disaster. . . .
>
> After the first silent spring will come a short and suffocating summer, then asphalt autumn, and in the end, winter. Cold, clear, orderly, concrete winter. Winter forever.

The markedly older generation—the grandparental generation—has been exposed to an almost unremittting series of shocks and horrors, and some of its members have been deeply and personally affected by some or all of these experiences. This generation, reaching intellectual maturity before or during the American depression of the 1930s, then went on to witness the rise of fascism in Europe, the fascistic war against democratic Spain, the decimation and physical destruction of the German Communist Party in the first days of the Hitler regime, the mass slaughter of Jews which followed shortly thereafter, and the entire series of military and political events included in World War II. Many remember the sense of shock—almost the final straw—experienced when, at the close of World War II, the United States dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. A glimpse into the terror of the abyss—the fear of the uncontrollable in man—was a vivid reality for a good many of us at that time.

The psychiatrist, Harry Stack Sullivan, delivered a brief address, "The Cultural Revolution to End War," on October 29, 1945, at the second series of W. A. White Memorial Lectures. He reported to his audience his own experience of insight-shock, occasioned by the recent atomic attack:

> The bomb that fell on Hiroshima punctuated history. . . . The gods of local certainties, of local moralities, of local loyalty, of personal salvation, of hate and prejudice and the intolerance of others passed into history. . . .
>
> The peoples of the world, wherever language reaches, caught a glimpse of Reality, felt with whatever terror a moment of insight into alike the minuscule and the magnificent in Human Being.

This passage was followed by a call to action:

> This is a challenge to each of us, and a challenge which each of us must meet. A decision to do nothing about it identifies one with the destructive principle which the great mass of humanity has not yet found a way to escape: one shows by inaction that one is of those who irresponsibly exploit their less fortunate fellows. Possible for how much longer? Can one be sure?

Sullivan took the challenge upon himself in an emphatic way, his reported comment being, "It appears that I'm about to make even more of a fool of myself than usual. . . ." Afflicted with a serious heart condition, he disregarded medical advice with full knowledge of the likely consequences to himself. He plunged into intense peace activity, aimed at mobilizing the profession of psychiatry and allied social sciences in an all-out endeavor to stop the destructive trends that seemed to be gaining momentum. He died in Paris, in January 1949, an early participant in a professional and scientific peace army which is now getting under way.

The distinction of Sullivan was that he was radical in a special and in an important sense. He upheld the cause of reason against unreason, of sanity against insanity, of enlightened science against reaction.

Visions of imminent destruction, man-induced, ideas of planetary desolation due to "unnatural disaster" of one kind or another, are grounded in objective reality. Subjectively, the experiencing of such outcomes in the nightmares of the imagination can serve a useful and indeed a necessary function. Sullivan may well have been right in seeing the release of atomic energy for destruction as a "punctuation of history," spelling out a break in continuity to be followed either by the end of Western nationalism as we know it, or else by a catastrophe of horror. It is a statement of the obvious that Western civilization has culminated in a historical crisis. The events of this century must be placed against the background of the entire sweep of history.

The late R. H. Tawney, a Socialist whose philosophy reflected a personal serenity not attainable by most radical thinkers of our time, told a British audience in 1949: "Each generation must write its history for itself, and draw its own deductions from that already written, not because the conclusions of its predecessors are untrue, but for a practical reason. Different answers are required, because different questions are asked. Standing at a new point on the road, it finds that fresh ranges of the landscape come into view, whose unfamiliar intricacies demand an amplification of traditional charts."

There is nothing intricate about the landscapes of desolation that come into the current visions of social and world disaster. There is only the simplicity of death and the anarchy of the unimaginable. But turning back to the hope provided by the various forms of radical and progressive thought and action now beginning in this country will involve facing the complexities of life and of reason. The time permitted for the necessary cultural and social revolution will be extended, as rationality expands. New forms of indispensable simplicity in social action and social purpose may be expected to grow out of a clearer understanding of some of our most essential public tasks.

RED MAN'S HERITAGE

THE LAGOON OF EXCREMENT

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Pine Ridge, S.D.

When important politicians pass through the land of the Oglala Sioux, local Bureau of Indian Affairs officials sometimes persuade Charlie Red Cloud to put on his feathered regalia and come into the reservation's main community, Pine Ridge, to have his picture taken shaking hands with the visiting dignitaries.

Such are the erosions of custom that Charlie is only a ceremonial chief, but he has impeccable credentials, being descended from the "original" Red Cloud, who in the pantheon of Sioux heroes probably ranks just below Sitting Bull, the spoiler of General Custer. A hundred years ago Red Cloud whipped the U.S. Army and forced a treaty on his own terms regarding the penetration of the Sioux hunting domain by white travelers.

So politicians should be proud to shake the hand of Charlie Red Cloud. Yet he is always asked to come to them. They never go out to his home for the ceremonial handshake and photo. And the reasons are obvious. For one thing, they might never make it. In the rainy season the road to Charlie's home, though it is just outside town, is a bog. And to get there the visitor must pass between the city dump on the left and, on the right, a shiny pond into which the community of Pine Ridge poured its raw sewage for several years. From Chief Red Cloud's residence, one has a perfect view of both the dump and the lagoon of excrement.

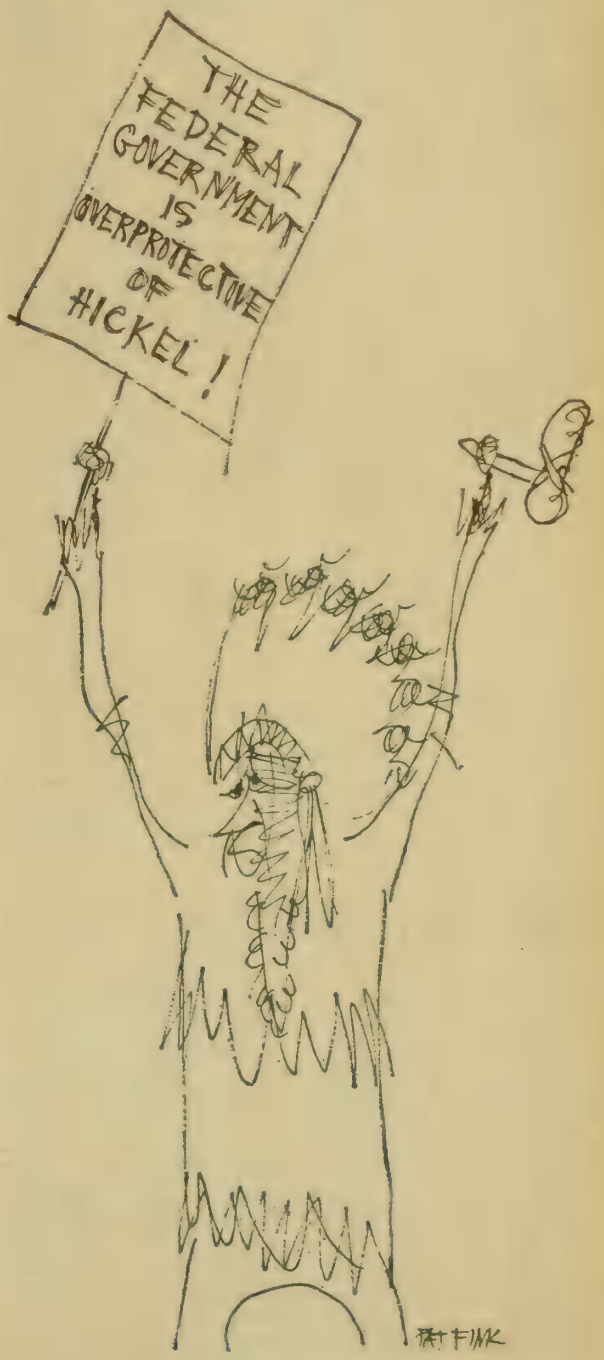
Another reason why the old chieftain's home may be avoided by visiting politicians is that it is an embarrassment to behold, being, from a distance, almost indistinguishable in size and shape from its outhouse. Charlie has no electricity, no plumbing. In the new democracy of this impoverished reservation, that's the way ceremonial chiefs must live—like just about everybody else.

Because the white man's government feared the original Red Cloud as much as it hated him, it built the old chief a handsome two-story home on the reservation, hoping that that would keep him happy and out of mischief. But since the white man's government today neither fears nor hates Charlie Red Cloud, but is completely indifferent to him, he gets nothing.

No minority group in this country is as poor as the 380,000 or so Indians who live on reservations. The average family income for Indians is said to be about $1,500, but the average on-reservation income is much lower. Unemployment ranges from 45 per cent to 98 per cent, the latter being the winter rate on some of the Dakota reservations. The Bureau of Indian Affairs estimates that 71 per cent of reservation Indians live in inadequate housing, but a more accurate estimate—90 per cent—is given by Alvin M. Josephy, Jr., in his recent The Indian Heritage of America.

These national figures readily apply to the Oglala Sioux. A couple of years ago Robert Kennedy visited the Pine Ridge Reservation. Because he promised to help them, the residents remember him with affection, and they enjoy pointing out the very cabin at which Senator Kennedy began his tour of the town. (It is a one-room cabin which, in fact, looks better than most of the other dwellings.)

Recently, for The Nation, I backtracked over Kennedy's path to see what improvements had been made—not by him, since he had no time to make good on his promises, but by others who might have been goaded into action by the national notoriety Kennedy gave to Pine Ridge.



There were a few improvements, but even some of these few seemed to have been made in a mood of black humor. For instance, the Pine Ridge Reservation has a brand-new landing strip. It is long enough to accommodate jetliners, but as far as I could discover, no Indian on this reservation owns even a Piper Cub. Most could not afford a kite.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs disclaims responsibility for this "improvement." They say it was contracted for by the tribe's own politicians and paid for out of the tribe's budget. If that is true, it would support what some of the Indians say—that when the BIA doesn't get to them, their own venal politicians do.

For more than ninety years many of the Oglala Sioux have made every effort to go along with the white man's programs. They have lived in peace, but they have been almost totally unproductive because they have been given nothing to work with. They have no capital base on which to build.

The Pine Ridge Reservation has no bank. It has no dry goods store, no department store, no hotel or motel, no dime store, no theatre, no drugstore worth mentioning, none of the usual outlets for "comfort commerce." Neither does it have a hardware store, a feed store or a farm equipment agency.

The government spent $10,000 on a study of the prospects for building a profitable motel on the reservation, and the study showed that it would work. But the Small Business Administration turned down the application for construction money. Off-reservation banks display the usual coolness to Indian enterprise. It is reportedly easy for an Indian to get a loan to buy a car, but difficult for him to get a loan to buy a tractor.

Aside from the highways that pass through the community of Pine Ridge, there is only one paved street on the "Indian side" of town (on the other side, where the U.S. Public Health Service and Bureau of Indian Affairs bureaucrats live, many of the streets are paved). This one paved street leads to what is locally known, with the wry humor in which these Indians excel, as "the industrial square." There is no industry on industrial square. The only building is a warehouse holding the U.S. Government commodities (flour, meal, etc.) that are given to the Indians to keep them from literally starving to death. The only industry on the reservation is a moccasin factory that hires about thirty Indians. There used to be a couple of fishhook factories, but these died when wholesalers found that the work could be done more cheaply by Swedes and Japanese.

In housing, employment and life style, the 10,000 to 12,000 Sioux (I got differing estimates of the population) on the Pine Ridge Reservation are still untouched by the benevolence of Washington. A few families are living in abandoned auto bodies. Some families live in tents, some in abandoned chicken coops. Many families (possibly as many as 50 per cent, conservative observers say) will spend this winter and the rest of their lives in minuscule huts with dirt floors. At least 75 per cent of the dwellings on this reservation have no plumbing.

At least two-thirds of the working-age men have no steady employment. Their families subsist on welfare checks and commodity handouts. The tribe leases out thousands of acres of farming and grazing land to white men at bargain rates (because most of the Indians can't raise enough money to buy herds or farming equipment themselves), and some of this lease money is distributed. But it is easy to find Indians who get virtually nothing from this communism. One woman said she received $1.20 as her share last year; another said she received $13 for the year.

One old woman, Grandma Tobacco they called her, said she would have received $392 last year from lease money, but that the Bureau of Indian Affairs had given her some food during the winter and deducted the cost of that from the payments. She also accused the BIA of deducting the cost of her son's funeral. Because she was supposed to get $392, Grandma Tobacco said, she couldn't receive regular welfare payments. When we visited Grandma Tobacco, she was patching her hut with mud in preparation for the bitter cold South Dakota winter ahead, and on the radiator of an abandoned car (it seems that the white car dealers in the towns surrounding the reservation have succeeded in unloading all their junk cars on the Indians) she was drying the hooves and anklebones from a cow. There was no meat on the bones, but she said she would boil the hooves and bones and a few strips of hide and make soup from them later this winter. There was no plumbing in her hut. She carries water from a creek, a mile and a half down the hill. She is 77.

When the military establishment at Igloo, S.D., closed down, it wiped out the town, and a few of the small frame buildings were shipped to the reservation and sold to the Indians for houses. Sally Little Flower (that isn't her real name), her husband and nine children moved into one of them. It was quite a step up from her previous home, which was 9 by 12 feet in floor span—about the size of an ordinary living room rug. In that box of a home they had slept and eaten—except in the summer, when the children slept in two car hulls outside. In the winter the nine children slept on the floor.

In their previous home, Sally's family bathed one at a time; and when that one person was bathing, the other ten persons stayed outside to permit some privacy. In their new home, despite its small size (too small to permit all to eat at one sitting even if they use the kitchen and living room for it), there is a bathroom. The only trouble is: there is no plumbing. The U.S. Public Health Service has the responsibility for installing the plumbing in reservation homes, and for two years it has claimed that it lacked the money to install the pipes.

So Sally's family hauls water in two milk cans. They have been getting it at the Sun Dance grounds (a kind of public fair grounds) a couple of miles away, but now their car has broken down and they aren't sure where they will get their water. Still, they are among the luckier ones. Some Indians who live in the back-country part of the reservation must haul water for 12 miles.

Nobody knows for sure how many need housing on the Pine Ridge Reservation, but Eugene Rooks, a member of the tribe and director of its housing program, told me that, assuming there are 3,000 families, at least 2,500 are in critical need of new shelter.

The government has made virtually no effort to fill this need. Before 1960 it did nothing at all; since then it has built about 200 houses to rent and to sell. There is some talk that fifty or so houses will be started next May.

But the requirements for buying these new houses would be uniquely discriminatory against just about everyone. Under federal standards, to be eligible to buy a two-bedroom home one would have to earn at least $2,805 a year. The average annual income on the Pine Ridge Reservation is well below half that amount. Also, houses won't be built for Indians who live more than one-quarter mile from an all-weather road. According to Rooks that automatically eliminates 95 per cent of the Indians on the reservation.

In an effort to meet the paving requirements, at least in the community of Pine Ridge, Rooks applied to the regional office of the Urban Renewal Agency in Chicago for money to build streets and sewers. Agency officials replied: "We don't do that sort of thing. You don't understand the purpose of urban renewal. We will inform you as to the projects available under urban renewal if you wish. We'll send you a handbook."

But no handbook was sent, and when Rooks wrote again requesting it, the regional office replied: "The Urban Renewal Handbook is not distributed through the regional office. Your subscription for the handbook should be ordered from the Superintendent of Documents in Washington, D.C. The price is $14. If we can be of further assistance, please contact us." This kind of maddening federal shuffle is the normal reception to applications from the tribal government.

It isn't that the federal government is ignorant of Indian needs. The BIA admits that about 5,000 new homes are needed by South Dakota Indians and that 2,300 of those now standing are in desperate need of repair. As Rooks explained: "We have been surveyed to death. Every cotton-picking college, large or small, that gets a grant to study the Indians descends on us. We've got surveys gathering dust for a hundred years in the BIA office. This whole thing is awfully humorous, but it is tragic, too."

Oddly enough, the situation at Pine Ridge is not altogether hopeless. It is quite true that the BIA and the various housing and economic development agencies of the federal government have given every indication of wanting to ignore Pine Ridge for another 100 years. The Farmers Home Administration, for example, has shown much more interest in building swimming pools and golf courses for the rural wealthy than in putting up homes for the rural poor, including Indians.

Nevertheless, some grass-roots efforts are being made on the Indians' behalf. The help is coming, of all places, from electric cooperative associations. Although in recent years most rural electric cooperatives have seemed more bent on making money than on upgrading life in their areas, the Dakota co-ops—largely through the leadership of Harlan Severson, top official with the East River Electric Power Cooperative of South Dakota—still adhere to many of the enthusiasms of Midwest radicals.

Recently, some of these co-ops held a rural low-cost housing conference in Sioux Falls. It had to be pitched —and properly so—to improving housing for both whites and Indians, since whites in that area don't get very excited about helping Indians alone. The case for both races was made dramatic enough by Dr. George Rucker, research director for the Rural Housing Alliance, who told the conference that, at the present rate of construction, the 53,000 housing units needed by Dakota families won't be completed until the year 2016.

If the co-ops, which have some political leverage even under Republican administrations, can get the construction started, Chief Red Cloud's folks just might be able to sneak a few houses for themselves into the program.

And if the co-ops fail, there is always reason to place confidence in youth. More than 50 per cent of the inhabitants of the dreary Pine Ridge Reservation are under the age of 16. They are becoming more vocal, more militant all the time. The movement so far is not sufficiently organized to disturb Washington, and the older Indians give no encouragement to the militancy. Few of the older ones would even talk about their troubles. As one ancient said angrily, "It is nobody's business how the Indian lives." But the younger members of the tribe, especially those who have wandered off for a time to Milwaukee and Minneapolis and Los Angeles, are beginning to talk about forcing Washington to pay attention. What Pine Ridge perhaps needs most is some convincing war paint on the young braves' clubhouses.

SULFUR AND DALEY

THE LAWLESS AIR

RALPH WHITEHEAD, Jr.
Mr. Whitehead has recently resigned from the news staff of the Chicago Sun-Times to complete a book on Chicago.

For its celebration of Cleaner Air Week, Chicago's pollution control agency rounded up a dozen tots at the Civic Center Plaza, gave them bright balloons, and sent them off to stand next to executives for the major polluting industries, posing for promotion photographs in front of Picasso's renowned sculpture—an entirely suitable backdrop, since its dusky color is a patina caused by seriously polluted air.

At the plaza's edge, several college students handed out balloons of their own. These were the color of soot and printed with a single word—"GASP!" After passers-by began eagerly to accept and flaunt these symbols of mild protest, William Stanley, head of the pollution agency, struck back. Spotting an elderly woman with one of these balloons, he suddenly grabbed her, took away her balloon, and broke it. Then, as Miss Cleaner Air Week scuttled off to join the photography sessions, Stanley realized that the college students now stood in the camera's background, so he shouted to an aide, "Get that goddam broad back here!" And another aide, the agency's public relations man, tried to brief some of the polluting executives on the character of the conservatively dressed protesters. ("These are extreme leftists, of course," he said, "obviously moratorium types. . . ." One of the polluters then asked, "Are they Communists, do you suppose?" The P.R. man smiled and replied, "Well, naturally, I don't like to use labels." The executives smiled, knowingly, and nodded.) Soon the students ran out of balloons and left the celebration, which quickly relaxed into the routine for Chicago, a city whose air is polluted at twice—and often three times —the levels dangerous to health. Only New York City, reports the United States Public Health Service, has filthier air.

Despite such statistics, the administration of Richard Daley fights pollution lackadaisically, at best. Although Chicago's control ordinance is comprehensive, its penalties are weak ($200 maximum fine for a violation), and they are rarely invoked. The politics of Chicago's pollution efforts show a good deal of the other side of the law-and-order coin in Daley's realm.

The City Council, for example, voted during 1968 to limit, as of last July, the sulfur content of coal burned locally. Commonwealth Edison's six Chicago area power stations burn high-sulfur coal and emit at least half of the city's sulfur dioxide, so at first it threatened not to comply. "We'll either have to operate illegally," said an Edison executive, "or else turn off the lights." Then the utility reconsidered. It instead sought, before the July deadline, a year's exemption from the new law (presumably this would be the first of many yearly exemptions, since Edison's forecasts call for the use of high-sulfur coal until 1980). This exemption request was to be decided by the Air Pollution Control Appeals Board at a public hearing.

Albany Times-Union

Ordinarily, this hearing would have gone easily for Edison. For one thing, it's an influential company. Its executives sit on all the right civic committees, one of its top men is a close friend of Mayor Daley and, during lean years for Democratic patronage, Edison is known to do some hiring. For another, the appeals board is named—and obviously influenced—by the Mayor. Its chairman, the husband of Daley's niece, used to be a lawyer for the city but left that job when he was accused of laxness in enforcing local ordinances. Another board member used to be the Daley family's obstetrician, and two others on the six-man panel have ties to big polluters. (The Mayor, incidentally, tried at first to torpedo the idea of an appeals board. It was set up during 1959 and, for nearly two years, he declined to appoint anyone to it. After some time, he found suitable talent.)

At this hearing a Hyde Park neighborhood group asked to intervene. It wanted to cross-examine Edison's witnesses and offer its own technical testimony. The board members were shocked; nothing like this had happened before. (Although its hearings are public, the board's practice has been to give notice only to the industries involved.) The board consequently refused the request.

Then, at the last City Council meeting before the sulfur law was to take effect, Mayor Daley ordered his council majority to delay the law for a year. Edison continues to keep its original exemption request on file, apparently planning to escape the 1970 date for the sulfur limitation.

Chicago's major steel producers (U.S. Steel, Republic, Interlake and Wisconsin) already have their sulfur pollution exemptions. But although the mills needn't comply on that score until 1972, they must cut their dust emissions according to an annual timetable and submit yearly compliance reports to the appeals board. The board scheduled a meeting several weeks ago to acknowledge the latest of these reports and, again, there was an attempt at public intervention, this time by a coalition of South Chicago block clubs, whose neighborhood lies directly beneath the belching mill stacks. Lawyers for this alliance tried for weeks before the hearing to look at the board's public records on the steel companies. Not until the neighborhood filed a federal suit for the records did the board consent.

One of the documents thus obtained is a critique of the 1969 steel report, prepared by an engineer for the Chicago control agency who quit shortly afterward. According to the abatement timetable, the mills this year must show a 79 per cent reduction in dust emissions since 1963—their report shows an 80 per cent cut. However, the engineer's report estimates the actual cut at only 38 per cent since 1963, and a mere 6 per cent during the last four years. While the two smaller companies are meeting the schedule, the engineer's analysis continued, U.S. Steel and Republic actually are increasing their pollution. (Together they pumped 40,000 tons of dust into the air during the latest year period.) The increase was caused by heavier production made possible by new techniques and equipment. The big mills had failed to tell the control agency of their new technology, the engineer said, and thus violated one of the terms of the exemption agreement. This document clearly gave the appeals board the ground for cutting off the exemption enjoyed by U.S. Steel and Republic.

At the hearing, however, the board would allow no testimony on the engineering analysis. Attention went instead to the self-serving report by the steel mills. "The company report speaks for itself," said the board's chairman. He also refused to hear the South Chicago group. When these citizens silently handed him their petition to intervene, he threw it aside, unread, and declared, "Petition denied." The Democratic alderman for South Chicago was allowed to make a statement. "The skies are still dark," he said, "but all this pollution is coming over from Indiana." The exemption for the steel mills was upheld.

After the outcry provoked by maneuvers like these, the Daley administration found a striking way to respond. It hopes to get the public mind off the pollution record of local industry by focusing concern on auto exhaust fumes—a critical pollution problem, yet one that doesn't call as heavily on local responsibility. Consequently, after the Justice Department had scandalously settled this September for a consent decree in its antitrust suit against the four major auto makers and their trade group (they conspired, the government said, to keep auto pollution control devices off the market), friends of the Mayor decided to bring their own private suit, a civil action, against the Big Three auto makers. The suit makes the same charge and asks to use the government's evidence. At the last minute, Mayor Daley declined to announce the filing, but the case is handled by two administration aldermen who also are private law partners, Paul Wigoda and City Council floor leader Thomas Keane. These two can do the political job for the Mayor, possibly pick up a quick $3 billion (treble damages are at stake), keep a chunk of it as their fee, and pick out injured parties to get the rest. "If they won, they'd be sort of like the Ford Foundation," observed a City Hall retainer.

ACADEMIC COLONIALISM

NOT SO INNOCENT ABROAD

GERALD D. BERREMAN

Mr. Berreman is a professor of anthropology at the University of California. During 1968-69 he used a Fulbright-Hays scholarship to make an anthropological study of a North Indian city, and taught as an honorary visiting professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of Delhi's School of Economics. In 1968, Mr. Berreman resigned from the Himalayan Border Countries Project on learning that it was to be financed by the Department of Defense. His Hindus of the Himalayas (University of California Press) is based on studies made during an earlier stay in India.

In the summer of 1968, American scholars of South Asian studies found their research in India jeopardized by disclosure in the New Delhi Parliament that the University of California's Himalayan Border Countries Project was to be financed for three years in the amount of $282,844 by the United States Department of Defense. This project had been in existence on a modest scale for several years under civilian, nongovernmental sponsorship. It comprised a number of independent, nonsecret investigations into the society, culture and politics of India's northern border region, to be carried out by scholars from a number of American universities. The region is politically sensitive, and India's response to the Defense Department connection was vigorous; the project died. At the same time, visa applications by all American social science scholars were held up and closely scrutinized. There seems to have been pre-existing doubts about the aims and desirability of all foreign social science research, but the suspicions were exacerbated by the disclosures and resultant political clamor regarding the Himalayan Project. These events followed by less than six months the termination of activities by the Asia Foundation in India, requested by the government of India when it became known that the foundation had been receiving money from the CIA.

In the past year a more sweeping decision has been reported from India that no social science projects supported by United States Government funds will be approved, although it seems that individual scholars will be permitted to work on research fellowships, if their plans and sources of funds are approved by the appropriate Indian Government agencies. This unhappy picture for American scholars is complemented in the United States by drastic reductions in financial support for research in India—reductions by at least 50 per cent in the major sources, which are primarily governmental but unassociated with the defense or intelligence establishments.

The people most sadly affected are the American scholars who regard their work as a legitimate, sympathetic pursuit of knowledge contributing to international understanding, the results of which will be available to all and will serve no single or ulterior interest. These men and women have devoted many years to learning the languages and cultures of South Asia and to acquiring high competence in their various disciplines (notably anthropology, economics, geography, history, linguistics, philosophy, political science, sociology and related fields). They have, for the most part, earned the respect and friendship of their Indian colleagues. Suddenly all of this is threatened.

It is a bitter but hardly surprising fact of life to these scholars that money for their work has dwindled as the American national administration has become more conservative, as the nation's resources continue to be devoted to the war machine, and as support for social science research has shifted to topics and regions of more immediate strategic interest than those of South Asia. They recognize it as ominous but not remarkable that increasing numbers of their colleagues have been driven to the Defense Department for funds to support research which is for the most part open and as innocuous as any can be these days. Increasingly, that has been the only place where funds could be readily found, or found at all. (The civilian backing of the ill-starred Himalayan Project had dried up when the Defense Department stepped in.)

But if some potential recipients of such funds have been willing to sacrifice long-run research opportunities for short-term financial advantages, many scholars have been aware of the inherent dangers. They have realized that, regardless of their own scientific objectivity, their investigations inevitably have social and political implications for the host nation. No matter how pure the researchers' motives, the research—particularly when supported by the defense or intelligence agencies—may be regarded by local authorities as dangerous or inappropriate, and it is that definition which is crucial for the continued opportunity to pursue the studies. The executive board of the American Anthropological Association put the matter clearly in a 1967 statement on Problems of Research and Ethics which was adopted by the Fellows of the Association. It said in part:

> Anthropologists engaged in research in foreign areas should be especially concerned with the possible effects of their sponsorship and sources of financial support. Although the Department of Defense and other mission-oriented branches of the Government support some basic research in the social sciences, their sponsorship may nevertheless create an extra hazard in the conduct of fieldwork and jeopardize future access to research opportunities in the areas studied.

The concern thus expressed seems justified in light of testimony presented before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, May 9, 1968, on "Defense Department Sponsored Foreign Affairs Research." In an introductory statement, John S. Foster, Jr., director of Defense Research and Engineering of the Department of Defense, said of projects sponsored by his department in foreign areas: "We are interested only in those so-called cultural and social factors that have clear relationship to defense activities. Today this spans a great range because the Defense Department shares responsibility for many international activities." He went on to say that the Defense Department seeks "understanding of how to deter war and build a peaceful world. Part of this understanding comes, in turn, from social and behavioral sciences research and foreign area assessments related to any contingency and area in which a substantial American commitment might occur" (see also The Nation, July 22, 1968). These statements suggest the reasons why most scholars shy away from Defense Department money and why they find naive at best the belief of some of their colleagues that the source of funds is irrelevant if the research is pure—certainly it is not irrelevant in the nations where they hope to be made welcome.

The reaction in Indian political circles has been what one might expect. In the case of the Himalayan project, for example, the government found itself subject to criticism from every opposition quarter for appearing to permit American defense-oriented research in its sensitive border regions. The leftist National Herald said in an irate editorial on August 7, 1968:

> The External Affairs Ministry seems to be innocent of many things, and the Education Ministry is not only innocent but ignorant. But someone in authority should have known the implications of such a project as the California University's research on the Himalayan border countries. The university's authorities could not have been innocent or ignorant of what research in the Himalayan border means, and if there was any doubt among others, it should now be dispelled by the report that the project has been partly financed by an agency of the mighty U.S. Defence Department. . . . The Government should have been correctly advised on the Himalayan project . . . [which] should never have been approved by anyone alive to the nation's self-respect and security.

The government reacted quickly; and the compromised research was not undertaken.

The problems are real, they are now widely recognized and, while there are no easy solutions, some attempts at amelioration are in progress. One of the most notable, although it would appear to come too late to help in India, has been the continuing effort by Senators Fulbright, Harris and others to initiate a National Social Science Foundation to facilitate nonmilitary government sponsorship of nonmilitary projects. The Senate voted recently to cut substantially Defense Department funds for this type of research. Meanwhile, the Committee on South Asia of the Association for Asian Studies is seeking additional nongovernment money to supplement the dwindling sources available for support of American post-doctoral studies in South Asia.

But these are not the gravest problems facing American social scientists in India. A more fundamental and far-reaching threat to their opportunities has only recently come to the shocked attention of many of those whom it will affect. It is the questioning by Indian scholars of the prerogatives foreigners have enjoyed in their research in India. This attitude is familiar in other regions of the world, and it will no doubt increase in intensity everywhere. In India it is found especially among the young, dynamic generation of scholars who had not borne the brunt of political colonialism or the Independence period, but who have experienced the social, economic and political frustrations of the post-Independence era. Many of them are at least partly foreign-trained, but they have resisted the temptations of the "brain drain," often at considerable personal sacrifice, in order to participate in the hoped for solution to India's problems. Their questioning of foreign research in India is sharp and uncompromising. Its tone is best suggested by their own term: "academic colonialism." What some would define as the exercise of free and objective inquiry among members of the international community of scholars, they see as a threat to India's scientific and ideological independence, to its self-interest and self-respect. The attitudes underlying this point of view are associated with opposition to political, economic and cultural colonialism throughout the world, and to a similar exploitation characterized as "internal colonialism" by blacks and other minorities in the United States.

The issue came vividly to my attention during an international seminar at the Indian Institute of Advanced Study in July 1968, shortly before the Himalayan Project reached public notice. An Indian social anthropologist who had received his postgraduate degree in Australia and taught in the United Kingdom before returning to India, gave a paper entitled "Science and Swaraj" (self-rule), using in the title a watchword of the Independence movement. He made the point that Indian social science is dominated by foreign money and ideology; that foreigners (especially Americans and Britons) largely determine what research is to be done and how. Extremely little money is available to Indian social scientists; foreign scholars, by comparison, arrive lavishly financed. Therefore, foreigners carry out an overwhelmingly disproportionate amount of such research in India, although the absolute amount is modest indeed. Outside dominance is accomplished by characteristically colonial attitudes of academic superiority and is enhanced in turn by a concession of that superiority on the part of many Indian scholars. Too many of them defer to the prestige of foreign degrees, foreign publications and foreign ideas, and those who do attract most of the scarce local resources. The Indian anthropologist said in his paper: "The existing system of foreign aid in science . . . upholds the system of foreign dominance in all matters of scientific and professional life and organization. It is nothing but the satellite system, with an added subsidy." He called for the development of an Indian social science, attuned to Indian problems and with Indian standards of relevance, ethics and excellence, to replace the predominant scientific internationalism that implicitly denigrates indigenous science and scientists. Others have referred directly to the racism inherent in many Western scholars' assessments of Asian scholarship.

In December 1968 the Indian intellectual journal Seminar published a symposium of six papers under the title "Academic Colonialism." The authors showed special concern about the potential intelligence activities of foreign academics, or at least the intelligence uses made of their findings. They expressed alarm at the tendency to judge scholarship by foreign standards, with the result that research topics, methods and analyses relevant to the Indian situation are being ignored. A complementary concern was that overreaction might produce an equally dangerous devaluation of all that is foreign in science and scholarship.

The remedies suggested for these ills might disturb foreign scholars even more than the ailments identified. One writer proposed a five-year moratorium on foreign aid for academic needs in India, and an end to foreign experts, advisers and visiting professors, and perhaps a ban on foreign travel by Indian scholars. In his concluding words, "Academic autarchy is the most appropriate slogan for the present generation of academics." Another contributor suggested, among other things, a panel of Indian experts to screen all research proposed by foreign scholars, to comment on their academic and technical qualifications, on their sources of money and on the implications of their work for the national interest. He advocated a similar screening for Indian scholars but without a judgment as to projects' desirability, "political or otherwise." And he advocated the founding of a social science archive where copies of all data collected by foreign scholars in India would be deposited. Other authors suggested less drastic measures to protect India's autonomy in social science, without jeopardizing the benefits to be derived from foreign contacts.

The basic motivation for this new assertiveness is not unlike that of black Americans who today call for separatism in order to rebuild a shattered self-esteem and to create institutions responsive to the needs and desires of their own people, long and disastrously excluded from the institutions and rewards of the dominant society. As one contributor to the symposium put it, the political problem for the Indian is whether he will be a cog in someone else's research wheel, or be in a position of control or at least parity through hard bargaining, pitting the double advantage of his expertise and his position as citizen of the host nation against the monetary resources of the foreign researcher. If the conditions of research "are unfavorable to the [Indian] researcher or his and his country's dignity to the slightest degree, the proposal should be rejected forthwith."

The problem of academic colonialism is real both for Indians and for foreign scholars in India. Many of the latter are surprised that it is raised by those with whom they felt they had the greatest rapport. But surprise should not turn to anger or to pessimism. The editor of the Seminar symposium indicated in his introductory essay that "the situation demands sober and balanced assessment, accurate perception and definition of reality, aware that our own judgments are the only ultimate basis for public policy." American scholars would do well to heed this statement and its implications. The financial, political and prestige advantage we have enjoyed for many years are now disappearing along with other, more widely recognized aspects of colonialism. Indian scholars welcome this disappearance, and I believe that thoughtful scholars everywhere should do the same; it signals the end of intellectual subservience. Whatever the future availability and distribution of funds, Americans will never again find unquestioning acquiescence in their research plans. In India, as in most of the rest of the world, they will be questioned: why this research; how will it benefit you; how will it benefit us; what are your qualifications to do it, and what will be our role? If forthright and satisfactory answers are not given, and quickly, the research will simply be banned. The same questions are being asked here at home by the dispensers of funds, and unfortunately the answers they demand of researchers in foreign areas are often precisely antithetical to those demanded by the host nations. Those who provide the money here want control and relevance to their interests; those who permit research in their own lands want control and relevance to their interests. The dilemma can be solved in only one way: funds must come from sources acceptable to the host nations, and projects must be designed to coincide with their interests and their standards of scientific and social relevance. Projects will be judged partly in terms of fostering a social environment and an identity consistent with the final disappearance of colonization and the emergence of true equality and reciprocity in a nation's relationships with other nations and other peoples. Approval of research will inevitably depend on nationalistic as well as scientific criteria.

The only hope for continued American academic research abroad (as among our own ethnic minorities) lies in genuine responsiveness to the needs, desires and demands of the host communities. This means not only conformity to explicit requirements when those are set forth but evidence of full respect for the intellect, judgment and responsibility of scholars and citizens in the other society. Scholarly respect has too often taken the form of lip service. It has been easy to express collaborative and reciprocal intent, but harder to make certain that Indian colleagues have the opportunity to share in the choice of research topic, in its planning and execution, in the analysis and writing of results. It has been easy to send social science graduate students to India for research, but harder to be sure that Indian students can participate in American-financed research in India or come here for study. It has been easy to give a few university lectures while doing research in India, but harder to bring Indian colleagues here to work and teach. Now these harder tasks must be undertaken, belatedly, if the easier ones are to continue.

Respect for Indian colleagues must now include respect for a kind of academic and scientific nationalism that many scholar-liberals will find hard to swallow—just as their domestic counterparts find hard to swallow the demands of their black or Chicano or other minority colleagues and students that teaching and research be not only relevant to their communities but conducted by members of those communities. The foreign scholar's position of advantage in India may well be replaced, for a time, not with equality but with subordination. Liberalism and tolerance then will have to be replaced by acceptance of and cooperation in what some would regard as a radically nationalistic social science. Collaborative research may well be the only foreign research.

If deference to indigenous values and scientific priorities is the price to be paid for research in newly emancipated societies, it should be remembered that this price has always been exacted by uncolonized societies. It is neither exorbitant nor dishonorable. If American scholars are to be welcomed or even tolerated in the Third World, they must prove that they are not simply well-meaning cultural emissaries or disinterested scientific innocents abroad but that they are aware of the implications of their work for those among whom they work and are prepared to act accordingly. If that is not achieved, Americans face a long period of enforced academic isolationism.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Prime Minister Without Portfolio

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BERTRAND RUSSELL. Vol. III, 1944-1967. Simon & Schuster. 339 pp. $8.95.

DEAR BERTRAND RUSSELL. Edited by Barry Feinberg and Ronald Kasrils. Houghton Mifflin Co. 171 pp. $5.95.

RONALD SAMPSON

Mr. Sampson is a lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol. His most recent book is The Psychology of Power (Pantheon).

The third volume of Lord Russell's autobiography is largely devoted to his struggle against the threat of war in the period since World War II. There was nobility in his stance against the monstrous behavior of the world's most powerful governments at the height of the cold war. The contrast between the braggadocio and callous insolence of governments threatening nuclear war on the one hand and, on the other, the spectacle of an old man of nearly 90 imprisoned for civil disobedience in protest aroused deep and widespread emotion. Russell himself mentions the case of Augustus John, an old man and very ill, who a short time before his death sat down anonymously in Trafalgar Square to testify to profound conviction.

The national newspapers at the time exhausted human ingenuity in their efforts to portray the protests as the work of irresponsible and unrepresentative social misfits. I remember vividly some of those people: an old lady of more than 90 sitting down in Whitehall; a young mother-to-be bidding farewell to her husband because of her refusal to be bound over; a blind man, impeccably dressed with a red rose in his buttonhole, waiting his turn to enter the "dock"; an elderly clergyman (who died shortly after his release from prison) addressing the air force across a barbed wire fence.

Mathematician and philosopher of great eminence, prolific publicist and writer, imprisoned in the First World War for his protest, consistently pursuant of the cause of peace through a long life, Bertrand Russell enjoys world-wide influence. He receives an average of 100 letters a day, he stated in 1963, some of which, together with Russell's replies, have been arranged according to subject matter in Dear Bertrand Russell to form a lively and entertaining collection. Given this influence, it is especially important that what Russell stands for should be subjected to rigorous scrutiny.

His argument runs something like this. If human life has any purpose, it cannot be known by us. Human beings generally prefer happiness to unhappiness, but there is no rational basis for such a preference. Men evince powerful passions, but have no grounds for ethical knowledge. Russell passionately objects to war. In addition to the more obvious reasons, war threatens human liberty upon which he sets a high value. As a result of technological progress, to which in general Russell is not opposed, war threatens to put an end to life itself. Although he has no ethical reason for objecting to this threat, Russell's feelings cause him to think it insane and to think that others must be mad if they do not share his feelings. Those who threaten to bring about nuclear destruction he describes as monsters of wickedness. Unfortunately in practice many men prefer the satisfaction of exterminating their enemies to insuring their own happiness or even their own survival. Hence the immensity of our present peril.

Although war is sometimes justified, he argues, in order to prevent a greater evil, nuclear war would be so terrible that resort to it could not be justified under any circumstances. "If mankind is to survive, the power of making scientific war will have to be concentrated in a supreme State." This new international body, or world government, should have sole possession of the major weapons of war, so as "to be fairly certain of victory in warfare with any single State." In short, the world government that he believes to be urgently necessary must be given the requisite teeth (and that, in the nuclear age, means nuclear teeth) to enforce its Diktat over recalcitrant states, to compel them to disarm to the level of sufficiency to maintain internal stability, and to compel them to accept the awards of the international authority when it arbitrates international disputes. The introduction of such an institutional reform on the world scene is, he confesses, going to be "difficult."

It is "difficult" (not to say impossible) because no existing sovereign power is voluntarily going to renounce or weaken that power which constitutes its entire meaning. Because every power bloc automatically distrusts all potential rivals, each deploys the greatest arsenal available to it. Russell is genuinely horrified by the cruelty and suffering resulting from the excesses of power, but he is far from being opposed to power as such. On the contrary, he believes governmental force necessary to protect the rights of men to advocate whatever form of governmental power they choose as well as to maintain the criminal law. Although Russell is generally to be found in the ranks of the anti-Establishment forces, he is not unpatriotic. Indeed, he calls himself "passionately English" and treasures "an honour [the Order of Merit] bestowed on me by the Head of my country."

Finally, although he is convinced that war as such must be abolished in the interests of human survival, and although he agrees emphatically with Lord Gladwyn, a devotee of the balance of terror, that what the world needs is "less fear and more love," he also believes that the world can no longer afford to dispense with economic justice, and he does not see how justice is to be achieved "without bloodshed."

In short, Russell's position is shot through with contradictions. Denying

LOST

High in the sun a plane groans across the sky to keep from falling.

Fallen, you lie quiet as moss between tree
and water, fish and fowl,
the long season of your bones emerging like a fungus.

Your eyes slowly fill with the black of whatever is melting there. From time to time your name still echoes musically off the mountainside and thru the forest, sending birds into the air like flares. If ever you felt music was a way of mending things, then tonight you are whole again as the cricket sings in your skin.

ROGER PFINGSTON

any rational base to ethics, he is obliged to hold ethics "reducible to politics in the last analysis." He is an Enlightenment liberal who stands for reason and logic, believes "God" to be a figment of the clerical imagination, necessary to priestly power, and equates ethical responsibility with political responsibility. Consequently all his judgments, albeit biased on the side of freedom, tolerance, justice and peace, are ultimately tied to the chariot of power. And, for all his genuine outrage, Russell is dragged along in its tracks, riding within the circuit on which "responsible" politics are conducted.

And so he presents us with the rather odd spectacle of a civilly disobedient earl conducting from his private residence top-level communications with heads of governments who in moments of crisis, generated by their own conflicts, treat him as an honorary Prime Minister without portfolio. We are and must remain grateful to him, but the price that is paid for such "realism" is the continued mystification and confusion of large numbers of men, who are ill served when intellectual brilliance buttressed by genuine and deserved moral authority issues forth contradictory pronouncements.

Russell's admirable irreverence for secular power, combined with a fully justified contempt for ecclesiastical hypocrisy, extends to the denial of the idea of God as the source of our being. Russell's judgment is ultimately pragmatic and political, and consequently cannot withstand the ordeal of confrontation with megalomaniac forces. Although painfully and sadly, he abandoned his pacifism in the face of Hitler. But why should moral man abandon ship when the immoral state achieves the ultimate in pathology? That Russell should have changed course under such terrible pressure is understandable, but he is not prepared to acknowledge that he may have been in error; and that it was this violent resistance that has led directly to the mortal aggravation of the total human condition.

Many of us took up arms in 1940. We were wrong, tragically wrong. From this we gradually slipped down to the level of mindlessness where it was possible for even Russell to advocate that the United States threaten Russia with war in order to protect its monopoly of nuclear weapons. It is admirable that he should proclaim: "It is shameful to deny one's own words." But this candid acknowledgment is immediately followed by a refusal to retract. It was right at the time, he claims, notwithstanding the fact that two years later at Stockholm he made the bizarre suggestion that persons advocating a preventive war should be exposed to the hazards of municipal "mechanical sharks."

The assertion that God exists and that it is God's will that we should love one another means, as Russell himself used to maintain, that we should not kill one another under any circumstances, cost what it may. This is ethical knowledge, grounded in metaphysics or rational religion, and absolutely incompatible with politics, defined as the pursuit of power, which leads logically to the arms race and the universal death which Lord Russell so eloquently summons us all throughout the world to devote all our energies and all our thoughts to preventing.

African Genesis

IDANRE AND OTHER POEMS. By Wole Soyinka. Hill & Wang. 96 pp. $3.95. Paper $1.75.

MARTIN TUCKER

Mr. Tucker is a professor of English at Long Island University and the author of Africa in Modern Literature (Frederick Ungar Co.).

The social and political phases that characterized African literature ten and twenty years ago no longer are major currents in its stream of consciousness. The phrases that were so easily labeled onto African literature are now a historical record. African literature is turning in different directions—in some ways moving back to tribalisms of language, in others spanning a more universal family of symbols, clashes and tensions. What it is now is diversified. No longer can one cover the field with a blanket statement that African novels in English are primarily concerned with the recoil of black culture from the onslaught of white imperialism. Not that such a theme did not produce many fine works: e.g., the books of Chinua Achebe of Biafra. But whereas ten years ago the ferment was recognizable—one knew where to look for the budding of talent, the concentration of form—today the activity is intense but diffused.

Perhaps African literature is in a state of transition. Finally. For a long time its writers have been trying to connect African literature with European culture. The results have often been impressive. The hybrid work has sometimes been a masterpiece—unique in its very oddness, as all great art finally is. The initial enthusiasm for African literature was largely social and political—African literature became the expression of a self-conscious national and continental identity. With the growth of independence, the focus of feeling dissipated. No longer was there one thing to look forward to—the one thing had come, and, having come, had splintered into a hundred new themes, foci and quests. The old imperialists had died, the new godheads were adrift in the land.

The leading playwright of Nigeria, who is also a poet, novelist, essayist, actor and teacher, is one example of this complex evolution of spirit. Wole Soyinka identifies himself with this split in his long (and title) poem, "Idanre," praising the slave who rolled a rock down on his complacent master and, in the smashup that followed, created a multiple godhead. Soyinka also refers to the "Mobius split"—which he identifies in a note to the poem as "a mathe-magical ring, infinite in self-recreation into independent but linked rings and therefore the freest conceivable (to me) symbol of human or divine (e.g., Yoruba, Olympian) relationships."

In this long poem, Soyinka captures his country's experience of bloodshed, horror and hate. "Idanre" was written before the civil war, but Soyinka had seen enough massacres of Ibos and other peoples to know the bite of pain and remorse, to feel the sting of sympathy. As Soyinka says in the preface, the poem is built of two separate experiences: one was a visit to the hills of Idanre, the petrified rocks of supernal force and shape, and the other was a walk through a rainstorm "three years later and some two hundred miles away." The second experience brought back the meaning of the first, or rather gave the two experiences a total meaning. In the drenched quiet that follows the destruction by both fire and rain, Soyinka finds his measure of calm. It is, in spite of the reign of storm and havoc, a pacific poem.

Soyinka wrote the poem some time ago (he has just been released from prison, where he was sent for allegedly supporting secessionist Biafra, though he has claimed he was only trying to mediate the conflict, not engage in it). The poem has its African identities: the dominant deities are Ogun (the Creative Essence), god of war, iron and metallurgy, and Sango, god of lightning and electricity. Ogun, who cleared a path of earth and then attempted to retire to his godlike heights, is trapped by liquor and ire into fighting a battle with other, more jealous gods. In his drunken stupor he murders his own men, and in shame re-enacts his crime every year. Warring gods are the province of many poets; African poetry is not unique in this respect. Yet what "Idanre" and other poems in Soyinka's newest book reveal is a quieter, less assertive kind of statement: this African poetry is lyrical and pained, it is a head bowed not in defeat but in supplication.

One of Soyinka's most beautiful poems, "The Hunchback of Dugbe," may remind some readers of Dylan Thomas' "The Hunchback in the Park." The moods of the poems are similar, the images come from shifting shades of light and darkness: shut out from the beauty of the conventional world, the hunchbacks create their own world of beauty.

Here is Soyinka on the hunchback:

But the bell-tower of his thin
Buttocks rings pure tones on Dugbe
A horse penis loin to crooked knees
Side-slapping on his thighs

At night he prowls, a cask
Of silence; on his lone matrix
Pigeon eggs of light dance in and out
Of dark, and he walks in motley.

Soyinka has other similarities to Thomas: the sharp thrust of sensual imagery, a "perverse impalement" of sexuality, the belief in a regenerative universe, the obsessive awareness of death.

Yet these similarities are not the result of direct influence so much as the shared use of techniques and imagistic insights available to all poets. Indeed, it is probably time to recognize the similarity of African to other poetry. It then becomes more apparent what variety of forms and vast cultural apparatus African poets bring to their work. The two encounters related in Soyinka's poems, "Civilian and Soldier," convey and fuse the dilemmas of Vietnam, of Biafra, of Russia in 1917. The first encounter is between a captured civilian and a soldier. The civilian pleads for his life, arguing that he is not a warrior, he is a part of his land.

. . . and oh I heard the lesson
Of your training sessions, cautioning—
Scorch earth behind you, do not leave
A dubious neutral to the rear.
Reiteration
Of my civilian quandary, burrowing earth
From the lead festival of your more eager friends
Worked the worse on your confusion, and when
You brought the gun to bear on me, and death
Twitched me gently in the eye, your plight
And all of you came clear to me.

The second encounter is imaginary. The civilian hopes one day to meet the soldier and shoot him:

. . . No hesitation then
But I shall shoot you clean and fair
With meat and bread, a gourd of wine
A bunch of breasts from either arm, and that Lone question—do you, friend, even now, know
What it is all about?

In the past, Wole Soyinka has been lively, forceful, demonstrative, certainly playful. In this volume he is meditative and understated, willing to contemplate himself as well as grant others their expressions. This quiet dignity is a new center to Soyinka's work.

Soyinka's plays, on one level, are about the conflict between past and present, between tribal beliefs and modern expediency. He was both critical and appreciative of both ways of life. What he was most attached to were those universal features of character that distinguish a man no matter when he was born. His work suggests an underlying animism: Soyinka allows for spirit in all things—in trees, in forests, in roads, even in jet planes ("This beast was fashioned well. . . . I am . . . a fine ash in the beast's sudden desiccation when the sun explodes").

In his earlier work he granted vitality and shrewdness to his tribal chieftains and their beliefs in animism and spirit, particularly when they were in opposition to dry Western rationalizations of universal mysteries. He reveled in his peasant showing up the poorly educated African, the pompous schoolman stuffed with British abstractions. In this present volume there is still something of this jollity: "To My First White Hairs" is a mock-praise poem celebrating the coming of his old age. But mostly the poems convey a new quality of acceptance: a lyricism about life has replaced the enthusiasm for it. Even in "Abiku," a poem about those legendary changeling children who die only to return and plague their mothers, the poet's eye is on the unchanging quality of pain, the inevitability of suffering and death:

The ripest fruit was saddest;
Where I crept, the warmth was cloying.
In silence of webs, Abiku moans, shaping
Mounds from the yolk.

It is almost as if Soyinka's expansiveness has contracted. His spirit is not broken, but it has retrenched for watering. Though the poems are not the result of his prison experience, they are prophetic and reflective of it. Until the time of his imprisonment by his fellow Yoruba tribesmen and their powerful allies, the Hausas, he was a free spirit able to jibe and love all comers. Now the love remains but the stimulus for fulfillment, the desire for experience, has diminished.

African literature is not a monolith, a black slab of fixed features and categories. It is changing and vital. Some critics in searching for a "pure" or "representative" African literature may indeed be leading into stereotypes. There are generalities to be made about African

NEW DIRECTIONS

BOOKS

Ferlinghetti

TYRANNUS NIX? Challenging political satire on ". . . Nixon Nixon enigma Nixon." Paper, $1.25

Guillevic

SELECTED POEMS. Denise Levertov translates a leading French poet. Bilingual. $5.95; Paper, $1.95

John Hawkes

LUNAR LANDSCAPES. A novella, "Charivari;" six short stores; two short novels. Paper, $2.50

Thomas Merton

THE GEOGRAPHY OF LOGRAIRE. A "wide-angle mosaic of poems and dreams." $4.95; Paper, $1.75

Kenneth Patchen

SLEEPERS AWAKE. A "novelistic fantasy" with interludes of concrete poetry. Paper, $2.25

Ezra Pound

CONFUCIUS. English versions of Ta Hsio, Chung Yung and The Analects. $6.50; Paper, $2.45

Kenneth Rexroth

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL NOVEL. A poet recaptures the ferment of America in the 20's. Paper, $2.95

Dylan Thomas

A CHILD'S CHRISTMAS IN WALES. The classic tale with five wood engravings by Fritz Eichenberg. Ltd. ed., $200; Cloth, $4.00

Send for complete catalog

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 6th Ave.,
N.Y. 10014

literature, but the emphasis must remain on the individual writer who, like the Abiku child, returns again and again to plague the belly and mind of his carrier.

Soyinka's poems suggest an ever-evolving shape of African habitations and English literary traditions. Dawn, cockerels, egrets, sunset spears, frangipanes, the Abiku child—they are in his clean, spare, imagistic lines. They are branches into many different fields, not part of one enclosed tradition.

Dreams Without Substance

A SPECIAL PROVIDENCE. By Richard Yates. Alfred A. Knopf. 340 pp. $5.95.

JOYCE CAROL OATES

Miss Oates is an associate professor of English at the University of Windsor. She is the author, most recently, of Them (Vanguard) and a collection of poetry, Anonymous Sins (Louisiana State University Press).

In 1961 Richard Yates published a disturbing and prophetic novel, Revolutionary Road, which was nominated for the National Book Award. This novel explored various contemporary delusions, one of them being our American tendency to dream and to attribute to our necessary environments certain qualities of failure, impotence, deadliness, which supposedly account for the devastation of our dreams. No matter that we ourselves are underlings: let us blame our families, our husbands or wives, or society, America itself, the age itself! What we cannot and will not face is our own mediocrity.

A Special Providence is a novel about the grayness of lives, gray as the dust jacket of the book, relieved only by the irony of its title—a special providence? —and the continual comic antithesis between what the young hero imagines his role should be and what it actually is. Robert Prentice, 18, is shaped partly by his exasperating mother and partly by popular culture, mainly movies; his imagination veers skyward while his uncoordinated body takes him earthward, stumbling around in what seems perpetual confusion in World War II (a war which has been treated often in fiction, and which, in Yates's handling, is as chaotic and meaningless as ever). Whoever has written the scenario for Prentice has not had in mind any classical standards of heroism, or even sanity:

> There was no coherence to the days and nights. . . . There was never a whole night's sleep, and there was never enough to eat. Mile after mile of what was said to be the Ruhr was slowly consumed in the changeless rhythm of walking . . . through a haze of exhaustion the broken towns rose up and divided into broken streets and houses, and the houses divided into rooms; then rooms, houses, streets, and towns closed up and fell behind, and there were more roads, more fields and woods and railroad tracks and factories, with other towns waiting.

Impossible, in such a landscape, to locate one's own identity; and yet, maddening as the war and its marginal activities appear, life in the United States is not much better. Prentice's mother, Alice, has dragged him back and forth across the country, always a little bit ahead of her creditors and the realization that she is a failure as a mother, a woman and an artist. If only she were more obviously a failure, then both she and Prentice might be free of her delusions —but it is the predicament of a certain kind of mediocre human being that he cannot really make sure that he is not superior, that he does not owe the world his labor.

Alice Prentice is a sculptor with a few, a very few, successes. From what we can gather she has an enthusiastic, feminine talent, yet she is not very good —though, given the fluid standards of contemporary art, might she not on the very next page turn out to be immensely successful? After all, this is America. But it never quite happens that way; she ages, she becomes an alcoholic, she hangs onto her son desperately and pathetically, only to lose him at the end to no special providence . . . she simply loses him, abruptly and without much explanation.

The novel's central concern is with the dreary relationship between son and mother. It is a wonder that Prentice turns out as normal as he does; reared by his pseudo-Bohemian mother, who has herself rejected a conventional, plain husband, he is spoiled, self-conscious, a show-off, weak, awkward, doomed to secondary roles, one of the invisible people of life. Indeed, most of Yates's characters, in this novel, in Revolutionary Road, and in Eleven Kinds of Loneliness (a collection of short stories published in 1962) are invisible people, not quite there, unable to assert themselves or to guide their own destinies. They share, vaguely, in the destiny of their society. They seek personal grandeur, based upon ill-considered praise from ignorant judges who in any case do not mean what they say; they seek salvation of a kind, the transcendence of what they imagine to be a world not good enough for them. The only possible hope for them lies in their realizing, at some dismal time in

HACKBERRY

Bark sags in folds from the crotches down to where the trunk extends delicately, deliberately to suck water out from under the lawn.
Children know how the knotholes seem to shift sometimes. (Do gnarled sockets darken when we walk between it and the young pear?)
Our living room is dark. We wish the tree weren't there.

It's alive with ants; brisk birds creep upside down on its hide all day, grooming.
Twenty feet up, squirrels, grubs, beetles hang with thick shade over us, a ceiling, (tiny breaths, droppings). One dead limb creaks just over our bench. Wasps dive sizzling from it. Green leaves fall near us. It's alive.

It never seems to sleep; we hear how it tests its tether out there, restlessly. All night long it rubs against the roof. We think it remembers old years before we were born.
It's killing the grass.
We talk in bed about chain saws, ropes, danger. We take care not to be heard: it's awake.

NANCY PRICE

their lives, that they deserve no special fate—that they are not heroes in a Hollywood movie, after all.

Having endured the war, having survived a bout of pneumonia and other ugly experiences, Prentice still must "fight it out" with another mediocrity, the two of them seeking to determine who is "yellow" and who is not. They fight. Prentice does not win, but he does not exactly lose. And what is the conclusion? "He didn't think he had proved anything. It was turning out like everything else . . . like the ending of the war itself: no settling of accounts, no resolution, no proof. And what the hell did you expect, Prentice? Quint would have said. Do you think everything's going to work out the way it does in the movies? Aren't you ever going to learn?"

Yates's treatment of ordinary life here stresses the dullness, the lack of pattern, the lack of personal imaginative fulfillment. One feels that his people never have a chance: odd things may happen to them, but they are never odd enough, never tragic and awful enough, to lead to a change of vision. And there is a curious lack of detail in the work, as if it were imagined as a movie; the visual dimension of the Prentices' world is to be supplied by the viewer, automatically, perfunctorily. Perhaps because Alice Prentice moves so often, falls "in love" so often, she cannot establish a solid social environment which we might come to recognize, any more than her son can recognize it, if only to rebel against it. A sad, gray, deathly world—dreams without substance—aging without maturity: this is Yates's world, and it is a disturbing one.

Black Revolutionaries

An important article by Dan Aldridge on the development of black revolutionary consciousness. Also, David Horowitz analyzes the role of giant corporations in the formation of U.S. foreign policy; and the editors write on the significance of the multinational corporation. Send for your free sample copy of the November issue now.

MONTHLY REVIEW

Edited by Paul M. Sweezy and Harry Magdoff

Dept. 2 116 West 14 St. N.Y., N.Y. 10011
$7 a year students $5 (foreign add $1)

An American Provincial

MENCKEN. By Carl Bode. Southern Illinois University Press. 452 pp. $10.

ROBERT EMMET LONG

Mr. Long teaches English at Queens College. He publishes frequently on American literature.

Carl Bode's new biography, following by approximately a decade Mencken's death in 1956, signals a new wave of interest in Mencken's life and career. At the height of his fame in the 1920s, Mencken was described by Walter Lippmann as "the most powerful personal influence on this whole generation of educated people." The 1930s witnessed the radical decline of Mencken's reputation. His attack upon democracy and the common man and his opposition to liberalism left him without an audience, so that in the 1940s, while continuing to write, he seemed a figure of ghostly remoteness. Photographs of this later period show Mencken covering Presidential nominating conventions, his eyes staring out over spectacles tilted down on his nose with the expression of one who hardly knows where he is. Now, after a lengthy period of eclipse, Mencken is again the subject of interest and reappraisal.

In the last three years a number of books about him have appeared. Carl Dolmetsch's The Smart Set: A History and Anthology (1966) was an extensive study of Mencken as editor of one of the most influential magazines ever published in America; it was followed by a study by the French scholar Guy Forgue, H. L. Mencken, L'Homme, L'Oeuvre, L'Influence (Paris, 1967), and by Sara Mayfield's The Constant Circle (1968), a biography centering upon Mencken's marriage to Sara Haardt.

Bode's study fills in some gaps and shadowy places in Mencken's life. It elaborates on the story of Mencken's marriage and of his last, terrible years after a massive stroke in 1948 left him unable to write or speak clearly, nearly blind, wishing daily that he might die. The story of what happened to Mencken's independence and pride of intellect during a long, humiliating helplessness and infirmity is grim indeed. There is also fresh (if scrappy) information about Mencken's friendships and associations—his newspaper acquaintances and the beer drinking musical evenings of their Saturday Night Club, and his friendship with a number of women (Marion Bloom, Beatrice Wilson, Aileen Pringle, Anita Loos, Sara Haardt, Marcella DuPont) toward whom he acted as a middle-aged knight. Most of all, one sees Mencken in his Baltimore "localness"—in his attachment to the family home, with its Victorian furnishings and the habitualness of life they represented. Still, Bode's account is not greatly different from or significantly more informative than the earlier biographies.

What is most disappointing is Bode's evasion of critical judgment. It is literally impossible from reading the book to know what Bode thinks of Mencken and the nature of his achievement. The biography is marked by the absence of an interpreting mind. The data of Mencken's life is flatly presented. Mencken's mother is touched upon briefly but there is no searching out of implications. One would wish to know more about this woman, the center of the whole web of the Mencken family relationships, and under whose roof Mencken lived as a bachelor until well into middle age. Indeed, only until his mother had been dead five years did Mencken marry Sara Haardt—a mother surrogate who had been given only three years to live! There is a similar failure to find dimension in Bode's sketchy account of Mencken's friendships with Dreiser, Lewis, Fitzgerald and Nathan. Most of all, there is no weighing of Mencken's own writing, no attempt to place his career in perspective. Only indirectly, by the concentration upon Mencken's Baltimore background, by the display of how firmly rooted he was in the American middle class, is there an interesting insight into Mencken's temperament.

Mencken's provinciality shows nowhere more clearly than in his criticism, with its air of cosmopolitan authority and elitism that does not disguise his awkward self-education and the limitations of his mind. One recalls the literary criticism of Poe with its affectation of learning and European cultivation, which has at its core, despite intelligent comment and observation, merely a few narrow, inflexible dicta. The limitations of Mencken's mind are never more obvious than when he writes about poetry. In one of his weekly columns in The Smart Set, he extols a poem, "Tears," by the Baltimore poetess Lizette Woodworth Reese ("When I consider Life and its few years —/ A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun"), which he compares favorably with Keats's great odes. But, he concludes, even so nobly wrought a poem as "Tears" is an escape from reason and reality, as is, he believes, all poetry. This bumptious dismissal is typical of the way Mencken will pronounce on subjects of which he knows little or nothing. He seems at such times like a small-town editor handing down sure opinions to an audience whose culture is even more limited than his own.

Mencken was better equipped as a critic of fiction, and it is to his credit that he recognized and encouraged many of the best young writers of his time; yet even here his judgments were narrow and often inadequate. The genius of Henry James was lost on him, unaware even that James was an initiator of the new realism he advocated; Emerson, Thoreau and Hawthorne merely illustrated the corseted gentility of post-Puritan New England. He was generous in his praise of the naturalists, but writers of any other tradition did not interest him, and he did not try to understand them. Mencken was a popularizer of a certain school of writing, and even more of a certain view of life. But this concentrated strength was also a measure of the extreme restrictedness of his mind.

Mencken brought his vision to bear upon the whole moral geography of the 1920s, with its unexamined and optimistic faith in religion and democracy. No one ever wrecked more middle-class idols than Mencken, or addressed himself to the common life with such tragicomic exuberance. Mencken's mind was not luminously large and discerning: it was closed to everything but one aspect of life—our national provinciality. But his caricature was so powerful that it still lives. His success is no doubt explained by his own provinciality—his amazing literalness of mind, his obsession with the spectacle of the common life immediately before him. Mencken thought of himself in the tragic tradition of Nietzsche, yet he seems to us today as one of our great and authentic humorists.

Eyewitness to History

PRIME TIME: The Life of Edward R. Murrow. By Alexander Kendrick. Little, Brown & Co. 548 pp. $8.95.

DESMOND SMITH
Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is on the staff of C.B.S. News.

The dramatic portrait on the cover of Mr. Kendrick's biography shows Edward R. Murrow wearing an airman's Mae West, a cigarette clamped between thumb and index finger. It sets the scene perfectly for the life and strenuous times of the news broadcaster whose portentous voice over C.B.S. radio and somber presence on C.B.S.-TV came to represent the exact, unshakable truth for millions of Americans throughout the 1940s and 1950s. The Murrow era spanned the Munich crisis of 1938 to the McCarthy nightmare of the 1950s. When I joined the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in 1952, it was the C.B.S. News service, largely shaped and certainly dominated by Murrow, that represented our ideal of what broadcast journalism should be. For most of us, Edward R. Murrow was the heroic Malraux-like reporter of action who fought off every kind of interference with his story, both from above and from the outside. He gave broadcast journalism size and direction, and largely from his own personal qualities: intelligent curiosity, clarity of thought, the power to transmit experience, and a skepticism when confronted with facile generalizations.

To most Americans he is now but a dim figure from an era of Philco radios and 14-inch black-and-white TV screens. When I mentioned his name at a dinner party recently, the hostess recalled him only as, "that charming man who used to do Person-to-Person, and smoked too many cigarettes." So it is good to be reminded of this extraordinary communicator in this first full-length study written by one of Murrow's close associates, C.B.S. correspondent Alexander Kendrick. The book is always interesting, though not invariably convincing, for reasons both of manner and content. It is written in a rather pedestrian style, freighted with touches of heavy irony; and the chronology is not always easy to follow. This is a pity. Mr. Kendrick is an intelligent writer who has, presumably, had complete access to the Murrow papers. What he does here is to detail yet again the sins of commercial television and, particularly, to describe the role of Edward R. Murrow in battling the Establishment. "Describe" is the word. He does not really explain it at all.

To be fair to Mr. Kendrick, Murrow, for all his public visibility, kept pretty much to himself when out of camera range. As a newsman he possessed a ferocious appetite for work. He was pure hard news. Nothing else. He took few vacations, and what little social life he allowed himself was invariably work related. Mr. Kendrick's account of Murrow's working methods makes absorbing reading. As a self-driven reporter, he had a quite extraordinary desire to be a part of whatever he was reporting, and at the same time to be back in New York to present the story in the role of sagacious pundit. Few people can be in two places at once. Murrow often was. He rarely had six hours' straight sleep, smoked too much, sweated profusely from nervous tension.

Murrow's reputation in radio was easily transferable to television. He possessed, as they say, "the right cosmetics." Lean, dark and handsome, his somber good looks and baritone voice attracted audience and sponsors alike. At the height of his career his annual salary was more than $200,000. Yet it's a fair bet that neither money nor acclaim had much to do with Murrow's conscientiousness and diligence; he worked the way he did because he enjoyed asking questions, finding answers, above and beyond all else being an eyewitness to history.

Edward R. Murrow was born in 1908 on a small farm near Greensboro, N.C. His father was a farmer, though not a successful one. Murrow worked his way through Washington State College at all manner of jobs, and spent his vacations working in logging camps. At college he was a straight arrow. He was proud to be pledged to the "best" fraternity on campus, enjoyed drilling in the ROTC, joined the debating society, was featured in college dramatics. The yearbook attributed his success to "an A-plus personality." He became president of the National Student Federation. In 1930 he was graduated. There being no other jobs around he took a full-time (but unpaid) job with the Federation and moved to New York. Two years later he moved to the Carnegie-financed Institute of International Education as its assistant director, and in 1935 joined the Columbia Broadcasting System as head of its newly formed Talks and Special Events department. He was 26 years old. William Paley, the C.B.S. board chairman, "who had an active interest in what his network was doing, especially in the field of public affairs," writes Kendrick, "was first struck by his young talk director's zeal and undoubted skills. They saw each other often, and the business relationship began to develop into personal friendship." The rapport between the two men was, of course, the source of much of Murrow's power.

Until the late 1930s there really wasn't a great amount of news programming to be found on radio. Between the wars Americans got most of their news from newspapers. Radio provided a diet of "special events"—Presidential speeches, international music festivals, talks by foreign dignitaries, and so forth. As Kendrick notes, it was not uncommon to hear the announcer say after reading the news headlines, "For further details consult your local newspaper." At the time when Mussolini's troops were invading Ethiopia, C.B.S. put on a concert of native instruments by Ethiopian tribesmen. News values were no different at N.B.C. There, as Nazi bombers brought death and destruction to Guernica, N.B.C.'s chief international contribution was a world-wide Singing Mouse contest.

In 1937 Murrow was sent to London with the title of European director and the job of arranging talks and special events. While Hitler's troops were crossing the Austrian border Murrow found himself in Warsaw arranging a Polish children's program for the C.B.S. American School of the Air. It was Hitler's aerial onslaught on London that firmly established Murrow's reputation as a newsman. By the time America entered the war, Murrow was already a legend with his radio news reports from the British capital. He reported air raids from the burning streets, drove around at the height of the blitz in an open car, and scorned even elementary safety precautions.

When he sailed back to the United States in 1946, Murrow seemed aware that he had hit his high spot emotionally during the war. In a final broadcast over the B.B.C. he summed up his wartime years, and remarked, "You were living a life, not an apology."

He spent eighteen unrewarding months as vice president in charge of news for C.B.S. and found most of the time was spent living an apology not a life. He explained, "It's the big desk with the telephones, the In basket and the Out basket. Conferences, memos, budgets and firing people. Who am I to be firing people, the Almighty Himself?" So Murrow resigned the vice presidency. He never again went back into the executive suite, except to argue. Instead he returned to the microphone and the daily news broadcasts.

Murrow's idealist temperament and upbringing often got him into trouble during the Red scare years of the fifties. The cautions and accommodations which normally accompany a pay check in broadcasting were not for him. With great courage he took it upon himself to help broadcasters who had been "let go" because of liberal or left-wing leanings. Toward the end of his broadcasting career he became a kind of myth figure, a hugely enlarged reality that verged on near fantasy, lauded by after-dinner speakers as, "the conscience of broadcasting." Murrow was the most powerful, and arguably the greatest, news broadcaster in American television, which meant he was not without his bitter enemies inside the industry.

We know now that Murrow left broadcasting a deeply frustrated and angry man. In his final years at C.B.S. he found himself increasingly at odds with the network powers over news policy. This distressed him. He would brood about it, and then he would go and see his old friend and boss, William Paley. When the crisis was papered over he would return to work, but inevitably another crisis would occur and the cycle would begin again.

Kendrick sees Murrow as the victim of a changing concept of broadcasting; C.B.S. which, under the presidency of Dr. Frank Stanton, had mushroomed from a relatively small broadcasting system in the late thirties, emerged as a giant "knowledge" conglomerate in the fifties. Kendrick bitterly quotes a C.B.S. annual report which boasted that the company was "the world's largest advertising medium," and he argues that an earlier philosophy originated by Paley, that of public service, had been abandoned in favor of "servicing the public." In 1959, spent in health, desperately in need of a rest, Edward R. Murrow announced he was taking a sabbatical year. He never returned to C.B.S. Two years later he announced his resignation, after twenty-five years of broadcasting, to become head of the United States Information Agency in the Kennedy administration.

The aspect of Murrow which is most admirable, as Kendrick clearly shows, was his profound commitment to fair-minded reporting. It was his great achievement to raise the public status of broadcast journalism and thus restore a healthier balance to the democratic process. When Murrow began broadcasting, radio was not considered a reliable news source, newspapers suffered from what Harold Ickes called the "arrogance of power." ("The public," a 1939 Fortune survey reported, "has a poor opinion of the press's truthfulness about the publishers' personal and political friends, and big advertisers.") Murrow helped restore the public esteem of both broadcasting and newspapers—the first deliberately, the second consequentially.

In his last public speech in October 1964, Murrow cautioned: "The speed of communication is wondrous to behold. It is also true that speed can multiply the distribution of information that we know to be untrue. The most sophisticated satellite has no conscience . . . and in the end the communicator will be confronted with the old problem, of what to say and how to say it." The problem has outlived Ed Murrow.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

A book that broke into the news several years ago was Games People Play, in which Eric Berne used the stylish "scenario" method to elucidate a great number of the ploys whereby neurotics attempt to stay one up on their associates. Susan Sontag's Duet for Cannibals might be taken as a projection of the book, its players working out literally the little dramas which Dr. Berne's case histories were for the most part staging symbolically. The film is thus lively with aberrant deportment—everything from sudden attacks of vomiting to drawing-room copulation. It is also solidly performed

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

Vol. XIII, No. 4 Fall 1969

JAMES T. ARAKI
Kawabata and His Snow Country

G. R. STEVENS
The Sun Is Setting on the Paleface Brave

ALVIN GREENBERG
The Revolt of Objects: The Opposing World in the Modern Novel

EUGENE GOODHEART
Relevance and the Authority of Culture

FREDERICK PLOTKIN
Diderot's Nephew and the Mimics of Enlightenment

CHARLOTTE SPIVACK
The Elizabethan Theatre: Circle and Center

• • •

Subscription Rates:
$1.00 for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues)
$5.00 for two years

Available at bookstores or from 110 Morrill Hall
Michigan State University
East Lansing, Michigan 48823

POEM

I meet Mother in the street,

she hardly recognizes me;
I have to pull her by the sleeve of her coat.

Then she stops, smiles and says:
I'm so proud of you my son!

LENNART BRUCE

THE ACCIDENT

(To Madelynne)

Dragged upright,
Towed to its hideous graveyard,
My wife's near-hearse
Stands abject among the other wrecks
As if asking forgiveness
For nearly killing her. But a closer look Shows up the lying trash:
It bristles with lethal splinters
Of glass, malevolent flash-Es in the sun, those dark dried stains
Were vivid with her blood,
And the world batters me down,
There, among the violent funerals.

But not hers! Not hers!
My heart assures me in its great good luck,
And I think of her untouched mind
Under the long scalp wound,
Her green eyes, puffed and black,
Under the rash of bruises
Nothing hurt or broken. In the light
Of that miracle I leave hurriedly,
Never looking back,
And become instantly fugitive,
Brayed at by funeral horns. . .

Out of sight and sound
Of the killing freeways,
In a sunlit field, cows are grazing,
A light wind stirs the grass. . .

Was it yesterday I saw
How like a cloud the shape of absence is
To fill a world with tears?
It blacks out. Long ago.
And I watch where she will enter the field,
Stopping and looking up,
Assuring herself of the sky,
Of the earth firm underfoot.
Then trusting herself again
To the natural hazards,
To the lifelong frailties of love.

ERIC BARKER

ANCESTRAL SCENES

old crystal a dry piece of cake remains on the plate

also herring scraps radishes slice of blackbread tea-leaves etc.

the man who farts likes it letting his muscles relax

& feels inky more like a sponge than a man how alarming, how vulgar they said, their way of speaking said it

JEROME ROTHENBERG

HOLY GROUND

Sometimes, not to hurt myself,
But because I depend
On the steadfast natural world,
I drive the car down the dirt road
By the creek where we used to go crabbing.
The crabs are still there, blue-claws,
Born fighting, fast, wicked, worthy opponents.
Here is a young green heron
Describing its lean arabesque
On the corner fence post.
Otters melt down their mud slide
The way they always have melted.
Flowers in the ditch are ones we identified,
Boneset and purple loosestrife.

I come at all seasons but oftener in the fall
When lightning wings of the horned lark
Flash for me and its aerial call Rings in my blood;
When in the flood of afternoon's final hush
Sumac reveals itself as the burning bush.

MARION LINEAWEAVER

by one Italian and three Swedish actors (I have not been told why Miss Sontag chose to make her movie debut in Sweden, but it permits her to supply efficient subtitles in addition to her contributions as writer and director), and well photographed in the deceptively rational Swedish style.

But as narrative or elucidation of character the picture seems to me to have almost no significance at all. That may be because Miss Sontag, though a challenging social critic, is not gifted as a creative writer. She wishes to show, with the clarification conferred by exaggeration, that people in our day have taken to devouring one another, but she lacks the particular kind of imagination that can couch this no doubt accurate observation in credible fiction. Thus the postulates of the film are acceptable enough: Dr. Bauer from Germany is a failed revolutionary, now in retirement; his Italian wife, considerably younger, is a frustrated woman of strong libido; they have chewed on each other so long that they must now seek outside nourishment. But then we come to the active present of the work, and it is much less acceptable that Tomas and his girl friend Ingrid should serve themselves up for the other couple's perverted appetite.

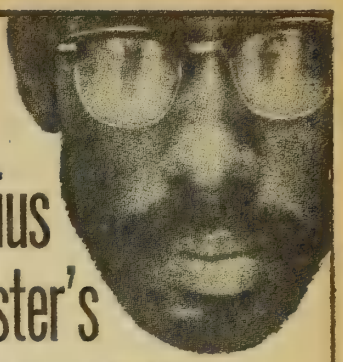
They must do so, of course, because the film's thesis so demands, but it was beyond Miss Sontag's power to suggest that anything other than her own determination was motivating them. Thus, since I could find no ground for agreeing that Tomas and Ingrid would allow the Bauers to use them in the degrading and alarming ways stipulated, I could make sense of the picture only by assuming that the actors were engaged in charades—an assumption made easier by the prominent use of such aids as dark glasses, hats, toy pistols, bandages, closets and abrupt changes of scene. Charades alternately bore and embarrass me and I am no good at ferreting out the hidden word. I was glad when Tomas and Ingrid decided to pack it up, and return to the sanity of their student loft. They looked utterly unchanged by the desperate antics pressed upon them by the doctor and his wife, but I was aware that I had aged by an hour and a half.

Lions Love is also about nothing much, but Agnes Varda has animated it with much more agreeable people, and you can almost slide home safely on the non sequiturs. It seems that Shirley Clarke has come to Hollywood to make her first commercial movie, but is denied artistic autonomy by a benevolent tycoon who will not trust his box office gross to the director of The Connection and Jason. She takes a dose of sleeping pills (as she herself objects, she is not the sort of woman to engage in that kind of nonsense, and Miss Varda, nudged by Pirandello, must step before the camera to show her how it is done), but is saved by Viva, Warhol's star, and Jerome Ragni and James Rado, the begetters of Hair. These last are shacked up in a Pop art motel à trois, and it is their ingratiating arrogance that keeps the film bouncing. They assume that they are witty and charming on the basis of such slight evidence that the assumption itself conveys wit and charm.

It is a little too much, though—self-satisfaction is not an enduring theatrical spell. But Miss Varda has staged Miss Clarke's near suicide to coincide with the assassination of Robert Kennedy and the attempted murder of Andy Warhol. This coincidence, although greatly drawn out with TV coverage of the Kennedy shooting and its immediate aftermath, puts a burden of significance on the film. The little "in" entertainment, which seems made as much for the amusement of its participants as for public applause, begins to look anxious.

The director is shrewd and so are her performers. They have come up with a plausible definition of the life style of plastic youth: a litter of irresponsibility obscured by a smog of love. For Viva, Ragni and Rado, as they here mock themselves, what you are is the role you play—another day, another part. So naturally nothing gets picked up and no wagers are for keeps. But Kennedy's death imposes itself; it will not absorb into the kaleidoscope of self-absorption. And a mist of undirected love won't obscure that kind of litter.

THEATRE



HAROLD CLURMAN

October 16th saw the American première of the Institute of Actor's Research Laboratory Theatre of Wroclaw, Poland, under the direction of Jerzy Grotowski. For those who are particularly keen on the study of fresh trends in the theatre the evening was of great moment. Grotowski's ideas, methods of training and production have already exercised much influence in Europe (on Peter Brook, for instance) and to some extent here.

When I emerged from the Washington Square Methodist Church on West 4th Street—where the event took place—and later at various social occasions where I was asked what I thought of the first Grotowski production, I decided not only to withhold any expression of opinion but not to formulate one even for myself until I had seen the second and third productions scheduled for November and December. One can't be casual about Grotowski; one ought not to be hasty. His art is something.

Thus I turn to the many minor but readily accessible stage offerings upon which I have deferred comment. I say "accessible" because the Grotowski evenings are open to no more than 100 persons per performance.

Athol Fugard's Hello and Goodbye (Sheridan Square Playhouse) interested me only because it is the work of an author who some time ago wrote a good play, The Blood Knot, and because I discerned a sort of parable in it. A young woman returns to a wretched home in a small South African town after fifteen years in England. In the past, she had suffered a bad time with her father, a railroad worker, as well as with her brother. Her return is prompted by the hope that she may share in the insurance money her father, now moribund, had acquired through the loss of

Julius Lester's

SEARCH FOR THE NEW LAND

"Wonderful—a talking mixture of anger, disgust, and love, And hope. In its way, it says almost everything."—GEORGE WALD, Winner of the 1967 Nobel Prize for Medicine

"Necessary to anyone's understanding of the 60's"—JULIAN BOND

In this searing yet compassionate work, the author of Look Out Whitey! Black Power's Gon' Get Your Mama! and To Be a Slave tells how the poison in the American soul has acted upon and created his own generation, black and white.

$4.95, now at your bookstore

THE DIAL PRESS

Photo: David Gahr

Free to Authors

To The Author In Search of a Publisher

OF BOOK MANUSCRIPTS

Is your manuscript ready (or almost ready) for publication? Send for this valuable booklet packed with information every writer should have. Tells how to get your work published, promoted, distributed. Write Vantage Press, Dept. FR-59, 120 W. 31 St., New York 10001 a leg due to an accident at his work. But there is no money, and the brother fails to tell his sister that the father is already dead. By the time she leaves the shack, we realize that her brother has made himself into the image of his father, to the point of tying up one of his own legs so that he will eventually lose the use of it.

If this story means anything, Fugard is saying that those who cling to the old ways in South Africa (at least), those who harbor a nostalgia for such homes and hope to prolong their "tradition," are doomed to cripple themselves.

But whatever the play's "message," its dramatic body is not at all stimulating. One sits through it with forced patience because one expects poignancy of some kind and because Colleen Dewhurst acts with arresting authority. As her brother, Martin Sheen, for all his effort, is much too wholesome and straightforward a human being to make convincing the muddied mind and soul of the character he plays.

PERSONALS

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

50% COMMISSIONS possible 10 days from now. Easy money—NO Investment—EVER! Send 10c —SCOTT GIFTS, 7425 Beach Ct., Milwaukee, Wisc. 53217.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 101 W. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10001.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 11-10-69
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $[illegible]
☐ Two Years, $[illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $[illegible]
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

The Ofay Watcher by Frank Cucci (Stage 73) is a "morality" piece. It says that anyone who wants to solve the problem of racial prejudice by making the black man lose a sense of his nature (and difference) by turning him "white" deserves to have his throat cut—which is exactly what happens in the play.

It begins comically—the black man caricaturing the clever-dumb darkey type—and ends in the murder of both the white fool and his black paramour who actually wants to be turned white. In other words, the play proceeds from burlesque to horror. Some reviewers treated this charade seriously. I can't. As an earnest statement it is silly if not fraudulent; as entertainment it is primitive. What sustains it is an excellent cast: Cleavdon Little, Terry Kiser, Billie Allen.

Salvation by Peter Link and C. C. Courtney (Jan Hus Playhouse) exploits the vein of free-wheeling rock and roll jamboree made familiar by Hair. The church is mocked, sex is celebrated, and the kids are happy. All the expected gimmicks are there in little, and a good time is had by all whose sense of fun is juvenile.

A Whistle in the Dark, originally produced by the Long Wharf Theatre Company of New Haven (and now in New York at the Mercury), is very much better than the strong stuff mentioned above. Thomas Murphy, the author, has observed and experienced what he talks about. The play depicts the fundamentally depressed among the poor and uneducated in a small town in Ireland. Its authenticity is unmistakable; its effect pathetic and shocking.

The Carneys are a family tightly knit by ignorance and mutual hate. The father, a retired policeman, is a bully, a ne'er-do-well braggart, obtuse, cowardly, full of inane laughter and stupid pride in the murky grandeur of the native lowly. He has inspired his sons to hard drinking and to feuding with members of another clan. One of his five sons is a pimp whose frustration manifests itself in deliberate violence. Physical prowess constitutes the family's nobility. One of the boys yearns futilely to escape the indignity of the environment and is eager to save his youngest brother from its ordure. The "intellectual" of the family, he is too late to remove the blight which has already begun to corrode the 17-year-old boy. In the end, to defend himself against being beaten by his "baby" brother, egged on by their father and brothers who resent the "superior" member of the family, the older man unwittingly kills the younger. The father protests pitifully that he always tried to do his best.

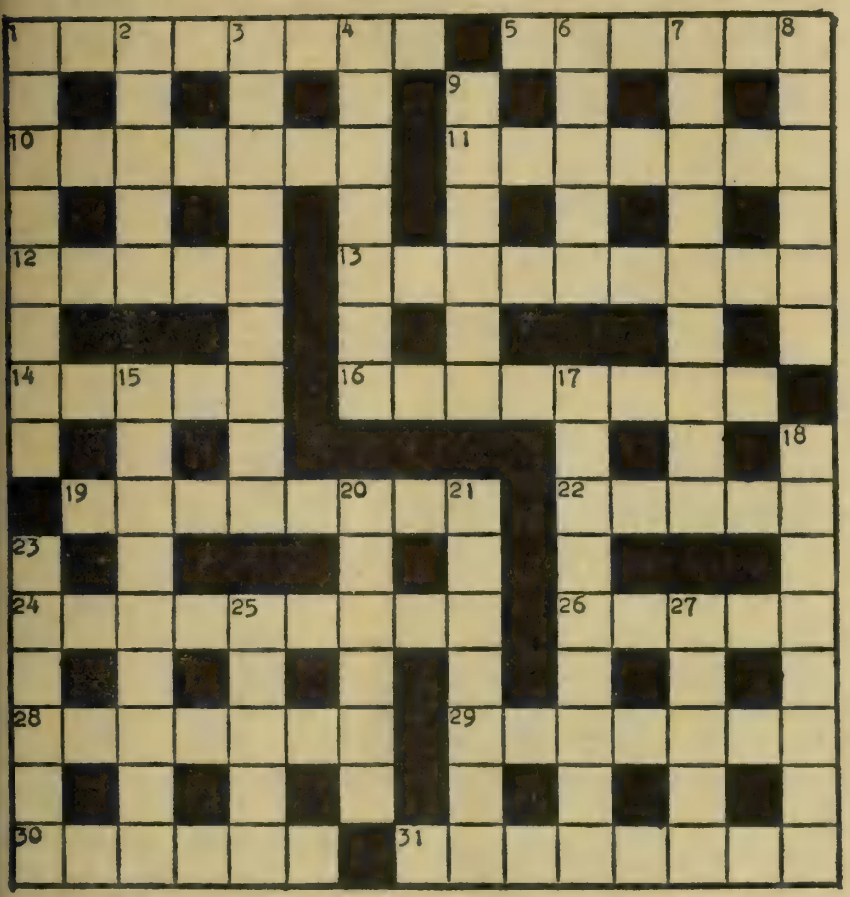
There is little subtlety in this play; it is funny in a ghoulish way. Its method and content are not new, but I am less concerned with what is new than what is true. Here one is in the midst of life not of fabrication.

The casting and acting are admirable with especially good performances by Stephen Elliot as Carney père, Charles Cioffi as the thuggish brother, and Roberta Maxwell as the Cockney girl whom the sober brother has married.

Back on Broadway, Butterflies Are Free by Leonard Gershe (Booth Theatre) is in the vein of the slight comedies which are a constant of the world's stages. As such, it is pleasant enough, with cute quips, tolerable human beings, affable nonsense, honorable sentiments in the permissive key of the day. It is slick with acceptably facile commercial craft. The story deals with a blind young man's love affair with a near "hippie" girl, popularly adorable. As pastime, the play will harm no one and will be well liked by many.

What gives the evening savor is, once again, a perfectly chosen cast. Particularly expert is Eileen Heckart as an uptight WASP mother who under the starch of her respectability possesses common sense and a heart of gold. Miss Heckart's long face—to which she knows how to lend an even longer line and an owlish look of imminent disapproval, and from which issues a cool stream of crisp cleverness—is the mask of a thoroughly aware professional.

Blythe Danner is Broadway's newest sweetheart. She is utterly winning and a talented actress. She is entirely relaxed ("natural" is the more usual epithet), delicately funny and in every way, including the corporeal, yummy. Keir Dullea as the blind youth is intelligent, sympathetic and easy; he manages to convey feeling without becoming mawkish.



My conclusion after all these shows is that while acting of great scope or significance is still rare among us, the level of acting in general is above that of most of the writing. But why do so few of our actors appear grown-up? I believe the answer lies not only in the conduct of the theatre itself but even more in the realm outside it.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1320

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Does it carry water where the horses might be? (8)
5 Exhaust in part, or excise entirely. (3,3)
10 In return, point out the bad inside, and straightway brighten up. (7)
11 One who swaggers might have an association with St. Nick. (7)
12 Ted's a satisfied sort, obviously. (5)
13 Is an explosion of the sun put off in A-OK manner? (2,2,5)
14 and 25 down Company association? Not with the film star! (5,5)
16 Hold up what's left with a drop of water. (8)
19 A case of poisoning that leaves Doc and I mixed up in a take-it-or-leave-it situation. (8)
22 The fruit of encouragement? (5)
24 Dance team of a balky mule and a fractious nag. (9)
26 Can there be no militia raised without this headdress? (5)
28 The Devil you say? Bruce, otherwise! (6,1)
29 Like the philosophy of Xenophanes, if I elect a substitute. (7)
30 Edna St. Vincent Millay's was born of a little sin. (6) 31 An order of protozoa? Try to successfully serve one! (8)

DOWN

1 and 18 down It might be un mensaje —as written by Elbert Hubbard. (1,7,2,6)
2 Implying there may be no match for a French bed! (5)
3 and 4 The watchword of the successful cut-up? (6,3,7)
6 The heights of rural setting? (5)
7 Showing your teeth in opposition? (9)
8 The plant management is economical, evidently. (6)
9 A false step is taken to be instances of ill will. (6)
15 Rock the holder of it, destined for a very special drawer. (9)
17 The type of fever to send to the shelter? (9)
18 See 1 down
20 Fisher perhaps was the ruling descendant of Mohammed. (6)
21 With unequal sides, cleanse the result.
23 Affects a smile when what might be written up annoys one. (6)
25 See 14 across
27 Certainly not a low story told in Greek.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1319

ACROSS: 1 In exchange; 10 Mustang; 11 Intuits; 12 Clipping; 13 Honor; 15 and 24 down Upset price; 17 Vagabonds; 19 Two-handed; 21 Tempe; 23 Nacre; 24 Pebbling; 27 A priori; 28 Upsurge; 29 and 5 Easy-going; 30 Censorship. DOWN: 1 Isms; 2 Ensiles; 3 and 9 Champ at the bit; 4 Aggrieved; 7 Avignon; 8 Distresses; 14 Just in case; 16 Travelog; 18 Gadabouts; 20 Oxcarts; 22 Monarch; 25 Laser; 26 and 6 Deeplaid.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

PUBLICATIONS

DEAR FRIEND EISENMAN: "Your HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM is wonderful. I plan on using it repeatedly. Everything you write is stimulating." D. F. Fleming — December, 1965. NOW READ "Volume Two, WHY I SHOULD BE PRESIDENT" by Abram Eisenman: "WITHDRAW FROM VIETNAM AND THAILAND". "FREE ABORTION. FULL EQUALITY FOR WOMEN". "GOVERNMENT UNDERWRITES WORK FOR ALL". "FIFTY BILLIONS FOR PEACE NOT WAR". "WOMB TO TOMB SOCIAL SECURITY". Send five dollars for autographed copy to THE SAVANNAH SUN, 234 E. 48th Street, Savannah, Ga. 31405. HARD COVER. TELLS ALL.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832, Kan[illegible] City, Missouri 64141.

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

EDWARD M. KENNEDY QUARTERLY. Everything about the Senator. 4-issue subscription: $2.00. Sample copy: 50c. Write: EMK—N, 65 Tysens Lane, Staten Island, N.Y. 10306

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 1 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Printing Inc., Milford, Conn

Holy War In Belfast?

History repeats itself if its roots remain intact. Northern Ireland was torn by civil strife in 1886 and again in 1969. Why? What are the roots?

HOLY WAR IN BELFAST, published in the "Free State" of Ireland, deals with these questions. It exposes the roots of the current strife in the historic struggle for and against English domination. Taking the story from the 18th century right up to August, 1969, the author, Andrew Boyd, reveals the real significance of the religious conflict.

HOLY WAR IN BELFAST is not being distributed in the United States. But you can have it as a free gift if you subscribe now to The NATION. Enter a one-year subscription and you will receive HOLY WAR IN BELFAST, a history of the conflict in Northern Ireland.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will send you HOLY WAR IN BELFAST, by Andrew Boyd, free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me HOLY WAR IN BELFAST.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico, $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 11-10

PORTUGAL LOREN JENKINS

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 17, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
NOV 17 1969
LIBRARY

The Real World Comes to Wyoming

STEVE MURDOCK

Blacks on Campus: INTEGRATION BY EVASION

ROBERT F. ENGS & JOHN B. WILLIAMS

Change or Stagnation
Case for Advocacy Journalism

DAVID DEITCH

Gulf of Tonkin / Richard J. Walton
Lawrence Alloway on Harold Rosenberg

LETTERS

from Broadway to Alaska

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Harold Clurman's review of the play Indians by Arthur Kopit [The Nation, Nov. 3] states incisively the case for greater public awareness of our nation's treatment, past and present, of its American Indian people. While Mr. Kopit's play deals with historical events, the issues he raises are as current as the Alaska oil boom.

In Alaska today 60,000 Indians, Eskimos and Aleuts are fighting to protect their lands from expropriation. In 1884 the Congress promised to honor the aboriginal land rights of Alaska's Native people, and for eighty-five years it has failed to act.

The Senate and House committees on Interior and Insular Affairs are now considering proposals to settle Alaska Native land rights.

The Alaska Federation of Natives, representing the three aboriginal ethnic groups, has recommended to Congress what it considers to be fair terms. Their proposals are contained in S.3041 and H.R.14212. These bills call for confirming to the Natives legal title to 40 million acres of land—roughly 10 per cent of the lands to which they have valid claim, cash compensation for the land to which they surrender their claim, and 2 per cent mineral royalty.

Congress is today writing the sequel to Mr. Kopit's play. Let us hope that it has a more fortunate conclusion.

William Byler, Executive Director Association on American Indian Affairs

paper peril

London

DEAR SIRS: It is really shocking, I think, that Mr. Tertius Chandler, presumably a reader of The Nation, should pretend that your country's undeclared war against Vietnam is "to protect the United States from the two huge Communist powers" [letter, Oct. 6]. For the logical corollary of your country's approaching defeat in that war, which even The Wall Street Journal has long since (Feb. 23, 1968) pronounced "inevitable," would expose it to the direst peril. Which is absurd, I suggest, since both the People's Republic of China and the Soviet Union have repeatedly made it quite clear that they don't want to fight with you (or with any other country), and will do so only if they are attacked.

In the case of the former country, moreover, it is quite obvious that it could not fight with you unless you went over to its side of the Pacific.

Edgar P. Young, Comdr.
Royal Navy (Ret.)

due credit

New York City

DEAR SIRS: B. J. Widick's report on the AFL-CIO convention, "The Isolation of George Meany" [editorial, The Nation, Oct. 20], leaves an important point unanswered. He notes that the election of Michael Harrington in Massachusetts represents the new mood of American politics, which is both a repudiation of Meany and an indication of the direction that labor must now take. He might have added that Harrington could not have won without the support of the Committee on Political Education (COPE), the political arm of the AFL-CIO, which financed most of his campaign and contributed valuable manpower. Meany disagreed with Harrington's views on the war, of course, but he liked him in other respects, and I think that liberals who are so quick to dismiss the AFL-CIO might show a similar degree of flexibility.

Carl Gershman

EDITORIALS

Notes on the Election

Of the recent elections, Mayor John V. Lindsay's victory is by far the most significant nationally. It re-establishes Lindsay, after his bad showing in the June primary, more firmly than ever as a "main-eventer" on the national political scene. Bowled over by his victory, many of his recent critics are now saying that he would be an ideal Vice Presidential nominee for the Republicans in 1972. And so he would. The GOP now has governors in all the states of the Northeast, but Nixon is not popular in any of them with the possible exception of New Hampshire. However, a Nixon-Lindsay ticket, which made little real sense—at least from Lindsay's point of view—in 1968, is not likely to make much better sense in 1972. What does make sense is a new coalition of the kind we described some weeks ago when discussing Lindsay's campaign ("Lindsay and the Future," The Nation, September 22). The elements clearly exist: young voters, intellectuals, blacks, a sizable section of the labor movement, liberal Democrats, liberal Republicans, independents, Jewish voters, Puerto Ricans, the poor, the better-educated middle class—"a coalition of conscience," concerned with the urgent new issues. These elements may be less attached to parties in New York than elsewhere, but they exist in most of the major cities.

The problem is how to combine them. In New York it was easy because Lindsay had neither major party endorsement and appeared only on the Liberal Party and Independent Party lines. Whether a new coalition emerges and what form it will take if it does, are questions that cannot be answered just yet. But Lindsay is the central figure in national coalition politics. No figure would pull more liberal Republican votes to the Democratic Party as a Presidential or Vice Presidential nominee if he decided to change his registration. Conversely he would be a strong rallying point for liberal Republicans within the party. As we have suggested, he could challenge Nixon in selected primaries, much as McCarthy challenged Johnson. Or he could be a major figure in any independent protest movement or third party. Fortunately he is now free of party obligations and can move in whatever direction he sees fit. Nor should it be forgotten that a kind of de facto coalition has existed for quite some time; it is one of the means by which independent voters frustrate the party bosses. In default of the kind of Democratic nominees they like, independent Democrats will readily vote for liberal Republicans and the reverse is also true. For example, if California Democrats should nominate Stanley Mosk—who would first have to resign as a justice of the state supreme court—he would pull liberal Republican votes in volume and would be an odds-on favorite to defeat Sen. George Murphy next year. On the other hand, if former Sen. Thomas Kuchel were to change his registration and then go on to win the Democratic nomination, he could trounce Murphy. In other words, either Mosk or Kuchel would be excellent "coalition" candidates.

As to the other elections, President Nixon is being given credit for Republican victories in Virginia and New Jersey which he does not deserve. The Republican nominees for governor were the front runners in both states before he decided to campaign for them. Linwood Holton, the Republican nominee in Virginia, had the support of AFL-CIO and the leading Negro voter organization. A vote for Holton was one means of voting against remnants of the Byrd machine.

In New Jersey, the Democrats could hardly escape responsibility for the flourishing Mafia enclaves in the state. Moreover, labor was split and the Hudson County Democratic machine, headed by John V. Kenny, had turned against Meyner. In fact, in this race Cahill, the Republican, had the attributes of a big-city Democrat: Catholic, Irish-American, large family constantly on display, and eccentric diction.

In Pittsburgh, Peter F. Flaherty, a city councilman, who ran against the Democratic machine in the primary, defeated John R. Tabor, the Republican, by a vote of 95,038 to 49,426. A "new politics" type, Flaherty would have nothing to do with the Democratic machine which has been in undisputed control of Pittsburgh for decades. A few days before the election, he published a full account of his campaign expenses and donations; the total came to some $75,000. This forced Tabor to publish a similar statement, which showed contributions of around $450,000 and the list of donors read like the membership of the Duquesne Club. Flaherty's victory is a real upset and will have significant repercussions in the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania.

The Detroit election was close: 257,312 for County Sheriff Roman S. Gribbs and 250,002 for Richard H. Austin, who is a Negro. Both are Democrats, for Detroit elections are conducted on a nonpartisan basis. Detroit is so sharply polarized it is doubtful that any Negro could have been elected, but the size of the Negro vote there and elsewhere is an assurance that Negroes have won a significant role in decision making.

In Cleveland, Carl B. Stokes was re-elected by a narrow margin. In Buffalo, Frank A. Sedita, a Democrat, won re-election for a third term as a Democrat despite an aggressive challenge by Mrs. Alfreda Slominski, a Republican-Conservative "law and order" candidate. A Negro candidate siphoned off 7,000 votes that might otherwise have gone to Sedita, but the bulk of the Negro vote went to him. Nor should it be forgotten that in late October, Sam H. Massell, Jr., with heavy Negro backing, was the first Jew to be elected Mayor of Atlanta, and that Maynard Jackson, a Negro, was elected Vice Mayor. In Birmingham, Arthur D. Shores was the first Negro to be elected to the city council in the history of the city.

Of these elections one can say that the political parties seem to be fragmenting in cities in which there is a heavy Negro vote. It would seem, also, that the greatly blown-up ogre of "Middle America" is to be taken a good deal less seriously than the mass media suggested. The elections do not show a significant swing to the right. If a swing is indicated it is toward what columnist Joseph Kraft has termed "nobody knows what." Political positions in the cities remain, as he puts it, "fluid," with state politics more and more tending to merge with national politics.

IN THIS ISSUE

November 17, 1969

EDITORIALS

522

ARTICLES

527 Labor Against Itself: The Alienated Rank and File — Al Bilik

530 Change or Stagnation: Case for Advocacy Journalism — David Deitch

532 Portuguese Showcase: New Style of Tyranny — Loren Jenkins

535 The Real World Comes to Wyoming — Steve Murdock

537 Blacks on Campus: Integration by Evasion — Robert F. Engs and John B. Williams

BOOKS & THE ARTS

541 Howard: Alone With America — Charles Molesworth

542 Goulden: Truth Is the First Casualty — Richard J. Walton

543 At My Mother's Grave (poem) — Raymond Roseliep

544 Rosenberg: Artworks and Packages — Lawrence Alloway

545 Singer: The Estate — Leonard Kriegel

546 Theatre — Harold Clurman

546 Each Autumn (poem) — Linda Pastan

548 Lifton's Birds

549 Music — David Hamilton

550 Waiting for a Hysterectomy (poem) — Bill Little

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR. | Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS | Associate Editor PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH | Literary Editor BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 17

The Comedy of the Theories

Mayor John F. Lindsay's "astounding" (but not to us) victory in New York City's mayoralty election has precipitated the flood of theories that usually comes in the wake of a major political upset. How did it happen? Counted out in the June 17 primary, denied the nomination of his own party, the Mayor nevertheless came back to score a great victory over his two opponents. His victory may not be great in terms of the actual vote count—he received fewer votes than in 1965—but great it is in terms of the odds against him and the way he upset the "professionals" who forge most of the theories.

One thing must be said for these theoreticians: they are ingenious. Race track touts, explaining why some overlooked nag took the race, are no more ingenious than New York's "pros," of both parties, in explaining the victory. One learns that Lindsay won re-election because: he hobnobbed with Israeli Premier Golda Meir; he was doused with champagne in the Mets' dugout; he was photographed with the astronauts; he gave a cordial welcome to Bernadette Devlin and the back of his hand to the Rev. Ian Paisley; he carried at least three yarmulkes at all times and wore them on frequent visits to synagogues; he had a lot of money to spend; his television spot commercials were well done; Governor Rockefeller refused to support him, thereby earning him a "sympathy" vote; he is physically attractive to many women voters; his wife is a splendid politician; he raised the issue of the war in Vietnam, which he has opposed for some years; Procaccino was an inept candidate badly managed; Arthur Goldberg endorsed Lindsay; he was photographed with U Thant; many well-known actors and actresses campaigned for him; the Sanitation Workers, with whom he had had a celebrated confrontation, finally supported him; William Buckley insisted on muddying the waters by injecting the Conservative Party candidate into the Republican primary, thereby helping his arch-enemy Lindsay in much the same way that he had done in 1965 when he was himself a candidate; he had the support of The New York Times and the New York Post and most of the electronic media; and so on and on.

No doubt there is a pinch of truth in some, if not all, of these theories. But as usual the pros have missed the central point. Sen. Charles E. Goodell said it simply—the Mayor was re-elected because he is an "honest, decent, dedicated" public servant. Everyone knows this and most New Yorkers, including the Mayor's rivals and enemies, will concede it. But as a theory, it is far too simple to satisfy the professionals.

More to the point, Senator Goodell's "theory" credits the average voter with far more sense and perception than the pros are ever willing to concede. Yet we submit that that was what re-elected Mayor Lindsay. He has had his share of troubles; he has the toughest administrative job in the country (we do not except the Presidency, where the burdens are greater but not the administrative hang-ups), and he is not a good administrator. He needs now, as he has needed from the start, a tough-minded, expert administrator as Deputy Mayor, and we hope he finds one. But he understands New York and New Yorkers—he even loves the city!—and long before he became Mayor he impressed us as being an "honest, decent, dedicated" public servant.

When you find one of those, you cleave to him, you elect and if possible re-elect him, you honor and respect him. The point about Mayor Lindsay is that his possession of these qualities comes through to voters; he is photogenic (but so was Jimmy Walker); the more important point is that he projects the moral qualities and that they are quite real. An upper-class WASP who can win eight of every ten Negro votes in New York City, who can walk anywhere in Harlem without fear of assault or insult, and actually be greeted with respect and affection, is a man who deserves well of the electorate, black and white.

Answering Mr. Nixon

As far as content went, there was no reason for the President's speech of November 3 on Vietnam. Having nothing to say, he filled the vacuum with self-praise and exhortations that, as one of his critics remarked, were an insult to the intelligence of the audience. Nevertheless a substantial political motive lay behind the address. The October moratorium had Mr. Nixon worried, and he was eager to take some of the steam out of it. It was necessary, therefore, to announce the speech before October 15, and yet to set it far enough ahead so that it might disorient the November moratorium. In the interval, Mr. Nixon may have pondered making some concessions to our opponents in Vietnam, but his own hawkish instincts, the advice of his hard-line counselors, and other impulsions tending in the same direction, resulted in a speech in which he simply stood pat, adding nothing to what he—and Lyndon B. Johnson and Dean Rusk before him—had already said. This required a brutal distortion of history so recent that everyone should be able to spot the manipulation, but millions cannot and these millions, whom Mr. Nixon referred to as "the silent majority," were his target.

Even so, the speech merits analysis at several levels. First, we are told that, like the Miami acceptance speech, he wrote this exercise in rhetoric and histrionics entirely on his own. As then, he secluded himself and worked up draft after draft—ten in all before he was satisfied. This speech, then, is pure Nixon. Consistently enough, there is in it not one phrase or sentence that would make a single heart beat faster, except perhaps in anger. It does not even invite rebuttal. At the close, Mr. Nixon declared that he wished especially to speak to students. He then went through some rhetorical motions, and it is a safe surmise that the majority of young people only despise him the more. Nixon cannot speak to the young because he lacks the feeling and respect for principle that could bring him close to persons who take ideas seriously.

Regarded as a performance, the speech was a fiasco. However willing he might be to take instruction, Mr. Nixon would be the despair of any movie or TV director. There is something about this man, unfortunate for himself and more unfortunate for the country, that puts off anyone with normal human feelings. When he smiles, he radiates a forced joviality. When he attempts to be "sincere," he succeeds in convincing us of his duplicity. It is only when he threatens that he manages to come through. His threat that he would take "strong" action against the enemy if infiltration from North Vietnam were stepped up again, or if the Vietcong mounted widespread attacks, sounded as if at least for the moment, and conditionally, he meant it. Even this he bungled by the immediate, hackneyed follow-up: "This is not a threat."

Civilized Americans, young and old, who listened to this vacuous address could feel only disgust at such an unrelieved sequence of evasion and misrepresentation. Mr. Nixon patted himself on the back for not taking the easy way of unconditional withdrawal when he took office. If that had been the easy way, one suspects he would have taken it. There is no easy way and delay will not provide one. The fact is that our intervention in the Vietnamese civil war was an error of such magnitude, both morally and militarily, that it cannot be corrected (to the extent that it can be corrected at all) except by measures that, from a conventional nationalistic standpoint, will be painful and humiliating. Mr. Nixon has no stomach for such an ordeal. All that is left, then, for him and for those of like mind, is to continue the war in the hope of making an "honorable" peace, i.e., one that can be camouflaged to look like a victory—or a justification for the blood spilled (Mr. Nixon did not speak of the Vietnamese dead). This necessitates our continuing to support the Thieu government and to identify it with the Vietnamese people, who must be pictured as the agonized victims of conspiratorial communism intent on world conquest. And although Mr. Nixon promised eventual withdrawal of American ground troops, he said nothing about air power, which can continue to be exerted in support of Vietnamese cannon fodder from naval aircraft carriers and bases in Thailand.

Mr. Nixon professed to be concerned about a possible "blood bath" if American troops were withdrawn. He does not appear to be concerned about the blood bath which American intervention has inflicted on the Vietnamese people, first by support of the French colonialists, and then by taking over the war after the French defeat. That this has been a brutal war no one who looks at TV from the combat front can doubt; and that reprisals might follow an American withdrawal is certainly possible. But if Mr. Nixon fears such a development, he might better devote himself to preventive measures, which he could negotiate as part of an agreement for American withdrawal, instead of prolonging the war indefinitely by perpetuating fictions as to its origins and goals. Or let him pull out the prospective victims with his troops.

Never, since the 1952 "Checkers" show which cleared Mr. Nixon for the Vice Presidency, has any candidate for high office resorted to such press agentry as when, the morning after his address, Mr. Nixon called in the reporters and joyfully showed the stacks of approving telegrams he had received from his "silent majority." Few who know Mr. Nixon's record and disagree with him would waste even the price of a telegram to tell him what they think of his policies. While giving lip service to the right to dissent, both Mr. Nixon and Mr. Agnew have made it plain that they will not be swayed by demonstrations in "the streets." But all that remains to those who see the United States—their country as much as it is Mr. Nixon's—going downhill toward dictatorship, is precisely this form of protest. It would serve Mr. Nixon's purpose if the November chapter of the moratorium were to depart from the peaceful character of its beginnings. That danger is what the peace forces must now guard against.

Latin Millstone

In its June 2 issue The Nation published "Mexican Auto Swindle," an exposé by the undersigned of the recently mushrooming auto industry in Mexico and Latin America. The examination posed the inescapable inference that the multiplication of new auto plants, far from developing Latin American industry, was proving a leaden weight to its industrial and economic progress. Now comes Robert McNamara, president of the World Bank, to make the same indictment, only more harshly.

In a speech delivered at the end of September, he said: "Developing nations spent an estimated $2.1 billion in domestic resources in 1965 to manufacture automotive products. These had a world market value of only $800 million." This loss of $1.3 billion in a single year, McNamara pointed out, "approximates the total amount of resources invested in industrial development by the World Bank in its entire twenty-three years of operation."

When McNamara spoke of the auto industry in the developing countries, he was pointing inevitably to Latin America, which in 1965 produced 80 per cent of the automotive product of the "developing" countries. Presumably, therefore, Latin America had a loss of more than $1 billion in 1965. The situation has not grown better; by the end of this year the gross loss since 1965 may amount to $5 billion. This is a burden that the fragile Latin economy cannot possibly bear. And there is every reason to believe that a solid investigation of the farm equipment, electrical appliance and petroleum industries would reveal similar aberrations. Is it any wonder that the Alliance for Progress has been an experimental disaster?

Some time after World War II, when the economies of Western Europe and Japan had fully recovered and their stocks of capital began to pile up, they quietly but insistently demanded their place in the Latin American sun. Apparently the Lebensraum had to be granted them in order to forestall a forbidding internecine conflict. Almost without exception, every manufacturer from the developed countries established multiple auto plants in Latin America. The United States, with an annual auto sales potential of one unit for every twenty people, has four auto companies. Mexico, with a sales potential of one unit for every 450 people, has ten immigrant auto corporations from all sections of the globe. And the same situation is duplicated in the rest of Latin America.

In itself this could be less than fatal, but the rub comes with the practical mechanics of a multiplicity of plants supplying a comparative handful of buyers. Free competition among the corporations is obviously impermissible; the only alternative is to assign production quotas. And mini-production quotas mean low-production equipment. And that in turn has meant very high prices and the consequent heavy drain on the national economies.

Robert McNamara, production genius of the auto industry, ought to know this. Instead he turns banker and demographer. He assigns some unintelligible fiscal reasons and then laments the population rise. There is a population explosion, but it has caused no impossible density. With a land area more than twice the size of the United States, Latin America is not overpopulated; it is under-farmed and under-industrialized. And this is the by-product of malevolent cartelist stratagems.

If, in revising its Latin American policy, the United States wants to be helpful, it must adopt a program of genuine assistance in the development of a modern machine-building industry and the other prerequisites of late 20th-century production. Some of the deflated auto plants must be turned into cybernetic units of competitive production. All industry must be permitted to develop at the initiative of the national forces with outside assistance in the form of capital and capital goods.

Is this too much to expect? Probably. But Secretary of State Rogers has explicitly declared that Latin America is for us the most important sector of the world. The impending debacle in Southeast Asia may not really be materially costly. We were only trying there to stake out a claim for the future. But convulsions in Latin America, already forecast by Cuba, Peru and Boliva, could create proliferating explosions during the last third of the 20th century. The benign program offered above could at least bring us safely to the 21st. LEO FENSTER

Pentagon Loyalty

The Pentagon has exhibited its curious interpretation of economy by firing the Air Force efficiency expert who revealed to Congress the procurement shenanigans connected with the $2 billion cost overrun on the giant cargo plane, the Lockheed C5A. Thus by abolishing the $31,000-a-year job of A. Ernest Fitzgerald, who has done more than any single individual to expose the inefficiency and even duplicity of high-ranking Air Force officials, the Pentagon has shut the mouth of one of its most articulate critics. A number of Mr. Fitzgerald's duties have been taken over by the consulting firm of Arthur Young & Co. —which is also Lockheed's auditors.

Fitzgerald not only revealed that the C5A, originally estimated at $3.4 billion, would cost an additional $2 billion, but also that the Air Force had taken measures to hide this overrun. He says now that "concern for cost reduction at the Pentagon is regarded as an anti-social activity." The Pentagon, like that other military elite, the German High Command, regards loyalty to itself above loyalty to country. Fitzgerald, nominated by the Air Force in 1967 for the Defense Department's Distinguished Civilian Service Award, made the fatal error of taking his duties too seriously. The dismissal is a personal tragedy for him; for the country, it has broad implications as to the future handling of Department of Defense budgets. What other Pentagon officials, eager to trim the $80 billion defense budget, will recall the experience of A. E. Fitzgerald and decide to be prudent?

If Secretary Laird really meant to carry out his pledge to cut the Pentagon budget "to the bone," he would scarcely have dismissed one of the Pentagon's best efficiency experts as an economy move. What kind of sense does it make to terminate the job of $31,000-a-year employee who has revealed the mismanagement of billions of dollars? It makes the sense that those who make waves at the Pentagon will surely drown in them.

Courtroom Confrontation

Judge Julius J. Hoffman has at last severed the trial of Bobby Seale from those of the other Conspiracy 8, and set it down for April 23, 1970. But he has also sentenced Seale to four years for contempt of court.

It is important to keep the facts in mind. There can be no doubt whatever that Charles Garry of San Francisco was Bobby Seale's personal attorney. He had been for several years; he represented Huey Newton; he is attorney for the Black Panthers; he is Seale's counsel in a trial pending in Connecticut. On September 9 Garry, as chief trial counsel, picked a pretrial team of attorneys to make preliminary motions and the like. In the meantime, he had started a trial in San Francisco which had to be interrupted for a week while he entered the hospital for examinations and tests for a possible gall bladder operation. His physicians let him return to the pending trial on condition that as soon as it was concluded he would enter the hospital for an operation, which he did.

Affidavits were prepared, setting forth the facts, and a motion was made to continue the trial in Chicago from September 24 to November 24, when Garry would presumably be sufficiently recovered to try the case. Under the circumstances, the request was entirely reasonable, but the motion was denied. When the trial opened, Seale was without counsel. At that time, attorneys for the other defendants said that they would look after his interests, or words to that effect; but Seale never designated substitute counsel, nor did Garry.

If the trial had been postponed or if the severance had been ordered initially, the big fuss about Seale would never have occurred. Seale's behavior in the courtroom, while not exactly decorous or respectful, was certainly understandable; he was insisting on his right to be represented by counsel of his choice or to defend himself. And it cannot be denied that he had this fundamental right or that it was arbitrarily abridged by Judge Hoffman. Seale would still be there, gagged and shackled, in a courtroom scene reminiscent of Nazi "justice," if he had capitulated. But he would not knuckle under to the ruling and Judge Hoffman finally had to acknowledge defeat.

As to the contempt charge, it will be appealed by Mr. Garry and it should be dismissed. Judge Hoffman has also quietly piled up a contempt record against two of the defense counsel and at the conclusion of the trial he will no doubt "throw the book" at them. By and large, trial judges get just about the measure of respect they deserve. Judge Hoffman's conduct invited Seale's unruly behavior. Why doesn't the Department of Justice recognize the travesty that this trial has become and ask for dismissal of indictments which should never have been returned?

THE ALIENATED RANK AND FILE

AL BILIK
Mr. Bilik is director of Ohio Council No. 21, the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFL-CIO).

"Every Monday is 'klassenkampfe'—'class struggle day,'" explained the Israeli trade union leader. "Each Monday I sit here at the telephone, take calls from our shop committees and members, and listen carefully to all the complaints about the union. This is how I know what the members want."

George Meany, with no class struggle day to help him, assured his Labor Day interviewers that American union leaders have their ways of knowing what the members want. "Somehow, these things filter through to the top."

American trade unionists are being heard from, but more and more the voice is that of the wildcat strike, or the hooting down of recommended contract settlements; or the defeat of supposedly entrenched leaders, or—almost routinely now—the rejection of labor-endorsed candidates in the nation's elections.

What goes with the American rank and file? The trade unionist in contemporary America is variously labeled "snob," "bigot," "reactionary" and, by way of explanation or perhaps rationalization, is usually assigned to the affluent middle class. Having allegedy "made it" himself, if not exactly by himself, the unionized worker is seen as bent on one thing—the defense to the death of his hard-won perquisites. When George Wallace in 1968 cried, "Don't let them take it away!" the "them" he had in mind were clearly the poor, black minority who threatened the white worker's job, his standard of living, his home and his security in general.

But the same refrain was heard throughout the campaign twenty years earlier—uttered not by George Wallace's forerunner, Strom Thurmond but by Harry Truman. "Don't let them take it away," cried Truman. But the "them" that year was the Republican Party. Like the blacks of 1968, the GOP was accused of wanting to deprive the worker of his job security, his union security and all his other hard-won perquisites.

The average worker in America is not so much affluent as he is eager to become affluent; the average white trade unionist is not so much a bigot as he is a self-protectionist. And he hasn't really changed much over the years. Fifty years ago he wanted social legislation and Chinese exclusion. Because social legislation today seems to be intended only for "them," he appears to be obsessed exclusively by exclusion. And not surprisingly, pleas of the United Fund type by labor's leaders, pleas that the rank and file be its brother's keeper—and to vote that way on Election Day—fall on deaf ears.

Last November, organized labor suffered its worst political defeat in twelve years. Little more than half of the card-carrying union members voted for Humphrey, whereas three out of four unionists had followed their leaders against Goldwater in 1964. Although the leaders held fast to Johnson and his entire program, pollsters warned that the house of labor was as deeply divided as the nation itself. Events tumbled upon one another in rapid succession: Romney, New Hampshire, Kennedy, McCarthy, Rockefeller, Wisconsin—and then, de-escalation, renunciation, assassination, riots. The war uneasily receded as the principal point of focus and friction, giving way to the sharper contrasts of conflict in the cities and on the campuses. It is the domestic crisis that takes on special meaning for the American labor movement, for its stresses test most clearly the ability of organized labor to function effectively in the real world of its members and of those with whom the movement has traditionally been allied.

Union members as early as 1966 had forsaken their leaders. Whether from backlash, boycott or plain boredom, working-class votes switched or stayed home. That was the case again in 1968, despite the investment by labor of vast sums in "register and vote" drives. The international unions cooperated with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education as never before, yet among those workers who bothered to vote many voted "wrong." Candidates whose record was "right" on poverty, education and civil rights, and who were therefore endorsed by labor's leaders, were rejected by the members at the polls. The heavily unionized states elected governors who were opposed by labor's leadership.

A solution urged by some is better communications. Another is organization in the precincts. Finally, "computerize!" Almost entirely overlooked is the fact that labor has fallen into its present difficulties because it has gradually turned away from its own clearly stated political principles and thus become estranged from its natural allies as well as from its members.

Let's review. The AFL-CIO, if not a revolutionary, has certainly been a resolutionary movement. Conventions have consistently called for national government action on matters of health, education, job and income security and other worker benefits. Resolutions have ringingly demanded these benefits as the right of all Americans and not as charity for some. Progressive tax measures have been urged to pay for such social legislation. How do the major parties respond to the labor challenge?

The Republican Party rejects in principle and in practice the national route, the basic right as opposed to the concept of charity, and the "ability to pay" tax schedule. The Democratic Party, although it still by rote endorses the principle, finds it extremely difficult to deliver in practice. Paradoxically, while the Republican Party nationalizes itself in support of its anti-national doctrine, the Democratic Party, led frequently by conservatives in the Congress and structurally a pick-up-sticks collection of state and local baronies, is incapable of national performance on behalf of its national program. Much has been said about the "Great Society." The lament of the Left has been: "If only Johnson had avoided Vietnam, his domestic program would have earned him a place in history." But the fact is that Johnson's program of social legislation, even if entirely accomplished, would have fallen far short, not merely quantitatively but qualitatively, of labor's stated social and economic goals. Because the Johnson administration's preoccupation with poverty tended to stigmatize all its domestic efforts as programs for paupers only, the political consequences for the Democratic Party and for the labor movement have been disastrous. The failure to achieve such parochial labor objectives as repeal of 14b and the protection of situs picketing did evoke a "pox on both your houses" from Mr. Meany, but the official position of the AFL-CIO finally emerged as one of great admiration for the Great Society and enthusiastic recommendation of political candidates on the basis of Great Society votes. Labor lobbyists who worked earnestly on Capitol Hill were impressed; the rank and file was not.

And the image of the national government suffered in the process. A Gallup poll in August 1968 revealed that most Americans, union and nonunion alike, considered big government a greater threat than big business or big labor. Only the black and the poor trusted the national government. Ten years ago a similar poll showed that only 14 per cent of Americans viewed big government as the major threat. Another recent poll indicated that only 18 per cent of those interviewed believed that the federal government spends money more wisely than do the states. If conservative candidates have been successful on platforms of "no taxes" and "law and order," Republican proposals to share federal revenues with the states are likely to accelerate the trend. Republicans may now enjoy the best of both worlds: by demanding that a share of federal tax revenues be returned to the states GOP candidates can capitalize on public distrust and fear of the national government, and at the same time take credit for improved state services without running the political risk of imposing new taxes.

Johnson's mistake was that he tried to convert the federal government into a gigantic community chest. A poverty tag and a means test were applied to all merchandise in the federal do-good bag. The Economic Opportunity Act, publicized as a "war against poverty" and touching as it has on health, education, allowances, jobs, housing and related government services, implied that such services were available only to those who could successfully plead poverty. Thus public health today is pauper's health; public housing is pauper's housing; public job training is pauper's job training. Given the current economic and psychological state of the country, poverty as defined both in dollars and social status, is literally not popular. Although the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 (MDTA) was originally conceived by President Kennedy as a means to guarantee to victims of automation both income and dignity while in training for better jobs, and although in theory it remains that today, it has become so enmeshed in the public mind with the subsequent "war on poverty" that it is now dismissed as just another charity operation that hands out income but withholds dignity. MDTA was the logical vehicle through which not only the unemployed but the millions of *under*employed whites and blacks could have received on-the-job or institutional training; it could have become a drive to tap the full potential of a work force vast numbers of which, for financial or other reasons, had been denied timely education and training.

The means test, which labor rejects in principle, has crept into almost every aspect of federal social legislation; it even threatens a public education system that for 150 years has been accepted as a right to be enjoyed by all. The federal school lunch program, a United States Agriculture Department anachronism, has long permitted a pauper's oath to be extracted from parents of children receiving free lunches. Other ancillary services provided in the schools through the poverty program, such as free dental care, are open only to those who plead poverty. Kindergarten, in the school systems that provide it, has traditionally been considered an integral part of the curriculum to be available to all children in the community, regardless of income. The federally financed version, Head Start, is in reality another kindergarten which although administered by local schools is confined to children of poverty-stricken families. The Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 also carries a "poverty" tag, implying that this landmark legislation is for poor people only. We are keenly aware that local education has discriminated against the poor for many years and in many ways, and that federal aid is essential if quality education is at last to be available. But must federal aid to education, after the long years of struggle, be cast in the image of pauper's aid?

This gradual erosion of the principle of government services as the right of all the people is not lost on labor's leadership. But instead of making a frontal attack on the problem, labor has further entrapped itself by, for example, seeking to preserve the respectability of Social Security by stressing that workers contribute directly to the system, as do their employers. This makes a distinction between the welfare or poverty handout and the earned benefit and, because of the psychological problem thus raised, advocates of proposals to finance further benefits from the general revenues are stymied. The AFL-CIO Executive Council did recently suggest cautiously that general taxes would eventually have to be tapped to supplement the Social Security fund, but then quickly went on to endorse the traditional formula for increasing benefits through increased contributions—that is, increased taxes.

Having thus slipped by one crucial question of principle, AFL-CIO proceeds to trip clumsily over the tax principle itself. The Social Security tax is an unfair, regressive tax which, like the rapidly proliferating single-rate, no deduction, municipal earnings taxes, hits hardest those least able to pay. Nevertheless, labor, in principle an exponent of progressive, graduated tax systems, continues to support increases in the Social Security tax. By so doing, labor not only violates its own oft-stated principles; it further compounds an already awkward political problem dealing with taxes. It should be noted that even the small Social Security tax increase built into the Medicare program was met by ominous lack of enthusiasm among rank-and-file unionists whose average age is considerably below the retirement level.

Union members overwhelmingly favor Social Security improvements and indeed, as a Harris poll affirmed, a national health program for all citizens, not just the elderly. What sours the average unionist, plagued as he is by his own pinched income, is the narrowness of the present government programs and the unfair method of paying for them. Lost in our national preoccupation with poverty and affluence are the facts that the average worker, when fully employed, has an annual income of perhaps $7,000; that for a family of four to live without frills in an urban center demands about $9,500 per year; that the cost of higher education and of adequate health protection are beyond his means; that in these vital departments the average worker is in a very real sense "poverty stricken." He resents that only "they" appear to merit his government's concern and aid.

And it used to be his government, he recalls. It appears to him that the federal government has begun to scorn him in favor of the black, poor minority. Social legislation, for which he is taxed, is no longer designed to benefit him. He becomes hostile when it is announced that the government is giving compensatory training to the jobless so that, as he sees it, they can more effectively compete for his job. A white local union officer, perhaps 50, rises at a meeting and protests that he completed the 8th grade and "made it by myself." Now the government is helping only "them."

Yet labor today tends to balance its concern over self-interest matters such as 14b repeal with protestations of unselfish devotion to the welfare of the nonmember, the young, the old, the dispossessed, the persecuted. Union members are assumed to have made it. Indeed, the running argument within the labor movement centers on the relative sincerity of the AFL-CIO commitment to the downtrodden. Sincere or insincere, the slogan remains "let's help those who can't help themselves," connoting a charity concept indistinguishable from the community fund campaign, and hardly calculated to stir enthusiasm among trade unionists.

The average unionist is anxious about his job, income and commitments. The growing incidence of wildcat strikes and rejection of recommended contract settlements testify to his uneasiness. He feels left out, and both Wallace and Nixon reminded him that he has been forgotten. If he is permitted to believe that the government has now become his enemy, bent on taking his taxes in order to create new competition for him on the job and in social status, then he sees his own best interests in defensive votes for Nixon, Wallace and assorted "law and order" candidates at the local level. The answer lies not in telling him that "he's never had it so good." It rests in clear-cut recognition that most Americans have serious job, income, health, education and housing problems and that as a practical matter labor's idealism can be best expressed through the determined pursuit of the enlightened self-interest of its rank and file.

The self-interest of the average worker in governmental guarantees of full employment, job training, for the underemployed and the unemployed, free medical care, free higher education and decent housing harmonizes readily with the needs of most citizens, including of course the very poor. Full-scale pursuit by labor of these objectives as a right, not charity, would at once capture the loyalty of union members, the unorganized and the dispossessed. Those who are in greatest need would be benefited, but without means test, without stigma and, equally important, without recrimination among rank-and-file trade unionists. Rather than urge the unionist to be his brother's keeper, ask simply that he be his brother's brother.

If labor suffers politically it is not because it lacks organizing skill. Or because it doesn't know how to communicate. Labor's problem is that it systematically shortchanges itself in the scope, quality and clarity of the political program it presents to its members. For example, the AFL-CIO executive council last year adopted the following positions on the people's health:

> AFL-CIO demands a 50 per cent increase in Social Security benefits, and we believe that some financing from general revenues is necessary and desirable. . . . We endorse the President's proposal to raise benefits by 20 per cent to be financed by higher Social Security rates and . . . we call for AFL-CIO rallies in March in support of the President's position.
>
> AFL-CIO reaffirms labor's long-sought goal of government financed national health insurance as a right of the American people, and we demand that the Congress act now. . . . We endorse the President's recommendations to extend Medicare to the disabled, although we favor the eventual extension of Medicare to all Social Security beneficiaries.

Imagine collective bargaining conducted at the shop level in the above fashion. Local union leadership that gives away the principle of the program even before the bargaining begins would be repudiated by the rank and file, and this is, of course, the fate of labor at the polls. It is perhaps prophetic that certain of the Social Security rallies were held on the ides of March.

Consistent with its best traditions, organized labor ought to demand the full package and apply to that goal all the skills acquired over many years of collective bargaining. If a labor organization calls on the employer to grant across-the-board benefits for all workers in the unit, without means test and regardless of income, the same ought to be required of government. If labor insists that the employer finance out of general income the full cost of pension and health benefits for the worker and his family, then labor should take the same position with government. If labor demands union security of the employer, then labor should insist that government guarantee full employment and job security for the worker. Change the Employment Act of 1946 to the FULL Employment Act of 1970. Convert the President's Council of Economic Advisers to a National Planning Agency. The New York Times of May 11 reported from England, "Computers to Fit Workseekers to Jobs." On another page of the same issue, it reported, "United States uses computer to select weapons combinations for tank and mechanized infantry battalions." Labor should demand that government put the computers to work for people and for peace.

A few days before his death, Martin Luther King, Jr., in a speech to the striking sanitation workers of Memphis called for an economic Bill of Rights for all Americans. Organized labor has said it time and again in convention resolutions that need only to have new life breathed into them. It can be formulated as follows:

> Every man has the right to the protection of the labor laws of the land. Every man has the right to be fully and gainfully employed, and to a decent income guarantee when working, when unemployed, when in job training, when sick or disabled, and when retired.
>
> Every man's children have the right to free public education through four or more years of college.
>
> Every man and his family have the right to free, quality medical care.
>
> Every man and his family have the right to live in decent housing.
>
> Every man has the equal right to all such rights.

Labor should demand full government payment for this package; it should press it on the parties (it will make them healthier); play it straight across the political bargaining table and not through the cloakroom. Then every election campaign will take on the excitement of a strike, with every polling place a picket line.

But if labor persists in its present course, politically alienating not only those who share its true interests but even its own members, the solution is simple: get out of politics while there is still time. Save the money and the manpower, and perhaps some political allies. To do otherwise may only continue to reward labor's enemies and punish labor's friends.

CHANGE OR STAGNATION

CASE FOR ADVOCACY JOURNALISM

DAVID DEITCH
Mr. Deitch writes on economic and financial affairs for the Boston Globe.

The American press is under attack from the Left, the Right and the harassed middle. It needs reform and knows it, but nothing less than profound structural changes will make a qualitative difference sufficient to insure the survival of newspapers as credible agents of information about the society in which they operate.

Structural changes are imperative because the reforms now most often proposed do nothing except increase the existing fantastic level of journalistic self-consciousness. Newspaper managements and editors already get together frequently to discuss the shortcomings of their daily efforts; newspaper men already deliver scathing critiques of their profession. For example, the monthly Journalism Review was initiated recently by Chicago journalists who had been unable to print the stories or make the reforms they felt were necessary to the well-being of their dailies. On the national level, a new Washington journal, Straus Editor's Report, has been formed to monitor the press.

However, all attempts thus far to accommodate newspapers to the needs of society have failed, and all the evaluations have turned out to be indexes of failure rather than progress toward some satisfactory result. Criticism that does not lead to structural change is simply an exercise in reformist frustration, and the effect has been that the press today is one of the least trusted of the country's national institutions, public or private. Right-wing critics complain that the papers undermine confidence in democratic institutions by striking at the government. The Left insists that, by adhering to so-called balanced reporting, they in fact stabilize the worst features of an inequitable system. The confused middle is rapidly losing its faith in the ability of the daily press to sustain the image of impartiality that newspaper managements—not readers—have demanded.

It thus becomes obvious that the press will not begin to cope with its credibility problem until newspaper managements acknowledge that that mystifying standard, "objectivity," cannot be adequately defined or achieved, that in fact it is pernicious to the society as well as to the institutions of journalism. This neutrality is demanded by newspaper administrators and editors, concerned that the news content remain under tight control; there is no evidence that it serves a public interest.

At a time when people are becoming politically more aware, a newspaper loses credibility when readers believe themselves to be manipulated and propagandized on behalf of those who dominate the political economy. It makes no difference how they identify those powers, or whether their evaluation is right or stems from the widening circle of paranoia that seems endemic to a highly centralized society. A commitment to the notion of objectivity has in effect become a sign of manipulation, whether newspaper managements like it or not, and the way to deal with it is to admit that the editorial function is inherently biased, that reporters have opinions of their own and that newspapers, like other large institutions, are political entities.

There is nothing new about these concepts. Newspapers no less than universities must be seen as instruments of either social change or stagnation. The European press has known this for a long time. Le Monde, widely regarded as one of the world's greatest newspapers, is described by the Paris correspondent of The New York Times:

> Unlike the American practice, there is no copy desk and no division of function between copy editing and reporting. Each staff member is a "journalist" in charge of a specialty. He may cover a story directly or rewrite or edit the news agency reports on his subject. Department chiefs check headlines and make space allotments but do not change copy.
>
> As is the rule in European journalism, there is no clear line between reporting and opinion.
>
> "We are proud," said an editor, "not of our objectivity but of our independence." The assumption is that the reader knows the viewpoint of the reporter and expects it to be reflected in his copy. . . .

(See "Our Press and Theirs: The Mask of Objectivity," by Leslie R. Colitt, The Nation, June 17, 1968.)

Le Monde makes itself credible by rejecting the myth of objectivity. It exposes all its biases to the reader, who automatically learns the security of reading "news" that is placed in a readily identifiable context. Le Monde journalists—the best in the world—have established their reputations over time on a newspaper that has given them their heads. Readers take issue with Le Monde journalists, not with Le Monde, and do not feel that they are being propagandized by an objective automaton. The context of the news becomes as important as the news itself—indeed the one can never really be divorced from the other—and journalist and reader engage in a relationship similar to that of actor and audience.

The refusal of American newspapers to consider Le Monde's methods is a kind of mistrust of the public that claims management knows best what readers need or want. Hollywood and TV magnates hold similar views. In the press, however, the fact is that many reporters try to make editorial points between the lines of their objectivity, thus inserting surreptitiously what they should be writing candidly. Says one ex-Newsweek man: "If you wanted to express an opinion, there was no problem. Insofar as I recall the techniques, you invented a quote and ascribed it to somebody . . . made up a person if necessary. It's very devious, of course, but it's a substitute merely for doing the sensible thing which would have been to write a first-person story in the first place. . . . Newspaper men are always finding ways to get around whatever inhibitions there are to personal journalism."

But the trouble with using a subterfuge—however much it may clarify the point of a story—is that it still leaves the reader wondering how objective the news story is, how responsible the reporter is, what his biases may be.

The notion still prevails among reporters that they should strive to be as objective as possible. It has a nice, clean-cut ring to it, but nobody has been able to tell them how to approach that elusive goal, much less what it really means. Most reporters and newspapers fall back on the idea that the proper solution is a kind of "balance," a presentation of pro and con that lends itself to mathematical analysis: that is, always try to get the other side of the story, even for just a couple of lines.

It is a puzzle why reporters continue to insist that objectivity, or balance, is the key to the good journalistic life, but one explanation may be that it permits a kind of psychological anonymity. A reporter need not reveal what sort of person he is, uncover his biases. More important, by clinging to the myth that he is indeed being as objective as humanly possible, he can evade personal responsiblity for his work; he is only a technician of the news. Advocacy, on the other hand, openly admitted, requires an exposure of self, a willingness to undergo scrutiny, and a commitment to excellence that seems very demanding.

Some reporters are thus afraid of advocacy. Those who don't feel strongly about things see no reason to take sides. Others correctly perceive that they lack the competence to be advocacy reporters, that they do not really know their "beat." A reporter cannot express his convictions about, say, education unless he has made himself an expert on the problems of schools and the theories of learning.

It follows that the opportunity to become an advocate would cause responsive reporters to acquire the background necessary to acquit themselves creditably. The informed reporter would make himself known as competent to act in his new professional capacity, thus raising the general level of the profession. Those who saw the advocacy role as an opportunity to dispense propaganda would be exposed as soon as the public judged their work against the progress of events.

Many newspapers would maintain that they already permit reporters to become advocates—usually on or opposite the editorial page, but occasionally in the news sections. However, managements inevitably insist that these contributions be identified as "columns" or "news analysis." In the absence of a systematic attempt to orient either the public or reporters to the uses of advocacy journalism, these few columns have done nothing to increase the credibility rating of the profession.

What is to be done? One possible course for an adventurous management would be to experiment with a program that devotes a limited amount of space each day to the opinions of those reporters who have sufficient confidence in their ability. The space would be clearly identified as containing advocacy accounts by the writers involved, and the content would be under the control of those producing it. It would be understood by all concerned that the judgments were those of the reporters, who had acquired the privilege of stating them by demonstrating good sense, knowledge and general competence. If the experiment succeeded, it should cause a re-evaluation of space and assignment priorities.

A new city-room attitude should permit the most talented reporters to realize their capabilities for intellectual and investigative work. The less enterprising would be confined to jobs for which opinion was irrelevant, and those inexperienced but eager to learn would be stimulated by the incentive of new standards of excellence. The corruption, cynicism and apathy that have lost newspapers their standing in the community probably cannot be eradicated until reporters are forced to take personal responsibility for their actions. The advocacy experiment would force reporters to identify themselves to the public, and to show in their jobs how they define themselves as political men.

It would also cause newspaper managements to re-evaluate themselves politically, as they redefined the purpose and public need for the daily newspaper in the context of broadcasting competition. For example, regional newspapers are discovering that it makes less and less sense to compete with The New York Times on national and international news coverage, even when the wire services give adequate coverage. Instead, they tend increasingly to run news roundup sections. The Wall Street Journal's front page makes very effective use of the roundup technique, leaving personnel available to report and write three original—and frequently outstanding—stories each day.

Excellent newspaper men are forever complaining that they have no time to do the investigative or interpretive reporting of which they are capable. It is odd that a newspaper will boast that its Statehouse reporter has been on the job for twenty years, but never give the readers the benefit of his opinion on state politics, or about how that construction firm got the big contract. A reporter who knows his beat should be expected to tell readers what's on his mind as a basic part of his job. Those who see themselves as recorders of facts should be confined to factual sections of the newspaper—accidents, sports, births and deaths—and those who want to use facts to expose larger issues should not be burdened with a technician's job. Ideally, an idea man should be paired with a facts man, or two or more frankly biased reporters should be permitted to give different points of view on the same political story. Press releases, if important, might be printed verbatim, just like the text of a speech. Rewriting them is worth no one's time.

The market for objective "facts" has been saturated by TV, as newspaper managements well know. Newspapers must provide something more than a statistical expansion of the eleven o'clock news, but no amount of "reform" discussion will produce a new product; the conditions must change. This requires structural innovation, a radical transformation of the American daily newspaper into a social participant, not a mere observer. Neutrality is conceivable only in a political vacuum and nothing is more political than a newspaper. The public knows this and withholds its belief from journals that venerate objectivity.

The key element in journalism, as in all writing and all art, is risk, sometimes personal risk. Newspapers will never be "ready" for personal journalism, for major changes, for a role in the events around them, until reporters and editors are willing to stick their necks out.

PORTUGUESE SHOWCASE

NEW STYLE OF TYRANNY

LOREN JENKINS

Mr. Jenkins is a special correspondent for Newsweek in Spain. His articles have also appeared in New Statesman, Atlantic Monthly and Jeune Afrique.

Madrid

During a recent visit by Premier Marcelo Caetano to an impoverished village in Portugal's southern Algarve province, a stooped peasant woman turned to her neighbor and said: "This Salazar is nicer than the other one." The story is being repeated gleefully in the cafés around Lisbon's Rossio Square; better than anything else, it describes the mark Caetano has made in the thirteen months since he succeeded the stroke-crippled Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, Portugal's dictator for more than forty years.

While Salazar lives on in the Premier's Sao Bento Palace, partially paralyzed and still thinking he is in power, Caetano sells himself as a nicer, warmer, more human national leader. To this end, the 63-year-old former Lisbon University professor applies all the modern propaganda skills at his command, from periodic fireside chats on television to highly advertised handshaking tours through the villages of metropolitan Portugal, as well as its guerrilla-besieged African colony of Mozambique.

Everywhere, Caetano presents himself as the nation's all-understanding elder uncle, willing to listen and to observe but rarely willing to alter his ways, except in style.

"The difference between Caetano and Salazar is slight," one well-known opposition leader who had felt the weight of both told me. "Salazar used power and repression gratuitously, just for the sake of it. Caetano is more refined: he uses only as much power and repression as he needs to meet his ends. Salazar was a tyrant. Caetano is not, though he is just as authoritarian."

None of Caetano's embellishments of the status quo has been conducted with more hoopla than the National Assembly elections of October 26. To the world—and to his own people—Caetano promised an honest electoral test for the assembly's 130 seats (thirty of which come from the colonies, or "overseas provinces" as the regime prefers to call them, including three seats from the paper colonies of Goa, Damao and Diu, which were seized and incorporated by India in 1961).

To give this vow some credibility, Caetano magnanimously relaxed—but did not abolish—censorship for the twenty-eight days during which the electoral campaign was permitted, and allowed Portugal's long repressed opposition to form "electoral commissions" (but not political parties) to oppose the well-financed National Union, Portugal's only legal party. He also took the ban off the issue of the African colonies, and for the first time allowed the question of Mozambique, Angola and Guinea-Bissau to be openly debated.

The result was the most open election in more than forty years—but after the decades of Salazar-rigged elections, almost anything would have been more open. Despite some relaxation of the traditional controls, the election was neither honest, nor free nor democratic. Its shortcomings in these respects were noted by a seven-member observer commission of the Socialist International (headed by Austrian Secretary-General Hans Janitschek) just hours before Caetano booted them from the country on charges that they were guilty of "intolerable intervention" in Portugal's internal affairs.

Despite all the talk of openness, less than 20 per cent of metropolitan Portugal's 9.5 million citizens were eligible to vote (and, though the government gave no figures, it was reliably reported that the number of voters among the 15 million Portuguese and Africans living in the "overseas provinces" was only slightly more than 1 per cent). All outdoor political meetings or rallies were forbidden and indoor meetings required prior approval from the police, who were also given permission to disband any meeting they deemed an "incitement to subversion or civil disobedience or slandering of authority." And the censors continued to operate, if less rigidly.

The results were predictable and indistinguishable from past Salazar elections: the National Union won all 130 seats with what the government proudly claimed was 85 per cent of the vote. Even Salazar, who again implied to an interviewer that he still thinks he is Premier, was bundled into a black Cadillac limousine and driven to a polling station where he cast his ballot through the car window, while voters gaped in amazement. "The Portuguese people demonstrated in an unequivocal manner their support for Marcelo Caetano's policy of evolution," a triumphant Caetano man, National Union Secretary-General Jose Melo e Castro, proclaimed in an early hint at just how the bespectacled plain-faced Caetano would seek to build the future.

The triumph was as synthetic as the election was crooked. The opposition had conceded total defeat weeks earlier and made no bones about the fact that the polling was a farce, despite Caetano's pretensions to the contrary. Dr. Francisco Pereira de Moura, a 44-year-old university professor who led the mass-based Socialist Democratic Electoral Commission (CDE), was gratified that in many places up to 50 per cent of the voters abstained, and that his twenty-eight-day-old movement made a generally strong showing in most urban areas, and especially in their industrial districts.

The dynamic CDE, forged from young, militant intellectuals, professional men and workers, soundly defeated the more moderate bourgeois opposition Electoral Commission of Democratic Unity (CEUD), led by the well-known Mario Soares, a 44-year-old lawyer whose opposition to Salazar has earned him twelve arrests and two and a half years of jail and exile. The CDE seems assured of killing off the CEUD, which sought a moderate, almost collaborationist, opposition role, as opposed to the active and uncompromising socialism of the CDE.

The irony of this transparently rigged election is that Caetano, in his moment of manipulated victory, may be on the brink of oblivion. He is walking a knife edge between a new, vigorous opposition that gives no sign of post-election eclipse, and an implacable, ultra-nationalist, neo-Fascist fringe in the National Union which fears that the changing style of authoritarianism may ultimately commit them to extinction.

The opposition groups will pose no direct problem to Caetano. The "electoral commissions," formed for the campaign, are by law dissolved now that the election is over. The opposition, once again, is deprived of any right to organize, but their showing at the polls will undoubtedly keep them alive. And their very persistence will be a grave irritant to the ultras who are seeking to manipulate Caetano for their ends—or, if that fails, to push him aside for a more reliable reactionary.

"The government can no longer ignore our existence," de Moura said, speaking in the tumultuous CDE headquarters on election eve, while bearded students cheered and flashed V-for-victory signs. "Whether or not the government wants it, we will continue to exist. They can't do away with us now—we are too many."

That is precisely what alarms the ultras. Conditioned to corporative, neo-Fascist practices during four decades of relentless dictatorship, they are made nervous by even a semblance of relaxation. From the moment Caetano assumed the premiership, the ultras have studied his every word and move.

Composed of the senior military hierarchy, old-guard Salazarists, Fascists, the paramilitary Portuguese Legion and the financial oligarchy, ever solicitous for its investments in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea, the ultra wing of the party has demanded that Salazar's policies continue unchanged. When Caetano during his much publicized visit to Mozambique last summer hinted at some possible softening of colonial rule (his term was "administrative autonomy"), the danger bells began to clang. When during the campaign a vocal opposition openly called for self-determination for the African territories and, in the case of the CDE, for immediate negotiation with the freedom fighters, the ultras decided that Caetano had gone far enough.

The Premier was obviously advised to return to the gospels. Armed Forces Chief of Staff, Gen. Venancio Deslandes, an old conspirator-manqué of the Salazar era, was the first to tip the ultras' hand. As the election campaign began, he pointedly warned that the military, which is amply nourished by the continuing colonial struggle, would remain "vigilant" during the election. This hint was widely interpreted as a threat of intervention should things not go according to the National Union scenario. A sign that Caetano understood this signal came in early October when he assumed the Foreign Ministry, which had been given up in a huff by ultra Alberto Franco Nogueira. In a speech to the diplomatic service, the Premier backed off from his earlier ingratiating ambiguity about Africa, stating that he could not comprehend "Portuguese pretending to make peace with leaders of the terrorist movements, to turn over to them territories where millions of countrymen—white and black—are working, confident in the protection of the common motherland." "Withdrawal," he added, "would endanger for many years what we have done in Africa and Europe."

And though it was Caetano who originally opened up the subject of the African territories for debate, by election day the Premier was toeing the ultra line. In a final pre-election television speech, the moon-faced Caetano said: "The results of the election must make it clear that the Portuguese people are not in favor of the abandonment of the overseas provinces. . . . The homeland cannot be discussed."

A more modern, European-oriented man than the introverted recluse whom he succeeded, Caetano is aware of the expense of the colonial struggle (more than 60 per cent of the nation's budget goes to keeping the guerrillas at bay, so that Portuguese companies can operate). He toyed with adopting a softer policy toward the colonies as a means to lighten this financial load and allow the stagnant metropolitan economy to be developed. (Portugal remains one of the poorest countries in Europe, with a per capita income of $430 a year and one of the highest illiteracy rates on the continent.)

The ultras, however, said No. And though Caetano moved to renovate the National Assembly by seeing to it that 70 per cent of the National Union candidates were younger, more technocratically minded and pro-Caetano men than the past Salazar assembly, the Right succeeded in wresting the initiative from the Premier.

The focal point of the reaction is the 51-year-old former Foreign Minister Alberto Franco Nogueira, a loyal Salazar crony who has been almost obsessive in his international defense of Portugal's "civilizing mission" in Africa. Nogueira is a self-proclaimed xenophobe who sees an American, British, or Soviet plot to unseat Portugal from Africa behind every public pronouncement. The sallow-faced, slickly gray-haired Nogueira openly maintains that Portugal is as much, if not more, an African country than a European one.

"I am not interested in Europe," he told me in his book-lined sixth-floor apartment behind the Overseas Ministry on the outskirts of Lisbon. "We have no vital interests in Europe. We do in Africa and we will defend them. We have no alternatives. I am Portuguese. I want to follow Portuguese policies for Portuguese interests." His line is totally isolationist. For him, world communications and interchanges, ideologies and competitions and interlocking economies have no relevance to Portugal. Portugal for the Portuguese, and much of Africa he considers Portugal.

Though Nogueira states that he resigned from the Foreign Ministry in order to run for the assembly, it is no secret that he quit because he suspected Caetano was moderating colonial policy. Since his resignation, he has become the leader of the ultras and has tried to assemble a pressure group within the party from the mixed bag of extremists, neo-Fascists, ultra-nationalists who have rallied to his banner. Because Caetano remained aloof from the electoral campaign until the last three days, Nogueira assumed party leadership in the campaign by default, easily eclipsing Caetano's personally selected party chief, Jose Melo e Castro.

Indeed it was the emergence of Nogueira as a power to be reckoned with in the National Union structure that prompted Caetano to re-examine some of his earlier stylistic innovations and finally plunge into the campaign. Caetano did not have to stand in the general election, since he serves by appointment of President Americo Thomaz, and he sought to remain above the struggle. Nogueira's success, however, forced him in. As the campaign period was coming to an end, Caetano released a two-day newspaper interview that was splashed across the front pages of the pro-government press; he made a last-minute television appeal to the voters in which he warned that their vote would determine "the peace or an eventual civil war."

Nogueira's threat appears sure to continue. When the new assembly meets on November 25, he is expected to be named assembly president, a power base which he will no doubt use to keep Caetano honest to the principles of Salazarism or, if that fails, as a base from which to depose him. Though the younger officer corps is less than enthusiastic about the eight-year-old jungle wars which have felled more than 3,000 of their troops (by Portuguese count), the older military men appear to be siding with Nogueira who would no doubt emerge as the front man in any military coup against Caetano.

As one astute Western diplomat put it: "The National Union is composed of the conservative reformists of Caetano and the Neanderthals of the old guard. There is bound to be a struggle between these elements and only time will tell who is going to win." Thus it would appear all too probable that the real political contest in Portugal is only just beginning, now that the showcase elections are over.

The Real World Comes to Wyoming

STEVE MURDOCK
Mr. Murdock, a former California political writer, is now on the staff of The Riverton Ranger.

Riverton, Wyo.

Early in September a man sitting in the lobby of the Teton Hotel in Riverton, Wyo., and watching a football game on the lobby television set, declared as part of a discussion that was proceeding along with the game—that the people of Wyoming are "fifty years behind the rest of the country." Fortunately, the remark was not made in a bar and even more fortunately the custom of settling matters of affront with six-guns went out of fashion some time ago, even in Wyoming. Local pride in Wyoming can become a matter of considerable vehemence.

The discussion had been prompted by the fact that three Riverton policemen, including the assistant chief, had announced that they were quitting on October 1 because they considered the pay inadequate and because the force was offered no pension plan. The debate brought out the fact that very few Wyoming cities have any kind of civil service—a reform associated more with the turn of the century than with the space age. That led the man to place Wyoming's outlook a half century off the national pace.

What no one around the television set that Saturday afternoon realized was that manifestations of profound change were about to explode all over Wyoming. Before a month had passed it was clear that, however far Wyoming may have lagged behind the country, some of its citizens were sprinting frantically to catch up. And by the time November had dawned the concept was being considered, at least in some places, that events in Wyoming were a manifestation of a significant change in the structure of thought and feeling across the nation—thought and feeling in relation to the war in Vietnam and other matters as well.

In quick succession an almost heady series of events shook Wyoming, which, although a state of vast distances, is small in population and has an intimate dependence on eight daily newspapers and a chatty network of radio and television stations. The opening move was made by The Wall Street Journal, which on October 3 published an account by staff reporter Dennis Farney that became front-page news in all eight dailies and lashed everyone from Gov. Stanley Hathaway to the corner bartender into a fury of hurt pride.

Farney's thesis was that Wyoming, one of four states in the Union to lose population since the 1960 census, had become a faltering society, "dominated culturally and economically by the outer world." His portrayal of the state as a deteriorating sagebrush barony set local reporters to retracing Farney's steps and interviewing again the people to whom he had talked. Each factual error in his story, and there were some, was pounced on as—if not proof of perfidy—at least evidence of reportorial incompetence.

The echoes of The Wall Street Journal affair were still bouncing off the by now snowcapped mountain peaks when along came the October 15 moratorium.

To say that it enjoyed a success unexpected in Wyoming is to understate the case. One can hear the incredulity in New York or Los Angeles—"Peace marches in Wyoming?"

Yet, on the cold night of October 15, down Main Street in Riverton (a city of slightly less than 7,000 persons on the Wind River in central Wyoming) came a group of forty young people, mostly Central Wyoming College students. They carried the traditional peace symbols. They purchased candles, lighted them, and marched back up the street to the high school on the hill.

Lorran Minick, the Riverton youth who organized the demonstration, also announced formation of a group called "Students for a Non-Violent Society."

Meanwhile, up the Wind River Valley in the little lumber, hunting and fishing village of Dubois (pop. 800), which sits near the Continental Divide in the Wind River Mountains, Mayor Arden Coad, a service station operator, had already caused a statewide furor. "Somebody's got to support the moratorium," said Coad. "We don't seem to have enough Senators and Congressmen with enough sense to do it."

Coad said he reached his decision after hearing that New York's Mayor Lindsay was supporting the moratorium. "If the mayor of the nation's largest city can back it, the mayor of one of the smallest cities can too."

Coad has three children. One of his sons is serving in the Army in Germany. "I'm not a pacifist," he says. "I'd give anything I have to this country, but this Vietnam War has no meaning." He said he couldn't understand how educated people can pay income taxes to, in effect, have their sons killed. "As long as we pay them, the killing will continue. It's a shame this nation has to have a war economy."

Coad's remarks had no sooner made the papers and the broadcasts than rumors began to fly. There were reports that he had been fired and that the state Veterans of Foreign Wars convention, scheduled for Dubois in January, was being moved elsewhere. Coad put both rumors to rest. He said a lot of people were unhappy with his stand, but they also respected his right to his opinions, and he still had his job. Coad and State VFW Commander Dean Smith of Buffalo both said the convention was not being moved. Smith said, "The 7,000 VFW members feel he earned his right to say what he wants, even though we don't agree with him."

Meanwhile, the moratorium was making itself felt elsewhere in this state, which has slightly more than 300,000 inhabitants. (As The Wall Street Journal observed, that is roughly the number of municipal employees in the city of New York.) All across this vast but comparatively unpopulated empire of mountain and sage—this land studded with historic rivers, the Green, the Wind, the Popo Agie, the Big Horn, the Powder, the North Platte, the Sweetwater, the Tongue—something was happening in October that speaks to the national temper.

In Laramie, seat of the University of Wyoming, the moratorium was given a name—the Day of Propagation of Peace. There was a letter-to-your-Congressman campaign and a march. A resolution that would have given student senate endorsement to the moratorium was defeated by a vote of only fifteen to twenty. Some 550 marched. Others held a twenty-four-hour vigil. Many classes on the day of the moratorium were devoted to discussion of the war.

In Casper a rally of 200 at Washington Park was addressed by Ernest Wilkerson, a supporter of Eugene McCarthy in 1968 and an unsuccessful Democratic candidate for governor in 1966. He denounced "the idiotic expressions which the politicians and the military and the peculiar conglomeration of defense contractors, big labor leaders and others have put together . . ." in support of U.S. intervention in Vietnam "and which they substitute for serious thought."

Two Casper College students, Bill Cole and Mark Ferguson, distributed handbills that read, in part: "This is in coalition with the national Moratorium on the war in Vietnam. The hour is late. Many will die as you are reading this. Please join us. . . ." At Casper College, an open forum on the war was attended by sixty students.

In Cheyenne seven teen-agers asked Governor Hathaway to join them on the steps of the state capitol to read the names of some of the recent war dead in Vietnam. He declined, but the Cheyenne youngsters, lead by a high school senior named John Slough, placed a wreath of red, white and blue carnations, draped in black, in front of the capitol. Names were read from 1:00 P.M. to 7:00 P.M., despite near-freezing temperatures.

The Laramie march—with 550 persons ten abreast—stretched for twenty city blocks. It was led by a banner that said, "Give Peace a Chance."

There were counter demonstrations, but the ever-cautious Associated Press said, "There was no jeering from the sidewalks and the march was without incident." Wilkerson, in his address at Casper, called the war "probably the most dishonorable and disgraceful episode in 20th-century American history," the American Legion and the VFW teamed up for a full-page advertisement in the Laramie Daily Boomerang, urging—as the AP put it—"everybody to fly their flags." The AP, with its own talent for understatement, said of the two veterans groups, "Both organizations have been negative toward the Moratorium."

Back in Riverton, someone who identified herself only as "Another Mother for Peace" bought rebutting display advertising space in The Riverton Ranger to reproduce the poster, "War is not healthy for children and other living things." Also in Riverton a number of high school students and at least two teachers appeared in school on Moratorium Day wearing black arm bands. One of the teachers, Suzanne Hunsucker, was shortly to become embroiled in still another aspect of Wyoming's awakening.

All of this was treated quite respectfully in the Wyoming press. Journalism in Wyoming has a quality that big city sophisticates would call corny, but it maintains a sober respect for facts—and a peace march or a vigil on a cold October day was a fact, deserving the same accurate reporting as would a barn burning.

Over in Lander, at the base of the Wind River mountains, W. Terry Ward wrote in a column in The Wyoming State Journal: "The marchers in the Vietnam Moratorium yesterday, with the exception of a few troublemakers, love this country just as much as their fellow men; it is unfair to say otherwise. They are trying, that is something."

The Riverton Ranger said editorially on October 15 Moratorium Day: "Nixon is in the process of getting the United States out of a war, which, in retrospect, most people realize now we should never have been in." Robert Peck, the Ranger's publisher, wrote on the same day: "We're witnessing today a reverse transmission of knowledge, from the young to the old. Neither group has the answers, but the young see clearly that there's got to be a better way, and most of the older people agree." Two days later, the Casper Star Tribune said editorially: "The most salutary effect of the Moratorium Day demonstrations was the evidence that it is possible to conduct a protest movement in the United States without hurling Molotov cocktails, burning buildings, looting stores and resorting to other acts of violence."

Horner, New Statesman

Whistler in the Dark

Debate about Moratorium Day might have continued in Wyoming for some time, had it not been for a new crisis, involving the University of Wyoming's unbeaten football team in which the state takes great pride.

On Saturday, October 18, just three days after the moratorium, Wyoming was to play Brigham Young University. This Mormon school has become to black militants the symbol of the discriminatory attitude of the Mormon Church. (Blacks, in the Mormon view, are the descendants of Cain and hence ineligible for the lay priesthood of the Mormon Church.)

Wyoming has an almost infinitesimal black population and a number of its people harbor strong prejudices against blacks, Indians and Mexicans. Yet Floyd Eaton, Wyoming's authoritarian and highly successful football coach, has recruited extensively outside the state and has been notably successful in attracting black athletes.

On Friday, October 17, Eaton came face to face with both the black revolution and the revolt against authoritarianism: all fourteen black members of his unbeaten football team, wearing black arm bands, walked into his office to discuss with Eaton their reasons for not wanting to play against Brigham Young the next day. Eaton immediately suspended them from the squad, because by wearing black arm bands they had violated a team rule against participating in demonstrations.

The furor that followed made the comments on the moratorium sound like polite conversation at a pink tea. People in Wyoming, where there is a great tradition for independence and acceptance of the individual for his own worth, are not used to being called racists—but that is what happened to them.

The frontier, which many people in Wyoming hope to preserve as an anachronistic enclave in a moon-age society (some speak of blowing up bridges and blasting pits in the landing strips, if necessary) was an open society that did judge a man, including a black cowboy, by his roping ability, not his pigmentation. Now these advocates of the preservation of the very last frontier were being asked to put their principles to the test in the crisis that faces everyone else in the nation.

And while all of this was going on Mrs. Hunsucker of Riverton High School, who had worn a black arm band while teaching on October 15, was planning a "Love Festival" for her students. The boys and girls were instructed to prepare exhibits concerning love in a variety of concepts.

Alarmed school authorities, egged on by parents, ordered her to take the exhibits down. Mrs. Hunsucker said, "If you want it taken down, take it down yourself."

And so a new crisis came to central Wyoming, hard on the heels of three others—starting with the police crisis in September. Mrs. Hunsucker, 24 years old, blonde and with a Phi Beta Kappa from the University of Southern California, later wrote the school board: "When I left the meeting Friday . . . I felt there was hostility and strong polarization and I accept my share of the burden for that uncompromising situation. With hindsight, I can see that I tend to be unrelenting when my personal worth is being challenged.

"My adrenalin was running full steam. My armor was up and my Irish blood was defending the deeper principles of academic freedom and educational relevance that I felt were the key issues at stake. . . ." When this was written Mrs. Hunsucker had been removed from active classroom teaching, but she was still on the staff.

Any way one looks at the situation, Wyoming seems to be a lot livelier place than The Wall Street Journal said it was at the beginning of October. The real world has come to Wyoming.

BLACKS ON CAMPUS

INTEGRATION BY EVASION

ROBERT F. ENGS and JOHN B. WILLIAMS

Mr. Engs and Mr. Williams are both graduates of Princeton University. Mr. Engs, a doctoral candidate at Yale University majoring in Negro history, is currently serving as a field professor to the New Jersey Urban Education Corps. He served as associate director of the Princeton Cooperative School Program in 1966 and was succeeded by Mr. Williams in 1967. Mr. Williams is at present director of Special Programs, New Jersey Urban Education Corps.

The integration of traditionally all-white colleges in this country began ten years ago. But despite the chaos and hullabaloo, despite the black directors and black assistant deans, things haven't changed much since that September in the early sixties when a handful of blacks like ourselves became anomalies on lily-white campuses. As a matter of fact, this very lack of change probably explains the chaos and hullabaloo. White universities, like many other institutions in American society, have been trapped into mistaking changes in appearance for changes in substance, with consequences that have become all too obvious. If this fascinating social drama is not to grow still more strident, it must be given some balance and perspective.

Having gone to a white college and survived, it is difficult for us to work up much sympathy for either the universities or their black students. Both sides are too eager to tinker with machinery rather than to confront the basic principles of education which are really in question. To be fair, however, it seems to have been a lot simpler—though not easier—in our day. For the universities, the implications of admitting Negro students were still undefined, the issues and their possible solutions were still open-ended, and, perhaps, most important, the polarization of blacks and whites outside the universities had not yet become apparent.

That first handful of black students was different, too. One of our professors defined the problem this way: "As representatives of the best in the American tradition of liberal education, we have been woefully negligent in including at our colleges qualified students who are Negroes." And that is what we were—"qualified students who are Negroes." In terms of university requirements, spoken and unspoken, that meant being bright and middle class, with grades and test scores comparable to other students admitted into our class. Our main difference, it seemed to the university—and to us, at first—was one of skin color. We all accepted the idea of integration, at least to the extent that we had the right and the ability to compete with whites, in their world on their terms. We didn't worry too much about a separate black culture. If we admitted that there was one, we called it a "subculture" and had been taught to look down upon it as inferior to the white culture.

So really, we also ducked the basic questions about the purpose of education. We tried to accept the university as it defined itself and its role; we wanted to be a part of it. The university tried to accept us as being just like all the other students, except darker. In fact, it was hard to find out how many Negroes there were on campus; university officials claimed they didn't keep such records.

Of course, all of this was an exercise in mutual self-deception. The university didn't really believe we were just like the other students; if it had, it wouldn't have felt the need to spend so much time and energy recruiting black students. Black students had not until then been part of the student body, but the university was content to pass that off as an oversight, now corrected. It was more complicated than that and the consequences of such simplistic answers to such complex questions are now clear—armed black students occupying buildings.

For our part, we helped the university maintain its self-deception. Being the first black students at a white university was not easy; we had many difficulties. But we thought of them as specific and individual; nobody seemed to have heard of institutionalized racism. The problem as we saw it was that a few administrators, professors and students were bigots. There was the director of the dormitories whose unstated policy was to put black students together as roommates or to ask incoming white freshmen if they objected to having a black roommate. There was the political science professor whose pronouncements on American politics factored out black people: "Excluding slavery, Americans came closer to achieving their ideal of democracy during the Jacksonian Era than at any time before or since." Or the English professor who spiced his lectures with race jokes. Or the track coach who seemed to believe that anyone with a black skin was a potential Olympian and insisted that we join the team whether we could run or not.

Our fellow students presented tougher problems. We had to live, eat, sleep, go to class with them, but either we were invisible (the jokes about the "niggers in the kitchen" while we sat at the same dinner table), or they were so intrigued by at last meeting a black who wasn't a servant that they couldn't see us as people. "How do Negroes feel about this, that, or the other thing?" And their self-righteous accusation that we were "oversensitive" when we angrily retorted: "I am not the Negro race's representative to Princeton University; why don't you ask me how I feel?"

As we tried to solve these problems of relations with the university's white officials and white students, we began to see and feel what those who have followed us call "institutional racism." Individual professors and students were sympathetic to our gripes, but most of them seemed content to ignore the problems and, again, to tell us we were being oversensitive. It was infuriating to be told, after being insulted by student or professor or campus cop, that the problem was with us instead of them. When we pressed the point, we got paternal lectures about the nature of universities, the importance of faculty autonomy, the overall value of our education at the university, and that these little things shouldn't be allowed to interfere.

Usually, we were able to get some satisfaction. The professors cleaned up the most blatant remarks in their lectures and the track coaches at least checked to see if a black was interested in running before drafting him onto the team. On the other hand, changes of behavior or remarks do not necessarily imply changes in the attitudes that originally produced them. No more did finally taking large numbers of black students deal with the reasons why those students had not been admitted or had not applied in the past. It was becoming clear to us that we were asking the university to change in order to cope with us and that the university was unwilling to do so. We could no longer deceive ourselves that the only difference between us and the other students at school was our color. The university, by being unable to resolve the problems we raised, showed us that our difference was something more pervasive and complex. Though the university did not realize it then, and many still do not, its actions were forcing us to redefine ourselves and our relations with our college.

Here again, things were simpler for us than they are for black students now. We had no need to agree as a group on a positive definition of what being black meant. We still conceived of our problems as individual and different for each of us. Mutual problems with the university forced us apart, rather than together. When we made our adjustments to the university, we acted as individuals, not as a group. After all, we had accepted the university's premise that integration was our goal, and, like the university, were slow to change. To act as a group would have been "clannish," a fault that the university was forever warning us to avoid.

Our resolutions of the problem fell into three general categories. A few who felt the infringement upon their style and personalities most strongly, made an entirely honest decision—they left. Others of us managed to so deceive ourselves as to think that our goals and values really were the same as those of the white students and professors. The overwhelming evidence to the contrary was carefully and painfully ignored. The majority of us made compromises between the two courses. None of our compromises were entirely satisfactory, and all were at least partially dishonest. We stayed at the university. We saw ourselves as Negroes (a far more flexible concept than blacks) at a white university. There were certain things about the university which we would not accept, but the value of this particular university degree was too great to permit us to transfer to another college. We chose to stay, but to reject indignantly and emotionally everything about the university we felt infringed on us as Negro students.

It was a disastrous decision—not so much for ourselves as for the universities and the black students who followed us. Our approach was almost entirely negative and self-serving. We never defined precisely what we felt was wrong with the university, nor did we propose positive alternatives. Of course, we cannot be held entirely to blame. The university, by refusing to solve honestly the problems of race that we confronted, never allowed us to get beyond race in defining our difference from the rest of the student body. More important, the university failed to fulfill its basic responsibility as an educational institution. It never required that we state our question clearly and concisely, nor that we analyze the issues honestly, nor that we propose intellectually valid solutions. Above all, the faculty and administration felt no compulsion themselves to engage in an honest analysis of this very real problem. The university, on the contrary, seemed determined to convince itself that it didn't really have a problem. From this pantomime of self-serving and emotionalism by the black student and stupidity and avoidance of issues by the university, the more recent scenes of complete chaos have been elaborated.

At Princeton the problem came to a focus for us over the organization of Southern (white) students who advocated segregation, which they euphemistically phrased "the Southern point of view on race relations." As many of us were also Southerners (black), we resented the existence of this organization, its exclusive claim to "the Southern point of view," and the university's apparent willingness to tolerate it. We saw an opportunity to strike out against what even we were beginning to call university racism. At least as important, we saw a chance to stop being, as the campus press continually called us, "the one in the class of '65," and one of the "five in the class of '66." We could force recognition of ourselves with names and feelings. So we packed the first meeting of the organization with liberal white friends and got one of us elected vice president. We had a field day; it was all done, we felt, with exceptionally good humor and taste and we got the recognition we sought. We were the darlings of the liberal faculty and students.

Then the campus press editorialized against us for using "neo-Nazi techniques," and President Goheen made some statement about violation of "the Millsian principle of the university as a free market place of ideas." Sure, we asked, but where were you when our ideas were being ignored these past three years? Again there was no real discussion of the educational principles involved. The president had a point, but the Southern conservatives picked it up and beat us over the head with it. The faculty rejected the point because they rejected the segregationists. The question of whether segregation had any validity, of why the organization could be created on our supposedly liberal campus, of why the black students responded to it as they did, of why we chose the destructive techniques that we did, were never raised in contexts where they could be intelligently discussed. These became topics for late-night bull sessions, not for the classroom where all involved might have been required to respond with their minds as well as their emotions.

If nothing else, the take-over of the Southern society forced the university to recognize that it had a problem with its black students. Its response was typical of what it had done in the past and of what helps to sustain the current level of black-white confrontation on campuses across the country. There must, it decided, be something wrong with the black students (not with the university), so it hired a black counselor, unsubtly disguised him as an assistant director of financial aid, and told him to solve our problems for us. It was an impossible task. Our problems, after all, were with the university, not with him and not with ourselves.

Having reached the degree of alienation from the university that then prevailed among us—and for reasons which, even in retrospect, seem entirely valid—we naturally resented being provided with a black father figure. Perhaps we could have overcome that resentment if he had been able to fill the role. But, after all, we knew whom he worked for and so did he. He could not be our advocate with the administration and faculty, because they paid him; nor could he be their spokesman to us, because everyone was smart enough to know we would not put up with that. So he was trapped in the Booker T. Washington role of the "Negro leader"—the mediator and reconciliator. The degree to which that role is irrelevant to the present problems is demonstrated by its complete ineffectiveness in quieting black student dissent across the country.

Our relations with our black counselor were very stormy. The main function he served for the university appeared to be that of lightning rod; we took out our hostilities on him. Perhaps the university was devious enough to have hired him for just that purpose; white administrators could then get on with their more important tasks. In any case it didn't work. After testing out this new ingredient in the university's response to us, we relapsed into our compromise—we would get our degrees and get out. And we did.

In the years since, we have worked closely with the faculties and administrations of white universities, and with their black students. We have watched the situation grow more complex and more insoluble. Black student emotionalism and self-serving are greater. It was conceivable, after all, that a Negro student could make his peace with a white university and get its degree, but how can a black student do so—especially when he is busy denouncing all about him for not being as black as he is? Universities have carried stupidity, intellectual dishonesty, and avoidance of issues to their logical extremes. If one cannot cope with a handful of black students, why does one energetically recruit hundreds of them? If black students from widely different backgrounds and with different levels of ability continually raise identical objections about the university, and if even white students begin to do the same, shouldn't the university look at itself as well as its students when trying to resolve the problem?

The heart of the problem for the university is that our society is one of conflict and difference. Students, both black and white, are beginning to recognize this reality, but they are ill equipped to handle it, for nothing in their education, nor in ours, prepares students to do so. Universities seem determined to ignore these conflicts and differences, or to treat them as student problems, irrelevant to the learning process which is the business of the university. Because students are not allowed to learn about conflict and how to cope with it in the classroom, it emerges as riots in the dormitory and as occupation of faculty offices.

Our problems as black students on white campuses were but a small part of the total problem of societal conflict. They provided, on the other hand, an excellent opportunity to begin retooling the university so that it could deal with a much better educated and much more aggressive generation of college students. That opportunity was lost and each attempted resolution since then seems to withdraw further from the basic problems. Black studies programs are potentially steps in the right direction, but unless both style of teaching and subject matter change, conflict can also be avoided in a black history course. Unless black students are more willing to hear and debate the opinions of white students in such courses than whites showed themselves to be in "white" history courses, the opportunity to learn to handle conflict and difference will still evade them.

The problem cannot, however, be resolved simply by a change in the academic aspect of university life. Students, particularly black students, need positive relationships with adults who can help them resolve the intellectual and personal conflicts which a college experience creates. College offers a unique opportunity to look at oneself and one's society, but to date colleges have offered no answers to the problems that a student discovers. Rather than making it possible for students to learn from mature faculty members who have found personal, if not universal, solutions to coping with conflict, students are forced back on their own resources at the very time they need the most assistance. Look past the black skin and rhetoric of the "Black House" on any campus and it is difficult to distinguish its students from any other self-selected and self-protective college subgroup. We used to call them fraternities and rejected them as unhealthy and discriminatory. Now, out of fear and confusion, such black groupings are condoned. They are not unhealthy because they are all black but because universities have found no way to insure that they serve a valid educational purpose within the university community. Too often, they have become harbors of anti-intellectualism under the guise of searching for an uncritical definition of black identity.

If a university is truly interested in educating undergraduates, particularly black undergraduates, it must take them as they are upon matriculation. This in no way endangers "standards," for in many ways the young black students are raising questions far more basic than many scholars have lately asked one another. Moreover, until the content of the students' lives is accepted as a valid part of the university learning experience, it will be impossible to teach students the abstract concepts by which they can go about solving their problems and those of the society. This is a most complicated and self-scrutinizing process to ask of any university. But the universities that have begun the process are the ones at which there is a relative degree of racial peace. Those that still persist in tinkering with the machinery will ultimately suffer the breakdown of the institution itself.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Ammons, Ashbery, Bly, Bowers, Corso...

ALONE WITH AMERICA: Essays on the Art of Poetry in the United States Since 1950. By Richard Howard. Atheneum Publishers. 594 pp. $12.95.

CHARLES MOLESWORTH
Mr. Molesworth teaches English at Queens College. He has published poetry and criticism in Salmagundi, Poetry, University Review and Genre.

Neoterics, Scriblerus, breath-line: these are easy and effective labels for our poets; they enable us to place them without much work, or perhaps make our work on them placeable. The taxonomic mystery persists, and only a fool would insist that proper naming of poetic trends or groups, never mind for the moment what they say, is not a legitimate function of criticism at the present time. At the other extreme, we have the fully deployed sensibility, inviolate of ideas or labels, roaming in the fields. At a symposium on criticism some nondiscursive partisan rose to ask, "Why not just admit the best critics of the century are its best novelist and its best poet—Lawrence and Pound." To reply to that is to mark oneself as soulless and tasteless. There you are, either you go around pinning labels on people whose whole life's work is confronting the difficulty of proper naming, or you get yourself born as an artist.

Fortunately, there are other ways to perform the critical task, less stable on the one hand and less glamorous on the other, but necessary and valuable. When the object of scrutiny is poetry, and contemporary American poetry at that, however, various alternatives present difficulties of their own, some self-engendered, others a result of the object itself. Poetry reviewing is scandalous for all the known, obvious reasons: it's always done by other poets, and is little more than an exercise in vicarious self-promotion; or the reviewer is so temperamentally (and, yes, programmatically) opposed to the work at hand that nothing results but exercised frustration and opulent bitchiness. (Consider the recent one-word comment by James Dickey on the total opus of Robert Bly: "disgusting.") And poetry grows more hermetic every day, faction-ridden, elitist, and increasingly removed from the center of attention, though, strange to say, it still matters.

How might a serious poetry reviewer make us pay attention to what he considers important, considering the two extreme methods to be, for all sorts of reasons, unavailable to him? How can he avoid the temptation to overpraise or to reject out of hand? How can he help to create those great audiences Whitman saw as necessary?

Richard Howard, writing here on forty-one contemporary poets, has employed a way he describes like this: "the entire production—prose and verse, translation and criticism—is drawn on, is mined out to forge a free standing figure which will suggest not only the monuments but the career encompassing them as moments of its course." The metallurgical image, especially when refined into a statuary one, suggests a static, frozen approach; but that is modified by a kinetic sense of the course of each poet's growth.

That conflict between the static, the immutable, the memorable and hence the mythic, on the one hand, and the kinetic, the unique, the quotidian, hence the Adamic on the other, runs throughout Howard's book. Though quick to find it in many poets, he is reluctant to credit its initial formulation to Roy Harvey Pearce in The Continuity of American Poetry. (Though in his Foreword he acknowledges not only his but his fellow poets' debt to such critics as Burke, Blackmur, Frye, Wimsatt and Nemerov. He seems not the least scandalized to suggest that poets learn from critics.)

So from A. R. Ammons to James Wright, as the rigid alphabet runs, and from "John Ashbery to Louis Simpson, by way of James Dickey and W. S. Merwin, and Kenneth Koch and Sylvia Plath," as the checkered dust jacket notes, all concern for schools, for groupings, for forces is abjured, and we are left with "free-standing creative figures." Perhaps this is Howard's way of mediating between the labeling impulse and the visionary flight. However, implicit criticism is contained just in his choices and his allotment of space. (Ed Dorn and Charles Olson are excluded, while Richard Hugo and Edgar Bowers, one is compelled to say, sneak in. Allen Ginsberg is given only 6 pages and Denise Levertov 13, while Irving Feldman gets 9 and John Hollander 31! All too often the critic's job has been pre-empted by the publicity machine churning day and night in the hidden sealed world of poetry.)

As for the book's title, it is completely gratuitous. Alone With America could hardly be less concerned with America as a geo-political entity, not to mention its status as a cultural myth. Howard does pause to point out that Donald Justice published fifty poems in his first two books, one for each state in the union. Beyond that, he rarely travels in the country itself.

Leaving aside as better unexplored the American aspects of Howard's critical vocabulary, one should not be surprised to find European dicta operating as guides to his formulations. Himself a well-known translator from the French (more than 100 titles), Howard is much more likely to quote Paul Eluard than Edwin Arlington Robinson. In fact, he does quote Eluard in at least three separate essays. Most contemporary American poetry is as intercontinental (if not cosmopolitan) in its accents as that of any other period in literature. Bly and Wright owe much to Trakl, Snodgrass to Rilke, Merwin to Guillén. Since Eliot found Laforgue, a pervasive air of polite smuggling covers the land. The Yale Series of Younger Poets, the Lamont Award, the Pulitzer, Guggenheim travel grants—how often do those honors result in translations!

In many ways, then, Howard's expert knowledge of continental literature places him in an advantageous position. Disposed toward the "academic" tradition of American poetry, he is wise and adroit in his insistence on shunning such an easy label. (I resort to it here only out of necessity. As I said, taxonomy persists.) Academic poetry is not the whole expanse but the area most in the eyes of the professional judges. It owes its sophistication to European models, its prestige to these judges. This is the mode to which Howard's sensibility is most attuned. It is the dominant mode of American poetry perhaps because of critics like Howard.

The essays divide themselves into three main patterns of methodology. First is the rehearsal of the poet's career. This usually proceeds with the mild disclaimer that while the first book was heavily clotted with influences undigested, the third has begun to master poetic areas as yet uncharted. How can it be that of forty-one poets, all forty-one have had second books which advanced over their initial efforts, and third attempts which rectified the flaws caused by the second's too earnest striving to improve the limitations of the first? Still, it happens. In this category, the Dickey essay is the best; the weakest is the one on James Wright. Now there's a career which needs an explanation of its development—though maybe there is none, beyond Wright's own Protestant pomposity: "Whatever I write from now on will be entirely different . . . I am finished with what I was doing." He has, apparently, put on the Pauline new man.

Then there is the method derived from looking for a poet's central image, theme or statement, and tracing its development and distortions through the paces. This leads Howard to consider weak poems equally with strong ones, an evaluative leveling which he is guilty of in other ways as well. So we find out about Galway Kinnell and fire, Robert Bly and the sea, and so on. Discussing John Ashbery and the notion of en abyme, setting one experience or perception inside another, Howard is brilliant. But in discussing how Adrienne Rich learns to become entranced with the "exact premonition," he quotes some very weak lines, making a thin poet appear thinner.

> . . . she creates a voice as exact and premonitory as that of any nurse, as entranced as that of any virgin, as erotic as that of any temple prostitute, all of whom she resumes and restores when she says, at that end where she is most herself:
>
> For us the work undoes itself over and over;
> The grass grows back, the dust collects,
> the scar breaks open.

To use language like this is to give a man a blanket when he needs a lamp. Miss Rich's poetry may suffer from virginal entrancement or even vestal prostitution, but it's hard to guess it from the lines quoted. At this rate of inflation, we should soon have studies of the Platonic elements in Rod McKuen. In fact, Howard's main flaw is this tendency to overinflate second (or third) order poets while leveling those voices and careers which are more engaging and instructive.

The last methodology that Howard derives is evaluation by etymology. The child of Burke and Empson, Howard is often reminding us that parentage and preparation share the same root, that glamour is a Scotch corruption of grammar, and so on. Occasionally such historical retentiveness can be useful, such linguistic double-checking profitable. For example, rip-rap means not only a "cobble of stones" as Gary Synder tells us himself and as we need to know to begin to appreciate his aesthetic; but, Howard points out, it also means "a kind of firewood that when lighted makes a succession of sharp explosions and jumps." That further clarifies Snyder's poetry for it is in the metaphoric space between those two meanings that his poetry operates. But often these etymological exercises are really not evaluative at all, as when we are reminded many times that verse means a turning, or as Howard glosses it, a re-turning to a fixed standard or metric.

Escape from evaluation is, finally, the common flaw of each approach. Each has its advantages, to be sure. The essays on Creeley, Koch and Merwin are all first rate. (This is largely because they are among the best poets considered, but nowhere does Howard maintain that, let alone attempt to demonstrate it.)

Still, in its avoidance of evaluation, Howard's criticism possesses an advantage in dealing with its subject matter. American poetry since 1950 has been blessed and cursed with precious irony, an irony born often of alienation and frustration, trained to balance perfectly the extremes of emotional possibility. In doing so it has often been bereft of real emotional contact, failing to offer that evaluation of experience that the best artists always provide. Howard says that William Meredith's odes to duty "constitute a lamentable genre but a real distinction," and we recall the war poetry of Shapiro and others, remembering, alas, that the distinction is largely one of versification. When we're told that some risky "moments . . . justify, even as they jeopardize" Merrill's gifts, we think of Berryman's Henry and his pathetic jeopardy. When we see Anne Sexton's career as "an excruciating trajectory of self-destruction, so that it is by her failures in her own enterprise that she succeeds, and by her success as an artist that she fails herself," we suddenly realize that Howard is, after all, describing the peculiar nature of American poetry since 1950: it often fails itself through its very successes.

Since criticism performed with either the handy label or the gifted sensibility is too extreme for daily bounds, the criticism of poetry ends up suffering the same fate as its subject. Howard's book is a formidable enterprise, and better by far than anything on the subject. Still, it can be said of critical studies as it can of poems, that "When they become so derivative as to become/ unintelligible,/ the same may be said for all of us, that we/ do not admire what/ we cannot understand." The view is clearer, if not more comfortable, at the poles.

'Suggest Thorough Reconnaissance'

TRUTH IS THE FIRST CASUALTY. By Joseph C. Goulden. Rand McNally & Co. 285 pp. $6.95.

RICHARD J. WALTON

Mr. Walton is the author of The Remnants of Power: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson (Coward-McCann). He is now working on a study of the foreign policy of President Kennedy, to be published by Viking Press.

This account of the Gulf of Tonkin incidents is of the first importance and not only because the Tonkin resolution was—to use Nicholas deB. Katzenbach's now famous phrase—the "functional equivalent" of a declaration of war. Beyond the resolution's enormous significance as the turning point of the Vietnamese War are the deeply serious questions this book poses about the American system of government in the postwar years.

Putting aside these deeper questions for the moment, Goulden's book would be of enduring value even if he had done nothing beyond what he has done so superbly: reconstruct the chaotic events of these first days of August 1964. By now there can be hardly anyone left who puts much credence in the Johnson administration's account of what happened in the Gulf of Tonkin. After reading Goulden's account, carefully assembled from official documents and interviews of participants, one can only conclude that even as American bombers took off for the "retaliatory" attack on North Vietnam, there was considerable doubt on the scene, at Pacific headquarters and in Washington about what actually took place on the stormy seas of the Tonkin Gulf on that pitch-black night of August 4. That is a charitable assessment. Many readers will conclude, as did this one, that the alleged attacks on the destroyers Maddox and C. Turner Joy simply did not take place at all.

One could possibly understand a decision based on faulty, incomplete information if the facts seemed clear then and only later were called into question. But immediately after the supposed naval engagement, Capt. John J. Herrick, commander of the patrol, radioed Pacific headquarters: "Entire action leaves many doubts, except for apparent [my emphasis] attempted ambush at beginning. Suggest thorough reconnaissance in daylight by aircraft."

That alone should have been enough at least to postpone action of the magnitude that was soon to take place. But shortly thereafter Herrick sent another message: "Review of action makes reported contacts and torpedoes fired appear doubtful. . . . Freak weather effects and overeager sonarman may have accounted for many reports. No actual visual sightings by Maddox. Suggest complete evaluation before any further action." The evidence consisted largely of radar and sonar reports in weather and operational circumstances that made them very unreliable.

Secretary McNamara saw this message and he called on the scrambler telephone Adm. Ulysses Grant Sharp, Jr., Pacific naval commander, and demanded that the engagement be substantiated before the planes were sent over North Vietnam. He soon got that confirmation. Herrick had been bombarded by messages from a whole clutch of admirals and his doubts had now vanished. No one who has ever served in a chain of command, military or civilian, will be surprised. Superiors usually get the reports they want from juniors. Yet the fact was as plain then as it was later that supporting evidence was sketchy and questionable.

Why, in the light of these indisputable facts, Admiral Sharp gave so quick an answer and why McNamara, Rusk and Johnson acted in such haste on so grave a matter are questions only they can answer. It would seem to have been an act of great irresponsibility by the three American officials who should have been most responsible. One must also ask another question of judgment, a question not asked by Goulden. Even if the second Tonkin incident took place, how could it justify a major act of war in response? According to the Johnson administration the total damage to the American ships was caused by one bullet—one bullet—that landed harmlessly on the Maddox in the confirmed first incident on August 2. And for that the North Vietnamese paid with three PT boats badly damaged. Sufficient, one would think. The punishment of a series of heavy air strikes certainly did not fit the crime of a minor naval skirmish—even if the crime took place as charged.

Goulden discusses several aspects that put into question the entire patrol: the Maddox, for instance, was not on "routine patrol" but was engaged in electronic spying. But beyond the Tonkin incidents themselves lie deeper questions. Was the Tonkin affair a long sought after pretext for a joint resolution that would give Johnson a "blank check" to do what he wanted in Southeast Asia? The evidence suggests it was. And did the administration ram it through in the heat of the moment, refusing amendments on the ground that they would comfort the enemy (an argument we've heard often since), knowing that its specific language went far beyond the intent of Congress which wanted only to show support for the President in a moment of supposed crisis and not authorize an escalation of the conflict?

The Tonkin incidents also raised the frightening question of deception in government. As U Thant observed, "In times of war and of hostilities the first casualty is truth." This was certainly so in the Tonkin affair. The administration misrepresented facts, denied the Senate Foreign Relations Committee pertinent data, and doctored other information. McNamara, when he appeared before the committee, twisted and turned and played with words.

Goulden's fine book also causes a reader to wonder anew about the competence of the military in its own field. Many of us have seriously doubted its competence in global strategy or foreign policy but we assumed that the military was at least technically adept. However, Goulden tells us that another electronic spy ship, the Liberty, sunk by Israeli planes during the Six Day War, was ordered out of the danger zone but the messages incredibly went to the Philippines, to Fort Meade, Md., to Asmara, Ethiopia, and to Morocco but not to the Liberty. Add to that the Pueblo fiasco and the recent incident in which a plane was able to fly from Cuba unchallenged to the airfield where the President's plane stood, and you begin to wonder.

More basic still is the question of Presidential execution of foreign policy. Liberals, who more than anyone else have long championed the increase of Presidential powers, now have to face the consequences of that policy. One President after another has gone far beyond his constitutional powers in committing American troops abroad. These Presidents have steadily usurped the constitutional powers of Congress with the enthusiastic support of most liberals. And look where it has led.

Liberals have not only advocated a form of Presidential dictatorship in for-

AT MY MOTHER'S GRAVE

Goldfinches lift from nowhere, climb,
dip,
piping per-chic-o-ree
twice at the crest of each wave, then are gone
from December sun,
leaving me lightfooted light.

Before April bee will roar thru my stringtied violets, spider bounce
on his homemade trampoline, ballerina moth
figure my mother's grave, or wind bring the coupling clank of I.C. coal cars
from the valley where my mother's eyeblue River eases by,
and things are things again:

I pocket the bone-rattle of my heads,
catch mortal breath within sight of my brother's rococo roses,
candle parched and incredible as waxen flesh, and when my breath moves with a wind moving a tiny skull of autumn leaf
on checkerboard sod,
I give short shrift
to the boy in me asking how do I cope with a ghost.

Before night will touch the fallen oak with its record of rings, lower on my mother's grave,
reach me:
I will tend light.

Filigree twig shadow stirs like lace
on my hand and withered grass, like lace in a tintype
for the eyes' appraisal, sun splinters to matchwood
in my gathering arms.
My mother relates to the universe, this Iowa hill and manchild:
flesh is shattered,
spirit refracted

Fifty trillion cells of me rise with the Massbread dough in my oven at home.
Goldfinches lift from nowhere,
climb,
dip,
lantern the abundant air.

RAYMOND ROSELIEP

eign affairs but have fostered elitism, with themselves, of course, as the elite: such liberals, such intellectuals as McNamara and the Bundys and the Rostows and Kissinger. They all believe that only the men around the President have the intelligence (in several senses) to carry out foreign policy. They believe that neither Congress nor the man in the street knows enough to make a valid judgment. And that is still the kind of thing we're hearing from the White House now. Perhaps it is this kind of personal arrogance multiplied many times that has led to the national "arrogance of power."

These are things we need to discuss and Goulden has made a real contribution. He has given us vital facts about one of the crucial events, or nonevents, in American history. Future historians will be grateful.

The Ready-Made Crisis

ARTWORKS AND PACKAGES. By Harold Rosenberg. Horizon Press. 232 pp. $17.50.

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

The difference between artworks and packages is amplified by other antitheses which Harold Rosenberg discusses, the difference between "the opus and the commodity," between the museum and the market. All evince an us/them polarity in which the enemy is the mass media, a term that Rosenberg applies to almost any public treatment of art outside the studio. Rosenberg's original argument in the early fifties was that the act of creation as a form of knowledge was so potent that it wiped out other forms of knowledge of art. He is less fanatic in his definition of the act now, but he is showing sustained zeal in exposing the false forms of knowledge. "The museum itself is being transformed into a mechanism of mass communication"; "art has entered the media system"; and "the media turn art into media" are characteristic pronouncements.

In contrast to the illusive but deep experience of the artwork, Rosenberg argues, "packaging" is the ultimate vicious form of the mass media. By packaging he means the panoply of supplementary information about art. Exhibition histories, catalogue entries, references and reproductions in journals and books accrue to the work of art in what Rosenberg regards as a network of false commentary, like an advertising campaign. "Cornflakes" or a "retrospective exhibition of the paintings of Jackson Pollock"—it's all packaging according to Rosenberg. (Would not the same hold true of the recent retrospective at the Museum of Modern Art of his friend Willem de Kooning arranged by Tom Hess—to whom this book is dedicated?)

By seeing art as the opposition to (as well as the opposite of) the mass media, Rosenberg is trying to find something useful for art to do. "Art today needs political consciousness in order to free itself from the frivolity of continual insurrections confined to art galleries and museums." It is curious that Rosenberg attaches so little value to the changes in art registered in the places that by definition show art. I find it no more strange than that Rosenberg should urge revolution in The New Yorker and celebrate the coonskinner in Art News. His suspicion of museums and art galleries could be taken as no more than a writer's professional hostility toward other, rather effective, channels (like newsmen knocking television); but it is clear that Rosenberg is no less critical of art.

In 1952 in his lively but abortive essay, "The American Action Painters," he stated: "the gesture on the canvas was a gesture of liberation, from Value—political, aesthetic, moral." In his new book, however, art is defined very differently, as "symbols of activities of mind that extend beyond the skill involved in their production." The work of art is evidence of value, after all: a position that Rosenberg had to resort to if, as he believes, "politics haunts the art of our time." It seems to haunt one of our art critics. According to him, "Action painting became a mythical substitute for the myths of the American Social Revolution"—a strange explanation of the divergent art of Pollock, Hans Hofmann, and de Kooning, who are mentioned together as Action painters, along with Barnett Newman, described as "very close to being one." (It is interesting to learn that one can be almost an Action painter.)

Rosenberg is forever expanding his once hermetic term Action to include, for example, Futurism and Paul Klee, though the argument advanced rests mainly on the term's lack of definition. Rosenberg asserts that since the Futurists, "action had been the pledge" on which all avant-gardes flourished. And of Klee he says: "color, line, plane are translated into verbs." His piece on Klee is the most openly affirmative and interesting one in the book, but to claim him for Action via verbs (doing words) is case of kidnapping.

Thus Rosenberg in his new book make dual claims for Action painting as simul taneously a mode of political commit ment and a key term of Kenneth Burke like copiousness. He is pretty cool t most of the cool art after Action paint ing (now generally called Abstract Ex pressionism), but he makes one excep tion when he notes that "Action painting or—by the testimony of Allan Kapro —the idea of Action painting, led logical ly to the Happening." It is embarrassin that Rosenberg should feel he has to ad vertise in this way, for while it is tru that Kaprow liked the term, his formula tion of the early Happenings was th result of a cluster of influences, not jus one, as Rosenberg implies.

A part of the difficulty I hav with Rosenberg is that he writes as if h were immune to the ironies and pollu tions that he loves to identify in others How did he get above the battle? Wha he has done is translate the Marxist his torical overview into the feigned omnip otence of the literary essayist. Since Th Tradition of the New in 1960, Rosenber has moved from criticism toward th essayistic; that is to say, away from tigh argument about particular problems o situations toward general reflections. H writes about the Art Scene rather in th way that Joseph Addison wrote abou The Town, which he set up as a steady state of folly, vice and error. In the 19th century the image of The Town became The Age, a larger unit but one that sup ported a similar stock of moralistic re flections about the failures, dangers an evils of the Present Age as compared with history.

After Town and Age the stock subject of the 20th-century essay is Crisis. It i standard form when writing to announce a crisis, chart its ramifications, and con trovert the fallacies that made it possible This makes for much more thrilling read ing than straight art criticism with ana lytical intentions or with small-scale tar gets. The reader of Crisis-essays gets free glimpses of vast, unargued schemes of history, the human condition, society technology, and of course mass commu nications. There is, therefore, a built-in reassurance to the reader about the rele vance of the essay he is reading. The tactic of the ready-made crisis, as a matter of fact, might be considered one of packaging.

The tone of Rosenberg's recent essays is more urbane than it used to be and he mentions many more artists by name. As a reviewer of current shows, and as a student of the symptoms of crisis, he is forced to write continually about the young or the younger artist, though never with much delight. He is convinced neither by the super-object of literalist art nor by the anti-object of conceptual art. His comments are ironic and derogatory, which is, after all, the standard attitude of the essayist chiding youthful foibles and extravagance, as earlier essayists might have said.

Rosenberg's withdrawal of support from younger artists and new movements, his corrective theory of the mass media, and his attempt to include traditional artworks within the province of his original exaggeration of Action, have a cumulative effect very different from the impact of his early pieces. Once he wrote for or on behalf of artists, usually de Kooning, and poets, himself probably, which gave his work a topical intensity rare in the early 1950s. Now he seems taken up with the defense of his past position and with the imperial spread of his slogan. In terms of the politics by which he seems haunted he is hardly the expected revolutionary. Even his attacks on the mass media sound more like a conservative complaint about the changing world than a speculative play with their possibilities.

Legacy of the Enlightenment

THE ESTATE. By Isaac Bashevis Singer. Translated by Joseph Singer, Elaine Gottlieb, Elizabeth Shub. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 374 pp. $6.95.

LEONARD KRIEGEL

Mr. Kriegel is the author of a forthcoming book on Edmund Wilson. He teaches at the City College of New York.

Through their sense of tradition, the fine of spiritual as well as historical continuity, the novels of Isaac Bashevis Singer challenge our belief in progress. The old, the established, the tested—the triumph lies here. And Singer, writing in Yiddish, not only celebrates shtetl life, he celebrates it without sentimentality and without apology.

The Estate, the latest of his novels to be translated into English, is "a sequel to and the conclusion of The Manor." It opens with the death of a man of his world, Clara Jacoby's father, Daniel Kaminer, and concludes with the death of Jochanan, the saintly Hasidic Rabbi of Marshinov. Between these deaths, the novel probes the breakup of the shtetl, the Jew's struggle to establish a foothold in Poland near the end of the 19th century, and his emergence into a world in which the boundaries are still recognizable but have begun to shift. To go out into the world as a Jew is unsatisfactory, but to go out into the world as a non-Jew is ultimately impossible. Man's estate, at any time and place, is restrictive; paradoxically when it contains new possibilities, restriction becomes constriction.

The Estate is a novel in which ideas are taken seriously because it is about a culture—and about a particular time in that culture's development—which took ideas seriously. Eastern European Jews in the 19th century were bursting with the overflow of the Enlightenment: liberalism, assimilationism, Zionism, socialism—the choices were as real as they were intense. They were debated with passion by people who desired to stake their claim to all of life's possibilities. The ideas in this novel, however dated they may seem, remain surprisingly vital, even the ideas about God. For Singer is one of the few modern writers who takes the idea of God seriously enough to mean it when one of his characters questions divine existence.

Sin and guilt are never far from the surface in Singer's work. In The Estate, Ezriel, now established as a doctor in Warsaw, finds himself wishing for the day when his wife, Shaindel, can be sent to an insane asylum so that he can be free to live with Olga Bielikov, his assimilated mistress. But Ezriel, who has chosen the way of Enlightenment over the way of the Hasidim, discovers that he cannot cast aside that which is part of him. To be a Jew is to be. His son, Joziek, emigrates to Palestine in response to Polish anti-Semitism; Shaindel dies in the asylum; Mirale, his sister, sacrifices herself for the Socialist revolution; his daughter, Zina, follows in her aunt's footsteps and becomes a revolutionary; his youngest son, Misha, is left with the Rabbi of Marshinov in order that he may become what Ezriel himself once was, an orthodox Jew; and Ezriel chooses emigration to Palestine, where at least he can feel himself a part of a history that cannot be obliterated.

Ezriel is the character in whom the fate of the Jews is depicted; his assimilation fails because it leaves him, finally, only with Western ennui. "In all the years that Ezriel had studied, had wrangled with himself, he had believed that he was destined for something higher. He had been dazzled by such words as culture, humanity, progress, civilization. Now the awakening had come. He had been left without a

Uncle Sam needs YOU to fight the defense establishment

HERE'S THE BOOK THAT GIVES YOU THE AMMUNITION:

American Militarism 1970

"If American democracy is destroyed within the next generation, it will not be destroyed by the Russians or the Chinese but by ourselves, by the very means we use to defend it."
—from the Epilogue by Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

$.95 paperbound $4.95 hardbound

Get it wherever books are sold

THE VIKING PRESS

EACH AUTUMN

Each autumn seasons us for death.
We put our leaves in order, raking, burning, acknowledging the persistence of time.
We have been dying all our lives, waiting out the slow seasons of the blood,
tramping the leaves to dust
under our own forgetting feet.
Only the trees go down in light, welcoming winter. Listen to the first snow fall from the ruined branch with the same sound as earth thrown into a new grave.

LINDA PASTAN

belief, without an ideal, without hope."

In Ezriel, the estate of the title becomes the specifically Jewish condition, the legacy of Judaism in conflict with the legacy of the Enlightenment. The past not only exists, it remains vibrant. In his letter to Zadok, the revolutionary son of the Rabbi of Marshinov, Ezriel does more than renounce his claim to the products of the Enlightenment; he chooses to reject that which, he sees, will ultimately reject him because it has rejected its own humanity. There are few more effective descriptions of the intellectual's dilemma than this letter: that very knowledge he had trained himself to worship has brought men to the brink of disaster. Unable to believe, Ezriel "cannot stop being a Jew." A brilliantly drawn character, Ezriel brings to mind the late Isaac Deutscher, who chose to embrace completely and consciously that which Ezriel finally rejects.

The Estate is not merely a portrait of the assimilated Jew's disillusionment. It is the portrait of a world as it disintegrates. The Jews at least have their assimilation to which they can look forward. True, it will fail them, but there will be years of illusion before the failure. The Poles in the novel, peasants and noblemen alike, are even worse off: they have little prospect of liberating themselves from the Russians; they have lost their country, find no refuge in religion, and are without prospects or hope. There is no Palestine for them.

Taken together, The Manor and The Estate chronicle the second half of the 19th century, "an epoch when humanism undertook to practice what it had preached for generations." But for Singer, history is not a progression; its fallibility lies in the very criteria by which we measure it. In The Manor, Ezriel abandoned Judaism to follow the path that so many Jews have found attractive since Spinoza (a figure with whom Singer has been having a running argument ever since he began writing). In The Estate, the Enlightenment is found wanting, especially when looked at by the orthodox Jew. If history is flux, then Hasidic orthodoxy is permanence. Its attraction lies in its timelessness. Looked at from such a point of view, the modern theologian's struggle for relevance can only be illusory.

Although Singer has criticized Thomas Mann for being an "old-fashioned" didactic novelist, one can see how much he shares with Mann. Beneath the complexity of Mann's fictional textures and Singer's impassioned prose there is an essential pessimism about modern life. Erich Heller described "the deepest source of Thomas Mann's irony" as "a religious imagination and religious conscience in conflict with a skeptical mind." Singer's work is not primarily ironic, but his greatness and his limitations spring out of a similar tension. And just as, for Mann, the past forces us to cast a cold eye on the present, so, for Singer, the reality of Judaism must outlast even the charnel house of Europe. "When one gazes at the Talmudic scholars," Ezriel writes in this novel, "one actually sees eternity. What is Berlin to them? What is Paris? How wonderfully they have isolated themselves amidst all this madness. They do not even know that they are in Europe and that we are at the end of the 'magnificent' and bloody nineteenth century. In their Houses of worship, it is always the beginning."

Singer is one of the major writers of our time. He creates in defiance of language; for his audience, like the world from which he derives, was all but obliterated in the greatest madness of this most progressive of all centuries. What little audience Yiddish writers could claim after the Holocaust has been taken from them—by cultural assimilation in the United States, official repression in the Soviet Union, new waves of anti-Semitism by the latest descendants of the Polish Count Lucian of this novel.

But Singer has survived those horrors to make his art prevail. There are worse fates than to find oneself among Professor Toynbee's fossils. One could, for instance, simply succumb to the natural order of events. But that would be to deny the possibilities of any kind of creation. And the genius of Isaac Bashevis Singer would never permit so easy a way out.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

It has nothing directly to do with the matter, but it struck me as I watched Joe Orton's two one-act plays collectively titled Crimes of Passion (Astor Place Theatre) that dramatists often foreshadow their own destinies in their writing. Marlowe's special ferocity presages his death by stabbing; Odets' Golden Boy points to his eventual creative collapse; Orton's violent end at the age of 34 complements the horror of his comedies.

He had an unmistakable talent. His pungently derisive dialogue captures the guying tone of contemporary London. There is something at once traditionally elegant and nasally obscene about his manner, as if Oxford had produced an irrepressible guttersnipe. If you open your mouth in laughter at an Orton play, a spoonful of acid is dashed into it. His jokes are a preamble to murder.

In "The Ruffian on the Stair," the first of the two one-acters, something like a note of tenderness is introduced. But it is muffled either by technical deficiency in the plotting of the play or by some ambiguity of purpose. On the pretext of wishing to rent a room in their apartment, a certain Mike appears at the door of a truckdriver who lives with a former prostitute. We do not know at the beginning that the intruder is the brother of a young man whom the truckdriver for some unexplained gangster motive has deliberately run over and killed. Mike, the "ruffian on the stair," seems at first to be seeking revenge by harming the truckdriver's girl. That, however, is not his intention: it soon becomes evident that he is a homosexual and that his devotion to his brother was more than fraternal. What he wants is to be killed by the very person who killed his brother, the only person he cared about. By pretending to have made a successful pass at the truckdriver's girl he succeeds in getting himself shot.

There are in effect two stories here. The first suggests the extreme loneliness of a man bereft of his only beloved and his consequent desire to die. But the greater part of the action concerns itself with the wretched humor of the brutish truckdriver's relation to his blowzy, frightened and fundamentally innocent girl friend. In the end they cling to and protect each other because of their desperate mutual need.

If there is unity here, as on reflection there appears to be, it is in the inference that the world is full of foul folk whose only common trait is their aloneness and their shabby groping toward one another to insulate themselves against the chill of solitude. Yet one can hardly say that Orton finds any saving grace in this, because, except for the "ruffian" and possibly the girl, he sprays everything with a shower of hate-filled mockery. We laugh because Orton writes sharply and can be funny, but the venom scalds. There is no pleasure in the fun.

When Orton turns to thoroughgoing farce, as in the second of his Crimes, "The Erpingham Camp" (it takes place in the sort of fun fair now popular in England's smaller towns) he becomes trigger happy, aiming a broadside of buckshot at the entire community, from officialdom and clergy down to the "little people" who frequent such resorts.

The play is too long. It provides moments of acrid entertainment especially through Orton's expert use of the common man's lingo cleverly patterned by his own sophistication—but it all ends by making humanity seem a sorry sell.

The two playlets are done well enough under Michael Kahn's direction by a competent cast of which the ablest are Sasha von Scherler (as the girl in the first play), Richard Dysart as the mucky truckdriver and David Birney as the sacrificial "ruffian."

In A Scent of Flowers (Martinique Theatre) James Saunders writes educated prose and feeble drama. It is the story of a young girl whose spineless father—so "fair" that he is never able to take any positive action—and rather rigidly realistic stepmother fail to prevent her from commiting suicide when she finds herself caught in an emotional dilemma.

The girl, isolated in a family which consists (apart from the aforementioned) of her fond but intolerantly atheistic stepbrother, impishly and cynically detached bachelor uncle, a cataleptically silent centenarian grandmother, has an affair with a married man, a teacher at the college she attends. The girl, a still believing Catholic, follows the kindly admonitions of a priest whom she trusts and decides to give up her lover. No one seems to recognize the extreme painfulness of her plight, and when her soul-frustrated uncle, in a baffled attempt to console, gives way to a sudden impulse to possess her, she takes an overdose of sleeping pills.

This rather banal "fable" (somewhat reminiscent of Graham Greene's The Living Room) is given the appearance of originality by a special device: the girl is already dead when the play begins and her story is retrospectively enacted around her coffin. The various characters identify and explain themselves directly, and episodes leading up to the suicide are played out in brief flashes. The exposition of the basic situation leads in the third act to the intellectual core of the play—the burial scene in which the entire family, in addition to the gravediggers, appear and converse with the deceased girl.

The import of this scene is that all

I Am Curious (Greenbaum)

Again, we at Warner/Reprise come to you with a problem. It's not just Norman Greenbaum, a recording artist whose new album is hardly a household word. We who try to sell the LPs were hoping for at least a Crosby, Stills and Greenbaum.

No such luck this month. Norman Greenbaum, plus nine other neo-folk-rock messengers most people never heard of, or have gone very damn unappreciated.

How, we pondered, to get them across to you.

Another big money-losing album offer was the answer. We call it "October 10, 1969," the date we released these albums.

This capsule taste-maker (a full stereo LP) has new goodies not only by Greenbaum, but also these other underknowns: The Kinks, Fleetwood Mac, Levitt and McClure, Ruthann Friedman, Denny Brooks, Eric Andersen, The Fifth Avenue Band, Frank Zappa, and The Mike Post Coalition. The whole LP costs you a buck.

If you are curious (Greenbaum), this heady experience may be had thusly:

To: October 10, 1969 S
WARNER/REPRISE RECORDS
4000 Warner Blvd. Burbank, Calif. 91505

Dear Libra, here's my $1. Send me my stuff.

_____

_____

_____

(Make checks payable to Warner Bros. Records)

Treat us not lightly, or next time it may be Blood, Sweat and Greenbaum.

Lifton's Birds

These cartoons are from Robert Jay Lifton's Birds. Mr. Lifton, winner of this year's National Book Award in the Sciences for Death in Life, is a research professor of psychiatry at Yale University. (Random House. $2.95. Copyright 1969 by Robert Jay Lifton.)

of us are alone in life, forgotten in death, hat nothing really matters, that no one s much to blame, that people cannot help what they are. For all the brightness of our minds, the sincerity of our feelings, the anguish of our experience, our vale of tears is beyond understanding. We are all a closed book o one another.

Perhaps I ought not to describe the play in this vein, for its author (with whose novels I am unacquainted) is clearly a serious person, possessed of literary skill. But I not only cannot abide his philosophy but must even refuse to consider it one—at least in the terms n which he presents it here. Taken at ts word, it should produce total silence, abstinence from all activity including writing or self-immolation. I am reminded of Samuel Butler's reply to he question, "Is life worth living?" "That," he said, "is a question for a foetus, not for a man."

A Scent of Flowers is ably produced. The setting by Ed Wittstein is handsomely sober, the direction by Brian Murray apt and the well-chosen cast wholly in tune. Especially good are Katharine Houghton whose intelligence quickens her sensibility—her prettiness too is marked by refinement—and Carolyn Coates as the stepmother whose thrust of thought serves as a kind of pillar of sanity amid the play's sentimental ruins.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

Just why György Ligeti's Atmosphères should be one of the very few postwar works to be accorded a second presentation by the New York Philharmonic is not clear, but it turned up on Seiji Ozawa's final group of programs with the orchestra (the previous hearing, under Leonard Bernstein, produced a recording, Columbia MS-6733). Conceivably, the fact that the work, along with others by Ligeti, figured in the sound track of the film 2001 has some bearing on its relative popularity, although the Philharmonic program notes did not mention this. Atmosphères is one of the more skillful examples of tone-cluster music, and thereby calls attention to the limitations of this style more conspicuously than do other less consistent efforts.

Ligeti's texture consists of bands of sound, varying in width, density, register and color; these clusters slide around, break off, change in loudness and timbre. Melody and meter are completely abandoned—in fact, there are no major articulations except a few resulting from complete contrasts, as when a high-register cluster is broken off and a low-register one begun. The resulting work is without structure in any conventional sense, and its success depends entirely on the composer's ingenuity in devising sonorous variety to maintain interest over the seven-minute span. I would agree that Ligeti has managed to do that, but the possibilities of the idiom are obviously limited: there are only so many things you can do with the modification of these sonorities, and in actual practice a number of possibilities will turn out to be functionally identical (e.g., the exact width of a cluster does not matter most of the time, since pitch identities from one part of the piece to another are not employed for connective or articulative purposes).

In short, Atmosphères is an example of a very limited music, the single-minded exploration of a particular musical device. And, since it uses a device with only minimal possibilities for hierarchical ordering, it is inevitably also a simple-minded piece. The composer deserves considerable credit for his sonorous inventiveness, but one cannot imagine that the work will retain much interest when these ideas have become commonplace, and especially when they have found their way into pieces with a higher level of organization. (Another example of Ligeti's work in this direction is his Volumina for organ, which composes out the same kind of textures using an interesting range of nonconventional sound possibilities. It is recorded on Candide CE-31009, along with two entertaining semi-theatrical works, Aventures and Nouvelles Aventures.)

On the same program, Ozawa offered Scriabin's Prometheus, which has a certain reputation as a progenitor of mixed-media music: it was conceived as a work for orchestra and "color organ," a light-projection system controlled by a keyboard. The Philharmonic offered some rather primitive lighting effects, thrown on the walls, ceiling and floor of the stage, but these can have had little to do with what Scriabin had in mind (exact correspondences between pitch-classes and colors). Otherwise, the performance was particularly noteworthy for the brilliant solo piano work of Paul Jacobs. Prometheus must have had considerable impact in 1911, but its structural diffusion makes it of limited interest today, when its best ideas have found better homes. (One of those homes was almost certainly not, however, Stravinsky's Firebird, as in-

NEW DIRECTIONS

PAPERBOOKS

Céline

GUIGNOL'S BAND. His nightmare novel of London's underworld during World War I. $1.95

Ferlinghetti

TYRANNUS NIX? Challenging political satire on " . . . Nixon Nixon enigma Nixon." $1.25

Henry Miller

THE BOOKS IN MY LIFE. Account of the writers and writing that influenced Miller. $2.45

THE COSMOLOGICAL EYE. A selection of Miller's most important shorter prose writings. $2.25

Kenneth Patchen

COLLECTED POEMS. "A writer of superb daring and invention. . . ." —James Dickey. $3.95

Jean-Paul Sartre

THE WALL. Stories: The Wall, The Room, Erostratus, Intimacy, The Childhood of a Leader. $1.75

Dylan Thomas

COLLECTED PROSE. Quite Early One Morning, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog, Adventures in the Skin Trade. Three volumes, boxed. $4.90

W. C. Williams

THE WILLIAMS READER. Poetry, stories, essays; excerpts from novels and plays. $3.25

Send for free catalogue.

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 6th Ave.,
N.Y. 10014

timated by one of my colleagues, for the latter work was completed nearly a year before the première of Prometheus.)

The two recitals by Peter Pears and Benjamin Britten (Hunter College, October 23 and 25) were among the most remarkable musical events of this or any other season. Only very rarely in this literature does one encounter the degree of ensemble and balance that these two performers achieve, and their realizations of Schumann's Dichterliebe and Schubert's Winterreise are the most coherent that can be heard today.

One of the most important factors in this coherence is respect for the composers' original key sequences. Both cycles were originally written for tenor voice, and there is no question that they "sound" more satisfactorily in this register; particularly on a modern piano, the accompaniment textures can become very muddy when transposed downward. Furthermore, there is a structural basis to the sequence of keys in these cycles, which the random downward transpositions that most baritones employ—one song down a minor third, the next a major second, etc.—completely obliterate. A final point is especially important with respect to the evening-long Winterreise: the relative vocal ranges of individual songs are carefully calculated to provide variety of color throughout the span of the cycle; the usual baritone transpositions negate this by putting every song squarely on the center of the voice.

Although it is clear that Peter Pears's voice is no longer (at age 59) the conventionally beautiful instrument of twenty years ago, he is more than ever a master of vocal technique and color, of verbal projection within the framework of a consistent legato line. If the German diction lacks a final measure of authenticity, the clarity and force of enunciation more than compensate, and by varying the weight and noise content of his consonants Pears can completely alter the effect of a phrase. For all its mastery of detail, on a level that many singers do not even attempt to reach, this singing never loses sight of the overall line.

Britten's playing, too, was full of striking details of execution—again, not in the conventional virtuoso sense but rather in the realization of musical requirements of phrasing, clarity of texture, accentuation, and variation of repeated material. Most important was the unity of the performances, with both musicians seemingly partaking of the same impulse throughout, and the whole moving forward with a spontaneity that belied the manifest thoroughness of preparation. To anyone who did not hear the performances, I cannot recommend too highly the recording of the cycles (London OSA-1261).

The New York City Opera's second new production of the season, Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, was, like the Mefistofele that preceded it, another questionable enterprise in an area of repertory that demands resources the company does not command. With the shining exception of Beverly Sills's performance in the title role, the singing was generally inadequate, and even the orchestra sounded occasionally at sea in the (to it) unfamiliar score. It is distressing to see this company turning away from the type of opera that it has done well in the past (and still does, if the performances of Mozart's Abduction from the Seraglio and Strauss's Capriccio that I saw are any indication). To be sure, Tito Capobianco's production was vastly preferable to the tasteless monstrosity recently on view at the Metropolitan, but is it so important to have another production of Lucia rather than, say Stravinsky's Rake's Progress, Weill's Mahagonny, or Busoni's Arlecchino—to mention just three significant 20th-century works that the City Opera ought to be able to do very well (and that, conversely, the Metropolitan would have no business staging at all)? I am second to none in my admiration for the singing of Beverly Sills, but provincial surroundings are no kind of showcase for her exceptional abilities. Can we not have a rational division of labor—and of performers—between New York's two opera companies? One would have thought that such coordination was a primary purpose of Lincoln Center.

WAITING FOR A HYSTERECTOMY:
A Saga Of The Boston & Maine

Smell the sex of this town reading the lips of America depot cafes waiting to ride out the night not even promised sun glints off silver steeple probably aluminum

we reckin realism heavy beat & gravelly voice

"ought to be examined"

where have we hidden all these children for the hamburger meat

where have we found chillblains growing wild up against the boxcars

two people shoot off their mouth shooting pool

two old women smoke furiously hoping the train will cure them in their Green Dodge two fourteen year old blondes

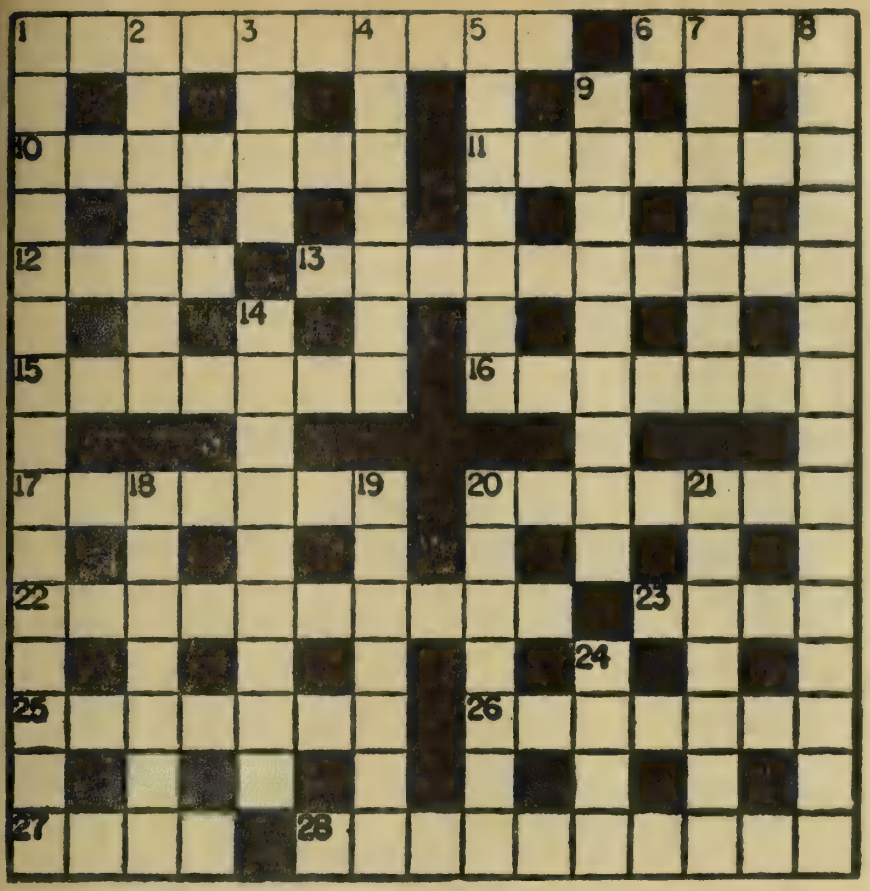
BILL LITTLE

RECORDS

FREE [illegible] PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION



THE NATION 11-17-69
[illegible] Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1321

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 What might you do with one of them? Oh, cut it out! (5,5)
6 Quiet morning? Not really! (4)
10 Stated and unstated numbers of players? (At least a couple!) (7)
11 As a writer she obviously makes a buck in having come out on top. (7)
12 The alternative article being port? (4)
13 A wringer sounds like it might describe what goes far from dry on a girl, proving a real leader. (10)
15 Never growing old enough to acquire sea-legs, even though shaky? (7)
16 The sort of dude now found shot, perhaps. (7)
17 They could be beautiful when the chord is resolved. (7)
20 and 27 Secondary Shakespeare title might have to be handled in 2, legally. (4,3,4)
22 What Thomas might have done completely—if with some reservations. (10)
23 What batters like to do in a native state.
25 Lock-keeper. (7)
26 Small type constabulary shows what it does to the law. (7)
28 In the present, it's tenacious! (10)

DOWN

1 A top producer does, but so does a clever faker. (4,2,1,4,4)
2 Re this, one might consider an abandoned one. (7)
3 Bird that can move either forwards or sideways. (4)
4 They might be necessary to make it possible to get at the contents of a pot or a jar. (7)
5 Not a fair description of what might come from a tuba. (3,4)
7 The deck might be so produced and possibly shaded. (7)
8 What a confused teen-ager may have to make—at least to his carburetor. (5,10)
9 It makes such sweetness as can urge revolution. (4,5)
14 Describing part of the filmed epic "Tin Gods"? (9)
18 Involving a supreme decision in the form of a cross. (7)
19 Might hold what you put in the fireplace and sink. (7)
20 Dampens everything inside, and notes the possible contents of them. (7)
21 Bows might have come from it, yet were misshapen. (3,4)
24 Representing one stage of life, they're found in the left side only. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1320

ACROSS: 1 Aqueduct; 5 Cut out; 10 Enliven; 11 Prancer; 12 Sated; 13 Up to snuff; 14 and 25 Greta Garbo; 16 Restrain; 19 Acidosis; 22 Mango; 24 Malaguena; 26 Tiara; 28 Robert I; 29 Eleatic; 30 Sorrow; 31 Testacea. DOWN: 1 and 18 A Message to Garcia; 2 Unlit; 3 and 4 Divide and conquer; 6 Urals; 7 Occlusion; 8 Thrift; 9 Spites; 15 Excalibur; 17 Remittent; 20 Sherif; 21 Scalene; 23 Smirks; 27 Attic.

SERVICES

BOOK PRINTING — Paperbacks, hard cover, pamphlets. As few as 200 copies. Quality printing at Budget Prices. Free details. Box 285N, Floral Park, N.Y. 11001

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

SITUATION WANTED

HISTORY Ph.D., five years experience, seeks position at liberal arts college committed above all to teaching. Box 630, c/o The Nation.

PERSONALS

RED, WHITE & BLUE WITH DOVE PEACE FLAG DECALS—50c each. Also send for list of Peace-Oriented Xmas Cards. Jewelry, etc. WOMEN FOR PEACE, Room 1416, 343 S. Dearborn, Chicago, Ill. 60604.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 101 W. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10001.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor, Self Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor says that whenever you pronounce the phrase "World Democracy" in prayer or otherwise, and will a world change, you immediately become a benefactor of total humanity, living, dead and unborn.

EDWARD M. KENNEDY QUARTERLY. Everything about the Senator. 4-issue subscription: $2.00. Sample copy: 50c. Write: EMK—N, 675 Tysens Lane, Staten Island, N.Y. 10306

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832, Kansas City, Missouri 64141.

DEAR FRIEND EISENMAN: "Your HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM is wonderful. I plan on using it repeatedly. Everything you write is stimulating." D. F. Fleming — December, 1965. NOW READ "Volume Two, WHY I SHOULD BE PRESIDENT" by Abram Eisenman: "WITHDRAW FROM VIETNAM AND THAILAND". "FREE ABORTION. FULL EQUALITY FOR WOMEN". "GOVERNMENT UNDERWRITES WORK FOR ALL". "FIFTY BILLIONS FOR PEACE NOT WAR". "WOMB TO TOMB SOCIAL SECURITY". Send five dollars for autographed copy to THE SAVANNAH SUN, 234 E. 48th Street, Savannah, Ga. 31405. HARD COVER. TELLS ALL.

PROTESTANT VISIONS OF THE VIRGIN MARY. 500 pages. Unique. Historic. Entrancing. Desperately needs a nonsubsidy publisher. Write or wire: B. Wm. Palmer, 15 S. Second St., Haines City, Fla. 33844

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. [redacted] 242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

We're A Pretty Damned Big Minority, Mr. President!

It should be clear by now, even to President Nixon, that the anti-war movement is more than just a vocal minority. Millions have demonstrated their support for immediate withdrawal from Vietnam and millions more are in silent agreement.

But the anti-war movement had modest beginnings. Remember the days when just a handful of critics, The NATION among them, saw through the official rhetoric and denounced the war?

This is the job of a critical journal, to expose the issues long before such criticism is popular. And this is the job done by The NATION. For 104 years, The NATION has provoked the American intellect and prodded the American conscience.

Help us continue. If you enter a new one-year subscription to The NATION, we will send you four bonus issues. Or if you are already a subscriber, why not send a gift subscription to a friend? But give us your support and give it today.

BONUS OFFER: If you join us for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me four bonus issues at no additional charge.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....Zip .....

N 11-17

THEATRE IN DUBLIN CATHARINE HUGHES

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 24, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
NOV 24 1969
LIBRARY

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

Agribusiness
REAPING THE SUBSIDIES
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

The Marxist Romantics
OBITUARY for SDS
LARRY DAVID NACHMAN

Northern Ireland
THE COMING WINTER OF DISCONTENT
ANDREW BOYD

'THE UNBOUND PROMETHEUS' / Theodore Roszak

EASTLAKE'S 'THE BAMBOO BED' / Beverly Gross

LETTERS

lost (?) letter

New York City

DEAR SIRS: In his review of two books by Gabriel Kolko [The Nation, Oct. 6] Ronald Radosh states in connection with the Soviet request for a postwar loan from the United States: "Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., has often asserted that this request was 'lost.' "

The only reference I have ever made to this loan request (in an article in Foreign Affairs, reprinted in The Crisis of Confidence, was in its entirety as follows:

> Washington inexplicably mislaid the request during the transfer of the records of the Foreign Economic Administration to the State Department. It did not turn up again until March 1946. Of course this was impossible for the Russians to believe; it is hard enough even for those acquainted with the capacity of the American government for incompetence to believe; and it only strengthened Soviet suspicions of American purposes. . . . The Russian hope for major western assistance in postwar reconstruction foundered on three events the Kremlin could well have interpreted as deliberate sabotage (the loan request), blackmail (Lend-lease cancellation) and pro-Germanism (reparations).

Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., presents a quote, taken out of context from his own Foreign Affairs article, which makes it appear that Russian suspicions of U. S. policy were understandable and justified. The quote is intended to show that my statement claiming that Mr. Schlesinger "has often asserted that this request was 'lost' " is false. . . .

Why does Mr. Schlesinger accept what Thomas G. Paterson ["The Abortive American Loan to Russia and the Origins of the Cold War, 1943-1946"; Journal of American History, June 1969] calls the "false and bizarre announcement" that the loan request was "inexplicably mislaid"? Repeating this as if it were true is not accidental or inconsequential. . . . The excerpt makes it appear that Schlesinger is merely explaining why the Soviets had solid ground for suspicion of U.S. motives. But his article goes on to argue exactly the opposite point.

Mr. Schlesinger accepts the false official story, because he argues that it is not clear that "satisfying Moscow on any of these financial scores would have made much essential difference." A loan would have strengthened both Soviet doves and hawks, reinforcing "both sides of the Kremlin debate; it would hardly have reversed deeper tendencies toward the deterioration of political relationships. Economic deals were surely subordinate to the quality of mutual political confidence." But as William Appleman Williams already pointed out in his forceful critique of the Schlesinger article [The Nation, Nov. 13, 1967], "that judgment completely overlooks the impact which a serious American economic proposal would have made on the 'quality of political confidence.' "

Mr. Schlesinger's entire point, indeed, is that "problems of communication" existed with the Soviet Union, which might have made the Russians "misread our signals." According to Schlesinger, the loan request was such a case. While the Russians might "well have interpreted" its being ignored as "deliberate sabotage," there was no basis in reality for such a suspicion. But the evidence presented by Kolko and Paterson now firmly proves that the response of Soviet officials was accurate and measured: the refusal to discuss the loan request was an attempt to dictate U.S. terms. This is why Schlesinger accepts and repeats the

(Continued on page 571)

EDITORIALS

Peace, Priorities, Politics

The American peace movement is evanescent. It emerges, seemingly out of nowhere, and stages giant demonstrations; then it subsides, even seems to disappear, only to re-emerge suddenly in response to some new threat. The explanation, of course, is that peace is an emotional issue and, therefore, one hard to sustain from one crisis, and one election, to the next. The interest does not abate, but the issue has not been one around which to build a "new politics" capable of attracting new constituencies and sustaining an on-going movement for the redirection of American power and purpose.

Yet the opportunity and the resources now exist to do just that. The rallies are bigger, the support broader, and the issues more sharply focused than at any time in the past. This last year has seen the first systematic attempt not merely to cut back the military budget but to inquire into the strange ways by which it has been put together in the postwar period and to insure against a recurrence of such methods. This movement—led by Sen. William Proxmire—did not succeed in its objectives, but for all that it represents the first significant attempt to launch a frontal assault on the growing militarization of American society. It scored some telling points; more important, it laid the groundwork for future campaigns aimed at the same objectives.

A few facts need to be emphasized about this movement. In the first place, it had no organizational support whatever. The legislative drive for peace had spent itself in the more "glamorous" attempt to defeat the ABM system; it did not carry over into the broader fight to cut the military budget. However, the national press had discovered a large public sentiment against the heavy military spending and began to cater to it. Dozens of papers ran articles on "the military-industrial complex," and gave front-page space to Senator Proxmire's disclosure of waste in military spending. As a result, the flow of letters to Senators and Representatives was impressive.

To this assault the Pentagon made characteristic response. It launched a heavy public relations campaign. It also, when ordering economies to appease public opinion, made cuts that would be certain to cause the most trouble for its Congressional critics. It punished key figures in the exposés; for example, abolishing the post of A. Ernest Fitzgerald, Air Force efficiency expert (see editorial, "Pentagon Loyalty," The Nation, November 17). It repeatedly announced specific budget cuts, which were later included in widely publicized general "reductions." The effect was to announce the same retrenchment more than once—in several instances three or four times—thus creating the impression that the Pentagon was really responding to its critics in and out of Congress. The tactic, as Senator Proxmire noted, was "maximum publicity for minimum cuts." By and large it worked: the Pentagon will get not all but most of what it originally requested.

Next year the country elects a new Congress. It will be an off-year election, and that endangers certain Representatives who voted against phases of the military budget and who also joined in the broad effort to do something about it. Few Congressmen like to stress the fact that they tried to cut arms money; rightly or wrongly, they feel that to do so invites attack from their opposition, especially in the absence of a general, broad-based movement insisting on the importance of such reduction.

If, therefore, some of the conspicuous critics of Pentagon spending are defeated in next year's election, it could have a disastrous effect on the growing movement in Congress to arrest the process of militarization and to stop the military boondoggles. For this reason, the 1970 elections are of decisive importance; the movement which Senator Proxmire and others have initiated can go forward only if it receives impressive popular support.

Today the potential exists for initiating a strong coalition movement in support of peace and a reordering of national priorities. The objective should be not to elect this or that Presidential candidate in 1972, but to extend the peace-and-priorities issue into every Congressional district. No district, however benighted, should be overlooked. A movement in Charleston, S.C. against Rep. L. Mendel Rivers, even if it did not succeed, would have the desired effect. Above all, those Congressmen who compiled a good voting record this year on the military budget should be supported.

The 1970 election will be the occasion to harness the energies of the peace movement to substantive issues of a kind that will not merely sustain it, between crises, but broaden its appeal and bring in new constituencies. Such a movement can tap strong potential support by appealing to groups that have a special concern about such issues as inflation, taxes, ecological waste, consumer rights, the cities, education, housing, transportation, civil rights and civil liberties, and foreign policy per se. All of these issues are involved directly in the struggle for peace and a new ordering of national priorities. If such a political movement is not set in motion, there is a danger that the peace groups will split into different factions, as they have in the past, become involved in disputes about "tactics," be tempted in discouragement to try methods that are likely to narrow the broad appeal which today the issue of peace-and-priorities possesses. The immediate organizational target, then, should be the 1970 Congressional elections.

Can SALT Succeed?

The strategic arms limitations talks (SALT) have begun at Helsinki. These negotiations labor at the outset under all the handicaps of earlier arms-limitation attempts, such as those which came to nought after World War I. The primary difficulty was—and still is—that military planners wish to take no risk at all vis-à-vis a potential enemy. Since that attitude prevails on both sides, arms races continue, with an escalation of risk for both sides.

The present situation is even more complex. Both contestants possess many times the nuclear weapons needed to destroy each other. Moreover, nuclear weapons technology is among the most rapidly advancing of all technologies. Thus a stable balance of terror is difficult

IN THIS ISSUE

JAN 6
APR 7
MAY

November 24, 1969

EDITORIALS

554

ARTICLES

558 The Marxist Romantics: Obituary for SDS — Larry David Nachman

561 Agribusiness: Reaping the Subsidies — Robert G. Sherrill

566 Northern Ireland: The Coming Winter of Discontent — Andrew Boyd

569 The Politics of Pesticides — Michael D. Green

BOOKS & THE ARTS

572 Landes: The Unbound Prometheus; Myrdal: Objectivity in Social Research — Theodore Roszak

574 Oppen: Of Being Numerous — L. S. Dembo

576 Eastlake: The Bamboo Bed — Beverly Gross

578 Calder: The People's War — C. H. Rolph

579 Theatre in Dublin — Catharine Hughes

581 Theatre — Harold Clurman

582 Art — Lawrence Alloway

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 209
No. 18

to achieve and perhaps even more difficult to maintain. Hence the decision to convene SALT, and hence obstacles even greater than those that vexed pre-nuclear arms-limitation negotiators. Conservative military planners on both sides will continue to oppose any significant limitation. On the American side, the Nixon Administration has adopted a somewhat less rigid stance than the Pentagon's; if it had not, there would be little point in entering into negotiations (except for probing purposes and to convince the public of the government's good intentions). But the difference between what the Joint Chiefs of Staff would willingly accept and what the American delegation will present for discussion is not great.

The danger is, then, that the negotiators will merely nibble at the edges of the problem, whereas the weapons in this armament race are so powerful that only radical measures can avail. Thus Morton H. Halperin, a former staff member of the National Security Council and a former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense with responsibility for arms control, has written for The Washington Post an article captioned "Sparring Won't Do At Helsinki." He urges starting off with the offer of a moratorium on testing of MIRV and postponement of deployment of these devices which, with the ABMs, are the currently crucial factors in the nuclear arms race.

Another expert, Prof. Wolfgang K. H. Panofsky of Stanford University, gave the same advice at a lecture at the University of Chicago on November 10. Panofsky argues that a small step in arms limitation may be "harder to negotiate and be in fact more dangerous" to the security of both the United States and the Soviet Union than far-reaching measures. MIRV and ABM cannot be evaluated separately. Depending on design and mode of deployment, they can be viewed as offensive or defensive weapons. To overwhelm ABM by sheer weight of numbers, MIRV does not need high accuracy. If, on the other hand, it is designed for, and achieves, high accuracy, it is an efficient first-strike device, since it can knock out enough of the emplaced and targeted enemy missiles to reduce the effects of a retaliatory strike to a level which the military consider "acceptable."

Both sides must be prepared to take some risk, or there can be no limitation agreement. The purpose should be to reduce the present risk, which by any sane standard must be judged unacceptable. Our military planners seem to have a morbid fear that the Russians will "cheat" on any treaty that is negotiated. But since the United States found out readily about a limited, primitive Soviet ABM system (which according to Halperin has been described publicly by Administration officials as a defense installation against planes, not missiles), is it conceivable that the Soviets could "cheat" on a SALT treaty in the only way that would mean anything—by carrying through undetected the tremendous engineering program required to develop a large-scale ABM system?

Panofsky concludes: "SALT offers a new opportunity to redirect our national priorities from an unproductive and dangerous technological contest to the solution of urgent problems at home. At stake is the survival of civilization on this earth. There is very little time."

Day of Reckoning

Some historian in the future will note an important change in many aspects of American life, coincident more or less with the date when it became common custom to refer to "funding" rather than "financing." Financing means raising money, borrowing it if need be, putting up collateral, amortizing, and other onerous effort. Funding means Santa Claus—getting money from those, mainly foundations or the government, who have it and are willing to donate it for uses they approve. The practice has become so widespread that in some quarters funding has almost displaced financing as a way of life.

But like playing the market, there are times when funding leads to tribulation. It is clear that Dr. James B. Conant of Harvard showed rare insight when in 1948 he said that a university should not accept funds for military research except at a time of serious national emergency, and presumably should terminate it as soon as possible after the emergency is over.

Many officers and faculty members of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology must regret that this advice was not followed at their institution. Now the issue impinges with crushing force on an institution that has grown accustomed to living in the style which generous funding made possible, and that finds it difficult to shift to types of research other than those which a war-oriented government finds of first importance.

At M.I.T. a single research facility, the Instrumentation Laboratory, receives $26 million a year from the Pentagon for research on modern operational weapons, especially nuclear delivery systems. The rest of the facility's $54 million annual budget comes from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, whose interests have possible military side effects. On November 8, leftist students, a type once unknown at M.I.T., besieged I-Labs and were finally routed by the police. The clash caused some anguished faculty members at the scene to weep. Dr. Raymond L. Bisplinghoff, dean of the school of engineering, spoke revealingly to the press.

"The university," Dr. Bisplinghoff said, "has set as policy a deliberate movement from Department of Defense and space research to a different mix: more and more research relevant to societal problems. . . . It's going to take a considerable time to make the transition, however, and if we are going to continue on the same scale of operations here at the laboratories we're going to need lots of time and new money." The difficulty is that money is easily available for military research, but hard to come by for anything useful.

Thus the great splurge of military spending not only created the illusion of affluence and distorted the economy generally; it also debauched the bookkeeping and fiscal policies of a fine institution. M.I.T. must now sober up, but one may commiserate even more with the staff of, for instance, the Roswell Park Memorial Institute, a New York State institution for cancer research. In common with a long list of other medical research organizations and medical schools, cutbacks in federal funding have hit Roswell Park hard. The values of our culture are nowhere more clearly revealed than in the largely token cutbacks in military funding and the serious slashes in medical and nonmilitary scientific research.

There has been some shift in emphasis from military to nonmilitary research among "think tanks" whose managers looked ahead a few years. The RAND Corporation of Santa Monica, Calif., which a few years ago served the Air Force exclusively, has gone up to 20 per cent in the nonmilitary category, and appears to have done useful work for the state of California and the city of New York. The lesson of the present crisis is that while the military Mephistopheles can make life pleasant for a time, in the end he demands his due, simply by withholding a part of what his victim covets.

Tough Questions

A powerful and successful lobby—recently dubbed the "educational-industrial complex"—is pushing through the House a $4 billion education appropriation bill for 1970. That is $1 billion more than the Administration requested.

Rep. Edith Green (D., Ore.) warned the House about the power of this lobby: "I am concerned about the education-industrial complex in the United States that is increasing in size and strength. The military budget has $80 billion in it. In the United States today at the federal, state and local levels we are spending about $60 billion on education."

Mrs. Green was reacting to pressure exercised by the Emergency Committee for Full Funding of Educational Programs. This lobby is well endowed, both politically and financially. Its money comes principally from "hardware people"—companies like Litton Industries, General Electric and Xerox, which are interested in selling educational materials.

For too long, the education lobby has justified increased education appropriations on the ground that they would insure better education for the nation's youth. To attack this argument was to attack the very basis of America's liberalism: the support of the public school system and institutions of higher education. However, the time has come to examine the effectiveness of the billions of federal dollars spent on American education. For example, a large chunk of the additional $1 billion will go to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) and Impacted Area Aid, whereby extra funds are distributed to school districts having federal facilities. ESEA is touted as the "most significant compensatory educational program" devised to meet the problems of children from poor families, but its usefulness is not that obvious. The Office of Education has not even been able to ascertain how ESEA funds are used. The effectiveness of Impacted Area Aid is even more dubious. Although a pet of the Congress, it has been cut from the education legislation proposed under Presidents Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon.

Two points should be kept in mind: First, an educational-industrial complex is indeed growing up around and within the education and poverty industries, and it acts and reacts in ways strangely similar to those of the military-industrial complex. That is not necessarily bad, for education should certainly be at the top of America's agenda and should get strong national support. In fact, the complex is probably inevitable. What is essential, however, is that it should be recognized for what it is. It exists for profit, not for children, and every step should be taken to safeguard the national interest.

Second, the strong believers in federal aid to education should not go soft and support programs out of ignorance and political expediency. We must not let education, with its new-found power, drift into a closed, inexplicit budget environment similar to that of the military. This is the time to ask the tough questions.

What are the objectives of these programs? What evidence do we have that the objectives are being met? What alternatives have been tried? The answers can be embarrassing or disillusioning.

Bigot Victory

Talk-shows in Portland, Ore., as well as in many other American cities, have been popular radio fare for several years. Since the spring of 1966, the leading talk station in Portland has been KLIQ. At the close of October, it had eight moderators, each with his own show. Then KLIQ canceled its talk-show format and switched to Country Music, Western Style.

In a policy statement delivered several times over the air, KLIQ's general manager, David J. Jack, gave the reason in detail:

> A considerable number of narrow-minded bigots felt that any idea that was contrary to their beliefs was at the least socialistic, and at the worst, communistic-inspired.
>
> We even welcomed these people as speakers. We felt that they too had the right to be heard. And they were heard. But that didn't satisfy them. Freedom of expression on the air wasn't good enough for them. They wanted and demanded more. They wanted moderators fired. They wanted programs canceled. They wanted advertisers off the air. My children were intimidated. My wife was insulted. Our moderators were threatened and advertisers on KLIQ were subjected to hate mail and telephone-call campaigns.
>
> For years we have put up with this type of abuse because we truly felt that KLIQ was fulfilling a community need, and that if we ignored these attacks they would go away. But we were wrong, so very wrong. For the attacks continued. They not only continue, but they seem to grow with every month that passes. And so, reluctantly, we are throwing in the towel. We don't like to, in fact we hate to, but to face another five or ten years of this type of abuse would be intolerable.

None of the eight moderators could, by any rational standards, be classified as radical. One was an outspoken supporter of George Wallace and strident hawk on Vietnam. A few were liberals, quite mild. Four opposed the war in Vietnam, and for this they were smeared as traitors. One man, who opposed both the war and hunting, became a special target. He received death threats, and had to broadcast with police protection.

Views which generated the most intense bigotry were: opposition to the war in Vietnam, support of gun-control legislation, support of sex education in the schools, support of fluoridation, opposition to racism, and a distaste for hunting. Almost without exception the telephone calls and letters came from persons who refused to give or sign their names.

OBITUARY FOR SDS

LARRY DAVID NACHMAN
Mr. Nachman is assistant professor of political science at Richmond College (City University of New York) on Staten Island.

On the long weekend of October 8 to 11, several hundred members of the "Weatherman" faction of SDS engaged in sporadic street fights with the Chicago police. By the end of the weekend, scores of "urban guerrillas" had been arrested and some will presumably be indicted on various felony charges up to and including attempted murder. This event, whose result in personal terms may be that a number of young men and women will spend the rest of their youth in the obscurity of Illinois prisons, may mark in political terms the end of SDS as a national force. Since for a time that force was considerable, one naturally looks back to discover what brought SDS to the position it took on the streets of Chicago.

From its inception SDS was part of the student movement, and it must be understood in terms of its relationship to that movement as a whole. The civil rights movement of the early sixties created large numbers of student activists who went out from their colleges into projects or demonstrations in the South and in their local communities. Two points should be noted about these activities. First, they were rarely directed against the university or college from which the activists were drawn. Second, the student activists saw their role as one of detached involvement in the struggle for freedom of an oppressed group. That is to say, the students tended to accept the image of themselves that was held by society as a whole. They were the overindulged beneficiaries of middle-class affluence; they had no personal grievances against the political and social system, but were acting on behalf of those less fortunate than themselves.

The Berkeley free speech movement changed all that. Its significance was that for the first time students were using the political skills and techniques they had developed in the civil rights movement for a direct attack on the university as an institution and the students' place in it. The university was attacked as a bureaucratic instrument of political socialization. No matter how great the value of the scholarship and education carried on there, the social function of the university was to train the new technical and managerial class. And to many students the university seemed to reproduce the atmosphere and the imperatives of the corporation: the campus was dehumanized by large lecture halls, absentee teachers, standardized courses, standardized exams and the standardized programs of study.

And yet, at the same time, one of the major sources of student discontent lay in the fact that for masses of Americans college provided an insight into what a liberated life might be like. The student was freed from monotonous labor and was, by comparison with other groups in the population, free to concern himself with self-development. He was in a community where highly civilized activities such as politics and culture could be carried on effectively. For all its problems and inadequacies, life in college seemed to many of the students infinitely richer than the workaday lives that society offered them after college. This is why the cultural revolution is so important among disaffected youth. It stands for experimentation in new social forms and the rejection of a middle-class value system that gives the central position to work and career. After Berkeley, political radicalism and cultural radicalism were united.

When the war in Vietnam became the dominant political issue for college students, their position became significantly different from what it had been during the drive for civil rights. The students attacked the war as an issue in which they did have a personal interest. In the first place, young men were in agony over the draft. By the thousands, they brooded over their alternatives: to become a murderer, an exile or a convict. In the second place, the universities were seen to be participating in the war, through ROTC, defense contracts, etc.

It is often said that the students chose to attack the university because it was incapable of defending itself, but this misses the central point that the university was the students' own community. For some time the Left had been discussing the principle of participatory democracy, the right of people to exercise some measure of control over the institutions and communities in which they spent a significant part of their lives. Now students who were enraged over the government's policy in Vietnam found that their own community was part of the horror: they felt that they were themselves being drawn into the web of complicity. For the student, the issue was enfranchisement. He was asserting his right to have his moral position taken seriously in his own community.

How, then, did SDS function in the midst of this burgeoning political movement? One must begin by rejecting the answer that is most often given by the press and the politicians, and sometimes by SDS itself—that SDS radicalized political opinion on campus. The creator of a radical American campus was not SDS but the government of the United States. The press has consistently reported a division within the student opposition where none existed. The "moderate" anti-war student, so often praised in editorials, shared with the "militants" a conviction that American political institutions were bankrupt and that the war was an immoral aggression against the people of Vietnam. The same person could move without internal contradiction from the occupation of a building to a Kennedy or McCarthy campaign.

SDS did not radicalize the student movement; it politicized it. In the midst of a moral attack on the war, defense spending, racism at home, SDS posed questions: Who made these policies? What are the sources of power of the policy makers? Who profits from these policies? And SDS also asked the thorniest question of all: If you oppose the war, how do you get the power to stop it?

SDS was a highly decentralized organization. Indeed, it was more a state of mind than an organization. For all intents and purposes, the local chapters were autonomous. This flexibility encouraged the development of projects directed toward locally relevant issues. Students did not join SDS because it constituted a more radical alternative to other organizations or because it offered a coherent ideology. They joined SDS to oppose the war actively. I recall an incident that occurred at a meeting of Columbia students and faculty shortly after the police had brought the campus "under control." A professor of philosophy demanded of the students that they consider the moral consequences of their actions. In reply a student rose and asked, "Has the faculty considered the moral consequences of its inaction?" SDS was the activist tip of the radical iceberg, and it was this for a generation that cannot understand a disjunction between having political ideas and acting politically.

The activity of SDS on campus was intensely political. It challenged the proposition that the university was autonomous and neutral, and it exposed the financial and institutional connections between the university and the government. It tested the assertion that the university was governed internally by rational persuasion. It demonstrated that only a community of political equals can be said to be governed by rational persuasion, and held that, because the universities were unwilling to admit their students to political equality, the universities had to rule despotically. SDS's most spectacular action revealed that the "free rational community" of Columbia University rested on police power.

In short, the substratum of campus opposition to the war was discontent over the structure and policies of the universities themselves. Because the students in SDS were accustomed to think in terms of politics and power, SDS became a useful vehicle for turning generalized dissent over the war to concrete opposition to particular university policies. Whether or not a serious disruption occurred on a given campus tended to depend less on the extent and intensity of anti-war feeling than on the responsiveness of the administration and faculty to the issues raised by the students. Indeed, it frequently happened that in the wake of a disruption administrators and faculty admitted that there were valid grounds for discontent and a need for reform of the university structure.

SDS, by itself, could not produce a major disruption. That required a spontaneous action by relatively large numbers of students. SDS could set the stage by testing the willingness of a university to permit its students a share in decision making, but SDS always remained a fraction of the anti-war students on campus. The strength of SDS depended on its working closely and sensitively with that larger mass. However, beginning in the fall of 1968, SDS began, consciously and deliberately, to separate itself from the student movement.

On the night of Friday the 13th of September, 1968, Columbia SDS held a meeting in the auditorium of Earl Hall, the religious center of Columbia University. This meeting brought into the open the strains, problems and downright stupidity that, in less than a year, would tear SDS into a number of impotent squabbling factions. The purpose was to decide strategy for the coming academic year. The 200 to 300 participants who packed the auditorium were almost all veterans of the occupation of the previous spring. These were the people who a few months before had brought the normal operations of the university to a halt and caused thousands of members of the Columbia community to pause to consider the questions of its involvement in the political life of the nation and in the Harlem community on which it abutted. They had by their action created a broad agreement at Columbia that basic university reform was needed and that both the students and the faculty would have to be given more power in university affairs. The question now was where SDS should go from there.

The discussion that night was dominated by a debate between the two groups that were to split SDS the following June. On the one hand, the "Labor Committee" was a faction within SDS whose political orientation was the orthodox Marxist-Leninism of the Progressive Labor (P.L.) Party. On the other hand, Mark Rudd was the principal spokesman for the "New Left" position that one normally associated with SDS.

P.L. shared with many Americans a simple incapacity to take the student movement seriously. To the students assembled in Earl Hall, to students who had faced expulsion, policemen's clubs and criminal indictments, P.L.

Noonan

set forth the position that students could not by themselves be genuinely radical; a student movement was merely a student interest group. In a society that was increasingly dependent upon universities to provide its scientists and managers, P.L. argued that the university was of marginal concern. Amidst the ferment at Columbia, P.L. was persuaded that it was impossible to reform the university without first transforming the whole of society. In a nation whose expanding technology had reduced its workers to hangers-on who fearfully organized and fought to retain obsolete jobs, P.L. sought to view the working class as intrinsically revolutionary and the bearers of a future society. P.L.'s conclusion was that the Columbia students should abandon their demands for changes at Columbia and ally themselves with the working class. In short, P.L. was continuing the historic mission of Marxist-Leninist parties in the West—the destruction of all vital radical movements.

There was a strange quality to Mark Rudd's response to the P.L. position. He appeared to accept a common theoretical and analytical ground and argued on purely tactical matters. He asserted that student actions served as positive examples to the oppressed groups, including the working class. He agreed that students should not organize on behalf of their own interests and conceded that the university was not a central concern. Throughout his remarks, he drew on traditional Marxist categories and, of course, he was no match for those whose grounding in Marxism was far more extensive than his. The debate that should have been between the old and the New Left never materialized that night.

I think there are several reasons for the failure of Mark Rudd and his allies to join the issue with P.L. In the first place, they were now paying the penalty for not having done their homework. They were generally well-informed on matters of contemporary politics and they had a flair for muckraking. But what they needed now was a political theory that was drawn from and relevant to the political experiences of the sixties. They needed a theory on which to base a coherent vision of politics and the human condition, so that they could understand where they had been and where they ought to go. Lacking that solid intellectual base, they took what was accessible, a third-hand version of Marxist thought.

In fairness, it should be said that SDS was not entirely to blame for not having an adequate intellectual base. From whom, after all, were they to receive the word? A sufficient number of intellectuals had so compromised their position as to undermine the students' respect for the role of intellect in politics. Some social scientists had subordinated the critical and investigative functions of their disciplines to the imperatives of policy making. Then there were the political aesthetes, whose awe and admiration of the complexity of institutions made them suspicious, even contemptuous, of any political criticism save that voiced by the "technical experts." An influential group of American philosophers had for a generation turned the investigation of moral and political questions into an elegant word game. And there were the grants men, whose appreciation of the autonomy and neutrality of the university vanished at first sight of Defense Department stipends. The "anti-intellectualism" of the students was at least in part a reaction against teachers who had not engaged in detached, serious, intellectual inquiry.

Moreover, they were genuinely troubled by the charge that they were degenerating into a student interest group. As a result of the rise of Black Power, white activists had been cut off from direct participation in political actions on behalf of the blacks. From 1965 on, white activists were repeatedly taunted by black militants, who charged that they were merely playing at revolution, that their commitment was superficial, that at the first sign of real danger they would run back to the suburbs. In this connection, it is well to remember that during the occupation at Columbia the black students had forced the whites to leave Hamilton Hall because the blacks did not believe that the whites were sufficiently committed to the issues. This kind of goading placed a persistent psychological pressure upon white radicals who, indeed, had self-doubts and an urgent need to test the depths of their courage and commitment.

After thousands of young men had gone into exile or to prison as draft resisters, after the Pentagon, Chicago and Columbia itself, one would have thought that the courage and commitment of the student Left would no longer have been an issue. Indeed, a case could be made to show that the criticisms raised by the students were inherently more radical than the criticisms raised by the blacks. As Herbert Marcuse has put it: "The abolition of material poverty is a possibility within the status quo; peace, joy, and the abolition of labor are not." But Rudd could take the student movement no more seriously than could P.L.; it was middle class and hence fundamentally unreliable. It must be tested again and again and again. And students should not concern themselves with university matters. They must go out to the people. Like the social revolutionaries of 19th-century Russia, Rudd was moving toward a position that was a mixture of "back to the peasants" and terrorism.

The result of the meeting that night was that the two major factions of SDS, each for its own reasons, turned their backs on the university communities, which are the only large radical constituency in this country. In April 1968, hundreds of students had occupied buildings at Columbia; hundreds of others had demonstrated in support of them. In the spring of 1969, the two factions at Columbia, on separate occasions, engaged in abortive occupations. On both occasions, they were alone.

During the academic year of 1968-69, P.L. intensified its criticism of the student movement. At two successive national conferences of SDS, it brought in resolutions condemning the use of marijuana. For the American college student, the drug laws symbolize society's unwillingness to recognize the individual's right to enjoy himself in this world. But for P.L. this was another instance of the bourgeois nature of student radicalism.

During the same year, Mark Rudd and other prominent members of SDS turned increasingly for inspiration toward Third World guerrillas like Che Guevara. Disregarding the differences between an underdeveloped society and a post-industrial society, they adopted a vocabulary and a style that can best be described as Marxist-Romantic. Their urgent, passionate desire to act annihilated what political sanity remained in them. Ultimately, they were attracted to pure violence as the most direct and personal form of political action. The result was Weatherman. During that Chicago weekend, a member of Weatherman said, "The most important lesson we have learned is that we can fight too—that we have a role—that's a tremendous lesson."

Neither faction, including the Revolutionary Youth Movement II, which split off from the Ruddites, can be expected to have much further influence on American campuses. But though SDS went its own way, the student movement still exists. This movement is not an organization, not an ideology, but an overwhelming political fact. That fact is that hundreds of thousands of college students who would normally have been expected to enter into the technical and managerial elite not only have refused to do so but are fundamentally critical of the whole structure of society, of its policies and performances. Coming behind them are God knows how many high school students who are now living as internal émigrés, biding their time until they are free to make their feelings known. Out of the heart of American affluence, a generation has arisen which has been promised the best that America can offer and has judged that that best is not good enough. The real political struggle of the future will not be over poverty and economic oppression. As Marcuse suggests, those ills can be eliminated without a fundamental change in the political and social life. The real struggle will be over the quality of human life which society permits and affords. And in that struggle, which will be fought entirely within the middle class, today's radical students and their successors will be a major factor for years to come.

AGRIBUSINESS

REAPING THE SUBSIDIES

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

It still isn't clear what the total legacy of his eight-year career as Secretary of Agriculture will amount to, but at least Orville Freeman left behind a sound description of farming in this country: "a miracle and a mess."

On the one hand, modern farming techniques can in a single season not only glut the market but also fill every available warehouse and storage bin with unneeded crops. To keep that miraculous power under control, the government, on the other hand, distributes money to the farmer by way of crop supports, land retirement payments and other largess in such a messy and seemingly senseless fashion that it offends a great bloc of the public.

Every year the U.S. Department of Agriculture pays more than $3 billion for nonwork (leaving land idle) and to support the price of crops that would otherwise have a rough time competing on the world market. About half this money is pocketed by the farmers who need it least—those in the top 15 per cent income bracket. This has been going on in one form or another for thirty-five years, and if the handouts have done much good, they obviously have had other effects as well.

During the same thirty-five years there has been a sharp trend toward domination of the food market by large commercial and corporate firms, while half the medium-sized producers have been squeezed out of business, and the really small farmers—almost untouched by the bounty—have slipped deeper into peonage.

The support programs are being opposed in Congress this year with more intensity than has been seen before in this bitter debate that rolls around almost as regularly as the seasons. Critics of the big subsidies are attempting once again to place a ceiling—proposals vary from $20,000 to $45,000—on any one payment made by the USDA. (Outside Congress the debate is marked by its usual inconsistencies and confusion, perfectly illustrated by the American Farm Bureau Federation's alleged opposition to the subsidy ceiling because it is in principle against any subsidies, restricted or otherwise.)

If not imminent, the end of the big subsidies seems inevitable. Most key USDA officials in the Johnson administration—except for Secretary Freeman and Horace Godfrey, the administrator of the subsidy programs and now a lobbyist for the cane sugar growers—reportedly favored a ceiling. Most members of the House also voted that way this year—no surprise, since fewer than sixty Representatives come from districts which have more than 15 per cent farm population. However, the Senate, whose farm-state members are in powerful positions to wheel and deal, turned back the 1969 reform movement, and its legislative future is uncertain.

The ceiling advocates, armed with stacks of dramatic statistics, push ahead with their argument that only by setting some limits can the government ever make its subsidies other than a bonanza for wealthy farmers—an argument shored up most impressively by the fact that every year the top twenty farmers in the nation take more booty from the Department of Agriculture than do the bottom 350,000 farmers put together.

It would be a serious mistake, however, to think that big subsidies are without their defenders. Many highly placed and knowledgeable people believe the programs are working splendidly. One hears no complaints, for example, from the owners of the J.G. Boswell Company of Kings County, Calif., who last year were paid $3,010,042 in government subsidies—the largest payment made to any one farm. In fact, Boswell received nearly three times as much in federal handouts as did all of New York's farmers combined.

Nor has anyone heard Sir Frank Kearton criticize the USDA's generosity. Sir Frank is chairman of Courtald Corporation of Manchester, England, which is the world's largest producer of man-made fabrics and which also has vast foreign holdings of timber and cotton land. Among its possessions is the Delta and Pine Company of Bolivar County, Miss., the world's largest experimental cotton plantation (38,000 acres—nearly 60 square miles—broken into fifteen smaller plantations; it owns one town, Scott, of 323 citizens). Courtald Corporation is not exactly hard up. It is capitalized at $1.5 billion and, according to the British Embassy in Washington, has an annual sales turnover of about $100 million. But the U.S. Government pays more than $600,000 in cotton subsidies each year to Delta and Pine.

Sir Frank's proxy neighbor, Sen. James O. Eastland, got $117,000 in direct payments from the government last year, more than anyone else in Sunflower County. Eastland and his relatives own more than 6,000 acres of rich Mississippi land which grows for them $158,000 in subsidies each year.

And Kenneth E. Frick, administrator of the USDA's Agricultural Stabilization and Commodities Service, which oversees the subsidy handouts, does not deplore the system. There may be reasons, aside from loyalty, for this tolerance. Frick and a variety of relatives, including an uncle and a nephew, have reaped roughly $340,000 from cotton subsidies relating to their California farms in the last couple of years. Frick owns 2,089 acres in Kern County.

Another important man who appears content with the farm programs is George Mahon, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which approves the money that goes into the subsidies. USDA records show that Mahon's brother, Durward, of Lubbock, Tex., received $26,978 last year. But doubtless more important to Mahon than these fraternal ties is the fact that Texas farmers benefit from the farm support programs far more than do those of any other state. In his district alone, more than 1,200 farmers receive annual subsidy checks of $20,000 and up. One-fifth of the nation's farmers who got more than $5,000 from the government last year are Texans.

One thing becomes clear at once from the list of $20,000-and-up payments: when it comes to the fat payoffs, the USDA's support program is national in name only. Last year, the New England states got no big payments; New York had only two. The most favored region for $20,000-and-up subsidies is the cotton belt of the Deep South and of Arizona and California. The land of cotton received nine out of ten of the big payments.

Of course, middle-sized and small farmers do receive price support and acreage diversion payments, and they help. Often the payments delay disaster. Wheat and corn are predominantly crops for the medium and small farmer. Of the 2,389 South Dakota farmers who received subsidy checks of more than $5,000 last year, only thirty-five got more than $20,000; of the 4,549 checks of more than $5,000 that went to North Dakota, only fifty-nine were for more than $20,000. Congress could set a subsidy ceiling of $10,000 and affect only 10 per cent of the wheat acreage.

But even in the line-up of big corn and wheat commodity payments, the fifth leading state is Texas. One may assume that William Robert Poage of Texas, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, was thinking of the nearly half-billion-dollar payments the home folks receive from the USDA—not merely of the subsidy-eligible feed grain crops he raises on his own two farms—when he wrote a Waco newspaper recently, defending the largess with the argument that "virtually every segment of the economy other than agriculture has received subsidies in either direct or indirect form. Railroads, steamships and airlines long have enjoyed subsidies. Tariffs and quotas which protect American manufacturers from ruinous competition of foreign-made equipment are an indirect subsidy and clearly increase the cost of things farmers must buy."

He is quite correct. The subsidization of the food production processes cannot be considered either radical or illogical in the controlled U.S. economy. It is simply another way of trying to match supply with demand. Farmers have one thing in common with, say, steel industrialists and oil men: they can produce too much for their own or for the nation's good.

But the problems are different in that there are a great many more farmers than there are steel or oil producers. It is an easy matter for a few companies to get together in a clubby way and say, O.K., we'll produce at 60 to 65 per cent capacity and keep the price up. But among 3 million farmers, most of whom think of themselves as flaming individualists, the problem of getting agreement on anything is formidable. That's where the government comes in, coaxing the farmers into a controlled situation. If he wants protection, the farmer must give up independence. It is all done in the mystic name of "parity," which is supposed to guarantee that the prices a farmer gets for his produce keep pace with his costs.

Not all farmers are coaxable. Beef and pork producers have always resisted government controls and they get no subsidies because they don't want them. But although they like to talk about their independence from government help, they aren't bashful about demanding rigid embargoes on foreign meat; and, when the price of beef and pork begins to fall, these ranchers suddenly become the most vociferous advocates of government lunch programs, food aid to the needy, and a higher protein diet for servicemen.

Vegetable and poultry farmers used to get government subsidies, but a few years ago, after the government wound up owning a great quantity of rotten eggs and potatoes, everyone agreed that the storage of perishable foods was an insurmountable problem, and these commodities were knocked off the subsidy list. Instead, their growers get help from the government in the supervision of marketing agreements. The producers of, say, grapes get together and decide that they want the government to control the marketing of their crop. After the government marketing board decides that there will probably be a crop of 500,000 tons of grapes, but that only 400,000 tons are needed, producers are allowed to market only 80 per cent of their crop. By voting their approval of the marketing order, the grape farmers bind themselves, and if a farmer doesn't comply he is subject to penalties.

A similar mandatory agreement applies to one of the big subsidy crops—cotton—but it does not apply to its twin colossus, wheat. If cotton farmers vote to accept the total national quota—in 1969 it was 16 million acres—then they agree to hold their individual production to fit that pattern, and in return they are assured of government price support and sometimes of acreage diversion payments. Wheat farmers operate in roughly the same fashion, except that they accept government subsidies on a voluntary basis. If they want to ignore the government program, they can do so without penalties, but are required to sell on the world market, which right now is risky.

Next year the national wheat crop will be planted on 45.5 million acres. A wheat farmer with 1,000 acres goes into his county Agriculture Stabilization and Commodities Service office to sign up for his share. The government experts stick their fingers up and guess at the weather, then they analyze market conditions, and decide that the right amount for him to cultivate is maybe 500 acres. So they pay him to leave 500 acres idle and guarantee him a certain price for the wheat produced on the remaining 500.

In a scheme of such massive scope, there is no way to guard against the farmer who fudges on the spirit of the law: renting the stoniest part of his farm to the government while he pours the fertilizer to the rest of acreage and comes up with almost as big a crop as he would have had if the government hadn't tried to buy him off. And there will always be the gentleman grafter, such as the Midwest banker with no interest in farming but much desire for land, who bought a farm for the sole purpose of getting a government nonproduction pay-off.

Noonan

None of the crop control schemes is guaranteed to work perfectly. They can be critically thrown out of balance by variables ranging from the climate on other continents to the antagonism of the Secretary of Agriculture to the programs. In 1967, there was great pressure on Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman to open up on wheat. The Food for Peace Program had been expanded; some panicky experts in this country said we might have a wheat shortage; India had suffered one of its periodic famines, and everyone was urging him to let the American wheat farmer rush to the rescue. So Freeman increased the wheat acreage. The weather was favorable, and the American wheat farmer got a bumper crop. But the weather was also favorable in other countries, including India. The upshot was that the extra production was not needed and our surplus wheat stocks shot up from a 400-million-bushel carry-over to 700 million bushels. One reason why wheat quotas have been sliced this year is that the USDA is trying to wipe out this philanthropic miscalculation.

Grotesque messes occur when the Secretary of Agriculture does not fully use the controls at hand. This happened under President Eisenhower's secretary, Ezra Taft Benson, who was trying to get rid of the government programs. In the final year of his term, production went wild and resulted in the nightmare of 1961 when the government became the unhappy possessor of more than $6 billion worth of commodities and, as John Scott, Master of the National Grange, recalls, "Storage was a national scandal, costing taxpayers more than $1 million a day." Even hundreds of Liberty ships in the bone yard up the Hudson River were called into service as storage facilities. And when there was no more room in the bin, the wheat was dumped onto the ground by the millions of bushels for rats and birds to eat. It was the kind of waste that bred corruption, and it was in that period that Billy Sol Estes, Texas' fertilizer king who now resides in prison, began to tap the USDA's pipeline of easy money.

However, the government's manipulation of subsidized crops is no more heavy-handed than the farmer's own juggling of such unsubsidized commodities as beef, pork, poultry, eggs, vegetables and fruits. If the public has a hard time understanding million-dollar payments to millionaires, it probably has equal trouble accepting the destruction of thousands of acres of potatoes, as is now being done across the country, in an effort to keep up prices (one Oregon farmer conceded that the 2 acres of potatoes he destroyed would have fed 600 people for a year); or the destruction of pigs, or the dumping of milk—other recent maneuvers by farm organizations to sustain prices, usually with little market impact.

Compared to these methods, subsidization looks pretty good, and anyway, as Poage says, unless the theory of subsidy is wrong in every corner of the economy, it can have a justified place in agriculture. The trouble really begins when the USDA tries to peddle its subsidization as a humanitarian project. The department loves to say that its primary concern is for "family farmers." But a more accurate description of the department's subsidy programs comes from Ben Stong, who used to be Sen. George McGovern's farm expert and is now administrative aid to Montana's new Congressman, John Melcher:

> Sure, the small farmer benefits from subsidies in that he's at least able to market 75 per cent of his potential crop at a small margin per yield, whereas if everyone produced at 100 per cent and loaded the market, the price would undoubtedly go below his production costs.
>
> The system breaks down on the small farmer in that he hasn't enough production capacity to make a living. This guy in the Ozarks with 160 acres of 40-bushel corn land simply can't produce enough at any price. . . .
>
> If the government won't help him expand the size of his farm, if it won't train him in farm management skills, or train him for a part-time non-farm job, it's going to be just a matter of time before he falls by the wayside.

The top 3 per cent of the nation's farmers produce more than the bottom 75 per cent. In terms of manipulating the market, the government can justify its payoffs to these farmers; if its objective is to keep land out of production, it must cut in the biggest landholders. But when the government alleges that it is thinking in terms of a corrective income supplement for the struggling farmer, the pretense gets a bit sour. One can argue whether the quality of American life will be improved or degraded by the disappearance of the independent farmer, but the point here is that the subsidy program ignores the question: it is a slide-rule response to a chronic supply and demand problem.

On the eve of his departure from government, Secretary Freeman—a fanatical defender of subsidies—was seized by a sudden attack of candor. Conceding that there are more than a million farmers who gross less than $5,000 a year and are therefore true welfare problems, he went on to say: "Unfortunately, most politicians and writers tend to lump all farmers together when they talk about the so-called farm program, and so the public is misled. The idea gets around: 'Well, here is this expensive farm program, and it isn't doing anything for the little farmer.' The fact of the matter is that these commodity farm programs I've been talking about were never meant to solve the problems of the little farmer with a substandard size of operation."

Once, just once during the Johnson administration, the White House said that the agriculture program of the future would have room for no more than 2 million farmers. (Which means that 2 million farmers would have to drop out.) The men who have shaped farm policy aren't often that open. Usually they will avoid admitting that they see farming only in terms of the big operator and that they are industry-oriented, not people-oriented.

Nothing new ever happens in agriculture. With South-dominated farm committees controlling the USDA, time stands still. There has been a constant seesaw between plunder and poverty from the beginning of the subsidy era in 1933, when the government paid farmers to plow under 10 million acres of cotton and kill 6 million pigs—to save prices. It did indeed save the big landowners, and it saved, for a few years at least, many middle-sized farms, but the tenant farmers were progressively ruined by the Roosevelt programs, and many of them, and their children, were driven off the land and are now the sullen inhabitants of Los Angeles and Chicago and Harlem. The very first year gave signs of what was coming: while Bolivar County, Miss., received the biggest handout for crop retirement in 1933-34 ($380,394, which went to 2 per cent of the population), the amount spent on relief in the county increased from $1,300 to $48,300. The tenants were obviously being wiped out. And when a program was set up for keeping the tenants alive and working—this was the resettlement program whereby several large plantations were purchased with federal money, cut up into small farms and resold to the displaced tenants on easy terms—it wasn't long before Congress, though it had seen nothing socialistic about subsidizing the plantation owners, judged tenant resettlement to be downright communistic and ended the program.

The inequities of the New Deal approach to the farmers—which, in modified form, is still the basis of the USDA's operation—can be criticized severely today, but so desperate was the American farmer in the 1930s that it is almost beside the point to criticize the programs in the context of their formation period. Something—however lopsidedly administered, however leaky—something had to be done or, as Edward O'Neal, the legendary leader of the American Farm Bureau, warned Congress: "We will have revolution in the countryside within less than twelve months."

From the crash of the stock market in 1929 to the inauguration of Franklin Roosevelt as President in 1933, the gross income of the cotton farmer fell by two-thirds. The "average" farmer who had earned $735 in 1929, was earning $216 in 1932. Hunger was commonplace, even among what had once been the middle class.

The agriculture programs of the Roosevelt era came pouring into this abyss. In the first year, the Roosevelt administration handed out more than $175 million in crop support and land retirement payments and for reimbursing farmers for killing hogs—an impressive sum for those days—and about 65 per cent of it went into the South where the margin for survival was narrowest. Briefly it looked as if the USDA was going to change its emphasis... and that any administration willing to take radical action for the top half of the farm population might be willing to take radical action to save the bottom half. But it never quite happened.

Some of the old hands in the USDA can remember when their exciting plans for a people's agriculture were slowly buried. One of them, an official at a moderately high level, recently ticked off the decades like this:

> Take the thirties. In the beginning the bright young lawyers in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration tried to work out a program that would wrest control of agriculture from the plantation owners and the even then all-powerful agribusiness types. But they failed. . . .
>
> Every time a new agency was set up to help the underprivileged farmer, it was stripped of its power, denied money by Congress, and eventually shuffled into something else.
>
> And all the way down the years, the poor farmers were betrayed or ignored. Henry Wallace didn't give a damn about the poor farmers, nor did Clinton Anderson. Charles Brannan had the right instincts but he had his hands full fighting other fights. And then came the fifties and Ezra Taft Benson, who was a throwback. Then came the sixties and Orville Freeman. He left too much to his aides. Toward the end of his regime Freeman visited the South, saw the poverty there and became interested, but then it was too late. I don't mean to imply that Freeman wasn't sympathetic. He thought of himself as a great liberal, and perhaps he was, but he listened to the wrong people in the beginning and he was irritated by the militants at the end. He never sorted out the alternatives. He had a great opportunity to marshal all of the forces of the Agriculture Department in a massive attack upon poverty and he blew it.

But the Congressional farm committees weren't blowing it. They were concocting and solidifying the fat-cat subsidy programs. It was done in a very harmonious fashion, for the membership of the Congressional committees is largely drawn from cotton and wheat states. Of the seven Democrats on the Senate Agriculture Committee, six are from the Southern Cotton Belt; on the Republican side, four of the six members are from Midwest wheat and grain states. Of the thirteen committeemen, only two are from east of the Mississippi River and north of the Mason-Dixon line.

On the House farm committee, fourteen of the thirty-three members are from Old Confederacy states; only four are from the Northeast, and that includes the very urban and very bored Allard Lowenstein of New York, who was assigned to the Agriculture Committee, it is generally assumed, as a kind of banishment.

In fact, so entrenched are the farm programs and so resistant to new theories, that more and more Congressmen, even those from farming states, have come to look upon the farm committees as banishment. Since the game is a monotonous ping-ponging between the special interests of big wheat and big cotton, few Congressmen with ambition and imagination want to get involved. Few sharp legislators willingly join a committee that automatically backs big subsidies for cotton, for example, when anyone capable of reading the market page knows that cotton planters should not be encouraged to continue growing anything like the present quantities of their quaintly antiquated fiber.

Some of the data from the National Cotton Council's own files would indicate that the crop from which Dixie historically has spun out its economic fate is today scarcely more pertinent to the basic needs of the nation than, say, the bicycle. Dabney Welford, economist for the Cotton Council, is quite straightforward about the cotton slippage and the reasons for it. In 1956, he says, the market consumed 9.1 million bales of cotton, about 600,000 bales more than were consumed last year. "During the past eighteen months there have been some tremendous market losses," he said, "partly because the price of cotton went up to a level that was not competitive with blend fabrics that rely mostly on man-made fibers, and partly because these latter have become much more wrinkle-proof than they were a few years ago."

For some time U.S. cotton farmers have been unable to compete with the price of foreign cotton; to defend them on that point the government has thrown up a total embargo against cotton imports. This, of course, would seem to put domestic textile mills at a disadvantage. So to make things square with the mill owners, the government pays them a third of $1 billion a year to compensate for having to buy the cotton whose price the government inflated in the first place. Thus the consumer is stuck with financing two subsidies plus the higher retail price that these subsidies bring about.

It's this kind of subsidization, especially, that is arousing heavy pressure for change. "It has become clear," said Rep. Odin Langen of Minnesota, one of the few members of Congress representing districts which have more than 25 per cent of the people living on farms, "that the public will no longer accept farm programs that rely primarily on government subsidy payments to farmers."

But this tremendous public concentration on one defect could create an unreasonably hostile atmosphere in which, in the name of reform, actions are taken that help only the farmers who need it least.

It could happen all the easier because the farm bloc in Congress has shriveled with its constituency. There were 6.8 million farm families in 1937; today there are fewer than 3 million, and the liquidation continues at a steady pace of about 90,000 families a year. Thirty years ago farmers were 20 per cent of the population; today they are less than 6 per cent.

The farmers who survive are so splintered in their own views, and so overwhelmingly outnumbered by city folks that the generic, overalled, tractor-driving red-faced son of the boondocks no longer swings much weight in Washington. Not long ago 400 farmers from Ohio, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas and Pennsylvania rode into Washington on their tractors and pickup trucks carrying signs like "Parity Not Charity," but they received scant attention from their Congressmen and little more from the press.

As a lobby that gets prompt and obsequious service in the capital, the family farmer has been replaced by the sophisticated agribusinessman—the middleman processor, textile mill owner, the meat packer, the canner, the chain grocery store executive, the feeder: big businessmen, big money men, big corporation men who already control the poultry market from the chicken coop to the market, who control most of the cotton (especially in Arizona and California) just as thoroughly, and who are well on their way to controlling most beef from conception to the meat counter. The tightness of their grip on agriculture will be limited only to the extent that it is difficult, if not really impossible, to hold 3 million farmers in line. But if this number were reduced to, say, 1 million and if that million were the biggest and most sympathetic to the profit motives of agribusiness—who knows what fine lock could be put on the industry?

That is what worries many farmers who now hear the American Farm Bureau Federation (AFBF) and Secretary of Agriculture Clifford Hardin and a coterie of Senators, led until recently by the late Everett Dirksen of Illinois, propose the "retirement" of 50 million acres of farm land. Instead of being kept idle from year to year through subsidies, this land would be permanently leased out of circulation. The current leader of the $20,000 ceiling movement, Paul Findley of Illinois, has tied land retirement into his own bill. It would not set aside pieces of farms, as with the present "acreage diversion" but would abolish whole farms, and these would be the medium to small family farms.

The Farm Bureau and its friends in Congress hold that the trend away from family farming is inevitable, and that the large commercial farms will bring more efficiency,* less waste, reduced subsidy and a more reliable balance between production and demand. But the proposal to retire 50 million acres is, at best, a dubious expedient; various programs now in effect have already removed that much land from production and yet the surpluses pile up at the slightest tip of the market. With his new fertilizers and production techniques the American farmer is a man hard to keep in line. One group of advisers has told Secretary Hardin that the cost of retiring the acreage will run $2 billion to $2.5 billion above previous estimates and that, to maintain prices at the 1967 levels, he will have to remove 80 million to 90 million acres, rather than 50 million. It is uncertain where the retirement plan would end, but it is certain that there would never again be nearly as many farmers.

Roger Fleming, secretary-treasurer of the AFBF, does not like to interpret the massive land retirement proposal as chasing anyone off the farm, but there is a tone of corporate bookkeeping in his reference to "premiumizing inefficiency—that's what you get when you go down the road of supporting individual farmers." There is some question, however, whether this reflects grass-roots sentiment. Although the AFBF is the largest farm organization in the country, about half of its members are not farmers at all but insurance men, bankers, real estate dealers and the like; furthermore, the AFBF's president, Charles B. Shuman, has also been president of the National Food Conference Association, whose membership includes meat packers, cereal manufacturers, flour millers, chain stores and grocery manufacturers—most of whom could hardly be considered the economic ally of the farmer.

The AFBF works closely with the National Association of Manufacturers and with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and its ultraconservative political and economic theories can seldom be differentiated from theirs. On one memorable occasion, the AFBF's general counsel, testifying before the House Agriculture Committee, suggested that the farm support plans were the handiwork of Communists. Although Chairman Poage could hardly be classified as a liberal, much less a Red, this was too much for him and he promptly gaveled the session to adjournment, shouting at the AFBF lawyer: "We'll not go further into this up here! But if you want to discuss it further I'll meet you in the alley!"

More than differences of theory as to supply and demand, the old Left-Right passions and inter-organizational rivalries (AFBF versus the comparatively liberal alliance of such organizations as the National Farmers Union, the National Farmers Organization, the Grange, etc.) will determine the course of the debate as it continues among the farm organizations. And these passions are certainly not guaranteed to give accurate guidance. There may be excellent reasons to support Congressman Findley's $20,000 ceiling, but some who would otherwise do so will shy away because the Illinois AFBF once used its address plates to circulate election material on his behalf. Many of the quarter-million members of the National Farmers Union, for example, will conclude that a friend of the AFBF is no friend of theirs. And conversely, many AFBF members will not listen to the NFU's counter-proposals because AFBF officials have so often hung the "pink" tag on the union. Because important priorities of agriculture have been neglected for so long, the arguments have deteriorated to that kind of sniping.

* If this is true—and there is no evidence that it is true—the Internal Revenue Service should be concerned that in one recent year, of the 103 millionaires involved in farming, eighty-eight showed a net loss; of the 228 in the $500,000 to $1 million income bracket, 201 claimed a net loss. These tax-loss "hayseeds," who don't care about commodity prices, make it all the rougher on the family farmer.

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Coming Winter of Discontent

ANDREW BOYD

Mr. Boyd writes on politics and economics for the New Statesman, Tribune, The Economist, Spectator, and widely in the Irish press on both sides of the border. He also broadcasts frequently on television and radio in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. His Holy War in Belfast, published in Ireland on September 1, has become a best seller.

Belfast

Northern Ireland has the formal appearance of a democracy. Elections are held; the ballot is secret; people vote for the candidates of their choice (the choice is often and lamentably limited); members of Parliament are paid. And yet Northern Ireland is not a democracy. Republican organizations are banned by law, probably because the Republicans are the most militant opponents of the Unionist Party. Political censorship, exercised under the Special Powers Act, a notorious statute, curtails the publication of Republican views. The possession of any banned Republican newspaper, leaflet or placard is an offense punishable by imprisonment. The Minister of Home Affairs has the authority—under the Special Powers Act, the Public Order Act and the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act—to ban meetings, parades and demonstrations, to imprison "political suspects" without trial, to suspend habeas corpus, abolish inquests, seize property and enter private premises at any hour of the day or night.

Furthermore, the Parliament of Northern Ireland, though it may formally engage in debate and pass bills, is not the ultimate authority. Power lies in the Orange Order and in the Ulster Unionist Council. Decisions of Parliament, even though its Unionist members outnumber the opposition by three to one, can be, and often are, vetoed by the Orange Order and the Unionist Council. For instance, Terence O'Neill, who was Prime Minister from 1963 until May of this year, was told by the Orange Order that he could make no arrangements to meet the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic without first consulting the ruling body in the order, the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland. O'Neill was eventually undermined by the Unionist Council and forced to resign. His successor, James Chichester-Clark, the present Premier, has had to satisfy the council on certain reforms which Parliament accepted in September.

Together, the Orange Order and the Unionist Council constitute a state within a state. They are, consequently, a negation of democracy. Moreover, the Orange Order can influence the selection of Unionist candidates for Parliament. All Unionist MPs and all members of the Northern Ireland cabinet, apart from two or three who have recently left or been expelled from the order, are Orangemen.

The Orange Order, the Unionist Council and the Parliamentary Unionist Party are so closely interlaced that it is impossible to say where the influence of one ends and that of another begins. But in the opinion of some Unionists the wishes of the Orange Order are more important than the decisions of Parliament. Membership in the Orange Order is common to enlightened Unionists like Terence O'Neill and to convicted Protestant fanatics like the three murderers who are serving life sentences for crimes committed in the summer of 1966. And the Orange Order has not only made Cabinet Ministers and MPs; it has deposed them when its members felt the need to do so. In the summer of 1969 the Unionist MP for South Antrim left the Orange Order and was immediately repudiated by the Unionist association that had promoted his career in politics.

The Unionist Party started in 1886 as a coalition of Irish Tories, Liberal-Conservatives and Orange extremists in opposition to Gladstone's scheme for Irish Home Rule. They formed an alliance with the British Conservatives to depose Gladstone on the ground that he was undermining the unity of the British Empire. Thus the Unionist Party began as an organ of resistance, refusing to compromise in anything that threatened to reduce the power of the Protestant ruling cliques in Ireland, and it has changed little in more than eighty years. Today some of the more intransigent Unionist leaders are again threatening rebellion and a Rhodesia-type declaration of independence if Britain insists on reforms that will benefit the Catholics.

The 1920 Government of Ireland Act was, therefore, a measure of appeasement. It excluded Northern Ireland

Trog, London Daily Mail

It's Just as Well They Believe in the Same God

from the jurisdiction of the independent Irish Government in Dublin. It also gave the government and Parliament of Northern Ireland the right to make locally effective laws on local security, health and social welfare, agricultural and industrial development, labor affairs and education. But these were merely transferred powers. The government and Parliament in London remained supreme and retained control over foreign affairs, external trade, customs and excise, the major part of taxation and, by Clause 75 of the act, "ultimate control over all persons, matters and things in Northern Ireland." Mr. James Callaghan, the British Home Secretary, exercised his authority under this part of the act when he pressed extensive reforms upon a reluctant Unionist government in September.

These reforms are now being rushed through the Northern Ireland Parliament. Ironically, they are far more drastic than anything the more enlightened Unionists like Terence O'Neill were willing to concede at the beginning of 1969, and more revolutionary than what the Northern Ireland civil rights movement had been campaigning for since 1966. Callaghan, acting on a report from Lord Hunt and two senior British police officers, has disarmed and reorganized Northern Ireland's regular police force, the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and, in terms that cannot be refused, has asked the Northern Ireland Government to abolish its irregular force, the Ulster Special Constabulary.

The new system of security in Northern Ireland will start with the British Army, which is expected to be in occupation for at least five years. The general officer commanding the army will be responsible for raising a part-time, unpaid militia to be mobilized in emergencies and armed at his discretion. This militia will replace the Special Constabulary. Meanwhile the regular police force, the RUC, will become a civilian force but will have a reserve, the Special Patrol Group, for crowd control during political demonstrations and similar occasions.

The Special Constabulary, upward of 11,000 in strength and costing $1.25 million a year, has reacted against this plan and has been getting the support of several Unionist MPs. The Special Constabulary is an exclusively Protestant body and, according to the Cameron Commission, is, "particularly among Catholics, a partisan and paramilitary force." Most of the special constables, if not every one of them, are members of the Orange Order; many belong to the militant Protestant organizations that comprise the Paisley front; some have been identified as taking part in unlawful attacks on civil rights demonstrators.

Callaghan's other reforms include the appointment of a government minister to be responsible for improving community relations, and a Community Relations Board, made up of Catholics and Protestants in equal numbers, which will have power to order the prosecution of anyone whom the evidence indicates is guilty of discrimination.

A communiqué signed by the Northern Ireland cabinet and by Mr. Callaghan at the end of August affirmed that every citizen was entitled to equality of opportunity in public employment, protection against the incitement of religious hatred; fairness in the allocation of public-authority-built houses, effective means for the investigation of grievances against public bodies, and proper representation, on all elected bodies, to be assured by completely fair electoral law, boundaries and practices.

Later, when setting out in detail what these reforms meant, Callaghan told the Northern Ireland Government that the right to build houses should be taken from local authorities and that in future all houses—apart from those built and offered for sale by private firms—would be provided by a government-controlled central housing authority. This reform abolishes the corrupt Unionist system of providing council-built houses for their Protestant followers while allowing Catholics to exist in overcrowded and often condemned slums.

Discrimination in housing was seen at its worst in the summer of 1968 when the Unionists on a local council in County Tyrone gave the tenancy of a new house, in the village of Caledon, to an unmarried teen-age girl whose brother was a constable in the RUC and whose employer was a local Unionist politician. Before the young woman could take possession, civil rights leaders seized the house and installed a needy Catholic family.

Pierre, Aux Ecoutes (Paris)
"One Does What One Can"

The Caledon occupation brought Northern Ireland's entire civil rights movement into the streets. They marched in Dungannon, Derry, Belfast, Newry, Armagh and in other towns, and they were joined by Republicans, Socialists, trade unionists, Protestants who abhorred the practices of the Unionist Party. The civil rights campaign—despite attacks by police and armed civilian Protestant militants, and despite outbreaks of arson and murder in Derry on August 12 and in Belfast two days later—culminated in Callaghan's reforms.

Since the Caledon affair, and particularly since October 5, 1968, when the armed RUC attacked a civil rights march in Derry, Northern Ireland has suffered material damage to the extent of more than $60 million. At least twenty-five people have been killed, thousands made homeless, hundreds injured and scores thrown into prison.

During the last months of his premiership Terence O'Neill tried to turn back the violence. He could see that Northern Ireland was doomed if the demands of the Catholics were not met and so offered cautiously limited concessions after October 5 and appealed to reasonable men to let themselves be heard. In February 1969 he called a general election, hoping that the moderate opinion he relied upon would endorse his reforms; but his strategy failed. The election, tragically, confirmed the strength of the Unionist right wing and O'Neill was driven from the premiership on April 28.

The forces against him ranged from members and ex-members of his own cabinet, the Parliamentary Unionist Party, most of the Orange lodges and local Unionist associations, and all the militant Paisleyite Protestants, including the Ulster Volunteer Force which O'Neil had outlawed under the Special Powers Act in 1966.

To hurry O'Neill out of office the UVF carried out several major acts of sabotage in which electricity-generating and water mains were wrecked. Since the August reforms they have attempted to destroy a large hydroelectric station belonging to the government of the Irish Republic. They have bombed the Irish Radio and Television Center in Dublin, desecrated the grave of Theobald Wolfe Tone, Protestant founder of Irish Republicanism, and, early in November, set fire to the Belfast gasworks in the hope, no doubt, that the flames and exploding gas would envelop a thickly populated Catholic part of the town nearby.

The UVF sees terror and sabotage as the one way to force Britain to leave the Ulster Unionists alone. In this they are merely following a basic Unionist strategy, for as far back as 1893 Unionist militants were making bullets in back rooms and plotting to kidnap the British Premier, W. E. Gladstone. UVF terror is also directed against Northern Ireland's Catholics. Three members of this force are now serving life sentences for political murders committed in the summer of 1966. Their comrades, assisted by members of the Ulster Special Constabulary, mounted a murderous surprise attack on unprotected Catholics and destroyed 100 houses with gasoline bombs.

Today the situation in Northern Ireland, politically and militarily, is distressingly complicated. The British Army is in the streets, patrolling around the clock. Army barricades are erected as darkness falls, and checkpoints are manned on the main roads into the Catholic and Protestant parts of Derry and Belfast. The soldiers, most of them young, short-service volunteers, face the prospect of an icy hard winter, with often only empty factories as sleeping quarters.

All around them arms and explosives are accumulating in the hands of fanatical civilians and, as is suspected, the illegal transport of weapons into Northern Ireland, across the land border with the Irish Republic and by sea into some of the smaller ports around the coast, is increasing, though, so far, intensive searches by naval vessels in the Irish Sea and by troops on land have uncovered few guns. Catholic militants are also armed, though the greater weight of weapons is undoubtedly on the Protestant side.

The political situation is also confused. The Unionist Party is split but has not yet fallen apart. The moderates who supported O'Neill during the February election are coalescing into local "parliamentary associations" and into the rapidly growing New Ulster Movement. Some middle-class Catholics have joined them, some liberals and a few people from the Northern Ireland Labour Party.

The Unionist irreconcilables are very active. They address meetings arranged by those members of the Special Constabulary who seem determined not to accept Callaghan's plan for their dispersal. They speak at Unionist gatherings every night. On weekends, they appear in Orange lodges and call for repudiation of reform. They demand Unionist independence, an end to London's dictates and interference. They forecast rebellion and bloodshed if their demands are not satisfied.

And in all this the Northern Ireland Parliament appears to be hopelessly irrelevant. Even the reforms which Mr. Callaghan imposed so ruthlessly upon the Unionist administration seem unimportant. What is now required—and the army and police chiefs know it—is the disarming of the Protestant militants, the arrest of the UVF and the dispersal of all anti-reform organizations by force, if that should be necessary. But how long will that take—months or years—and will Northern Ireland be anything but an economic wilderness when it is over?

THE POLITICS OF PESTICIDES

MICHAEL D. GREEN
Mr. Green is a Washington correspondent for a West Coast chain of newspapers.

Washington

The Delaney clause has been part of the federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act for eleven years, but it was not applied in an issue of really major concern until Robert H. Finch, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, invoked it to ban cyclamates. The clause, named for its sponsor, Rep. James J. Delaney (D., N.Y.), provides that no food additive "shall be deemed safe if it is found to induce cancer when ingested by man or animal. . . ." (Emphasis added.)

In 1959, the Food and Drug Administration seized a large quantity of New Jersey cranberries that had been sprayed with aminotriazole, found to have caused cancer in laboratory animals. The Delaney clause was cited again by federal officials when they banned safrole, a flavoring that had been used in some root beers. But the effects of both actions were minor when compared with the industry alarm, public confusion and Capitol Hill restiveness that followed Finch's move against cyclamates. His action made him something of a consumer hero, but the applause from some quarters was hesitant. Finch appeared to be on edge when he announced the decision; he even snapped a public rebuke at an FDA research scientist whom, mistakenly, he charged with leaking results of cyclamate studies to the press before passing them on to her superiors.

Finch was at pains to point out that he was banning cyclamates because the law left him no choice. He threw in a few words about following "a prudent course" in matters concerning public health, but his heart did not seem in it. One can understand why: Diet food and drink is a $1-billion-a-year industry, and the decision disconcerted millions of weight-conscious Americans. Thus rumblings are being heard in some quarters, including some scientific ones, to the effect that the ban on cyclamates may represent too prudent concern for public health.

Dr. Frederick Coulston, director of the Institute of Experimental Pathology and Toxicology at Albany Medical College of Union University in New York, said: "This is a terrible clause. Almost anything could form a tumor under some circumstances. The clause removes a good scientific approach and reasonableness of interpretation." His view was shared by other scientists, most notably by Dr. Michael Sveda, the discoverer of cyclamates. On the other hand, the cyclamates ban was hailed, quite naturally, by Representative Delaney, who urged Finch to study hundreds of other additives, whose safety "had not been established to the satisfaction of the FDA and many other groups concerned with the health and safety of the public." He particularly asked for a close look at saccharin, the major artificial sweetener remaining to the diet industry now that cyclamates are unavailable.

The next real test of the willingness of HEW and FDA officials to enforce the Delaney stipulation came, however, from an unexpected quarter. Environmental scientists, biologists and others concerned with the effect of pesticide residues on food, as well as with general pesticide and other contamination of the biosphere, challenged the federal officials to set at zero the tolerance level for DDT residues in or on foods, including meat. It is virtually impossible to eliminate every trace of DDT from foodstuffs, and the effect sought was to force the growers to abandon it. The petition, addressed to FDA, was filed early in October, before Finch made his cyclamate decision, by five attorneys for California Rural Legal Assistance, an OEO agency, and the Environmental Defense Fund, Inc., a nonprofit group of biologists and ecologists located at Stony Brook, N.Y. The petition was given slight press notice at the time, but the action against the sweetener made it of major importance. The argument used by CRLA and EDF was identical to that advanced by Finch: DDT has been found to cause cancer in animals and must, under the Delaney provision, be eliminated from food products.

In an attempt to speed the process, a wider coalition, including EDF, the CRLA lawyers, former Interior Secretary Stewart L. Udall and three leading conservation groups, filed a petition with Finch on October 31 asking him to set the tolerance level on DDT at zero without waiting for FDA action. A separate petition, filed with Agriculture Secretary Clifford Hardin, asked that the official registration of DDT as a licensed pesticide be canceled. The groups included the Sierra Club, Audubon Society and West Michigan Environmental Council, backed by the Izaak Walton League and the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC). When the Agriculture Department was confronted with a similar, recent decision in the same area, Hardin banned use of the herbicide 2,4,5-T under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act as representing an "imminent" danger to public health.

Ultimately, it was not these efforts which moved Finch to act, but the long-awaited report of the Special Pesticide Task Force Study headed by Dr. Emil Mrak, former chancellor of the University of California, at Davis, appointed by Finch last April.

Norris, Vancouver Sun (Canada)

"I'd Like Half a Pound of Anything You Have That Doesn't Contain Tars, Resins, Pesticide Residues, Polysupersaturated Fats, Artificial Sweeteners, Softeners, Foaming Agents or Chemical Additives."

Rejecting the request contained in the conservationists' petition to set the tolerance level for DDT at zero, Finch embraced the Mrak Commission's recommendation that DDT be restricted within two years to "essential" uses—not yet defined. In doing so, he pointedly avoided citing the Delaney clause as reason for his action. He announced instead that he would ask Congress to strike the law that foods with additives found to produce cancer in laboratory animals must be withdrawn from market. He is thus also asking that the law that caused him to ban cyclamates be removed. Finch argues that he needs more flexibility than is given him when he must ban an additive that causes cancer in mice, but which may not endanger human beings. The plausibility of the argument breaks down in Finch's own admission that no one really knows how hazardous such substances may be to human beings. The significant and major impact that weakening the Delaney amendment could have will perhaps be seen when Finch considers scores of other pesticides which are awaiting review and which, unlike DDT, play an increasingly important economic role. Until he acts on these, many observers will continue to eye him skeptically.

The reasons for this uncertainty are for the most part political and Finch is a highly political man. A general assault on current pesticide techniques may promise a storm far exceeding the cyclamate flurry. For one thing, diet manufacturers could absorb part of the temporary losses in highly diversified and profitable operations involving nondiet foods and drinks. Moreover, other sugar substitutes are available to take the place of cyclamates. Thus the political consequences of Finch's decision—and the pressures on him—were less intense.

But the same cannot be said of the impact on agriculture of a ban on a variety of now standard pesticides, or of the political response, in Congress and out. The power in Congress, at least in its Appropriations and Agriculture Committees, resides in senior members attuned to the interests of growers and chemical manufacturers rather than to those of consumers. They angrily regard attacks on pesticide usage as assaults on agricultural profits. Farm lobbies will be no less reluctant to put their weight on Finch in this issue.

That politics and pesticides have already mixed was made evident by the Senate's swift retaliation against the California Rural Legal Assistance when its lawyers filed their DDT petition. It also became obvious that the issue of pesticide control has become identified in conservative minds with the stormy, four-year-old nationwide table grape boycott led by Cesar Chavez, head of the UFWOC. [See "Poisons, Profits and Politics" by Ruth Harmer, The Nation, August 25.]

Several months ago, the union raised the issue of chemically contaminated California table grapes before the Senate subcommittee on migratory labor, chaired by

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.). Chavz had lately made pesticide control one of the central issues of his organizing effort, charging that growers are using "the wrong kinds of chemicals, in the wrong amounts, and in the wrong places" in reckless disregard of the health of farm workers and consumers alike.

At this time, legislation to extend the life of OEO by two years was under consideration, and Sen. George Murphy (R., Calif.) introduced an amendment that would, in effect, make CRLA subject to Governor Reagan by providing that governors may exercise an item-by-item veto of OEO legal projects, a veto that may not be overruled by the director. At present governors may choose to accept or reject OEO legal services only in their entirety, and they may be overruled by the director.

The board of governors of the American Bar Association immediately denounced the provision as an "oppressive interference with the freedom of the lawyer and the citizen." They were soon joined by the U.S. Judicial Conference headed by Chief Justice Warren Burger, and by the National Legal Aid and Defender Association.

The amendment caught Senate liberals napping and passed 45 to 40. In a belated move to salvage what they could, the liberals waited until Murphy had left the chamber to catch a plane for California and then won Senate agreement to another amendment that would allow the President personally to overrule a governor's veto. But the victory was hollow. Southern Senators wrung a promise from the liberals that they would agree to drop their amendment in conference if Murphy, when he returned, deemed it unacceptable. He promptly did so. There was still a slim chance that Murphy's amendment would be defeated by the Congress.

Murphy made it evident that pique over the pesticide brief filed by CRLA was his chief motivation for offering the amendment. The CRLA lawyers have been a thorn in the side of the Reagan administration and of California's large growers for some time. The legal aid agency forced Reagan to restore $16 million he had cut from the state's Medicaid program, halted the flow of braceros across the border for use as strikebreakers against the UFWOC, and forced reluctant counties to adopt food programs for the needy.

Conceding that the petition to FDA was brought not on behalf of the UFWOC but of several California residents, Murphy nonetheless pointed to the link with the UFWOC's campaign. "Who is representing these petitioners?" he asked. "None other than the California Rural Legal Assistance . . . the same California Rural Legal Assistance [that] issued a press release announcing that it was representing farm workers who have filed six major lawsuits and workmen's compensation complaints concerning recurring pesticide injuries against allegedly negligent growers."

Thus the CRLA—"a tax-supported organization"—was, Murphy said, being "employed for political gain by a private group." If the logic seemed thin as justification for turning the entire project over to the control of Reagan, it did not appear to bother a majority of Senators voting that afternoon. The implications for OEO legal aid agencies located in Southern states were also clear.

The vote represented a startling lack of confidence in Donald Rumsfeld, the new OEO director. But Finch, who hopes one day to return to Republican politics in California and who would like the cooperation of Reagan and Murphy when he does so, can also read it as a political sign of the times on pesticide control.

His problem has been that he could not, like Murphy, dismiss the CRLA petition as being merely a UFWOC tactic to frighten consumers away from buying table grapes and reanimate the union's allegedly "lagging" boycott. The scientific evidence cited in the CRLA brief, including studies by the National Cancer Institute and even a 1947 study by the Food and Drug Administration itself, has been substantial. Results of a five-year study by the National Cancer Institute, not yet fully revealed, indicate that some fifty out of 130 widely used pesticides, herbicides and related chemical compounds have carcinogenic properties (Medical World News, March 14). Part of the study dealing specifically with DDT and reported in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute, indicated that DDT caused cancer in mice. The results are being re-evaluated.

Cited research by Hungarian scientists showed that leukemia developed in 124 of 1,000 mice when three parts per million of DDT was added to their diets. CRLA lawyers also pointed to an FDA study showing an increased incidence of liver tumors in rats fed DDT and another study showing the formation of hepatomas in rainbow trout when DDT was introduced.

Study of the possible human implications has hardly begun, but tests at the University of Miami School of Medicine have indicated that terminal cancer victims had more than twice as much DDT in their fat as did victims of accidental death.

The problem still facing Finch is tough, and how he handles it may provide as good an indication as any of the general direction the Nixon Administration will follow on issues of consumer health. There are those who fear that for practical and political reasons he may, in implementing the Mrak Commission's recommendations on pesticide regulation in general, avoid the hard decisions that many scientists believe are required.

LETTERS (Continued from page 554)

State Department lie: only if one accepts the false story can one argue that refusal to discuss the loan was not economic pressure. Schlesinger understands that this "was impossible for the Russians to believe." Again Williams has answered him; Schlesinger's explanation "does not speak to the point of how the leaders could forget the request even if they lost the document."

But evidence exists that the leaders themselves knew the request had not been lost. As George Kennan stated at the Princeton seminar on the cold war (Feb. 15, 1968), "There've been a lot of statements that we lost the paper . . . it was not lost. It was always there in the files." At the time, Secretary of State James F. Byrnes admitted that he frankly had no desire to deal with the loan request. "I had it placed in the 'Forgotten File,'" Byrnes wrote, "as I felt sure that Fred Vinson, the new Secretary of the Treasury would not press it." Ronald Radosh

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Politics of Objectivity

THE UNBOUND PROMETHEUS: Technological Change and Industrial Development in Western Europe from 1750 to the Present. By David S. Landes. Cambridge University Press. 566 pp. $8.50. Paper $2.95.

OBJECTIVITY IN SOCIAL RESEARCH. By Gunnar Myrdal. Pantheon Books. 111 pp. $1.95 paper.

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak teaches in the History Department at California State College at Hayward. He is the author of The Making of a Counter Culture (Doubleday).

It would require a deal of space simply to list the virtues of Professor Landes' history of Western European industrial development. If the study offered nothing more, its deft synthesis of monographic and learned journal material, its résumés of the technical aspects of invention and industrial organization, and its marshaling of intelligently selected statistical data would make it an indispensable reference guide.

But the book offers a very great deal more. With impressive authority, it covers a wide range of most important interpretive emphases on and insights into modern economic thought and scholarship. The business cycle and monetary theorists, the school of entrepreneurial studies, outstanding thinkers like Weber, Schumpeter and Keynes are all passed in review. Marxist criticism—while never presented with depth or great discrimination among its many varieties—is acknowledged at numerous points.

Further, the more technical features of industrialization are treated by Landes with admirable breadth: the context of social and political history is never lost from sight in the often detailed discussion of machines, techniques and organizational forms. In this respect, Landes' opening chapter is as densely thoughtful an introduction to the origins of the industrial revolution as one is apt to find anywhere. It extends—as the subject demands—from the sociology of the European bourgeoisie to deep reflections upon the psychology of Western man, his penchant for secular rationality and his "Faustian sense of mastery over man and nature."

Most significantly, Landes has attempted to assimilate the whole of Western industrialism to the study of economic growth in general. In so doing, he links his history to the most timely and hotly debated topic in contemporary economics. In a world more and more torn between developed and underdeveloped societies, growth is the prize of gold for which hosts of ideologues and theorists contend. Landes enters this battle zone, however, not as a theorist but as a workmanlike historian: one who seeks to embed the economics of growth in the thick of the Western historical record. Even W. W. Rostow's theory of "staged" development receives a coolly negative response from Landes, despite the schema's concession to real historical experience. Landes' commitment is to judge all theory against the stubborn fact and massed detail of the past to match doctrine with experience. The most he will claim for such an approach is that it leads to "a small number of middle-range conclusions" or "limited inductive analyses." As I will suggest, Landes' professed modesty in this respect is not to be taken seriously; but he has nonetheless produced a history of such authority and critical substance, that it fully deserves the place it is bound to hold for the next generation or more as a standard comparative study of industrial development in England, Germany, France and (to a lesser extent) America.

For all its many virtues, however, there is a naïveté at the heart of this highly sophisticated work. That soft center is Landes' pretense of total objectivity in his exploration of the most explosively controversial ground in the whole of modern history. The stance he affects is that of the disinterested scholar, one who practices "the historian's customary prudence" and whose research is "an effort to see things as they are," to see the past as a vast complexity allowing of no simple doctrinaire judgments. "Complexity" is a theme continually sounded throughout the study. Again and again, we are reminded that the past follows no rules, no laws, no obvious pattern; there can never be—as the ideologues insist—a single cause or a single effect. Instead, there is always "a whole array of special circumstances" surrounding great events which make "ambitious universal abstractions" and simple evaluations impossible.

> How much more agreeable it would be to reduce everything to a handful of aspects and explain these by a handful of causes! And how comforting it would be to be able to draw unambiguous lessons from this rich tapestry of human experience and present them for the guidance of the industrializers today. . . .

But these are pleasures of simplification the historian must banish.

Now, in fact, this ponderously rationalized caution on Landes' part is so much excess baggage in his book. For he has not come within hailing distance of writing an objective history of industrialization—a project that is, in any case, neither desirable nor possible. It is difficult to believe that anyone could come away from his book without recognizing that its author shows a very marked and prominent political persuasion and has allowed that viewpoint to function as his interpretive touchstone. Here is the work of an Establishment liberal, one who comes down on the side of continued, though responsibly planned technological elaboration within the existing capitalist order. While that order is seen to have its imperfections, Landes views its record as substantially commendable—the best a reasonable man could expect—and its promise undimmed. If the system's prospects are shadowed at all, it is due to the pressure of newer, Socialist economies which threaten disaster because "their economic efforts are directed not to the pursuit of wealth . . . but to the pursuit of power"—an obscure conclusion which, insofar as can be made sensible, seems to require that we forget what society it was that invented the concept of Machtpolitik in the first place.

As Landes would have it, where capitalist industrialism has led Western society into war or agonizing dislocation, these have been in the nature of "difficult adjustment," "the growing pains of a system in process of germination." Where it has led to depression, this has been the natural balkiness of "an overworked engine vigorously stoked. . . ." And even so, Landes reminds us—as if the observation purchased perfect indulgence—the capitalist economies did continue to grow throughout and despite the depression of the thirties: "The system was far from healthy: but change was built into it and more than outweighed the deleterious effects of uncertainty, periodic crises and harmful medication."

In brief, Landes is the sort of scholar one would expect to discover in service on the Council of Economic Advisers, or heading up a blue-ribbon committee to formulate more sophisticated guidelines for military-industrial research and development, or perhaps providing historical background for the cogitations of the Harvard Program on Technology and Society with which he has been associated. He is one who believes in responsible advice and the infinite possibilities of internal adjustments. Thus he is, at last, the essential conservative all Establishment liberals turn out to be: for they will play the game.

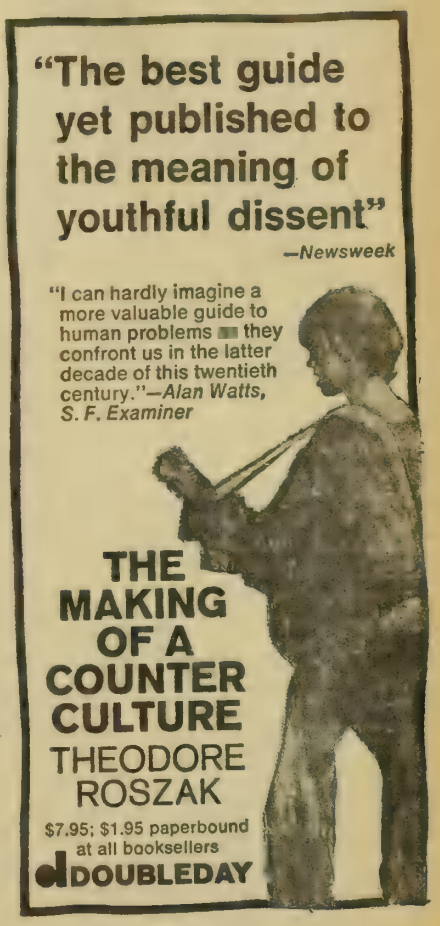
This does not in any sense disqualify Landes as an authority in his field or impugn the potential value of his judgments. It is only to say that he misleads us—and perhaps himself—to the degree that he assumes Establishment liberalism to be an apolitical position whose conclusions wear the costume of indubitable fact. Landes' brand of politics does indeed blend unobtrusively into the landscape of the status quo; but its low visibility hardly renders it nonexistent.

Some forty years ago, Sir John Clapham set about writing just such an objective history of early industrialism in Great Britain. The ponderous tomes he produced remain immensely useful in any number of ways; but it has not required much effort on the part of left-wing economic historians like E. P. Thompson and Eric Hobsbawm to reveal the essentially conservative politics that underlies such purported detachment. Landes' history, while vastly more readable, much resembles Clapham's work. There is the same heavy use of statistics, the same skirting and playing down of working-class hardships, the same softening of issues of social justice by way of invoking historical necessity, the long-term trends and the eventual high productivity of the system.

There is, too, the same arbitrary waving aside of basic, but troublesome questions. Confronted with the much debated issues of social dislocation and human misery in early industrial England, Landes identifies them as a continuing "matter of controversy" among rival schools of thought, and assures us that "this is not the place to assess these judgments." Confronted with the all-important question of whether the advent of industrialism has improved or weakened our cultural health, he decides "there is no point in arguing here whether the change is for the better or worse. The question is one of ends more than means and has its place in moral philosophy not economic history."

But of course such lines of intellectual demarcation are no more real than any scholar cares to make them. It is not professional law but personal choice that licenses Landes to write a history of technological development which ignores the work of those (like Lewis Mumford, Jacques Ellul, Siegfried Giedion and Roderick Seidenberg) who have challenged our society's facile and orthodox optimism regarding industrialism. And the result of such neglect is not objectivity but interpretation.

Terminology alone reveals Landes' predilections. Preindustrial social structures are referred to as "sluggish" and a "handicap"; their removal is a "liberation" which allows an economy to "advance" toward "maturity." Increase of industrialization is always seen as "progress." The fullness of industrialism is designated as a state of "rationality," despite the fact that, as Landes recognizes, the pursuit of industrial supremacy has turned into "a race without a finishing line," rather like the Caucus Race in Alice in Wonderland. But Landes' sequestered bias shows up no place more notably than in the final portions of his study where he identifies technological research and development as the probably inexhaustible new investment frontier which has carried us out of the doldrums of the thirties into an era of unprecedented growth, especially in the United States. Research and development were, as Landes puts it, "the silent, steady work" beneath the surface of the depression's apparent disaster. Those who first perceived this shining horizon were the "visionaries" of their generation, for they saw the promise hidden within a line of economic advance that then "seemed to rest on the pathological foundation of war and preparation for war." "Seemed"—as if it did not still.



The argument that much of the so-called growth we have known since World War II is but a statistical figment conjured up out of profit-bearing waste, disposable and nondisposable junk, ecological blight, careerist research mongering, and military boondoggling does not significantly figure in Landes' analysis. Provided it registers in the GNP, growth is its own justification. Nor does he acknowledge the relationship of this high-industrial "race without a finish line," along with the technological congestion it yields, to the development in our midst of a social system beholden to elitist expertise monopolized by industry, the military and the state. With these factors slighted or ignored, it is little wonder that Landes can provide his study with a brightly upbeat finish. He quotes from Fortune magazine:

> . . . capitalism as a whole is not subject to a ceiling of diminishing returns; innovation is not a self-exhausting process; the era of radical change we now experience is not headed toward a new "point of rest"; all the buffalo on the plains of progress have not been shot—indeed, they are breeding faster and faster.

The optimism of this conclusion will be lost upon those of us who begin to feel more and more like the buffalo on that fateful and bloody plain.

What we have in Landes' history, therefore, is a celebration of capitalist industrialism, of its ingenuity, its dynamism, its Promethean élan. No reader could miss the author's admiration for the system's daring and munificence, or his eager anticipation of its exciting and productive future. And, to be sure, there is no reason why economic history should not be written from that ethical perspective, since it also has insights to offer. That is why it is so amusing for Landes to parade a quaintly Rankean historicism across his pages, and to knock the left wingers so often for their bad habit of simplifying the vast complexity of the past. If radical economists and scholars have thinned the historical shrubbery, it has been to reveal the rascals that hide therein. Those who replace the bushes are not being more objective; they are only practicing a different sort of politics.

The gist of the criticism I make here is well set forth in Gunnar Myrdal's extended essay, Objectivity in Social Research, now available in a paperback issue that should enjoy widespread use on the campuses.

> No social science or particular branch of social research [Myrdal tells us] can pretend to be "amoral" or "apolitical." No social science can ever be "neutral" or simply "factual," indeed not "objective" in the traditional meaning of these terms. Research is always and by logical necessity based on moral and political valuations, and the researcher should be obliged to account for them explicitly.

Myrdal takes rather a long time saying not very much more than this in the essay. But he says it with mighty conviction. And it is a truth that continues to bear much repetition.

Individuality and Numerosity

OF BEING NUMEROUS. By George Oppen. New Directions. 64 pp. $4.25.

L. S. DEMBO

Mr. Dembo is professor of English at the University of Wisconsin and the editor of Contemporary Literature. He is the author, among other books, of Conceptions of Reality in Modern American Poetry (University of California Press).

When George Oppen stopped writing poetry in the mid-1930s, he had behind him only a small volume of imagistic poems, hardly enough to mark him for the stature he has achieved today. His efflorescence, after twenty-five years of silence, is remarkable. It would be irrelevant to speculate on what Oppen might have done had he been writing steadily, just as it would be sentimental to lament his silence. The four volumes that he has completed are in themselves an impressive contribution to American poetry.

There is nothing in his first volume, Discrete Series, to suggest that Oppen's social consciousness was strong enough to lead him to abandon poetry and commit himself fully to political activism. Yet that is exactly what he did. He and his wife joined the Communist Party in 1935, not for philosophic reasons, says Oppen, but out of the desire to do something about mass hunger. That this decision was not foreshadowed in Discrete Series is characteristic of Oppen's whole way of viewing his art. He never believed that politics could be made into poetry or, conversely, that poetry could have any effect on social conditions. When a poet could no longer tolerate what he saw before his eyes, Oppen felt, poetry was a luxury.

The following two and a half decades were years of activism, military service and exile. Harassed by the McCarthy committee in 1950, faced with the prospect of informing on friends or going to jail, he fled to Mexico with his wife and child and did not return until 1958, after McCarthy's death. By this time he had been working on some new poems. This opened his most creative period. In 1962 New Directions/San Francisco Review published The Materials and in 1965, This in Which. This year, his stature finally recognized beyond a small group of poets and critics, he won the Pulitzer Prize for Of Being Numerous.

Just as Oppen's involvement in political activities marked a divorce from poetry, so his return to poetry marked an exhaustion with politics. Unsurprisingly, the latter poems proceed from the same "objectivist" impulse as the earlier, even though they are, of course, broader in subject and more profound. While Louis Zukofsky, Charles Reznikoff, and Oppen himself have all denied the existence of a coherent movement called "Objectivism," the label remains useful. It is unimportant, for example, that Zukofsky's manifesto in the February 1931 issue of Poetry was as baffling to Reznikoff, whose poetry Zukofsky used to exemplify his theory, as to Oppen and many of the magazine's readers. More important is that each of the poets had a notion of what he himself meant by "objectivist"; and Oppen's interpretation is the key to all his work.

Objectivism begins for Oppen as an attempt to "construct a method of thought from the imagist technique of poetry—from the imagist intensity of vision." He called it a test of sincerity, based on the idea "that there is a moment, an actual time, when you believe something to be true, and you construct a meaning from these moments of conviction." "Imagist thought," first embodied in Discrete Series, is a form of nominalism in which appreciation of the existence of an object, in its tangibility or luminosity, is the primary poetic feeling. The moment of conviction is aesthetic, not philosophic or ethical:

> the thing
> Happening, filling our eyesight
> Out to the horizon—I remember the sky
> And the moving sea.

The world that is impenetrable to th "power and weight of the mind" reveal itself, in its own way, to the man wh is capable "of that emotion/Whic causes/To see"; that is, to the man wh can experience "a lyric reaction to th world." Poetry, then, ought not to hav a social or moral intention, any more tha the poet should be what Oppen calle a "medical pragmatist" offering remedies What matters is the "sense of the poet' self among things," not a display o "right thinking and right sentiment, which could not "substantiate themselve in the concrete material of the poem."

The aesthetic qualities of objects o events—apprehended not in terms o their associations or conventional mean ing but in terms of their form or mo tion—were considered by Oppen to b "empirical." They nonetheless depend o the point of view of the perceiver. Th chief interest in Discrete Series is no so much what is observed but how i is observed or experienced. For instance here is how a woman appears to nominalist sexually aroused:

> She lies, hip high,
> On a flat bed
> While the after—
> Sun passes.
>
> Plant, I breathe—
> O Clearly
> Eyes legs arms hands fingers,
> Simple legs in silk.

The subject of the poem is not the lad but the poet who, Oppen explains regards her as though he were a plan closed in on himself. As a matter o fact, the lady is perceived not as person but as a set of particulars o visual sensations; such constitutes he greatest "reality" for the speaker.

In the later poems Oppen's phe nomenological bent becomes un mistakable. "Thought leaps upon u because we are here," he writes i "World, World" (This in Which). Stil rigorously reporting only what he ha "seen" or truly sensed, he begins t describe a world of alienation and loss— a world lethal and unknowable yet of fering moments of intense aesthetic vision. In poems like "The Return," which reflect (but never declare) Op pen's profound sense of estrangement on his return to New York from Mexico "Resort," in which he views himself a though he were an alien object; o "Tourist's Eye," in which he vainly tries to penetrate beyond the "mineral fact" of the city, and the sheer "numerosity" of men, to a vision of "humanity" and a sense of continuity, Oppen reveals the human, if stark, struggle that underlies the perceptions of the objectivist Nonetheless, he could still say—and say characteristically—that "we want to be here" and that he himself lived not from lack of courage to commit suicide but in affirmation of life. Again, what redeemed the world for Oppen was the "lyric valuable."

Poetry thus became for Oppen the language of faith in the material world and the means for expressing its ultimate mystery. Commenting on "Psalm," he argued that in uttering small words like "sun" and "shade" one implied an entire cosmos. "It's a tremendous structure," he said, "to have built out of a few small nouns." The noun is the central part of speech in Oppen's universe, since it signifies the existence of an object but provides no knowledge about it:

There are words that mean nothing
But there is something to mean,
Not a declaration which is truth
But a thing
Which is.

That reality—as epitomized, for example, by the islands in the polar mist of "Narrative"—can inspire the poet with dread and the sense of Néant, as well as with joy and the sense of Being, points up the profound ambivalence in Oppen's view of the world. The "life of the mind," which Oppen believes to be the only life for humanity, coexists with Angst, boredom and despair. Yet underlying these opposing responses is the idea that reality in all its manifestations must be respected as truth. Nontruth is represented by the invented ethic, detached from actual feeling, or in objects, by the hollow decorations of an affluent civilization.

Of Being Numerous, with the title poem and its sequel, "Route," gathers up the themes of the preceding volumes into a coherent meditation. Both are major poems which mingle autobiography and metaphysics in an objectivist style that is anything but confessional. Investigating the philosophic implications of his own experiences and, conversely, the experiential basis of his philosophic generalizations, Oppen reveals little of himself except his proclivity to avoid soul searching. Furthermore, if "Of Being Numerous" and "Route" can be called meditative poems, they are meditative according to the logic of "imagistic thought." That is, each is a mosaic of observations that might justly be considered a discrete series; they are phenomenological rather than psychological renditions of the poet's consciousness, as the opening lines of "Of Being Numerous" indicate:

There are things
We live among "and to see them
Is to know ourselves."

"Of Being Numerous" is concerned with individuality and "numerosity." One of the important, if obscure, questions it raises is, Is there such a thing as "humanity," a vital whole that might be its own justification for living, or are men simply numerous, part of a meaningless, "infinite series"? The poem begins with an inquiry into the nature of men's lives in the city. (Many of the sections are taken from "A Language of New York" in This in Which.) The things we live among are "sad marvels," the "mineral facts" of skyscrapers, that can be seen but not comprehended. The city merely exists; it has no meaningful or recoverable past; life is pure "occurrence"; the poet finds himself incapable of living in any time but the present.

Frozen in the moonlight
In the frozen air over the footpath, consciousness

Which has nothing to gain, which awaits nothing,
Which loves itself

The poet is aware of his own individuality, but it is an awareness made possible only by the sense of isolation. Undoubtedly Oppen's actual exile lies behind this universal appraisal, and a personal sense of shipwreck gives force to the abstraction:

The isolated man is dead, his world around him exhausted

And he fails! He fails, that meditative man!

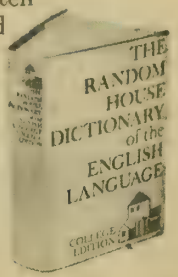
• ■ •

Obsessed, bewildered

By the shipwreck
Of the singular

We have chosen the meaning
Of being numerous.

The Singular Man had the power of seeing intensely but not of communicating; the shipwreck of the singular is really the failure of the poet to reach a community.



Underlying all the tensions of the poem is a crisis of faith in which Oppen posits an idea of humanity but cannot consistently believe in the metaphysic that will transform the infinite series of single lives into continuity and community, "the metaphysic/On which rest/The boundaries/Of our distances." Generations succeed one another, Oppen implies, only to be lost in "the great mineral silence . . . a process/Completing itself." The poem accordingly ends with a quotation from Whitman in which the capitol dome at sunset is described: "it dazzles and glistens like a big star: it looks quite . . . curious. . . ."

"At the end of a very long poem," Oppen remarked, "I couldn't find anything more positive to say than that."

What is John O'Hara reading?

One of the books John O'Hara reads is our dictionary. The Random House College Dictionary. It has more definitions of words than any other desk-size dictionary, old or new. Maybe that's why Mr. O'Hara uses it. The Random House College Dictionary. $6.95 ($7.95 thumb indexed.)

If you want to read John O'Hara, his newest book is The O'Hara Generation, a collection of stories written between 1935-1966. O'Hara is one of the undisputed masters of the short story, and this new book contains twenty-two of his most brilliant gems.

The Random House Dictionary of the English Language/College Edition

One of the books writers read.

The "first eyes" of the poet can be bedazzled but all they can know is "the noon's/Own vacuity." The anticlimactic comment marks the totality of the poet's knowledge of what he beholds. Aesthetic vision must be its own excuse for being, for there is nothing beyond it.

No less intense a poem than "Of Being Numerous," "Route" reflects the profound determinism that marks the whole range of Oppen's work. It has a vision of love, but love understood as a biological phenomenon. A matter of chromosomes and genes, it "occurs," no less unknowable an event than any other natural phenomenon. "Route" sees aesthetic clarity as the sum of knowledge:

One man could not understand me because I was saying simple things; it seemed to him that nothing was being said. I was saying: there is a mountain, there is a lake. . . .

The poem tells a pathetic story, from real life, about Alsatian men who hid themselves in holes to avoid conscription by the Nazis. But the story is presented in understated irony and in a casual tone, as part of the poet's "reportage" of the way men behave and the way things occur. Characteristically, Oppen does not comment on the horrors of war; his real subject in this section is the strength of authentic feelings, the psychological realities that are prior to all intellectual constructions, ethics included:

Wars that are just? A simpler question:
In the event,
will you or will you not want to kill a German. Because in the event, if you do not want to, you won't.

Consistent with his biological and psychological determinism, Oppen does not see war as a form of evil but rather of insanity. And if the genes do not produce love, "we will produce no s[ome] man again."

Oppen is not the kind of man to [call] attention to himself; he is unpretenti[ous], soft-spoken and, above all, mod[est]. These perhaps are the personal quali[ties] that lie behind his impersonal st[yle], which is never strident, but gener[ates] its own kind of power. In his sta[rk], chiseled idiom he frequently achieve[s] "limited, limiting clarity." His [only] poetic ideal is that of the existential m[an] in general whose integrity compels h[im] to face down an absurd universe a[nd] whose lucidity keeps him from desp[air]. Behind Oppen's impersonal "reporta[ge]" there is all the intensity of perso[nal] conviction, unjeopardized by [sen]mentality and romantic egoism. Opp[en] has realized the full potential of [his] objectivist allegiance: he has becom[e a] poet of the first order.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS
Major Contributions
by NOAM CHOMSKY
PAUL JACOBS and others in November's LIBERATION

Published Monthly
Subscriptions: $7(reg.)
$5(student) yr.
339 Lafayette NYC 10012.

A DIFFERENT INTERNATIONAL ENGLISH-LANGUAGE NEWSPAPER
EVERY FORTNIGHT!

Here's the next best thing to a trip around the world—a fascinating gift—a great way of keeping informed! One year's subscription gives you assortment of famous newspapers from all the free world, mailed direct from its own country on date of issue, every other week throughout the year. Such papers as Borneo Bulletin, Saigon Post, Irish Times, Manchester Guardian, Baghdad News, Calcutta Statesman. Specially selected, informative issues. Invaluable for school children, exciting for entire family! 26 newspapers, Only $9.98 (outside U.S.—$10.98). Satisfaction g'teed. Check or m.o.

READERS WORLD PRESS CLUB
Dept. NT-119, New Hyde Park, N.Y. 11040

Comic Surrealism

THE BAMBOO BED. By William Eastlake. Simon & Schuster. 350 pp. $6.50.

BEVERLY GROSS

The Bamboo Bed is the nickname of a helicopter belonging to the Search and Rescue Squad which swoops high over the Vietnamese jungle during battle supposedly in search of the wounded and the lost. Manning the Bamboo Bed, far from the controls, indifferent to where they may be floating, Captain Knightbridge makes love to Nurse Jane. No one ever gets saved by the Bamboo Bed, except perhaps the lovemakers. An image of suspended indifference, the Bamboo Bed captivates everyone's imagination and serves as a fitting emblem for this novel.

The title has a multiplicity of meanings. The dead and dying have their own bamboo bed: the thick underbrush of the jungle floor is a natural bier. The comic absurdity of William Eastlake's novel does not diminish, in fact depends upon, the impact of wanton, illimitable human destruction. On Hill 904, along with the "gin bottles, marijuana wrappers . . . autographs of Hubert Horatio Humphrey and the movie stars who visited the Hill on a calm day" are "millions of gallons of red blood as though it had been sprayed there by defoliation mission, all of a year's output of something from a chemical company for which the stockholders received a supplemental year's-end dividend and caused the stock to jump up three and five eighths."

Mme. Dieudonné has a large circular bamboo bed in her underground v[illa] ("very difficult to believe unless y[ou] have tried to live on top in Vietnam"). Mme. Dieudonné is the widow of [the] owner of a large rubber plantation whe[re] crop gets exported to France for [the] manufacture of the world's finest co[n]doms. Like everyone else in the no[vel] she is indifferent to the struggle, [is] concerned about the progress of the w[ar] (everyone believes, perhaps rightly, th[at] it will last forever). The war, wh[ich] destroys her lover, touches her not [at] all. She abides at the end of the no[vel] as she is likely to abide at the end [of] the war, whatever its outcome.

The Bamboo Bed is not a politi[cal] novel, hardly even a war novel. It [is] neither realistic nor (in the ordina[ry] sense of the term) hard-hitting. A br[il]liant, strange, wondrous perfor[m]ance: it is the kind of feather th[at] knocks you over. It has something [of] the black humor of Catch-22 which [it] superficially resembles. But Eastla[ke] has done something more than spaw[n] a sequel to Joseph Heller's novel. Catch-22 is set in World War II—set in: a[n] conflagration could have been used [as] the backdrop to its madness. The Bamboo Bed is the war in Vietnam.

The novel is about destruction, sudd[en] and slow. Almost everyone gets kille[d]. Clancy, the Captain of A for Alp[ha] Company, the lover of Mme. Dieudonn[é] is lost in the jungle slowly dying fro[m] his battle wounds. Captain Clancy is th[e] hero in this novel (not the hero of i[t]. The Bamboo Bed has no heroes in th[e] sense). Clancy is a war hero, scarr[ed] om battle, a more or less honorable an, who is responsible for some vic- ries and for one terrible defeat, the ttle at Ridge Red Boy when the whole A for Alpha Company was wiped out. ancy's life is regarded as worth pre- rving by people who are not bent preserving anything much any more: ey want to save him for his symbolic lue.

There has never been a band of such mbol hunters since the Middle Ages. is as though the characters are bent denying reality by their random, surd, contradictory symbolizing. It is eir way of leveling things, people, the ar itself; their way of endowing the eaningless with something resembling nificance.

That meaninglessness is the comic sur- ce, the horrifying subsurface of East- ke's narrative. The war has no mean- g, it is fought for no issues: none ever mentioned, none ever thought of. ne Viet Cong is simply the Unfriendlies. ne men see themselves engaged in a ntest between the Friendlies (us) and e Unfriendlies (Victor Charlie). If ere is heroism and nobility, it is for asons having nothing to do with out- le commitments. Weintraub, the draft sister who was vengefully singled out his local draft board, turns out to the straightest shooter in the com- ny. "If they hadn't drafted you you'd ll be in the peace marches," Clancy ls him. "You'd never know what a ller you are." The war is fought on ch places as Hill 904, alternately Ours d Theirs. ("Up the Hill 904 the nericans went. Down the Hill 904 the mericans came. . . . The Americans d this again and again and again and ain. Why? Because it was a habit now. ne Americans were hooked on Hill 04.")

The peculiar quality of this book comes rgely from the way such oddities are ken so easily for granted. No one is uch struck by the presence of two wer children, a guitar-playing deserter d his girl friend wearing an "I HAVE DREAM" button, who sit in the jungle nging Where Have All the Flowers one. Colonel Yvor, armless (although is later confirmed that he has had s arms pinioned to his chest under plaster cast—for aesthetic reasons), ho in his claim never to have read book is deemed the real spirit of the ietnamese War. Three Orientals at- ched to the company, Karl Marx, Ho i Minh and The Naked Chinaman, are e only ones who know how to repair e helicopter. Oliver and Elgar, the mpany WASPs, negotiate the sale of bridge to the Viet Cong ("It was our tra bridge we had coming into the wn. There were two so we sold one. was 'extra.'") It all seems normal everyone.

"You're not going crazy, Weintraub," Appelfinger said.

"Sure?"

"Yes. I know enough about evolution to know that man adapts."

"You mean if he adapts to insanity he's not going crazy?"

"Yes," Appelfinger said.

"But he's crazy if he doesn't become crazy? If everyone else is crazy?"

"Yes."

"Why is that?"

"Because we have to set a norm," Appelfinger said. "Even if that norm is crazy. It's called a mean."

"And you never went to college?"

"No. I studied evolution on my own."

The impact of The Bamboo Bed comes from its peculiar disjointedness. It is comic surrealism: the sudden shifting between hilarity and outrage; recognizable reality giving way to the symbolic, the mythic, the gothic, the absurd.

> Now the jungle made sounds. The awful silence had given way to the noises that usually accompany an American motion picture. The cry of gaudy birds seemed fake. The complaints of small animals, distant, remote, like some sound track that had blurred, some other mix for a different cinema, so that you . . . expected that the next reel would announce the mistake, that this war would have to start all over again. . . .

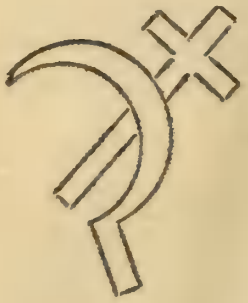
The dialogue is the same sort of mixture. Alternately serious and nonsensical, the exchanges between characters shift radically through impossible spheres. They speak in crisp non sequiturs which have the feel of soldier talk, but the movement of an animated Magritte.

> "It's a beautiful Vietnamese day, isn't it?"
>
> "It sure is, sir."
>
> "Billy Joe, why do you wear that Confederate flag in your buttonhole?"
>
> "I don't know, sir."
>
> "Billy Joe, what are you doing in this war?"
>
> "Driving the chopper."
>
> "Answer me."
>
> "Stopping the Communists."
>
> Colonel Yvor thought about this while watching the green monsoon sky above the dark jungle below.
>
> "Very well, Billy Joe, you may place the cigar in my mouth."

The war in Vietnam may seem startling material for comic surrealism. World War II had been two decades behind us before we were confronted with Catch-22. But to feel the surrealism of our involvement (as the commentators term it) in Vietnam may not require the perspective of time. Especially when

Now in a new, up-to-minute edition— the book Senator George McGovern calls "an essential source of historical information and valuable insights."

THE UNITED STATES IN VIETNAM



By GEORGE McTURNAN KAHIN (Professor of Government at Cornell University and Director of Cornell's Southeast Asia Program) and JOHN W. LEWIS (Professor of Government at Stanford University and Chairman of Stanford's Center for East Asian Studies).

Contains all of the original text plus new documents in the appendices as well as a new introduction and final chapters covering the latest developments. 5 maps

$6.95, hardcover; $2.95, paperbound
Now at your bookstore
THE DIAL PRESS

Is God pro-Communist?

Read the Link

Contents:

- The Apostles were Communists
- Pope Pius XI agreed with Marx and Engels
- Pope Gregory the Great endorses Communism
- Christ rejects organized religion, free enterprise and the profit motive
- John Stuart Mill endorses Communism
- A J. Edgar Hoover Lie

And more

Send Stamped, self-addressed envelope to:

CHRISTIAN COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

13685 Glenwood Avenue

Detroit, Michigan 48205

we are so amply conditioned by such announcements as Richard Nixon's tongue-twisted explanation, in his Election Eve address, of why the United States is going to continue its present war policy: "I believe it will succeed. If it does not succeed, what the critics say now won't matter. Or if it does succeed, what the critics say now won't matter. If it does not succeed, anything I say won't matter." He sounds like someone speaking in The Bamboo B Eastlake's army of oddballs is given certain verisimilitude by our Presiden

A myth is a fiction that makes possible to deal with the ineffable. So myths are pernicious, which is why, Mailer tells us, we are in Vietnam. The Bamboo Bed, a mythic exercise in own right, deflates the myth behind involvement in Vietnam by mytholog ing that war out of existence.

Their Finest Hour

THE PEOPLE'S WAR: Britain, 1939-1945. By Angus Calder. Pantheon Books. 640 pp. $8.95.

C. H. ROLPH

Mr. Rolph is the legal correspondent for the New Statesman. He is the author of many books, including The Trial of Lady Chatterley (Penguin) and, most recently, Law and the Common Man (C. C. Thomas). He was former Chief Inspector of the City of London Police.

Almost everyone who was an adult in wartime Britain will find in Dr. Angus Calder's monumental book many sources of riveting interest. He has assembled a wealth of social, political and gossipy detail that most of us previously knew nothing of. But having been there, one might also discover some odd gaps in what Dr. Calder has provided (I think, for instance, that he overlooks the role of the police during the blitz; many of them died in "heavy rescue" operations and a good many of them lived permanently in public shelters because their homes were blitzed). His history does contain some errors of fact and inference. The errors in so vast a scrapbook are remarkably few and usually unimportant: but it's a kind of testimony to the vividness of the narrative that one is concerned with such details.

Churchill did not, as president of the Board of Trade in 1909, "introduce Labour Exchanges in Britain." They were then more than twenty years old, and his government merely recognized and adopted them. In June 1940 we didn't get, "each morning," news that "more and more troops had been brought out of Dunkirk"; we got only rumors. Officially there was a deafening silence until the operation was all over. The air raid wardens did not "appear to the working class to be no more than lackeys of the police, a traditional enemy." They were a bit of a bore about blackout curtains and about hand torches not properly dimmed, but in the poorest districts of East London (to take an example I happen to know about) the warden beca everybody's friend. And "in a peri which spawned ominous clusters of itials . . . the soldiers added an unof cial one of their own: 'P.B.I.,' p bloody infantry." That christening tually dates from 1916 and Passch daele, where the infantry were sent o in expendable waves and died useles by the tens of thousands.

But it comes as a genuine surprise learn that in London only 4 per cent the people slept in the underground s tions, for as Calder says, "some accou of the blitz make it sound as if alm everyone took to the tubes." Incidenta he faithfully records the half-guilty h ror with which the normal Londo gazed upon the Neanderthal faces some of those unexpected fellow citize Nor did I know that in the passive fense period of 1939 the millions of c fins made ready for us were of papi mâché; or that the snakes in the Lond zoo were put to death, "to the manif sorrow of their keepers." I never hea of the priceless Lancashire magistr who said: "This is a people's war as w as ours." Calder's many references Churchill addressing "his" people on t wireless suggest that he sometimes p ceives the same essential attitude Churchill as in the Lancashire J.P. don't think many of us knew that Beav brook wanted to oust Churchill as P mier, though in this book the eviden is clear enough. I think our blood wou have run even colder if we had kno that. And I didn't know, and can st hardly believe, that Sir Herbert Read, all people, had "produced the suggesti that there should be official war poets

Calder gives a merciless close-u of Churchill, the warts touched in fait fully with care. But this huge and absor ing tome, vivid history written by a m who is too young to have seen it happe read by one who had an uncomfortab bit part in it, perfectly understan Churchill's uniqueness:

Churchill's famous phrases—"blood, sweat, toil and tears," "their finest hour," "we shall never surrender," did express something inarticulate, perhaps dormant but perhaps not, in the hearts and minds of his countrymen of most classes. They achieved their effect by a heroic yet very simple expression of the will to resist ("we shall fight them in the hills"), and by invoking the naive sense of nationhood and history which most of his literate subjects shared with him. Undoubtedly the middle classes at least, hearing his perorations, felt that they stood with Churchill on the heroic landscape of his imagination, and that the spirits of Alfred the Great and Nelson were with them. No other politician had the literary equipment and physical presence to give that kind of lead.

That is absolutely true, and (if you leave out the reference to Churchill's "subjects" which, I repeat, is going a bit too far), it has never been better expressed.

The book produces some enchanting antitheses, some of which (you may feel) must have been thoughtfully worked out. "The Daily Mirror," Calder says in his account of V-E Day, "fulfilling a faith long held in the fighting services, rejoiced by disrobing completely the hitherto tantalising 'Jane' [the comic strip heroine who was always losing some one of her essential garments]. Crowds massed, on the other hand, at St. Paul's Cathedral which was packed with worshippers all day." Those words—"on the other hand"—do an important job there. And when the two sides of a question get separated by several hundred pages, some unintentional gaffes are produced. Early in the book, there is a defense of "Bomber Harris," who is said to have been "unfairly blamed as a bloodthirsty ogre" for organizing those fearful air attacks on German cities; 300 pages later we learn that he was allowed at the end of the war "to follow his own whim" to "the point of manifest lunacy"—this was when he destroyed the beautiful city of Dresden in the hope of ending the war quickly by shattering German morale. (I'm told in Germany that German morale knew nothing about Dresden for many weeks.)

A marvelous book, nevertheless. There is another whole volume of information buried in the end notes. I relived the London war in these pages. And I salute a man who can combine the industry, the eclecticism and the literary grace to make one read compulsorily more than a quarter of a million words almost nonstop.

Theatre in Dublin

CATHARINE HUGHES

Miss Hughes is the American theatre critic for Plays and Players (London) and contributes regularly to Show Business and America. Her Madame Lafayette was produced Off-Broadway several seasons ago.

The indignation of the Irish press notwithstanding, it was only appropriate that the greatest stir at this year's Dublin Theatre Festival was created not by plays but by Playboy bunnies. Or, to be more accurate, by Playboy bunnies who never were, but who someone thought should have been, if only to rescue the limping Festival Club, in earlier years the center for late night gossip and Guinness.

As for the plays themselves—eighteen in twelve days—I would have been hard put to come up with a negative response for the cheerful Irishman who inquired, "Are they as bad as ever this year?" With a few exceptions, they sadly were, and even the exceptions were generally more interesting for what they had to say politically than for what they demonstrated artistically.

"Free Stevie Doherty" proclaimed the handbills passed out to the audience at the end of the first act of John Boyd's The Assassin. "We defend entirely the action of our brother Stephen Doherty. When he pulled the trigger in an attempt to free our country from the fascist tyranny of Col. Luther Lamb and all his followers, he struck a blow not for himself, not for personal gain, but for Ulster and for freedom." And, just in case the message needed underlining, there were signs demanding "Civil and Religious Liberty FOR ALL," "One Man, One Vote," "No Pope Here," "Up King Billy!", and voices singing We Shall Overcome in the background.

It couldn't have been more topical: the Londonderry demonstrations that brought Northern Ireland's explosive civil rights question out into the streets had occurred exactly a year earlier, and the bloodiest fighting yet was to occur in Belfast exactly a week later.

Actually, Boyd's play, although billed as a world première, was an updated version of one produced in Belfast in substantially milder form a few years ago. His Belfast is grim, fearful, torn by conflict—though perhaps not quite so grim or fearful as I found it as I walked along the Shankill Road a week later. And his central figure, the fanatic Rev. Col. Luther A. Lamb, though he contains elements of other Ulster demagogues, is so obviously Ian Paisley (even to a marked

AN INSIDE VIEW OF OUR NATIONAL MILITARY ACADEMIES

By RAY HILL
Associated Press Writer

"The Brass Factories" by J. Arthur Heise (Public Affairs Press) is "inside stuff" on the nation's three military academies.

It is an inside look at the beginnings of the nation's military-industrial complex and at a system of higher learning, so steeped in history, that it just may be out of whack with what's going on at every other campus in the U.S.

As Heise sees it, "The fact is that the men from West Point and Annapolis, with those from Colorado Springs only a few steps behind, have what is nearly a monopoly on the brass hats of the military-industrial complex. This domination makes the first level of the uniformed military hierarchy—the three service academies—crucially important."

The author didn't start out to deal with the military-industrial complex, nor with comparisons between the military campuses and other institutions of higher learning, but the book's appearance now proves to be very timely.

Heise, a reporter for the Buffalo Evening News, who in 1962-1965 was a member of the faculty at the Air Force Academy, was assigned as a newsman to look into the 1967 cheating scandal in Colorado.

What developed, through interviews and examination of hundreds of documents, was enough material for a fascinating study of the "factories" that produce the country's officer class.

From hazing at Annapolis to a detailed account of the inner workings of the honor code at both West Point and Colorado Springs, the author tells the story in a way that makes it as timely as a weekly newsmagazine.

Available at $6 a copy from leading bookstores or from the publisher, Public Affairs Press, 419 New Jersey Ave., S.E., Washington, D. C. 20003.

resemblance on the part of the actor who portrays him) that a defending attorney in a libel suit—if libel there be—would find it difficult to suppress a wink. There are "Lambites" instead of Paisleyites, and even an American college president from the Bible Belt (for which, presumably, one may read the Rev. Bob Jones, who by coincidence was visiting Paisley in Belfast that very week).

The Assassin opens with a rally celebrating the Reverend Lamb's election to Parliament and his shooting by a young lapsed Catholic member of the People's Democracy. The critically wounded cleric is taken to the hospital where, in a nicely ironic touch, he is nursed by a Roman Catholic nun ("If he woke up and found himself in a popish hospital . . ." moans his election agent).

In the flash-backs that follow, Boyd traces Lamb's career from his boyhood, where he acquires his initiation in bigotry from an aunt and uncle, through a first job which in time sends him to "the great Protestant U.S.A.," where he perfects his inclinations and is encouraged to emulate Martin Luther King's "I have a dream" speech—"the technique only"—a recording of which is played at some length, and thence to "Go home and sell the Lord." Returning to Ulster, he takes up his demagogic role, proclaiming: "There will be no surrender to Rome," forming the Evangelical Party, and providing bayonet lessons for his followers ("Remember, you're doing this for the Lord. . . . This is a holy and a righteous war. . . . God is on our side").

For all its considerable theatricality—its simulated civil rights rally, RUC men in the aisles and armed troops and barricades confronting the audience—The Assassin is far from as effective as one suspects it might have been. Its characters are plucked from the front pages and television screens, with little effort to flesh them out or explore their motivations, and its rambling, episodic structure prevents it from achieving either focus or impact. Boyd is decidedly on the side of the angels, his message being the futility of violence, whether by the exploiters or the exploited. And when his Colonel Lamb dies at the play's end there can be no disputing the "You fool, you've made him a martyr," which a warder utters to his assassin. Words very like them were to be spoken—mistakenly as it turned out—only a few feet away from me some nine days later in Belfast. But the streets of Belfast are one thing and the stalls of a theatre in Dublin quite another. There are plays to be written on the turmoil that is Northern Ireland today, but I cannot help feeling they are more likely to be found in the faces one sees in the Bogside or Shankill Road than in the headlines of the Belfast Telegraph—or, for that matter, of Dublin's Evening Press or The New York Times.

If only because its central figure is Biblical—at least ostensibly—Conor Cruise O'Brien's King Herod Explains is on safer ground. Not that it is really any less topical, if one accepts the idea that leaders are the product of the led, their culpability our culpability. "On whose hands is there not blood?" asks Hilton Edwards in one of the focal questions of an hourlong monologue which is at least as much a triumph for the actor as it is an impressive playwriting debut for the author. (Murderous Angels, O'Brien's play about Dag Hammarskjöld's role in the death of Patrice Lumumba, although written earlier, will not have its première until next February, at the Mark Taper Forum in Los Angeles.)

Herod comes on stage in evening dress, dons an ornate robe and, puffing a large cigar, proceeds to indict the press—notably St. Matthew—for circulating the erroneous idea that it was he who was responsible for the Massacre of the Innocents. No, it was not he, Herod, King of the Jews, but Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee. He merely liquidated his own family; for reasons of state, of course, the peace of his kingdom. Any other ruler—Kennedy, Churchill, Stalin, De Valera—would have done the same, political necessity dictating. Kennedy, [illegible] reminds a planted heckler, was involv[ed] in the Bay of Pigs. There was Vietna[m] . . . Why should he, Herod, feel guil[t]? Why should he be indicted for the s[in] of political pragmatism that goes on [all] the time?

The questions are not dissimilar [to] those raised in Murderous Angels, w[hich] its exploration of ends and means, pr[in]ciple and expediency. Where the new play differs most markedly—apart fr[om] the controversy quotient—is in the [ex]tent to which the audience is implica[ted] and found wanting. The topicality is o[c]casionally forced ("These Pharisees [are] they were rather like your New Le[ft] prickly"), but essentially Dr. O'Br[ien] makes his case, scores his debate[r] points, with considerable skill. And sin[ce] the "foe" he scores them off is rea[l] the audience—whose secret wishes, [he] suggests, are the stuff of the politicia[n]'s overt actions—what emerges is, in t[he] end, more than a simple fantasy of se[lf] justification. When, however, Herod hea[rs] the off-stage cry of a child in the nig[ht] his confidence and sense of irony des[ert] him: we are, after all, responsible f[or] the human consequences of our actio[ns] and "There are no politics at thr[ee] o'clock in the morning."

For the rest—or at least that pa[rt] attainable to someone who could be [in] only one theatre at one time—there w[as] less to be said. The "names" disappointe[d] Sir Tyrone Guthrie, for example, bei[ng] represented with a frequently static ove[r] production of Swift, a new play by E[u]gene McCabe.

Swift is one of those diffuse, episod[ic] theatre chronicles which attempts, wi[th] flash-backs, to explore and explain th[e] behavior of a Great Man. Its maj[or] premise seems to be that Swift w[as] scarred for life when abandoned in ear[ly] childhood by his mother, and that th[is] bore fruit in his later relationships wi[th] Stella and Vanessa, neither of whom h[e] married, both of whom, along with h[is] mother and other figures from the pas[t] emerge in his nightmare.

Seventy-year-old Micheál MacLian[n]moir (who, with Hilton Edwards, h[is] partner of forty years, has just been give[n] a government grant to take over onc[e] more the Gate Theatre, which the tw[o] men founded in 1928) portrays Swif[t] and portrays him to the hilt, with hunche[d] shoulders, sonorous rhetoric and no litt[le] relish. One of the London critics re[-] marked, with condescension, that if [he] hadn't been in Dublin, "you'd call [him] ham." Though I greatly admire Mac[-] Liammoir, I'd still have to call it a trifl[e] melodramatic.

The Festival's other major event, a[t] least on paper, was The Barracks, adapte[d]

How do you feel about those flags on cars?

If it angers you to see the super-patriots and love-it-or-leave-it guys taking over the American flag—show where you stand! Display these full-color "Peace" and "Equality" decals on car windows, bulletin boards.

©1969 SAVE OUR FLAG, INC.

PEACE decal Set of two . . . $1 EQUALITY decal Set of two . . . $1

Each decal over 4" square.
Seen on CBS News, NBC Today Show, in Life.
AT GIFT STORES. OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

Save Our Flag, Inc.
P.O. Box 79, Gedney Station, White Plains, N.Y. [illegible]
Please send me ..... sets Peace decals
..... sets Equality decals
Enclosed is $.....($1 per [illegible] plus 15¢ per order for p&h.)
Name _____
(please print)
Address _____
Dept. C
City _____ State & zip _____

from John McGahern's fine novel by Hugh Leonard (Stephen D, etc.), who seems to be turning into the Festival's resident adapter. It is a plodding, melodramatic effort at best, capturing little of the atmosphere or poignance of the original. Set in a Garda (police) station in the west of Ireland, it tells of a sergeant, gentle, well-meaning, a widower with three children, and his second, considerably younger wife, who develops breast cancer, is successfully operated on, but dies shortly thereafter of a heart condition. Interspersed are intrusive, badly handled flash-backs to her earlier life and love in London, terminated by the lover's death in an auto accident.

Perhaps the novel is one not suited to a transition to the stage. Whatever the case, Leonard failed not only to re-create the oppressive sense of stagnation and isolation that would have made it a successful stage work on that level but to give it sufficient momentum or focus. It had moments, to be sure, but they were more extraneous than integral—entertaining performances by two of the police officers and three engaging, believable child actors. But at the core, where there would seem to have been the possibility for genuinely moving drama, there was only sentimentality.

All in all, then, this year's Festival turned out more adventurous politically than it was successful artistically. Which, in one sense, may be a step forward for Dublin, but certainly cannot be considered one for the theatre. Not in a country which likes to boast of its O'Caseys, Joyces, Behans and Becketts. There were no new O'Caseys on view in Dublin, merely an old one: yet another revival of Juno and the Paycock at the Abbey. As an image, it will do.

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

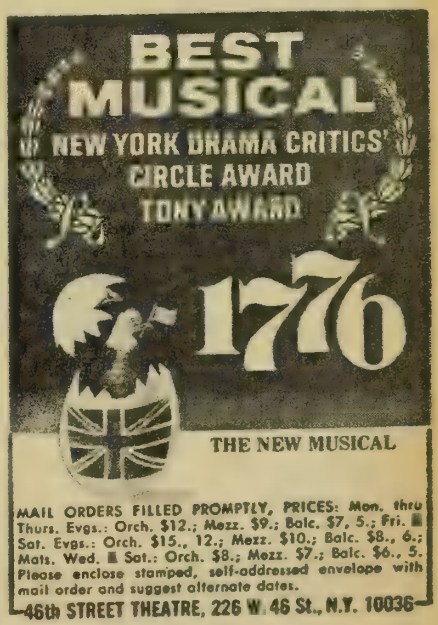
I have written about William Saroyan's The Time of Your Life so many times that I would almost have preferred to note summarily that it is surely one of the best plays the American theatre has produced and to have that opinion stand by itself. But certain reactions to its revival at the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center provoke me to say something more.

The Time of Your Life is not "dated"; it is a folk tale. It is not merely a play of the 1930s' depression, although its surface associations pin it down in time. It catches something permanently benevolent, gusty, zestful in the American ethos. It is as native to us as Huckleberry Finn, with greater contemporary relevance.

When in the fifties I spoke of the play I said that it was pre-beatnick. Today I would say it is pre-hippie. What was and is salutary in these trends is their resistance to the fierce aggressiveness which springs from the very mechanism of our industrial civilization. Those who are strong and mature seek by active political and cultural means to lift the burden of evil attendant on our success-crazy society; the more innocent drift toward a passivity which consists chiefly of nonparticipation in the drive toward noisy achievement. Unconsciously, this withdrawal from the mad push is something like a religious phenomenon. It is the way of both the saintly and the pure in heart among humble folk.

A corresponding sentiment lies deeply rooted in our people ever since we have become big. Hence the fascination with the hobo: it is a sort of nostalgia, almost envy. Secretly we harbor an irrepressible affection for the person who invites his soul, dreams, laughs, talks with quiet compassion to his fellow man and hurts no one. There is a certain strength in this. Many among today's youth are in accord with this spirit. It is no less important and valuable for being deficient in "logic."

The tone of Saroyan's play is one of lyric anarchism. It is sentimental in a way that one should be ashamed not to be. Saroyan, it has never been sufficiently realized, writes beautifully, without any trace of affectation. His language is robust, juicy, colorful—true Americana with no vulgarity or recourse to current smart talk. It is lightened by warm laughter. It is loose but not limp. There is a wonderful freedom in it. It will for a long time remain representative of what is most attractive in us. In every respect The Time of Your Life rises head and shoulders above most of the new young dramatists whose work is too often imitative in style, petty in feeling, frivolously ambitious, shrilly pretentious.



The play has always been staged as if it were realism. It is real, but not "realistic." Its characters are painted in tender "clown" pigments; the world they float in is delicately inebriate, harmlessly "psychedelic." When Robert Lewis first attempted its direction for the Theatre Guild in 1939 he was aware of this aspect of the play and tried, with the support of Boris Aronson setting, to embody its locale as a sort of modest dream palace, a realm apart from the main drag, an essential San Francisco in which different ethnic strains blended in the soft air of that still gracious town, as if all were bathed in a shimmering mist.

Saroyan insisted at the time that the saloon in which the action takes place be literally rendered as a drab and crumby little joint. The play came to New York in that guise, with an excellent cast but with the other elements of production indifferent—the whole sufficient to carry the play's "message."

Saroyan may have been right. But I have always hoped to see the play done poetically, with its fancy made visible, and with more song in its total expression. Alas, no one has as yet had the imagination, courage and skill to do so. The production at the Repertory Theater under John Hirsch's direction is adequate on the level of a conventional reading. The setting is as ugly as anyone would have such a place be. It is, moreover, so huge that the play's intimacy is entirely lost.

The cast contains several good actors, but they are all directed prosily; the result is pedestrian and rather heavy. There is hardly a lift in the lot, except for Robert Symonds as the delightfully mendacious soothsayer Kit Carson. That part in itself is one of the play's triumphs and Symonds lets it fly him high in the atmosphere to which the entire evening should soar.

Despite my regret that its production is not pitched in its proper key, I recommend your seeing The Time of Your Life (especially if you have never seen it before) and congratulate the organization at Lincoln Center for having undertaken its revival.

ART / Lawrence Alloway

The exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art called "New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940-1970" has caused some agitation about who's in and who's out. This was generated mainly by the friends and supporters of artists who were passed over, and then fanned by those critics who welcome any mischief they can stir up in New York art circles. The discontent (it is a good deal short of controversy) seems to me off the point because the exhibition is not a historical one. It is a string of beads. Taken as an anthology of forty-three one-man shows, not as one big show, it makes sense. Nobody who knows the career of Henry Geldzahler, the curator who staged the shows, could have expected a proportionate or causal presentation. Taken hedonistically, however, these exhibitions are a marvelous suite, a Versailles of avant-gardes, that you are free to perambulate in any order.

That makes two big *un*historical shows of recent American art this season. First was "The New American Painting: the First Generation" at the Museum of Modern Art, which was unrepresentative because the museum's own collection is not complete. As the scope of the collection was, in effect, the show's subject, the lacunas were legitimate and supposedly temporary. Mr. Geldzahler's gala suspends historical fact in favor of visual pleasure. He gives no attention to priorities or dependencies and has not tried to emphasize initiating or pivotal works. However gratitude is appropriate, if not admiration, for the assembling of these more than 400 works.

Essentially it is a show of familiar works, either of paintings often seen in New York, or of pieces typical of the great moments and famous themes of various artists (squares, stars and stripes, Campbell soup cans, Cubis and elegies, for instance). In the absence of a supportive argument or a historical purpose, it presents itself as a bouquet of taste. The exercise of connoisseurship which the forty-three shows elicit is rewarding, for the level of sophistication and of performance revealed by these works has no equal in the world. Their strength in terms of sensuous display is extraordinary. Such a chain of shows is to be enjoyed mainly in terms of the connoisseurship of art at an authoritative and imperial stage. That is not, it is true, the level of American art's most interesting achievements but, given this compilation, it emerges as the only common denominator. That is why disagreements about the cast are irrelevant. If the show had specific aims, some of the exclusions would matter, as would some of the overshowings. As it is, we need do no more than count the beads and our blessings which are numerous.

To view American art in terms of connoisseurship, that is to say in terms of refined visual judgment, runs against one's habit. When American painting was newly articulate and very postwar it was defined by its rare supporters in terms of freedom from convention and praised for its toughness and innocence. In line with a preoccupation of the period, American art was regarded as poor but honest by comparison with the skills and sneaky enchantments of European art. It is hard to recall this feeling, surrounded at the Met by such incontestably glowing bits of Art, but the criticism of twenty years ago attests to its existence. Now, however, it is certain that American art of the period 1940-69 has changed one's view of earlier modern art. One of the reasons why Picasso seems so coarsely schematic to my eyes, I take it, is that I was raised on Abstract Expressionist color.

Frederick Jackson Turner's history o America as an endless frontier, so dea to the mythological imagination, is no decisively inappropriate (as it was whe President Eisenhower opened the Genera Motors Technical Center by invoking it) The Met demonstrates what it feels lik to be not at the edge but on top. Ameri can art has become the world's or thodoxy. An orthodoxy is not a academy, not a reactionary group, bu simply the working group that know a subject best, whether it is electronic or acrylic paints. It is the professiona group that sets, by its achievement, th level of knowledge and the direction o research in its field. From the ex perience of orthodoxy (dominant an productive) American art derives it confidence and scale. We are now a the point where a style previously cele brated for its abrasive and revolutionar poverty must be recognized securely a art. The paintings in the Met set a stand ard of vivacity and consistency tha European art of the same period know little of.

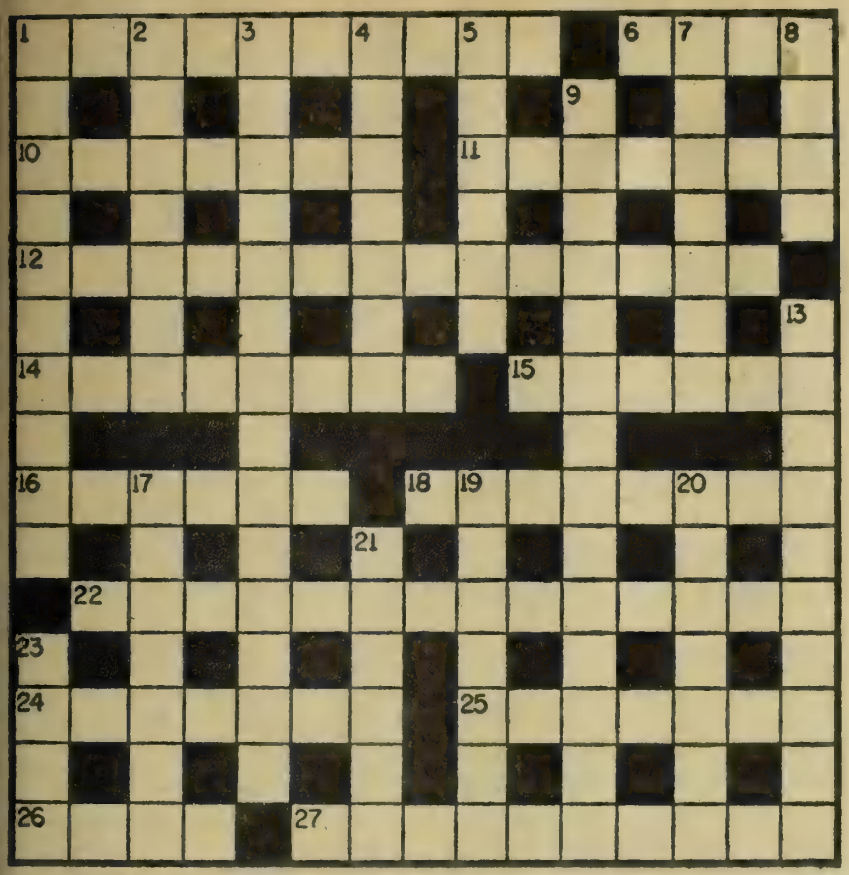
These reflections on connoisseu ship and orthodoxy arise from the nee to supply an explanation for the pleasur and the detachment one feels at th exhibition. It must be stressed that am speaking of the cumulative effec of all those grand, original, rich an well-made pieces. What one of the artis looks like, out of the context of affluen peers, can be seen by going to th Museum of Modern Art for the Cla Oldenburg retrospective. In the Met h half dozen pieces are handsome, pe fectly fit members of the super show In his retrospective he looks very di ferent, not just because he is seen i depth but because he is out of the cu tural shop winow.

One of the beauties of Oldenburg work is that it comes out of new cla sificatory systems and embodies them i subtle objects. He is never engaged i distortion as is Picasso, for exampl when he takes an existing pictorial fo mat, such as the seated woman a defined by Baroque portraiture, and the twists it and knocks it about. Older burg's forms are analogues of city an body; he initiates affinities betwee hardware and software, turning the of man-machine contact into a big so kiss. His writing gives clues to the proli erating homologies of his art, as whe he lists a chain of transformation "Earrings—airplane wheels—brassiere-breasts." "Orphic Annie" is a cha acteristic phrase and this is a characte istic observation: "the lipstick did strong flirt with the bullet." His wor is continually metamorphic while beir absolutely full and solid as an obje in view.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 917 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES



MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 11-24-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1322

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 What agricultural researchers do, as some saw things. (5-5)
6 Proving it's no good rising to the top! (4)
10 Do they offer encouragement for such as pigs? (7)
11 Sinkers, hopefully—or those who just set. (7)
12 Dante must enter in a make-up that is traditionally British. (14)
14 Seven has to be, to be scalene. (8)
15 There might be a projection on one to check the character. (6)
16 Broken down in two directions, but gives quality. (6)
18 Things that you can count or recount should be. (8)
22 Clear profit, as they say. (You can show it on your own account.) (5,2,3,4)
24 Grumbled because increase came first? (4)
25 Board that shows the reverse of skill in a certain number. (7)
26 It might be stuffed in your engagement book. (4)
27 With not enough scolding to be like some sleepers? (10)

DOWN

1 Crated with nothing in it, except the carpet inside, which is all wrinkled. (10)
2 What you expect to be delivered may be to show how the soldier stops. (2,5)
3 Big-shot directors, or the ones you take in front seats? (8,6)
4 To steer in the right formation might imply you deserve a medal. (7)
5 Attribute. (6)
7 Macbeth wanted to the suff'd bosom of that perilous stuff which weighs upon the heart. (7)
8 and 23 down Needed, by the sound of it, the main body ripened. (8)
9 Some of the things you might lick, he's interested in saving. (5,9)
13 Not 18, possibly, and even not thought of. (10)
17 Proud to make one showing a certain lack of attendance? (4-3)
19 The first or the last term. (7)
20 Spenser coined the word to describe the bleating herds. (7)
21 Refuse, in a way, to do something other than brighten up the study. (6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1321

ACROSS: 1 Paper dolls; 6 Sham; 10 Twosome; 11 Wharton; 12 Oran; 13 Bellwether; 15 Ageless; 16 Wounded; 17 Orchids; 20 and 27 What You Will; 22 Doubtfully; 23 Swat; 25 Hairnet; 26 Enforce; 28 Persistent. DOWN: 1 Puts on a good show; 2 Probate; 3 Rook; 4 Openers; 5 Low blow; 7 Hatched; 8 Minor adjustment; 9 Cane sugar; 14 Depicting; 18 Crucial; 19 Scuttle; 20 Wallets; 21 Yew tree; 24 Efts.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

GUIDE TO THE AMERICAN LEFT. Directory and Bibliography. 2,000 listings. Current. Comprehensive. $3.00. Directory, Box 1832, Kansas City, Missouri 64141.

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

DEAR FRIEND EISENMAN: "Your HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM is wonderful. I plan on using it repeatedly. Everything you write is stimulating." D. F. Fleming — December, 1965. NOW READ "Volume Two, WHY I SHOULD BE PRESIDENT" by Abram Eisenman: "WITHDRAW FROM VIETNAM AND THAILAND". "FREE ABORTION. FULL EQUALITY FOR WOMEN". "GOVERNMENT UNDERWRITES WORK FOR ALL". "FIFTY BILLIONS FOR PEACE NOT WAR". "WOMB TO TOMB SOCIAL SECURITY". Send five dollars for autographed copy to THE SAVANNAH SUN, 234 E. 48th Street, Savannah, Ga. 31405. HARD COVER. TELLS ALL.

EDWARD M. KENNEDY QUARTERLY. Everything about the Senator. 4-issue subscription: $2.00. Sample copy: 50c. Write: EMK—N, 675 Tysens Lane, Staten Island, N.Y. 10306

PERSONALS

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE — needs to love. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City 10017.

"McGOVERN FOR PRESIDENT" BUMPER STICKERS
10 for $1.00
McGovern Bumper Stickers
Dept.A — Box 10002
Kansas City, Missouri 64111

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 101 W. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10001.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

Advertising Rates
Classified: 74c a line (6 words) a line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Caution: The Tobacco Lobby Is A Hazard To Your Health.

What are the facts about smoking? The death rate from all causes for male smokers between the ages of 45 and 64 is twice that of non-smokers. Yet there are 49 million smokers in the United States today.

Who's protecting the public? Congress has refused to regulate cigarette advertising and strait-jacketed the Federal Trade Commission.

How can there be such a blatant disregard for the public welfare? SMOKING AND POLITICS, Policymaking and the Federal Bureaucracy, by A. Lee Fritschler, tells the story of the fight for and against the regulation of cigarette advertising. But he does more. He analyzes the relationship between the Congress, the regulatory agencies and "the interests."

Don't miss this fascinating study of the way our government works. Enter a new one-year subscription to The NATION and receive SMOKING AND POLITICS as our gift.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will send you SMOKING AND POLITICS, by A. Lee Fritschler, free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me SMOKING AND POLITICS.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 11-24

STREET THEATRE JOE ADCOCK

THE NATION

DECEMBER 1, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
DEC 1 1969
LIBRARY

J-TOR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

'IVE PEACE A CHANCE'

On Pilgrimage to Washington

KENNETH G. GROSS

RETOOLING A PARTY

The Democrats Confront 1970

reports from

California
Ohio
Illinois
New York
Michigan
Pennsylvania

OIL / Robert Engler

Harold Clurman on Meyerhold

LETTERS

many thanks

New York City

DEAR SIRS: A possible explanation of the pile of letters on Mr. Nixon's desk the day after his speech may lie in what happened to my letter. I wrote deploring the speech in very definite terms. No one who read the letter could think I support him. Last week I received an engraved card thanking me for my support and happy that so many like me believe in the President's aims!

From now on I will believe the more sophisticated young people who said to me: "Don't write. It's useless." This time it was more than useless, it was used.

Ruth K. Goldberg

target

Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: Thank you very much for sending me the copy of The Nation containing William D. Phelan's article, "Nixon's 'Southern Strategy': The Authoritarian Prescription" [Nov. 3]. It is pretty frightening, but I think it is right on target.

George Wald

correction

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: In my article, "Man in Nature: Model for a New Radicalism" [The Nation, Nov. 10] I quoted from a letter by Dr. Gordon S. Livingston, medical officer returned from Vietnam, and mistakenly gave his name as George. I regret this error.

Catherine Riegger Harris

code for sorcerers

Leeds, England

DEAR SIRS: In "Modern Biology: A Terrifying Power" by S. E. Luria [The Nation, Oct. 20] Professor Luria presents the problem honestly. If his solution is pitifully inadequate, it is through no personal failing of his but because of an outdated conception of the moral problems and responsibilities of science. In effect, he tells us that civilization had better catch up quickly, lest it be unable to cope with the knowledge that he and his colleagues are determined to create.

A moratorium on research is for him "the least rational and least effective" approach, since "the human enterprise depends on freedom of inquiry." But he should know that moratoriums on research are imposed daily, whenever one application for a research grant is passed over in favor of another. The usual criterion for rejection is roughly that the cost/benefit ratio is too high in comparison with other competing projects. Costs are now assessed in money and manpower; there is no reason in principle why they should not include social and ecological dangers. They would then be incapable of assessment in quantitative terms, but scientific benefits are similarly nonquantifiable.

"Free inquiry" in science has been a straightforward principle only since the time when inquiry into nature has been considered a straightforward process, producing knowledge and power in a manageable measure. Up to the 17th century . . . "knowledge too powerful to be revealed" was believed to exist, and practitioners of the magical arts had a severe code of sharing secrets only with tested initiates. It is noteworthy that even Francis Bacon, who believed that natural knowledge was a revelation of God's works and so inherently good, had the scientists of "Solomon's House" taking an oath of secrecy, and collectively deciding what to reveal to the state and what to suppress. Norbert Wiener

(Continued on page 604)

EDITORIALS

Freedom To Cheer

Several conclusions may be drawn about Vice President Agnew's ominous Des Moines speech. It is now clear, if there was ever any doubt, that Agnew's pursuit of "the tough line" has been at Nixon's instigation. The Des Moines media speech admittedly reflects White House "concerns"; if it was not written, it was "developed" there. It was from there that the "invite Agnew" message was unexpectedly flashed to the Republican faithful in Des Moines. It was the White House that asked Dean Burch, formerly chairman of the Republican National Committee and now Chairman of the FCC, to request transcripts of TV commentaries on Nixon's Vietnam speech—just to underscore the threat to the networks. The timing of the speech in relation to the Washington demonstrations leaves no doubt that it was intended to put the networks off stride on November 15. At Des Moines, the voice was Agnew's but the ideas were Nixon's. As Senator McCarthy said, Agnew is "Nixon's Nixon."

Agnew's speech was not designed to criticize the networks; on the contrary the purpose was to suppress network criticism. Many aspects of network news coverage and commentary are indeed vulnerable, but Agnew was not urging improvement, he was threatening interference. Henceforth the networks must be "positive" in what they say about the Administration, notably in relation to Vietnam—"or else."

Nixon boasts that his speech on Vietnam was warmly received by the people and the Congress, and the networks brought it to them. Why, then, did he zero in on the networks? He acted as he did because, despite all those telegrams, he panicked. His canny political sense told him that the general reaction was negative, even though the polls indicated "support for the President." The Administration was also determined to minimize the effect of the Washington demonstrations and, to this end, it demanded network cooperation.

It was not the networks alone that were attacked. A week after his Des Moines speech, Mr. Agnew let fly at the nation's press, particularly The New York Times and The Washington Post. (His platform, the Alabama Chamber of Commerce in Montgomery, was well chosen for a display of fist-shaking at the "Eastern Establishment.") Newspapers like these do not frighten as easily as networks, nor do they operate by government license, and the Vice President was careful to avoid covert threats. He also displayed a sorry ignorance of newspaper practice, excoriating the Times for ignoring a story which it in fact covered in detail—but not in time for the early edition he had read in Washington.

As in Des Moines, Mr. Agnew opened from a valid position: that the reduction of newspapers in the country over the past decade or so is regrettable (The New York Times, like other papers, has frequently deplored it.) But he soon got around to the point that the real fault of the press is that it does not invariably share his views as to what the facts are or how they should be handled. And yet his attempt to equate dissent with violence—in the face of the superb discipline shown in Washington on November 15 (see page 591)—is but another example of his almost total (indeed almost totalitarian) contempt for the truth.

We have heard such charges before, including the conspiratorial references to "a gaggle of commentators," "a handful of men," and the rest of it. What Agnew wants, what the President wants, is subservient media, as Nixon made clear in his "farewell" tongue-lashing of the press in California in 1962. President Johnson was not above trying to whip the networks into line, and President Kennedy tried his hand at "coordinating" the press, but never before have we had the threat to the media stated with such unmistakable directness. Those who fail to read the dangers implicit in it should not be heard to complain when, in the future, the squeeze catches them.

Agnew told his audience that they could read his speech in the next day's edition of the Des Moines Register. What they actually read in those fine pages was a first-rate account of the origins and purposes of the speech. As a postscript, we note that it remains to be seen how well the networks will stand up to Nixon's threat. Their first reactions were fairly good; but if they behave according to old habit, the network executives will begin to "reassess" their position and "sweeten" their coverage. They will deny doing so, but they will toe the line. So we predict, hoping to be proved wrong.

The Disaffection Spreads

Although the evidence is impressionistic and sketchy, there is good reason to believe that disaffection with the war has spread farther in area and involved far more people than at any time in the past. The real grass roots have now begun to show signs of disillusion, as in Wyoming (The Nation, November 17), and in the Ozarks (as The New York Times reports), and in historically belligerent Dodge City, Kan., where the Mayor recently told The Wall Street Journal: "This thing has made a complete turn-around. People here feel that all we're doing is sending our people over there for a useless cause—and with no end in sight."

The ferment has also spread into the once-quiet campus of Denison College, in Granville, Ohio (Wall Street Journal, October 24); and from Stevens Point, Wis., Anthony Lewis describes in The New York Times (October 29) a "Change in the Heartland." But more important is a report, in the Times of November 16, that San Diego, a city directly dependent on military spending, is now sharply divided over the war. This study indicates that much of the discontent is found in individuals who are against the protesters but also against the war.

It is symptomatic that whereas hawks become doves, one does not read of doves who turn hawk. A Gallup poll of November 12 detects a dramatic shift from hawk to dove category since 1967. Attempts to whip up sentiment for the war have been pathetic; counter-rallies in New Jersey and New York have not been successful. The fact seems to be that very few groups are for the war; if Mr. Nixon has a majority silently backing him, it seems to be made up of those who support him because they believe

IN THIS ISSUE

December 1, 1969

EDITORIALS

586

ARTICLES

591 On Pilgrimage to Washington: "Give Peace a Chance" — Kenneth G. Gross

Retooling a Party: The Democrats Confront 1970

594 California — Phil Kerby
595 Illinois — Don Rose and David S. Canter
597 New York — Jerome Wilson
598 Michigan — Douglas Crase
599 Ohio — Gene I. Maeroff
600 Pennsylvania — A. Stephen Boyan, Jr.

602 Rockefeller Reports: Half Right on Latin America — Richard O'Mara

BOOKS & THE ARTS

605 Tanzer: The Political Economy of International Oil and the Underdeveloped Countries — Robert Engler
606 To Find (poem) — James L. Weil
607 Rahv: Literature and the Sixth Sense — Mark L. Krupnick
608 Braun (editor): Meyerhold on Theatre — Harold Clurman
609 Oates: Them and Anonymous Sins and Other Poems — Calvin Bedient
610 Poem — Clayton Eshleman
611 Philadelphia Street Players — Joe Adcock
612 Films — Robert Hatch
612 A Game (poem) — Toby Olson
613 Records — David Hamilton
614 Letter to the Resistance (poem) — Jonathan Schwartz

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209
No. 19

that he is trying to end the war. In the absence of deeds, that faith will not endure.

It is significant, too, that anti-war sentiment is now to be heard among business executives, white-collar workers, and also in the blue-collar sectors. On the West Coast, where employment in the aerospace industry has dropped sharply, most aerospace executives "believe an end to the war in Vietnam would prove a boon to their industry as deferred programs were funded by the Department of Defense" (The New York Times, November 16).

Sketchy as this evidence is, it does indicate that President Nixon is under greater pressure than he supposes. The majority endorse his promises; he has borrowed this support on a moral IOU, and time ran out on that loan when Vietnam became Nixon's war.

Private Line

There is considerably less—and more—than meets the eye in AT&T's recent $150 million reduction in long-distance rates. At first glance, $150 million is a substantial sum. Actually, it is only a shade more than 1 per cent of AT&T's 1968 operating revenues of $14.4 billion—and it is $25 million less than the local rate increases Bell is seeking in New York State alone (in the nation, Bell wants another $202 million in higher local rates).

More important, the reduction package will result in tacit abandonment of the 7-to-7.5 per cent return which the FCC found "appropriate" for AT&T after its 1965-67 rate case: it will increase AT&T's authorized profit to at least 8.5 per cent. Each hike of 0.1 per cent takes another $24 million from phone users' pockets, and the difference between a return of 7 and 8.5 per cent is $360 million. That is a lot of windfall profit even for AT&T.

The 1965-67 rate case was important because it marked the first time since the FCC's founding in 1934 that it had conducted a public inquiry into phone pricing, with outside parties given a chance to challenge Bell's financial policies, and with Bell required to justify them.

But men act behind closed doors as they would not in public. By early 1969, AT&T's swelling volume of business and advancing technology had driven its profits to at least 8.5 per cent, and a 9 per cent return was projected for 1970. So Bell huddled with FCC members and staff for a curious ritual known as "continuous surveillance." The issues were whether to cut Bell back to 7.5 per cent or raise the limit; and what reductions were necessary to blunt the steady rise in profits.

FCC member Nicholas Johnson describes what happened: "Virtually all the information was selected, packaged and presented by Bell—there was no direct case from our staff or outside representatives. . . . The negotiating process depends on the skill and dedication of the negotiators—and a company with a single position faces a multi-member commission with a variety of positions. There are no limits on the lobbying effort by the company—to staff or commissioners—since ex parte rules do not apply."

With only Johnson dissenting, the FCC gave Bell the higher return, cutting rates only far enough to hold Bell to the new 8.5 per cent ceiling. Further, states Johnson, "the content of the FCC majority's press release announcing the 'reduction' was negotiated with Bell officials, who are clearly concerned as much with publicity as with profits."

Johnson calls the decision a "de facto modification without hearing of the commission's 1967 order." Courts have held that no legal redress is available for decisions reached under the "continuous surveillance" system, since there are no adversary parties. But, as Johnson suggests, "the fact that the commission recently made an on-the-record determination, and now changes it without hearing, may present a different legal situation." Representative Bingham (D., N.Y.) is looking into possible legal action to block implementation of an agreement he calls an "outrageous deception."

In other words, the time is ripe for an outside party—such as the New York City Consumer Affairs Department, which is well staffed and well financed, and which was denied an opportunity to participate in the 1969 closed-door meetings—to go into court and demand that the FCC set phone rates in public, and not in cozy privacy with AT&T officials.

Bombs, Bombs Everywhere

The United States is pockmarked with bombs and missile warheads. The TNT variety was bad enough, but old-fashioned "high" explosives are used nowadays only in little wars like the one in Vietnam. By all indications some 40,000 nuclear bombs are stored or deployed in the territorial United States alone. Despite Pentagon reassurances, this awesome arsenal presents a clear and present danger not only to the nations on whose cities and atomic plants the missiles are targeted but to the people of the United States. That is one more reason for hoping that the SALT negotiations may succeed in curbing the nuclear arms race.

The facts are detailed in an article in the December True: "Is There an A-Bomb in Your Backyard?" by Stuart Loory of the Los Angeles Times bureau in Washington. Loory made a cross-country tour, studied the unclassified literature, and interviewed armed service and Atomic Energy Commission public-information officers who, as one would expect, gave him precious little information. He came up with a count of at least 100 localities in this country where nuclear weapons are made, stored, maintained, tested or deployed. At one of these, the Manzano storage depot just outside Albuquerque, Loory believes there are enough nuclear explosives to annihilate all life on the planet. At Goose Creek, S.C., near Charleston, an accidental explosion would take out not only all of South Carolina but also portions of North Carolina and Georgia. If the Earle Naval Ammunition Depot in New Jersey went up, nothing much would be left of metropolitan New York. The situation is the same for most of the other centers of population and industry.

The Pentagon would have us believe that the risk of accidental explosion is "essentially nil." It is true that while there have been a good many accidents involving nuclear devices, the nuclear material has never been detonated unintentionally. From this record, however, one cannot assume that the hazard is of the order of one chance in a billion, a million, or even one in ten thousand. Back in 1960, some members of the Mershon Center for Education in National Security at Ohio State University published a carefully researched monograph: "Accidental Wars: Some Dangers in the 1960s." They concluded that the chance of an accidental nuclear explosion in the ensuing decade was approximately 1 per cent. Those odds have been good enough to date, but will they continue so into the 1970s, with ever more bombs being added to the arsenal? The risk of accidental explosion of one of our bombs may be greater than that of enemy attack.

An aspect of this insanity that Loory does not discuss is that much of the activity is completely useless. For instance, the Army is proud of the fact that its Nike-Hercules system, involving seventy-five sites with a total of hundreds of missiles, is on a full wartime footing twenty-four hours a day, 365 days in the year. Each missile carries or can carry a warhead of Hiroshima size. But this is an anti-aircraft system, and the chances of China or the Soviet Union launching aircraft against us really are "essentially nil."

Six Bomarc missile sites, likewise for defense against aircraft, are located near military bases and at two civilian airports. A Bomarc started to launch itself in 1960 while the crew were eating. The men were able to reach the missile in time to abort the launch. It was later conjectured by an informed observer that a combination of passing police cars and a tune played by a local disk jockey had combined into an electronic jumble that fed into the Bomarc's computer as a firing signal.

A bomber carrying two 24-megaton nuclear bombs crashed near Goldsboro, N.C., after jettisoning one of the bombs, which was equipped with the usual six safety locks. After the impact, four of these were found to be in the "go" position. Ralph Lapp, an expert on nuclear weapons, says that five were actually in the "go" position. If so, only a single safety lock stood between the people of North Carolina and catastrophe.

The secrecy surrounding nuclear weaponry is an insult to journalists and to all sensible men. The Atomic Energy Commission spends some $2 billion a year producing nuclear weapons, yet all information regarding the storage depots is supposedly classified; it is even denied that the depots exist. Everybody in Albuquerque knows about the Manzano base, but it was still on the top secret list when Loory was working on his story. And now we are on the way to building another dangerous, fearfully expensive ABM system to supplant or complement Nike-Hercules; there will be more secrecy and more danger.

Poison Bullets–For What?

According to a New York Times story (October 31) by Robert M. Smith, the Army has stockpiled at Pine Bluff Arsenal in Arkansas 20,000 bullets containing the toxin which produces the highly fatal disease, botulism. Rep. Richard D. McCarthy of New York, a specialist in chemical and biological warfare policy, is quoted as saying that in some instances, instead of botulism, bullets stockpiled by the Army will cause anthrax, tularemia, Q-fever and equine encephalitis. Obviously such bullets must have a special purpose. Some two years ago, Latin American publications suggested that the purpose was an improved means of assassination.

That is only a theory, since the whole subject of chemical and biological warfare is shrouded in secrecy, but it is plausible. Both the Vietcong and the U.S. Special Forces in Vietnam are believed to resort to assassination. Our Army press officers and civilian reporters and feature writers tell us this is so of the Vietcong. They do not tell us of the assassinations we perpetrate, but war being war, that would be too much to expect. It is a fact, however, that the first references to U.S. production of poison bullets occurred in 1965, the year in which American combat forces increased by about 800 per cent.

Officially, the Army sternly forbids the use of poison in warfare, but neither does it officially countenance assassination, torture, or the gang-style killing of intelligence agents. For purposes of assassination, disease-bearing bullets would have outstanding advantages. Botulism contracted in the normal way, by ingestion of contaminated food, has a 65 per cent mortality rate in the United States. Introduced via a bullet wound, however slight, the rate might be 100 per cent.

There is no evidence that disease-bearing bullets have as yet been used in Vietnam or anywhere else. But such a weapon would be useful in future Vietnams which, if we are to credit Governor Rockefeller's prognostications, await us in Latin America. To quiet such suspicions, if possible, the Army should tell the American public what use is intended for those 20,000 botulism rounds at Pine Bluff. It probably won't do anything of the kind, but in that case it should not feel aggrieved if people speculate.

One Small Gain

In Washington, D.C., Judge Gerhard A. Gesell has ruled against legal limitation of the right of a woman to obtain an abortion from a licensed doctor. The 68-year-old law was held by the U.S. District Court judge to be too vague in its stipulation that the doctor must prove the woman's health or life to be at stake. Judge Gesell found such a requirement could not survive constitutional scrutiny, and concluded that a defendant could not properly defend himself under it.

Anti-abortion laws, like those which heretofore have forbidden dissemination of birth-control information or devices, had their origins in the doctrinal teaching of powerful religious groups. Under the Constitution, the adherent of any religious faith may expect that the law will not interfere with the performance of his conscientious duties, but it is emphatically not his privilege to demand that the law require those of other faiths, or of none, to observe his particular prohibitions. A woman, as an individual, must enjoy under the law full dominion over her own body. The law has the duty to defend the integrity of the person, not to circumscribe or abridge it.

The worst aspect of the anti-abortion laws is that they operate as class legislation. The well-to-do have always been able to evade or avoid such inroads on their personal freedom: a flight to England where abortion is free, or a psychiatrist's services to bear expert witness to an impending threat to mental health. The woman who is poor, to whom another child may pose a threat of economic as well as physical disaster, is forced to patronize her local quack, operating in septic secrecy. Thousands die each year from such ministrations.

It is long past time that these laws, medieval in their philosophical roots and unconstitutional by nature, be stricken down. Judge Gesell has done what he could, by invalidating them in the District of Columbia and by encouraging appeal to the Supreme Court.

The Disadvantage of Being Poor

The "disadvantaged" is one of our mealy-mouthed euphemisms for the poor. One reason why the poor remain poor is that federal appropriations earmarked for them are often diverted to other uses more to the liking of the bureaucrats involved.

A striking example is the misuse of federal education funds under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Since the act was passed in 1965, Congress has appropriated $4.3 billion under Title I for special assistance to school systems having high concentrations of low-income children. Some educators have challenged the effectiveness of compensatory education, but there is a question whether it has ever been given a fair trial. After a six-month study, the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and the Washington Research Project of the Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy, assert that the funds have largely been "misused, wasted or diverted from the poor in many areas throughout the nation." These charges are contained in an article by John Herbers in the November 9 New York Times.

The allegations are convincing. To begin with, the Office of Education is a timid, old-line organization. Its function is to transfer the funds to state school systems, since Congress has a fetish about "local control" of education. The Office of Education is responsible for checking on the disposition the states make of the funds entrusted to them, but apparently the audits have been so feeble that the states, local boards of education and school officials could get away with almost anything, and they have not been backward in taking advantage of their freedom.

In Jackson, Miss., Title I funds were allocated to an all-white high school to set up a symphony orchestra. In Fresno, Calif., several school districts transferred about $930,000 in Title I funds to build a television system that presumably assisted all the children in the county, when the intent of Title I was specifically to benefit the poor children. In South Carolina and other Southern states Title I money was used to construct buildings and buy equipment that ostensibly would make schools for blacks comparable to those for whites—expenditures that should have come from other sources. Chicago has made a practice of spreading Title I money around to every school having a poverty area, instead of concentrating it in schools having a high degree of poverty. Mrs. Ruby Martin, former director of the Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and now a member of the research project staff, remarked in a press conference: "The number of color television sets in superintendents and principals' offices in Mississippi is outrageous."

It all recalls the situation in California (editorial, "To Him That Hath . . ." The Nation, July 7) where school districts used poverty funds to reduce the price of all school lunches, thereby benefiting middle-class children and their families, but leaving the poor children, who had no money at all, as hungry as they were before the funds were received.

The report presented some thirteen recommendations. The one that should receive top priority is action to recover funds used for purposes other than those clearly falling within the scope of Title I.

Entente Carolina

A lovely alliance between West Germany and South Carolina is described in Strom Thurmond Reports to the People (October 20, Vol. XV, No. 35). The Senator from South Carolina describes a visit from "one of the West's most distinguished statesmen," none other than Dr. Franz Josef Strauss, lame duck finance minister of West Germany. The two eminent statesmen did not come together by accident. Hearing that the University of South Carolina was seeking a speaker of international reputation for the dedication of its new $9 million Coliseum, Senator (also Major General) Thurmond played social secretary. But before that—no doubt again with Senator Thurmond's assistance—South Carolina and West Germany were locked in an embrace which, though as public as a movie star's elopement, has attracted little attention outside the state.

The affection of West Germany for South Carolina, and vice versa, is solidly based. As Mr. Thurmond says, until recently "our state did not receive its due attention on the world scene, but now our merit is recognized." German industry has invested at least $500 million in South Carolina, and by 1976 the sum is expected to rise to $700 million. Chemicals, dyestuffs, steel and metal working are among German-financed industries. At a news conference, Dr. Strauss described the attraction that South Carolina holds for new industry: "the good industrial climate, the fine attitude of the people, and the close cooperation of the leaders." More specifically, cheap labor, freedom from union interference and low taxes.

Dr. Strauss also briefed his South Carolina friends on the necessity of continuing the cold war. The Soviets, he explained, want a divided Europe under their control. To counter the rising Russian menace, the West European nations must unite, so that they can stand as equal partners with the United States. Although the visiting statesman apparently did not mention the Hon. L. Mendel Rivers, such words must have been sweet in his ears.

Presumably the West German-South Carolinian entente has the blessing of the Nixon Administration. Or has Senator Thurmond set up his own state department? Some enterprising reporter might raise that question at the President's next press conference.

'GIVE PEACE A CHANCE'

KENNETH G. GROSS

Mr. Gross, formerly of the New York Post, is the author, with Bernard Lefkowitz, of The Victims (Putnam's), and has completed a new novel, The Reporter, which will be published soon by Harper & Row.

Washington

It was a restless, bone-cold crowd circling and searching for a warm dry spot to rest in the heatless sun beneath the Washington Monument; it was a saintly patient congregation, waiting hours without complaint; it was a bored audience, enduring the labored rote of droning politicians with the same stoic shrug with which they accepted the heartless wind; it was children sharing their last sandwich with a shivering, white-haired couple, then tucking away the older pair within their own blanket; it was hand-lettered placards fighting the breeze: "Vietnam: Love It or Leave It"; "What's A Gnew?"; it was a Maoist, Ho Chi Minh, Che-ite crowd of young students who stepped on American flags with no memory of guilt earlier than Saigon, who flew a huge North Vietnamese flag from one of the poles of the states under the Washington Monument and yet were peculiarly American in their passions.

Sitting too long in the cold sun, under the incessant mash of helicopters, there were ominous rumblings from an incendiary pack of Mad Dogs, Running Dogs, Crazies, Yippies, Weathermen. And then Pete Seeger brought us all together. He had walked from Arlington to the Capitol, past the White House, he told them, carrying on his chest the weight of one dead soldier. He carried it as did the other 40,000 on a cardboard sign strung around his neck. And now he wanted to say something that kept running through his head all through that walk. Of course, when he says "say," he means "sing."

"All we are saying," he sang, "is give peace a chance."

The voice, boosted by the loud-speaker system, jolted the huge crowd silent. They stopped whatever it was they were doing and sat and stood silent. "All we are saying," he sang again and again, "is give peace a chance."

Each time he sang it, it was picked up by more and more people, until it was no longer a song but a common emotion. The great haunting sob broke from half a million throats. There was no one within sight or sound who did not join, holding arms outstretched until they tapered into twin Vs for peace, swaying.

No one sang loud because it was not a loud thing to sing. It was too deeply felt and they were too much on the edge of tears. That poignant, mournful cry, so thunderously hushed, broke through the crustiest defenses and even the numbed reporters and hostile photographers added their voices.

Pete Seeger had discovered why we had all come to Washington. We had all come to sob our hearts out about the war. Half a million voices, no less (the official estimate of a quarter million was too small to be even momentarily credible), and the wind was a terrible sob: "All we are saying, is give peace a chance." Five hundred thousand bodies, like a field of live wheat, swayed in thousands of directions.

It went on for about eight minutes. No one wanted it to stop. The angry Weathermen and their attack force had been surrounded by an anti-body of marshals, who had locked arms for protection but were now swept away by the song; even the Crazies and revolutionaries were prisoners of that song.

"All we are saying, is give peace a chance." It was a pure, crystal moment, and then it was over. And some were ashamed, as some are always ashamed of showing emotion.

The sad, lovely John Lennon tune ended the New Mobilization march, even if there were speeches and scattered incidents thereafter. Couples drifted out of the park still listening to the poignant melody, still marching to the mournful cadence. They wore the sweet, sad smile of people who had nodded at a truth.

It began on Thursday in the rain with the March Against Death. A man appeared at the tent where they were distributing the names and asked for a particular sign. He walked slowly to the darkened White House where he shouted the name. When he reached the Capitol and threw the cardboard bearing the name into the coffin, he said: "That's the last of my son." On Friday, the first violence occurred. A group of militants announced that they were going to serve eviction notice on the South Vietnamese Embassy. A blocking force of police met the few hundred militants at DuPont Circle. The crowd was told to disperse. A single police officer with a bull horn was drowned out when he ordered the group to disperse. And so the police and National Guard began to lob tear gas into the crowd. If there was advance warning, it was lost in the noise.

The kids scattered, choking on the burning gas. A group sought shelter in a nearby hotel. "Shit," said one black youth in a group of half a dozen. "I came all this way and I can't find a jewelry store."

Some of the demonstrators had taken refuge in the circle. Patrolman David Sydney parked his cruiser and started to walk toward the leader. His car was quickly surrounded by hundreds of militants. Sydney calmly asked someone if he could "take out any of the injured."

"Let's kill the pig," someone called. "Let's wreck the police car," urged someone else. Surrounded and trapped in the mass, Sydney listened for half an hour while anarchists debated with Marxists and Weathermen about whether it would be better to kill him or to destroy his cruiser.

Sydney did not appear worried. "O.K.," said the anarchist finally, "you don't want to kill him, you don't have to kill him." So Sydney went back on duty.

The children slept in frozen packs in parks, in cars, in crash pads. Pete Hamill, the New York Post columnist, found nine kids in his hotel room on Saturday morning. One reporter was thrown out of his room by a hotel manager.

On Saturday, the groups began converging on the mall across from the Capitol by daybreak. The marshals began forming by seven and the lines, like spokes, threaded toward the hub of the mall. They were mostly young. But other generations were present. In some groups were veterans of the 1963 March on Washington and of every peace demonstration since. In most, it was the first trip to Washington and the kids were sight-seeing as they went.

Police presence was scattered and not unfriendly. All over Washington, people stirred that morning as if to join a great battle. Breakfasts were gulped down as each side bundled against the day. An army colonel watched the forming crowds with professional concern. "That's a lot of people," he said.

But the colonel had been looking at only one leg of the star and when a reporter nudged him and the officer turned around and saw the main body assembling on the center mall, he was staggered. "Holy shit," he said. And he left to pass along his alarm. The monster crowd began to sense its muscle and it had an exhilarating effect on them.

"Bob," cried someone running across the lawn. There were reunions all across the grounds. The marshals assembling at Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues were firm and determined to avoid violence. Sorry, they told reporters trying to crash the lines. The reporters would bristle and bluster and the marshals would smile and say politely that they were terribly sorry, but they could not make any exceptions and no reporter had ever seen any cop so effective and so pleasant.

Eugene McCarthy made a speech, Mayor Washington paid his respects, and the great march sputtered and started. Muffled drums set the pace, recalling, as was intended, the dreadful funeral of John Kennedy. Silent marchers, listening to the drum rolls, huge rivers of people flowing into the tail, city police awed by the dignity and control. They had lined up hundreds of buses to block off the White House against any impulsive charge. But the marchers drummed by and only the obscene bitching of the press corps intruded. And the television crews covered lightly, as if it were a Fourth of July march, now that they had been chastened by Spiro.

By the time the march reached the Washington Monument grounds, thousands were already waiting. The line of marchers, thirty abreast, moved along and up and reached the rise and sighted the waiting crowds. It was a recognition between two great armies. The chests leaped at seeing each other. The marchers came across the grounds in unbroken ranks, holding their banners and heads high. The field was bracketed by helicopters. Police and army helicopters made low repeated passes and some of the youths saluted with a modified V, using only the single middle finger.

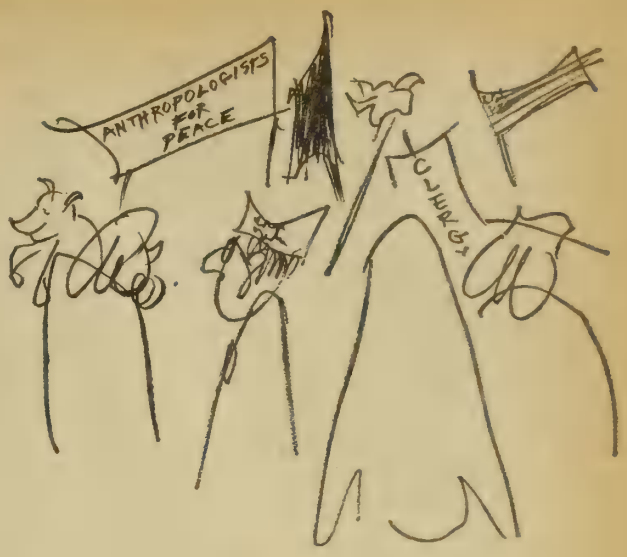
The first contingents arrived at about 11:30, and it took three hours for the rest of the crowds to enter. At first, one would look around and see that the crowd had reached a low hill 100 yards away and that was impressive. Then, one looked around and the Washington Monument had been surrounded. It dwarfed Woodstock or any past memory.

Button salesmen gave up trying to hawk. The crowds were too thick to walk among. They carried signs: Junkies for Peace"; "Let's Beat Nixon into a Ploughshare"; "Spiro My Hero." A young man shared a bottle of wine and a piece of cheese with a young girl. A couple made love under a thick blanket. A child became lost and was passed lovingly to a recovery area. A voice from the loud-speaker tower down in the valley: "Children, stay with your parents or come up here to Dr. Spock."



The crowds never shouted their impatience. "Peace Now," they chanted at one point. The lines outside the Johnny-on-the-spot portable toilets were patient and full of humor. "That line's gotten shorter," a husband told his wife, who had waited an hour outside one toilet. "O.K.," she replied, "I'll go again."

A youth came along carrying a sign supporting Nixon. "Oh, my God," he said, seeing the size of the crowd and threw away his sign. David Stringer, 22, a service station attendant, carried his sign supporting Nixon unmolested. "I'm surprised at the gentleness," he said. "Yes, frankly, I'm surprised."

Seeing him talking to a reporter, a group of demonstrators surrounded the reporter. "Sure, he eats that stuff up," one youth said. "The press looks for one lone dissenter and eats that stuff up." And the dissident dissidents did not recognize the strange similarity between their position and Agnew's.

In the afternoon, when the breath had gone out of the assembly at the Washington Monument, some drifted toward shopping areas. Troops were stashed in a dozen buildings along the way and the passers-by peered through the closed gates at the exhibit within. The Smithsonian Institution, however, became a temporary crash pad. The dull, sterile halls were filled with noisy, laughing kids, exploring exhibits. Antiseptic guards stared in astonishment as the youngsters camped out in the hallways, on the stairs, eating sandwiches, enjoying one another.

Across the street, tension was growing at the Justice Department building, target of David Dellinger and other militants. Down Constitution Avenue came a marching army of 5,000 yelling, "Free Huey Newton, free Bobby Seale." They carried Vietcong flags, banners, celebrations to Mao, clenched Black Power fists. They came east as far as Ninth Street, where a string of a dozen white-helmeted cops barred the way. An inspector, in a soft Southern drawl explained that here was where the parade permit ended. So now the militants had to decide if they were going to crash the line. O.K., said the cop, you can go on if you want, and the appearance of victory obscured the fact that the militants had been had, for the cops were eager to have them continue east and dissipate their anger in endless marching.

But the real militants were not fooled. They stayed and soon were joined by a main group carrying 8-foot plaster replicas of Agnew and Nixon and Attorney General Mitchell. Those Washington cops just watched it grow. Chief of Police Jerry Wilson walked with the crowd circling the Justice Department. He is tall and bobbed above the shorter demonstrators. He carried a walkie-talkie and when the voice at the other end kept asking if he needed help, cool Jerry Wilson said no thanks, things were all right.

A few demonstrators lowered the American flag outside the Justice Department. They had half raised a Vietcong flag in its place when a black police lieutenant led a squad of six men through thousands of hostile militants. The lieutenant, his face a fury of outrage, held off the militants while his men replaced the American flag.

Then rocks and bottles started flying. "Oh, no," cried a marshal. Soon, dozens of protest marshals stood on a low wall outside the Justice Department, their arms raised in living crucifix poses, their fingers stabbing into a peace V.

One or two of the marshals were struck by missiles but remained at their posts, bleeding from head wounds, still trying to halt the barrage with their bodies. "Peace. Peace. Peace," they chanted.

A young girl wearing a scarf over her nose and mouth came charging up and threw a Coke bottle at the champing marshals. "You've been selling that shit for three days," she yelled. One bloodied marshal began to sing: "All we are saying, is give peace a chance." His voice was drowned.

"We're gonna kill you," one clenched-fisted militant screamed into the face of Police Chief Wilson, who blandly turned away. Wilson walked back and forth, trailed by a pack of reporters and television crews, staring somewhere in the distance, past the threatening militants and microphones.

Perhaps 100 implacable extremists in the crowd were throwing things. The others would not endanger their marshals.

Jerry Wilson, hit with mud, kept urging the demonstrators to stop throwing missiles or they would be dispersed, but again the words were shouted into a wall of wind. Finally, Wilson had had enough and he lobbed a tear-gas canister. Soon, other police were lobbing tear gas. And the crowds lost their fight.

There was scattered looting and window smashing throughout Washington that night. But that was the work of only the handful of militants. The others went home listening to the memory of Pete Seeger and their own voices, a force more potent than anything unleashed by the militants.

RETOOLING A PARTY

The Democrats Confront 1970

CALIFORNIA

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

If the New Politics in California can be defined at all at the end of the 1960s, it must be as a politics of unhappiness and sullen apprehension. With not much of anything resembling an organization or leadership, New Politics is an impulse—nothing more—but it is a potentially powerful force awaiting a leader to mobilize the disaffected in this state of nearly 20 million.

The big city ghettos are smoldering, the Mexican-Americans are rapidly moving toward assertive political consciousness, and white workers living on the edges of the ghettos are fearful and angry. The white poor sense that they are forgotten, students and intellectuals are alienated, and middle America, where the power lies, is caught between high taxes and inflation, and feels surrounded and trapped. Only the rich and their managers and the professionals are happy; they should be, for the country is being run their way.

An exaggeration? Perhaps; but not much.

For the New Politics to take hold in California, its leaders, whenever they appear, must offer a plausible redefinition of society's goals and a workable program for restructuring private and public institutions that have not responded to obvious needs. But first, or simultaneously, the venom that is poisoning all the political processes in this country must be removed. President Nixon's speech of November 3, the very model of the old politics, is guaranteed to inflame the entire anti-war movement—whatever support it wins from the "silent Americans." The depth of bitter sentiment which the President's devious presentation of the Vietnamese problem aroused in California is suggested by the comment of the state's moderately liberal Sen. Alan Cranston: "The end of American bleeding and dying in Vietnam is not in sight."

When the war is ended, the fever in the country will decline, but the problems that have accumulated since 1945 will not dissolve, and new approaches, under whatever name, will be required. California will offer as good a chance for the New Politics to catch on as will any state in the country. Thoroughly defeated by Ronald Reagan in 1966 and by Nixon last year, the Democratic Party seems generally receptive to new ideas. Edmund G. Brown, the former governor, talks of "the new political leadership that is necessary to reconcile America to changes that have to come. Robert Kennedy got the steelworkers, the farmers, the blacks and the young to vote for him, but nobody else seems able to achieve this." Brown is working with an organization of young voters called "The Wild Ones," and has encountered the usual suspicion. "Anyone over 30," he says, "who has been in politics is not only old but, by definition to most of these youngsters, is 'old and corrupt.' "

Paul Posner, the Democratic chairman of Los Angeles County, would like to bring all the "dissidents" into the party. "I have been trying to locate the New Politics but," he confesses, "I can find neither the movement nor its leaders." Stephen Reinhardt, Democratic national committeeman, suggests that the "movement" may remain outside the scope of electoral politics, operating instead as a pressure group on the parties. Many activists believe that party politics is dead, that the politics of confrontation is more important. Who can say they are altogether wrong? "They tried it at the Democratic convention," Reinhardt says, "and while they lost there, they really won in the country. Everybody is against the war now. Maybe next year the kids will be picketing the automobile plants against smog."

Martin Stone, a young businessman who was active in Eugene McCarthy's campaign, welcomes the New Politics. He feels that "California Democrats are moving to the left. The vast majority of activists, those people not holding any title in the party, are on the liberal side, and the anti-war sentiment is so strong that Johnson couldn't get 5 per cent of a primary vote in this state today." Stone added optimistically: "California is not a reactionary state. Reagan and Sen. George Murphy won, but they won because they came across on television as moderates."

Of the state's political leaders in office, Jess Unruh, former Speaker of the state Assembly and now Assembly minority leader, may be the first candidate with a New Politics appeal. Since last spring's primaries, when he supported Robert Kennedy, and especially since the Chicago convention, where he led the anti-Humphrey-Johnson, anti-war California delegation, Unruh has been steadily shedding his old image as the pragmatic political boss. In theory and practice, he probably is the most competent officeholder in California today and, at 47, is itching to take on the 58-year-old Reagan next year. Writing in The Nation (February 17), Unruh said: "The ability to inspire confidence, and to justify it by dealing openly and honestly, free of commitments and traditional doctrine, is at the heart of that amorphous body of theory, the New Politics."

If Unruh runs against Reagan, that "amorphous body of theory" will get its biggest test in the nation's biggest state. Many elements of the New Politics supported the attempt by City Councilman Tom Bradley to unseat Mayor Sam Yorty last spring in Los Angeles. The effort failed, but it was successful enough to lay the groundwork for future campaigns with similar goals.

A hint, but no more than that, of the New Politics surfaced at a recent session of Democratic Party leaders in Fresno. A black and brown caucus demanded a large role in party affairs and sought 30 per cent of the state central committee's annual budget "to establish and maintain a continuous political operation." In contrast to similar conferences during the Johnson years, no justification of the war in Vietnam came from any quarter at Fresno.

Democrats met at Fresno to try to devise ways of regaining control of the state legislature, now narrowly held by the Republicans. The issue is important enough. The party that controls the legislature in 1970 will reapportion the state, and the new political boundary lines will go far toward setting the political balance in California for the next decade.

Some proponents of the New Politics, with their apocalyptic visions or their fascination with charismatic political leaders, totally reject or disdain the drudgery and boredom that make up so large a part of practical politics. If proponents of the New Politics aren't prepared for the long haul of a decade or more, their visions of a new society will become daydreams. If they persist in seeing no difference between Pat Brown and Ronald Reagan, they may find a gulf between them and youngsters of college age in California next year. University of California administrators have closed enrollment at UCLA for the 1970 fall term, and the state college system announces that 10,000 to 25,000 students may have to be turned away next year. That is a difference.

ILLINOIS

DON ROSE and DAVID S. CANTER

The Messrs. Rose and Canter are co-publishers of Hyde Park-Kenwood Voices, a monthly newspaper in Chicago. They have long been active as publicists in Cook County political movements.

Chicago

The fledgling Democratic reform movement in Illinois, which a year ago looked as though it might get off the ground, is dying of suffocation in the warm, fleshy, jovial embrace of Mayor Richard J. Daley of Chicago. Cooptation is what it is called, and it is a game played extremely well by the Mayor and one of his chief tempters, University of Chicago history Prof. Richard C. Wade.

Wade is Daley's oar in liberal waters. He does a splendid job of keeping independent-minded Democrats inside the party, preventing some campaigns from becoming too strongly anti-Daley and, where he can, avoiding Daley gaffes. However, Wade would not be so seductive, if there were not those within the reform Democratic movement ready to be seduced. Moreover, with the exception of the long-established Independent Voters of Illinois (IVI), the reform groups suffer from political inexperience and have made a couple of big mistakes to offset recent "instant politics" successes. They are, nevertheless, a vital movement at the grass roots, increasing both in numbers and in the tough, unglamorous doorbell-pushing activity. They understand how to win elections, as demonstrated by six stunning victories in the November 18 Constitutional Convention election.

The reformist groupings represent several tendencies —not all of which are influenced by Wade, a Kennedy-McGovern operative. In fact, Wade is trying to block the attempt of State Treasurer Adlai E. Stevenson III to gain Daley's endorsement in the race for the Senate seat of the late Everett Dirksen. Stevenson appears to be the reform favorite, although he recently outraged many of his back-ers by supporting the Chicago police force and by toadying shamelessly for Daley's support.

Stevenson, who cannot succeed himself as state treasurer, became a hero to the liberal-reform forces in recent years by criticizing the party and its ruler as "feudal," endorsing a few independent aldermanic candidates, and aiding the black movement here through Operation Breadbasket. He has been considered the focal point for opposition to Daley, who failed to sell other party leaders on Stevenson for the Senate in 1968, because of some mild statements the latter made in opposition to the Vietnamese War.

But Stevenson has been strangely reluctant really to challenge the Mayor—hoping, no doubt, that Daley will support him against even more hostile forces within the machine. Stevenson was the first respectable liberal to come out for Humphrey before the convention last year—preceding and perhaps anticipating Daley's move. It is said that he was driven to act precipitously in reaction to the nagging of Wade, who was pushing hard for Robert Kennedy at that point. Wade now supports former Atty. Gen. William Clark for the Dirksen seat. Clark was the 1968 candidate against the late Republican, running surprisingly well and on an even more surprising anti-war platform. A young man of the old school, Clark had been generally regarded as a hack, but became a leading dove during the convention and split with Daley to endorse Sen. George McGovern for the Presidency. Wade, a good McGovern man, is repaying the favor.

Wade also set up a visit Daley made to a party thrown on the Stevenson Libertyville, Ill., farm several months ago. The event, now known widely as the Libertyville Love-In—and to some as the independents' Appomattox—was sponsored by the Committee on Illinois Government (CIG), a reform group often mildly at odds with Daley.

McGovern was the main speaker, and the big question beforehand was whether Daley would show up. The odds were considered long. But show up he did, with a Wade-written call for unity, saying that the party was big enough for everybody. That was the first big public hint of the seduction of Adlai III. For the Love-In call for unity overlooked any question of justice—or any consideration that genuine issues separated Daley and his machine from liberals, progressives, the young, the black and the poor.

Despite a few demurring press releases, the Independent Democratic Coalition (IDC), local affiliate of the national New Democratic Coalition, came out in support of Stevenson's Senatorial bid, and was really trapped when Adlai III extolled the police, sidled up to the Mayor, and hinted that the party should forgo an open primary and support him.

Interviews with the IDC and conversations with officers and rank-and-filers of the CIG and IVI produced heavy vituperation of Stevenson, charges of "sell-out" and others less printable. He was also chastised at his own campaign committee meetings. But these groups will certainly continue to support him because, as they have said so many times in the past, they have no one else.

Another serious contender for the Senate seat—even stronger than Clark—is a young downstate Illinois Senator, Alan Dixon, who would have fine liberal credentials under most circumstances. But Dixon, who has in the past split with Daley's legislative program, is the candidate of Secretary of State Paul Powell, the second most powerful Democrat in Illinois and anathema to reformers. The Powell-Dixon bid could succeed, because Stevenson is not popular with the thousands of cogs in the patronage machine, and Daley may have a hard time putting him across. Also mentioned for the seat—after a recent "non-political" visit with Daley—is Ambassador R. Sargent Shriver, who still retains a Chicago voting address.

There is also a slim chance that an "open primary" will be held, with the machine making no endorsement. The slate makers were to meet late in November to make a decision. In any event, Illinois will have a fairly liberal Democratic candidate who can be expected to buck Daley—slightly—at times. Stevenson or Shriver could beat the incumbent appointee, Ralph Smith; Dixon would be less likely to do so.

The primary elections offer a few other possibilities for independent reformers who are less in need of Daley's tender loving care. The militant Gus Savage, a black newspaper publisher, might defeat the machine choice for the seat being vacated by 71-year-old Rep. William Murphy in the increasingly black Southwest Chicago 3rd Congressional District. Savage, who was badly beaten by Murphy last year, suffered from inadequate organization and a very low black turn-out in the period of demoralization following the King and Kennedy killings. He has spent the past eighteen months rebuilding his organization. The Democrats will probably replace Murphy with another white, fearing that if a black were put up he would lose the district in the general election.

That district is fascinating, from black poverty areas to mid-income black home owners, from the most racist white working-class wards to elegant upper-middle-class neighborhoods and suburbs. One unusual circumstance is that it may disappear after the 1970 reapportionment, and Daley may just decide to permit an open primary in response to black demands.

There could also be a reform bid in the 1st Congressional District, bastion of the aging, ailing Rep. William Dawson, long-time black boss of the city. The old man has announced his retirement and will probably be replaced by one or another of the Uncle Tom aldermen. A reform bid by one of the independent black aldermen, such as Fred Hubbard or A. A. "Sammy" Rayner, both of whom have challenged Dawson before and lost, will again be doomed to failure. The necessary political groundwork has not been done and only if there is a split in the black machine—an outside chance—could an independent squeak through.

In sum, despite increased interest, especially on the North Lakefront, the reformist element is not likely to make much headway in the coming year. Savage and Rayner, along with a handful of black and white aldermen and state representatives, are genuine independents who will not let ambition compromise them, but too many of the others are willing to cuddle up to Daley—or permit themselves to be seduced and guided by persons such as Wade, who hold out the Mayor's endorsement to those who don't fight too hard.

A state representative seat on the North Side may fall to a reformer in the 1970 primary, and some aldermanic seats will be won in 1971, as we wrote in these pages in September. But the reform thrust in Illinois, which is lively at the grass-roots level only in Chicago, is stymied by lack of genuine leadership, coupled with deft castrations performed by the surgeons of the old politics.

NEW YORK

JEROME WILSON
Mr. Wilson is state correspondent for WCBS-TV News and reports on state and city politics in New York.

New York City

The Lindsay victory has smashed the Democratic Party in New York State. Even before Procaccino's defeat, the party had been split—old line versus reform—but the two wings were still elements of a single party. Robert Wagner had brought them together in his last term, and in 1965, when Lindsay first ran, reform Democrats paid at least lip service to the party's regular nominee, Abraham Beame.

But so many reform Democrats endorsed the Mayor during his second-term campaign that the news was those who didn't. Even Wagner, a perennial fence straddler, came out for Lindsay—characteristically, on Election Day. Not only the party elite deserted the ragged Procaccino cause—Mrs. Lehman, for example, and the group that had been close to Robert Kennedy—but also whole components of the city's basic Democratic vote. Black voters have very strong Democratic voting habits; in 1965, even despite his identification with civil rights, John Lindsay attracted only 38 per cent of the vote in sample black districts, and that was considered an achievement. This year, Procaccino polled 13 per cent in black districts,* and Lindsay walked off with a staggering 80 per cent.

If anything, party loyalty among Puerto Ricans is still greater; local Democratic candidates in Puerto Rican areas consistently win by 10-to-1 margins. But even though he was endorsed by the city's leading Spanish daily, Procaccino could take only 27 per cent of that vote, Lindsay receiving 64 per cent. Among Italian-Americans, a group becoming increasingly distant from city Democrats, Procaccino scrambled for a 40-to-43 per cent split with Republican-Conservative candidate John Marchi, and he ran a 44-to-44 per cent dead heat with Lindsay in Jewish districts. Only in the lower-income Jewish areas did the Democratic candidate match Abraham Beame's record of four years ago.

The day after election, confessing his true ideological position, Procaccino charged that Marchi had been the "spoiler," that the Republican-Conservative had robbed him of the vote that was rightfully his. Many observers felt, however, that Procaccino lost because of his dismal showing among blacks and Puerto Ricans, because he never reached out for the majority that voted for other candidates in the Democratic primary, and because the Kennedy and McCarthy Democrats rejected him.

All of this provides the Democrats in New York with something less than a springboard to glory. The party hasn't elected a New York governor since Averell Harriman in 1954; it hasn't sent a Senator to Washington since Robert Kennedy in 1964; it has lost the last two city elections in a row. Nevertheless, it must find a candidate for governor and for U.S. Senator next year.

One of its first problems is leadership. The ranking city official in the party is comptroller-elect Abraham Beame. At the state level is comptroller Arthur Levitt, who was Carmine DeSapio's candidate for mayor back in 1961, and who since his defeat by Wagner, has busied himself with state fiscal affairs. Beame is expected to follow the Levitt example of alloting little time to party politics.

Both the Democratic minority leaders of the state legislature endorsed Procaccino, and it is doubtful that either will be looked to for statewide leadership, although the Assembly minority leader, Stanley Steingut, does have de facto command of the one county organization that "delivered" for the candidate.

Then should Lindsay run the state Democratic Party? For the present, at least, he prefers to remain a Republican. Even so, Democratic State Chairman John Burns acknowledged recently that the Mayor will have a say as to whom the Democrats nominate for governor and Senator. Furthermore, should former UN Ambassador Arthur Goldberg run for governor, he might even get the endosement of the fusion mayor. Goldberg, after all, endorsed Lindsay at a crucial time in the campaign, while Republican Governor Rockefeller said nothing on the Mayor's behalf after he lost the Republican primary.

If Mr. Goldberg does aim for Albany (there has been much talk about his running for the Senate), then by the traditional standards of ticket balancing, a non-Jewish, non-New York City candidate would be preferred for the Senate. The party's 1968 Senate nominee, Paul O'Dwyer, has the first qualification, but he is definitely of the city. Rep. Jonathan Bingham of the Bronx is in the same boat, and Rep. Richard Ottinger, the conservation spokesman from Westchester, misses on the religious score.

So where might the Democrats find a likely Senatorial candidate if Goldberg runs for the big power job, the governorship? One suggestion, outlandish on its face, is the present Republican U.S. Sen. Charles Goodell. Except that he is registered in the wrong party, Goodell has many of the credentials. He is from upstate (with the added advantage that he is saying what city Democrats who supported Lindsay want to hear on the war, the ABM and the cities), he is a Protestant, he endorsed John Lindsay after the Republican primary voters rejected him and could anticipate a Lindsay favor in return. And a crucial factor in speculation about a new political home for Goodell is that his own party rejects him, as it did Lindsay.

That, then, is the condition of New York's devastated

* All percentages based on the WCBS-TV News Election Estimate, November 4, 1969.

Democratic Party. Its strongest choice for governor—Goldberg—descends from the national scene. One possibility for the Senate—Goodell—isn't even registered in the party. Finally, New York City's Liberal-Independent Mayor has what amounts to a veto power over both designations. The strength of this veto stems both from Lindsay's shattering inroads into traditional Democratic voting strength, making him a major factor in his own right in the Democratic Party, and from the fact that any Democrat running statewide next year must have the co-nomination of the state's Liberal Party to win. Lindsay won reelection with more than 800,000 votes on the Liberal line, and the Mayor and the Liberals will be thinking as one.

The above considerations, if they are indeed recognized by the state's Democrats, would finally put an end to the Tammany principle that a politician must work his way up through the ranks of the party, as did Procaccino—and Al Smith, Robert Wagner, Sr., and, one might add, Jimmy Walker, before him. If this old road is at last abandoned, if the Procaccino candidacy was the last of its kind, the Democrats will perhaps have a chance to challenge the Republican hegemony, and create a two-party system once again in New York.

MICHIGAN

DOUGLAS CRASE

Mr. Crase, currently enrolled in the University of Michigan Law School, is a graduate of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University. His thesis at the Woodrow Wilson School was The Politics of Frustration, a study of Michigan's political system.

Ann Arbor

Just two years ago Zolton Ferency resigned as chairman of the Michigan Democratic Party, following his anti-war statements, and his suggestion that Lyndon Johnson be replaced as the party's nominee. Now the portraits of Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey which hang in the offices of the current state chairman, James McNeely, look down on stacks of blue and white bumper stickers left over from the moratorium—"Work for Peace: October 15."

With Nixon in the White House a lot of Democratic regulars here recovered their liberalism without the slightest memory of 1968 to embarrass them. But the scores of McCarthy insurgents, who last year swept into control of some 30 per cent of the votes at state party conventions, are less eager to forget 1968. There is now the potential for a strong, even controlling liberal-Left coalition in the Michigan party. What happens next depends on the willingness of liberal regulars (largely Kennedy supporters) and last year's insurgents (mostly McCarthy supporters and now members of Michigan's New Democratic Coalition, NDC) to educate each other about 1968 without ego feuds that serve no political purpose.

The Detroit election in November indicates the internal state of the party. The vote did not show, as some are saying, that racism will no longer cast the winning ballots in Detroit. Roman Gribbs, son of Polish immigrants and sheriff of uptight Wayne County, gently law and ordered his way past Richard Austin, black county auditor, to become mayor of this racially polarized city. The election seemed to rise above racism because Gribbs so nearly lost, outpolling his black rival by about 7,500 of the more than half a million votes cast. The real point, however, is that the sheriff beat an opponent whose qualifications, aside from color, were so obviously superior. The Alliance for Labor Action (UAW and Teamsters) campaigned mightily for Austin; the Detroit Free Press urged his election. Even Mayor Orville Hubbard of neighboring Dearborn, one of the most guarded of America's all-white communities, endorsed Detroit's first black candidate for mayor. Sheriff Gribbs, said Hubbard, did not come close to matching Austin's qualifications for the job. The deciding factor was race.

But, as Austin later said, the election was "not an inglorious defeat." It demonstrated what a broadly based liberal coalition might do in Michigan, even in the face of racism. An alliance among some local Democratic organizations, the UAW, local NDC chapters, the slowly unified black community and Democratic officeholders nearly won the campaign. Rep. John Conyers, Jr., an NDC member, owes his office to a bitter 1964 primary victory over Austin, backed by the UAW. Conyers campaigned for Austin throughout the mayoralty campaign, and persuaded Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., to come to Detroit on the candidate's behalf. The UAW worked so effectively with white union men that Austin took nearly one-fifth the white vote, twice the 9 per cent he won in the September primary. Voter turn-out, 68 per cent, was the highest in city election history. The average in black precincts was 70 per cent, surpassed only in 1964's defeat of Barry Goldwater.

The real victories came in the citywide elections for the nine-man Common Council. Voters swept in a 6-to-3 liberal (nonpartisan) majority, gave the five highest totals to (Democratic) liberals, and elected three black councilmen—one of whom became the first black to win more than 50 per cent of the votes in any Detroit city election. In these less symbolic campaigns, where the spotlight was not on color, the liberal coalition worked.

However, Detroit illustrates the dilemma of the Michigan NDC. It is difficult to maintain an insurgent liberalism when many party regulars suddenly stop acting like the party of death. Party Chairman McNeely chaired the Michigan Stop ABM Committee this year. During the moratorium, NDC leaders had to share campus platforms with regular officeholders who in times past were scandalized by dissent. Organization liberals also responded quickly to insurgent pressures for internal party reform. The Democratic Central Committee created a reform group, the Haber Commission, whose November report (not released at this writing) is expected to recommend sweeping changes in party structure, election laws and Presidential nominating procedures.

With its enemies refusing to fight, the NDC is in serious trouble. The Coalition has been somewhat schizophrenic from the beginning, a composite of activists indigenous to New Politics movements, and leaders who were often former regulars harboring grudges against an organization that had disappointed their ambitions. As a result, the Coalition could never make up its mind—was it a liberal pressure group, whose purpose was to educate a new constituency and force the party to the left? Or was it the new Democratic Party, whose object was to kick all the rascals out and honor the issues from a position of power? When the issue was Vietnam, and the regular party was intransigent, there was no conflict between the two objectives. Now, however, the requirements may be quite different.

With increasing frequency, NDC activities are little more than intra-party maneuvers indistinguishable from those of any other faction. Without issues for cement, the Coalition is having trouble holding itself together in the power game. Opposing factions proposed separate slates for the new NDC posts on the state party's board, and split the Coalition's vote for state party chairman at the spring Democratic convention. Otto Feinstein, former McCarthy chairman and executive secretary of the NDC, disappeared from state politics after another leadership squabble which left Al Fishman and others from the old Michigan Conference of Concerned Democrats in control. In 1970, there are likely to be at least two gubernatorial candidates with Coalition ties. The most prominent are Zolton Ferency and state Sen. Roger Craig, with former Detroit Mayor Jerome Cavanagh a possibility. As of now, there is no way that an NDC convention could endorse any one of these names without tearing itself part.

The greatest danger to the NDC is that its leaders cannot play the power game without making decisions in the old politics manner. Gubernatorial candidate Craig, for example, identified himself early this year with a campaign for a district Presidential primary in Michigan. NDC chiefs, eager to boost Craig's candidacy, won endorsement of the district primary idea from a poorly attended and totally unprepared meeting of the state Coalition. The action was premature, since several prominent NDC members were serving on the Haber Commission which was considering a primary much more advantageous to minorities. Many members were offended by the way their organization had been publicly boxed in, and the district primary never caught the enthusiasm of the public or Coalition members themselves.

The Coalition's voting strength in the party could be used to force liberal regulars into progressive alliances on many crucial issues without destroying NDC autonomy. This is especially possible because the old guard is deserting the party's moderate-liberal leadership. Many conservative Detroit Democrats supported Gribbs. They largely boycotted the Haber Reform Commission, the success of whose recommendations now depends on a coalition of NDC and regular liberals. Secretary of State James Hare, a long-time Democratic hack, recently withheld $50,000 in patronage funds from party Chairman McNeely. The liberal regulars are discovering that they need the NDC Left, but the Coalition leadership, engaged in a power struggle with all Democratic regulars, may prove too inflexible to take advantage of the new situation they helped to create.

The real test will come in the 1970 campaign for governor. Republican Gov. William Milliken is not invincible. A strong Democratic ticket (U.S. Sen. Philip Hart will also be running for re-election) could carry the state, and must do so to prevent a Republican legislature from controlling the decennial Congressional and legislative redistricting. However, a divisive Democratic primary is in prospect. Of six possible candidates, four—Cavanagh, Craig, Ferency and state Senate Minority Leader Sandy Levin—are from the liberal-left wing of the party. Levin and Cavanagh were Kennedy supporters last year; Craig and Ferency, both closely tied to NDC, were for McCarthy. The fifth, state Atty. Gen. Frank Kelley, a Kennedy supporter who voted for Humphrey, is the favorite but prefers to wait and run for the U.S. Senate in 1972. The sixth is Wayne County prosecutor William Cahalan, an outside chance who would appeal to the party's old guard.

The most likely primary contest will pit Levin against Craig or Cavanagh, or both, and it could be a disaster for Michigan's liberals. Any of the three, Craig, Cavanagh or Levin, should provide a satisfactory campaign around which to rally liberals, as Austin's campaign did in Detroit. But liberal regulars and New Democrats alike have failed to learn the lessons of 1968 that liberal constituencies across the state care little for the party's internal struggles and factional jealousies. Unless that lesson sinks home by 1970, the possibility of a new liberalism in Michigan is sure to be destroyed in the recriminations about who did what in 1968, and who supported whom, when.

OHIO

GENE I. MAEROFF
Mr. Maeroff is an editorial writer on the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Cleveland

Ohio's Democratic Party makes up in diversity for what it lacks in strength. In what other state are a millionaire businessman, a former college English professor and a retired astronaut vying for favor? The 1970 stakes include the governorship and a seat in the United States Senate.

Howard M. Metzenbaum, who made a fortune from a string of parking lots, was the campaign manager for Sen. Stephen M. Young in both of his successful races. He thinks he should now be given a chance to succeed the 80-year-old veteran, who has announced his retirement. John J. Gilligan, who would like to give speeches in the U.S. Senate rather than teach poetry at Xavier University, became known around the state during an unsuccessful bid for the Senate last year. He wants to try again. John Glenn, the first American to orbit the earth, is the best known of the Democrats who want the job, but he has the fewest backers and the least money behind him. He admits that his candidacy is in danger of dying well before the May primary.

Were there a strong central party organization in Ohio it could perhaps dictate who should be the Democratic nominee. But the party is weak, not having put a governor in office since 1958 and having lost a seat in the Senate to the Republicans last year, and control is somewhere in transition between the old guard and the new. The state chairman, Eugene P. O'Grady, has managed to keep a foot in each camp, but the dexterity does not guarantee harmony because the new guard is split between McCarthyites and Kennedyites.

Metzenbaum, age 52, is a former state legislator with impeccable liberal credentials. An early Robert Kennedy backer, he switched after the assassination to George S. McGovern. The small but active Democratic faction that supported McCarthy has never forgiven him. Their darling is Gilligan, who also has a staunch ally in O'Grady. The chairman convinced the party and labor to invest huge sums in Gilligan's unsuccessful attempt to wrest the nomination from Frank J. Lausche last year.

A number of minor characters are mentioned as possibilities for the gubernatorial nomination. One of them is former Gov. Michael V. DiSalle, now a Washington lawyer, who wants desperately to get back into Ohio politics. Another is Lausche, five times governor before he entered the Senate. And there is always the possibility that one of the front runners for the Senate nomination —especially Gilligan—will decide to shift into the race for governor.

Finally, Carl Stokes cannot be dismissed. Were he white, Stokes would be a leading contender for either post, but it would be risky for a Negro to run on a statewide ticket in Ohio. Even Metzenbaum, who is Jewish, faces an uphill struggle against prejudice.

Whatever the final Democratic alignment, there are two Republicans who would be tough for any Democrat to beat: Gov. James A. Rhodes and Rep. Robert A. Taft. But it could happen—much to the delight of the Democrats—that they will decide to fight it out for Senate nomination. Rhodes has already declared and Taft is making similar noises.

A kind of GOP Lyndon Johnson with a Midwest twang, Rhodes is a champion vote getter who is completing his second term and is prohibited from running next time. Until last April it was assumed that he would be unopposed for the Senatorial nomination and that no Democrat could beat him. Then a story in Life linked the Governor to a Mafia figure and accused him of dipping into campaign slush funds and finally being nailed by the Internal Revenue Service. Rhodes is now vulnerable—to both Republicans and Democrats.

The day before announcing his candidacy for the Senate, he broke his silence on the Life charges and released a statement purporting to detail his net worth (about $65,000). He also denied any wrongdoing in commuting the sentence of an imprisoned Mafia leader. Full-page advertisements in newspapers throughout Ohio carried Rhodes's statement.

In a rare display of bickering between Republicans, Taft called a news conference to question the propriety of the state Republican organization paying for these ads. "It seems to me you can't take this out of the context of the upcoming campaign," Taft said. He did not announce his candidacy, but it is clear that he yearns to follow his father into the Senate. Republican officials are still trying to convince Taft to run for governor, thus providing the dream ticket of Rhodes and Taft and avoiding a primary battle. Even with the Life affair hanging over his head, Rhodes would be formidable.

At least two other Republicans appear available, if a place can be found for them on the ticket. Donald E. (Buzz) Lukens, 38, of Middletown, is a Goldwater conservative who may have no qualms about challenging Rhodes. State auditor Roger Cloud, a former speaker of the Ohio house, owes his job to Rhodes and he would be a leading contender for governor if Taft steps into the Senate race.

Thus 1970 could be a year of rebirth for the Democratic Party in Ohio. But a better organized Republican organization that has been vastly more successful in statewide elections is not about to let the Democrats win any position without a battle. The Republicans have the soldiers and they have the gold.

PENNSYLVANIA

A. STEPHEN BOYAN, Jr.
Mr. Boyan, a political scientist at Pennsylvania State University, is president of the Centre County Young Democrats and a state board member of the New Democratic Coalition.

University Park

It is still too early to know whether significant reform of the Democratic Party can be achieved soon in Pennsylvania. One group actively encouraging it is the New Democratic Coalition (NDC), born out of the frustrations of the McCarthy campaign. McCarthy polled more than 400,000 votes, the highest ever given anyone in a Pennsylvania preferential primary, only to have the party leadership push through a delegate endorsement of Humphrey. That endorsement, and the tactics used to get it—anti-Humphrey delegates told to "sit down and shut up," the state committee "losing" the papers of delegates pledged to vote for the victor of the primary on the first ballot, etc.—convinced the McCarthy forces that the Democratic Party was in critical need of a shake-up. Not only would liberals have to lobby for rules changes before party councils but the party would have to be taken over, precinct by precinct, by a political leadership responsive to the needs of an electoral majority.

NDC conceives of itself as the organizing device for this new political leadership. It has formed more than thirty-three political clubs in the state, with five more in the process of affiliation. It has taken positions against the war in Vietnam, the ABM and the present ordering of national priorities, and has drawn up an extensive and detailed platform for Pennsylvania. Among other things, that platform calls for a graduated state income tax, the substantial elimination of real estate taxation, the regulation of medical and hospital fees by an elected state agency, landlord and tenant courts, "no fault" automobile insurance and repeal of the fair-trade laws. It advocates eventual public ownership of utilities and the use of their profits for public services. The NDC favors tuition-free higher education for all Pennsylvanians, and would abolish academic accreditation for ROTC. It wants the abortion law repealed. In short, the platform calls for adoption of virtually every proposal on the agenda of contemporary political liberalism.

But it is in part because of this program that many regular party leaders feel they can safely ignore the coalition. NDC plays no role in party affairs comparable, for example, to that of the state AFL-CIO. One party official (innocently) paraphrasing Stalin's question about the Pope, asked, "How many votes does the NDC have?" He doubted that it would ever gain much strength outside the upper middle-class suburbanites, the academic community or among Jewish voters. It is evident, moreover, that the NDC organization has made little headway in the many small cities around the state. Against that background, NDC's immediate prospects for reform leadership in the state party would not seem bright.

On the other hand, wide support appears to be developing for another kind of party reform. That is the movement to democratize the Democratic Party and end its years of domination by old-style machine politicians. On paper, the party is already superbly democratic. It is ruled in principle by an elected state committee whose members run from Senatorial districts at the spring primary election in each even-numbered year. In fact, however, the policies of the state committee are determined by the state "policy committee," a body dominated by county chairmen from areas that roll up large Democratic majorities, along with leading elected Democrats. The result is that the party leaders of Allegheny and Philadelphia Counties dominate the committee. When they can unite on a candidate or policy, they can usually win support from the other committee members.

One reason for this cooperation is that no Democrat can win statewide office without party support in Allegheny and Philadelphia Counties. Then, too, 40,000 patronage jobs are controlled by Democratic officeholders, who can also assign state contracts or confer other favors. Through such devices former Mayor Barr of Pittsburgh, head of the Allegheny Democratic organization, and Mayor Tate of Philadelphta, de facto head of the Philadelphia organization, have maintained absolute control over the Pennsylvania state party in recent years. In 1966, for example, when Robert Casey, the organization-backed candidate for governor, lost in the state primary election to Milton Shapp, a liberal, the organization "cut" Shapp and he was beaten in the election.

But changes have occurred in the party since 1966 and the result next time may be different. In Pittsburgh this spring a reform, issue-oriented, NDC-backed candidate, "Pete" Flaherty, handily defeated the organization candidate for the Democratic mayoral nomination, Mayor Barr having retired. This fall, still shunning organization support, and relying on labor, youth and liberal reform elements, Flaherty scored a stunning success at the polls, obtaining a greater percentage of votes than did Barr as the organization candidate in 1965. In Philadelphia, meanwhile, the electorate dealt the Democratic organization of Mayor Tate an even more serious blow. It defeated the Tate-picked, Tate-backed candidates for district attorney and city controller by the greatest margins that Republicans have achieved in Philadelphia elections since 1931. The message in both cities seemed to be that old-style organization politics will no longer assure success—that the electorate today responds to issues and candidates. William Green, Philadelphia County chairman, saw it that way: "The Democratic Party has not been sufficiently responsive to independent thinking. . . . We have got to open the doors."

This shift in voter motivation should have two immediate effects on state politics. First, even before the election, state party officials had revived a committee to look into the party's rules. This Rules Committee has held public hearings and met at least half a dozen times. It seems to be leaning toward a proposal to reconstitute the policy committee into a "nominating committee" (party leaders and all state committee members) that would endorse candidates only after hearing their views at a public meeting. Whether this proves to be a genuine reform remains to be seen; unless the vote is secret, for example, state party leaders might still dictate endorsements. But with the Allegheny and Tate-controlled organizations in at least partial eclipse, it is likely that their representatives will be less able to crack the whip.

Second, the election results suggest that aspirants for statewide office can afford to be more independent of the organization. If a candidate can generate a substantial popular appeal, the organization may need him far more than he needs the organization. Robert Casey, long identified with the Pennsylvania party regulars, may be especially affected by their decline in public favor. People close to him report that his true political views are considerably more liberal than what he has thus far expressed publicly. Pennsylvania Democrats will now watch closely for signs of a liberal trend in Casey's policy statements as he seeks the gubernatorial nomination next year.

The Casey-Shapp fight, if its occurs, could be a donnybrook. As early as 1966, when he ran for governor, Shapp opposed escalation of the war in Vietnam. He also formed a "Democratic Study Group," an organization of liberal Democrats that has been putting out position papers on many issues facing the state. In 1968 he backed Robert Kennedy, Eugene McCarthy, then Edward Kennedy. He has been outspoken on many state and national issues and has close ties to the NDC. He is contemptuous of the old-style politics, and the old-style organization returns the feeling. It believes Shapp's anti-organizational posture to be a sham, an opportunistic device to give him visibility with the electorate. Other prominent Democrats, especially in labor, are angry with Shapp for supporting McCarthy last year, when they were vigorously behind Hubert Humphrey. Hugh Carcella and I.W. Abel of the powerful United Steelworkers are believed already to have rejected him.

Casey ran strong in 1968, leading the ticket in winning the office of state auditor general. He expresses views on few state or national issues, preferring to concentrate on the auditor general's responsibilities and to please the county leaders with carefully assigned patronage. Some dismiss him as a machine "hack," cloaked in a "modern" image. Others point to his anti-Vietnamese war position and his strong stand for party reform at both state and national levels. Few liberals are impressed. NDC people, though they do not dislike Casey, believe that only a Shapp victory can advance liberal policies and genuine reforms in the party structure.

The question is whether Casey will move enough to the left to blunt Shapp's appeal, or whether Shapp can find enough support in his liberal, anti-organizational constituency to take over the party and then win the governorship. Shapp can only be encouraged by the election returns from Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

ROCKEFELLER REPORTS

HALF RIGHT ON LATIN AMERICA

RICHARD O'MARA
Mr. O'Mara, who formerly reported from Latin America, is an editorial writer on the Baltimore Evening Sun.

In 1958 Dr. Milton Eisenhower journeyed to Latin America at the behest of his brother the President. Vice President Nixon, on an earlier visit, had been spat upon in Caracas and roughly treated in various other capitals. Understandably, President Eisenhower wanted to know what was wrong down there.

Dr. Eisenhower, a studious and concerned man, went through Central America and returned home somewhat unsettled. His impression was that relations between the United States and Latin America had indeed deteriorated, and that a major reason for it was the increase of Soviet propaganda. A few months later William P. Snow, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, told Congress that not only were the Russians out-propagandizing us in Latin America; they were by their technical assistance program subverting the historical "special relationship" between the two halves of the hemisphere.

There were other alarm ringers at the time, and not all of them at home. In April 1960, Colombian President Alberto Lleras Camargo warned that if the United States did not begin to take an active interest in Latin America's social and economic development, the whole continent might be convulsed by a Communist revolution. President Eisenhower was not deaf to all this: he formed a committee to look into the matter and then returned to bickering with the upstart revolutionary regime just establishing itself in Cuba.

I recall all this not so much as a refresher course in recent history as to demonstrate the seeming immutability of Washington's attitude toward Latin America. The play has been altered slightly; the characters have changed; essentially the plot is the same. The leitmotiv remains: action-reaction.

Several months before President Nixon moved into the White House, the Peruvian Government of Gen. Juan Velasco Alvarado seized the American-owned International Petroleum Company. The General also refused to pay for it. That was the action. Mr. Nixon's reaction was like that of his Presidential mentor. He decided to find out what was going on down there by dispatching Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller on a fact-finding tour.

Mr. Rockefeller's journey was even more tumultuous than Nixon's had been eleven years earlier. The facts he found were even more disturbing than those uncovered by Dr. Eisenhower: the revolution had crept closer; relations between the United States and Latin America were worse than ever; the "special relationship" was on the rocks.

The Rockefeller report correctly identifies the economic sore spots in Latin America, as well as the other sources of discontent—the rapid expansion in communications technology, the world's fastest population growth, urbanization, nationalism and the disproportionate number of young people in the population. At the same time, the Governor's findings are politically regressive.

The area's economic ills had been carefully diagnosed even before he set off on tour. They were contained in a document drafted by economic representatives of nineteen Latin countries at Viña del Mar. This consensus of Viña del Mar requested more direct United States aid for Latin America, specifically aid with no strings attached. It asked that the United States grant preferential treatment for Latin American primary products, finished goods and processed foods. It requested that President Nixon resist any attempts by special-interest groups to erect new tariff walls against such products.

Most important from the Latins' standpoint was the request for trade preferences. "Trade, Not Aid" became the slogan of the Punta del Este summit conference of American Presidents in the spring of 1967. In his report, Governor Rockefeller specifically urged that Washington first try to win agreement from other industrial nations to grant trade preferences to products from all developing countries. Failing this, he recommended that the United States grant preferences only to the Latin countries. President Nixon has agreed to go along.

To grasp how important this is, one must understand the peculiarly painful position of the Latin American countries in the arena of world trade. The United Kingdom grants tariff preferences to goods from its commonwealth partners. Products from the French-speaking African countries have free access to the European Common Market. The nations of Latin America form the only bloc of developing countries that do not enjoy preferences anywhere. The United States, they argue, should be their special customer.

But instead of becoming more receptive, the Latins have complained, the United States market gets tougher to crack. Venezuela, for instance, is perpetually upset over its diminishing share of the United States' oil import quota. The Brazilian Government is still smarting over the recent successful campaign by large American food companies to reduce the importation into the United States of Brazilian instant coffee.

The Latin American countries have always viewed direct government-to-government aid as a useful tool of development. But in recent years aid funds under the Alliance for Progress have diminished while, at the same time, Congress has laid on new restrictions which make the available money harder to get. Some of these restrictions are blatantly insulting; one even states that, before a government receives assistance, the Secretary of State must have determined that it is not controlled by the "international Communist movement." The most well-known and troublesome is the Hickenlooper amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act. It is a punitive measure, requiring that the United States cut off aid funds to any government that expropriates United States property and does not "take appropriate steps" toward compensation within six months.

The Rockefeller report suggests that those restrictions be removed which "interfere with the process of development or impugn the sovereignty of other countries." So far, possibly because he fears that the expropriations which began in Peru and Bolivia might be encouraged, the President does not seem ready to press for the repeal of the Hickenlooper amendment.

Mr. Nixon has followed a few of the report's recommendations for improving the aid program. Mr. Rockefeller had urged that the specific restriction that all aid loan money be spent in the United States be relaxed, and that the Latins be permitted to spend that money anywhere in the hemisphere. President Nixon did not go that far: speaking before the Inter-American Press Association on October 31, he said: "I am now ordering that, effective November 1, loan dollars sent to Latin America under AID be freed to allow purchases not only here but anywhere in Latin America." He thus excluded Canada.

It was a concession, but not much of one. Aid loans had not been untied, just loosened a little. The fact is, not much in the way of development material (tractors, earth-moving machinery, industrial plants, railroad cars, etc.) is available in Latin America. The countries must continue to do most of their shopping in the United States, where these items are considerably more expensive than, say, in Japan.

Mr. Rockefeller also asked for repeal of the provision that requires half of the goods financed by American aid funds to be transported in United States ships (which are expensive). Mr. Nixon disregarded this recommendation, but did agree to give the Inter-American Committee for Alliance for Progress (CIAP) "an increasing share of responsibility for development assistance decisions." And he met the New York Governor halfway by promoting Charles Meyer, the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs to Under Secretary of State. Mr. Rockefeller had advised that Meyer, or someone else, be given full Cabinet rank. Most observers viewed this as a bureaucratic concession which amounts to little.

The Rockefeller report's analysis of subversion and revolution in Latin America is startling, for it recalls the fears of earlier days. One can almost hear echoing through its pages John Foster Dulles ranting against the international Communist conspiracy, the ponderous warnings by Dr. Eisenhower of Soviet penetration in Latin America, the ringing phrases of John F. Kennedy on the Alliance for Progress, which barely concealed his apprehension over the growing influence of Fidel Castro in Latin America.

Vadillo, Siempre (Mexico)

Now Mr. Rockefeller has pumped up Fidel Castro once again as a major threat to the hemisphere's stability. He offers what seems on the surface a practical rule of thumb by which the United States might conduct relations with the Latin governments—that is, equal treatment of all de facto governments, be they democracy or dictatorship. Here Mr. Nixon followed his envoy's advice, for on October 31 he announced that "on the diplomatic level we must deal realistically with governments in the inter-American system as they are." (Apparently Mr. Nixon's views have changed since he was Vice President and around the time of Dr. Eisenhower's trip, for he then favored giving an abrazo to the democracies while maintaining a cold shoulder for the dictatorships.) This implies nonintervention, and if adhered to strictly, would be an eminently sensible policy.

But nonintervention was far from Mr. Rockefeller's mind when he compiled his report. While in Latin America dodging rocks and sniffing tear gas, Mr. Rockefeller must have become convinced that the revolution had already arrived and that he was caught right in the middle of it. His report tells of Communist infiltration into student groups, labor organizations, the Church, even certain segments of the military. The elements he describes are the contemporary forces for change in Latin America, but Mr. Rockefeller, rattling the bones of international subversion, interpreted them as the forces of destruction.

Accordingly, he has urged that the United States increase its military assistance to help existing Latin American governments fight this rising tide of subversion. In his report he laments that military assistance to Latin America has dwindled from $80.7 million in 1960 (President Eisenhower's last year) to $21.4 million for fiscal 1970.

If the President follows Rockefeller's advice he will be leading the United States back to the cold-war years, the days of the mutual security pacts. One thing Milton Eisenhower learned was that a major reason why so many Latin Americans resented the United States was their conviction that Washington was much more pleased by the neatness and enforced stability of dictatorships (a more appropriate climate for investment) than by the sometimes unruly and rambunctious atmosphere of a Latin democracy. (President Eisenhower pinned medals on Latin dictators and threw lavish receptions for them in the White House.) And generous amounts of military hardware to the dictatorships certainly helped many of them stay on top.

President Nixon does not seem ready to start laying out American money to prop up military governments in Latin America. Perhaps he learned during his years as Vice President that this is a dead-end route. And so far he has not publicly mentioned Mr. Rockefeller's suggestion that a Western Hemisphere Security Council be set up as a planning body to counter subversion in Latin America. But the President has accepted Rockefeller's contention that Cuba is a generator of revolution in Latin America, and continues to support the ostracism of that country from the normal flow of hemispheric relations.

Several years ago, to be sure, the regime of Fidel Castro was abetting revolutionaries in Venezuela and Bolivia. Since then Cuba's outward reach has been withdrawn and it has turned in on itself, perhaps in recognition that its revolutionary activity was futile and expensive. In any event, Cuba is not the direct threat to the hemisphere it once was (if it ever was). But Castro's example has stirred revolutionary fervor in Latin America, and has touched all the elements of Latin society of which Rockefeller spoke.

In this first year of the Nixon Administration Latin America is not suffering continent-wide upheaval, but there is enough revolutionary action in certain countries to justify concern for the future. The United States has been the target of much of this action because large numbers of people in Latin America have come to resent the influence this country exercises in Latin American political and economic affairs—what Rockefeller describes as our "disproportionately visible role."

General Velasco in Peru and General Ovanda in Bolivia are not making war on the Standard and Gulf Oil companies. They are responding to long-held resentments among their people. The supermarket bombings in Argentina (all stores in the Rockefeller Minimax chain), the kidnapping of the American Ambassador in Brazil, the threats to nationalize the copper industry in Chile, these are all manifestations of a deeper discontent. The Latin Americans are not upset because they have been neglected by the United States. Rather, more and more of them have decided that, despite the Good Neighbor Policy and the Alliance for Progress, the United States has consistently taken more out of Latin America than it has put in.

"Thus," the Rockefeller report notes, "the rising drive for self-identification is naturally and inevitably leading many nations to seek greater independence from U.S. influence and power." But the so-called "special relationship" that Rockefeller would have the Nixon Administration improve has always been viewed by the Latin Americans as a one-way street, running north. Mr. Nixon has not indicated he means to reverse the direction, but he did meet some of the demands of the consensus of Viña del Mar, and he did accept some of the better suggestions in the Rockefeller report for improving United States-Latin American economic relations. That, at least, is a start.

LETTERS (Continued from page 586)

has reminded us that sorcery is again a real category. . . .

The establishment of the scientific bases of biogenetic engineering requires more than cash: it also needs men of talent and drive. There are plenty of other problems of scientific interest and of immediate human benefit to which a biologist can devote himself: Professor Luria has listed some of them. From these, we can easily identify the "major change of attitude" which he sees to be necessary in scientists: not to stick to an enjoyable line of research when its probable consequences are horrendous. . . .

Jerome R. Ravetz, Senior Lecturer in The History and Philosophy of Science University of Leeds

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Priming the Pump

THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF INTERNATIONAL OIL AND THE UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES. By Michael Tanzer. Beacon Press. 435 pp. $12.50.

ROBERT ENGLER

Mr. Engler is professor of political science at the City University of New York. He is the author of The Politics of Oil: A Study of Private Power and Democratic Directions (University of Chicago Press).

"We have received the definite impression that most low-income countries would welcome a larger flow of foreign investment, sharing our belief that such flows would contribute to their faster growth. How can that flow be stimulated?

"There is probably very little more that needs to be done to encourage the flow of foreign capital into extractive sectors. By its very nature, such investment will be attracted to ore bodies and oil deposits. Investment climate plays some part in this decision, but there are probably not more than a handful of countries in the world where that climate is bad enough to deter investment in a really attractive mineral project. What can be hoped for is perhaps that countries with rich natural resources will be able to use their resultant bargaining power to increase foreign investment in internationally competitive processing and/or fabricating facilities.

"How can direct investment in other sectors be fostered? . . . Improving the position of the private sector as a whole is the most important single step to improving the climate for foreign investment in developing countries. We therefore recommend that developing countries take immediate steps, where consistent with legitimate national objectives, to identify and remove disincentives to domestic private investment."

From World Bank Commission on International Development, Partners in Development, 1969

Thus do portions of the recent Pearson Commission report echo conventional wisdom as to the virtues of a greater private investment flow for emerging nations. In most of the literature on this problem, the development of resources such as oil is seen as too costly financially and too advanced technologically to be undertaken by these nations themselves. Nonproducing countries are encouraged to import their petroleum needs, both crude and finished. This view, of obvious self-interest to the private forces controlling most of the petroleum industry and presumably of comparable benefit to the Western countries where these corporations have their headquarters, has received vigorous support from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the United Nations, and a range of studies by academics and private consultants. Against this preponderance of expertise, the challenges to the private prerogatives of the international petroleum corporations in such countries as Indonesia, Iran, Chile, India, Venezuela, Argentina, Peru and most recently Bolivia, emerge as the irrational or conspiratorial acts of ungrateful and deluded nationalists of the Left and the Right.

In this setting Michael Tanzer's book is a timely primer on the political economy of international oil and on the operations of the brotherhood of merchants who control this basic energy resource. Its special value lies in its instructive appraisal of the social costs for the developing nations' reliance upon privately produced and refined oil. The vantage point is that of an underdeveloped country seeking to combine rapid development with the maximum possible economic and political independence. Tanzer's ideological orientation is anti-capitalist (in the modern corporate sense). But a critical reader will have to deal with the substantial data set forth by the author and not simply with his interpretations. Tanzer is a knowledgeable writer who combines advanced academic training in economics with experience working for Esso Standard Eastern, an Asian-African affiliate of Standard Oil of New Jersey.

The author recognizes how central the role of oil is to the economic lives of the new nations. Tanzer regards energy as the fourth factor of production, to be added to the classic ones of land, labor and capital. He is highly sensitive to the relationship between economics and politics:

> Of all the commodities moving in international trade, oil is undoubtedly the supremely political one. Because most oil moves internationally, because the trade is of enormous monetary value, because huge profits are to be made, because it is a vital necessity to most oil-importing countries, because it is of crucial importance to the economics of the oil-exporting countries and the balance of payments of the developed countries—for all these reasons, the ordinary day-to-day flows of international oil trade are the resultants of enormous and conflicting political pressures among the companies, governments and international organisations.

To Tanzer this is an industry where the "economics" are simple and the "politics" complicated, where the focus, if one is to understand what is going on, must be upon the critical power relationships. In an area where so much of the writing is either narrowly technical or general and vague at the crucial junctures (and often subsidized by the industry), his study provides hardheaded documentation and a useful analytic frame for understanding the dilemmas of the developing nations and for weighing basic public policy alternatives.

Tanzer succinctly describes the structure of the industry and its method of exercising economic power. He sees the major corporations' high degree of vertical integration as the principal mechanism for maintaining monopolistic control over the world's low-cost crude oil. The ownership of affiliated refining and marketing companies in various oil importing countries provides essentially noncompetitive outlets for the highly profitable crude oil. "Of all the major commodities involved in international trade, crude oil has by far the largest gap between the average cost of production and the price."

The exporting countries are generally in relatively weak bargaining positions. No one source dominates the world supply. Each of the international corporations has holdings in at least several countries. The underdeveloped nations are highly dependent upon export revenues, and their leadership has done little to bring oil more centrally into their economic life by broadening the internal demand. The countries of the Middle East, North Africa and Latin America are not united in their dealings with the corporations. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries has limited effectiveness; and even where it has been able to increase the incomes of its members, the individual governments remain as "essentially passive tax collectors."

In comparable fashion, the interests of the underdeveloped importing countries are subordinated to the profitmaximization objectives of the international companies. The local marketing affiliates have little incentive to explore for petroleum since so much of the profit comes from their imported oil. (Only fools or affiliates pay the posted prices.) Nor are they often eager to build new refineries within the importing country.

Underdeveloped countries are quite vulnerable to the economic boycotts which the corporations can invoke. They are also mindful of their general dependence upon the military, political and economic good graces of the Western powers, where corporations are closely linked to the public government. In the United States and Great Britain the international oil companies as a group are the most important single concentration of economic power. Petroleum investments account for 40 per cent of all direct U.S. investment and 60 per cent of all U.S. earnings in underdeveloped countries. This economic power has been accompanied by the political penetration of agencies for public policy formulation. A shared commitment to the blessings of "technology," to "free enterprise" and to "anti-communism" are also powerful factors in cementing the public-private alliance.

The leadership of the underdeveloped countries is quite aware of the serious drain upon their scarce foreign exchange and of the less tangible social costs of these unequal relationships. But the leaders are generally not very knowledgeable about the technical problems of oil and of the ramifications of the integrated corporate structure. The industry, in turn, does everything it can to perpetuate the mystique about the complexities of oil.

Tanzer is at his best in dealing with the arguments advanced against the alternative of a publicly owned and controlled industry. Through a general analysis and then specific case studies, the most detailed of which is India, he builds an impressive case for public investment in oil development. He debunks the twin myths of the prohibitive risk and great expense involved in oil exploration. He makes perfectly clear that the heavy investments which the corporations always emphasize should more properly be seen as an expectation of heavy profit.

> The question, then, of whether a country should "go it alone" cannot be solved a priori but only in the light of the specific possibilities and resources facing the underdeveloped country. There should be no presumption that oil exploration is beyond the means of a country nor that if the government does not undertake it private companies will. To the contrary, the presumption should be that an underdeveloped country cannot afford not to undertake an oil exploration program. This is because, viewed in the light of a social rate of return on investment analysis, oil exploration has uniquely attractive features for economic development.

The real cost of producing oil is relatively low; and, thanks to the current high prices maintained through the monopolistic control of the corporate giants, potentially 90 per cent of the value of the crude oil produced can be used for reinvestment in the economy.

Tanzer's case for publicly built refineries is persuasive. Such refineries would have the freedom to seek the lowest cost crude oil—regardless of corporate or national origins—on terms most favorable to the countries' broader financial needs. The refineries could be located and operated in harmony with the countries' own overall plans for development rather than those which fit into the worldwide private planning of the industry. Returns could be earmarked, at least in part, for investment in those economic activities which in turn would heighten the demand for oil.

Tanzer is fully aware of the political consequences of his economic recommendations. His case studies of India, Mexico, Cuba and Iraq indicate the complexities and pressures involved in developing such policies. Within the underdeveloped countries, reformers and planners must be prepared to meet the resistance of those propertied elements who have a stake in the status quo, that is, in underdevelopment. And there will be little sympathy from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations.

The author is not sanguine about the prospects for these countries' gaining full control of their energy situations. But he does see a number of hopeful signs. Rivalries within the industry sparked by the pressures of the newer overseas companies, the growth of oil consumption in the new importing nations, patterns of cooperation among underdeveloped nations in such areas as fertilizer production, the easing of cold-war tensions, and a general nationalist restiveness in Socialist and non-Socialist countries all make for more maneuverability in mounting an effective resistance movement. As a closing political note, he hopes that a coalition of underdeveloped nations, oil exporters and importers, will pressure the United Nations General Assembly to play a positive role in developing oil projects.

Certain premises and illustrations could be amplified. Do the current headlines about oil take-overs in Latin America indicate that Tanzer has overstated the effectiveness of the deterrents to nationalization? What are the implications for the private planning of the industry and the public planning of underdeveloped nations when such actions come from the Right rather than the Left? (Edith Penrose of London University has speculated that the international companies conceivably might come to accept "voluntary nationalization" and prefer contracts to ownership if they were to conclude that the demands of the producing countries could become too costly, unpredictable or threatening to their worldwide private arrangements.) If what some oil experts have seen as the "stabilizing weight" of the major corporations in keeping crude prices high is effectively challenged by a combination of factors (including political militancy and new reserve discoveries), what bearing will this have on Tanzer's argument that a public oil industry could carry much of the cost of an economy's development?

A full-blown study of public planning for energy is beyond Tanzer's scope. His prescription on how an underdeveloped country can embark upon harnessing its own indigenous resources needs further discussion. When he says that "this can

TO FIND

Well, what, you ask, did you expect to find there? Nothing, I say, nothing at all really, probably less: dust, just dust—splintered splendor, and not even its own or ours at that. Moonshine!—ah, those Kentuck Billys, good greeks, had the word for it. Later, sooner than later, our final Feds will find our hideout out, ourselves, the light years and dark years before we find each other.
What else is there to find, any where?
You say that's not much. No, not much maybe. Then say what else there is, at all.

JAMES L. WEIL

be done particularly by using unemployed and underemployed labor and natural resources, and by increasing the savings rate so that a greater proportion of output can be invested," and that "such a policy does not necessarily imply greater autarchy, since part of the increased output can be channeled into exports to pay for importing foreign technology and goods," he provokes a range of political as well as economic questions. A startling and not unfamiliar one concerns the kinds of social and political controls required for such planning. To be exercised by whom? Over whom?

If Tanzer's book is not a blueprint for revolutionaries abroad neither is it a strategy for domestic critics of American directions. But the implications for a reappraisal of American foreign policy and the social forces that have helped to shape it are devastating. They suggest how far cherished notions about aid, trade and private investment, masked by our good feelings about our beneficence and by the god of national security, have contributed, in the short run, to making the underdeveloped world safe for corporate profits and to heightening the tensions between rich and poor, powerful and powerless.

A Partisan and Public Man

LITERATURE AND THE SIXTH SENSE. By Philip Rahv. Houghton Mifflin Co. 445 pp. $10.

MARK L. KRUPNICK

Mr. Krupnick is assistant professor of English at Boston University.

Philip Rahv is one of the best of that distinguished generation of literary critics —including Lionel Trilling, F. W. Dupee, Allen Tate and the late R. P. Blackmur —which emerged fully on the scene in the 1930s, and still influences the way most of us think about modernist writing. Rahv's best pieces—on Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Kafka, and on Hawthorne, Henry James and "The Cult of Experience in American Writing"—are among the most rereadable essays of our time.

The present volume gathers together forty-four full-length essays and shorter sketches, written during the last three decades. All the writers discussed in Literature and the Sixth Sense belong to the last 100 years or so; there are novelists and critics but no poets. The main areas of interest are European novelists, especially the Russians (Gogol, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Chekhov); American literature (including shorter pieces on Henry Miller, Bellow and Mailer); and critics and critical theory. Sad to say, the valuable discussions of Crime and Punishment and The Possessed have not been reprinted here: they are to appear as chapters in a projected longer study of Dostoevsky.

Rahv is best known as an editor, since its founding in 1934, of Partisan Review. These are very much the writings of a partisan and public man who is as much concerned about influencing cultural debate as in elucidating texts. So this is literary criticism of a special kind: the essay as position paper, as a tactical exercise in a continuing war of ideas. Rahv acknowledges the influence of psychoanalysis, existentialism and anthropology, and he uses all of these resources of modern criticism to good effect; but his method depends basically on Marxism, with its stress on the social determinants of literature, the art object as it exists in the dimension of time. The modern consciousness of time, the sense of history, is the "sixth sense" of Rahv's title.

In cleaving to the Marxist critique of literature and society, Rahv has been almost a lone holdout among the critics of his generation, but the precise content of his radicalism seems to me problematic. As with other Marxist critics of the thirties, Rahv began with the dilemma of reconciling a revolutionary politics with an admiration for modernist writers of a decidedly illiberal political tendency. His solution has been to ignore the professed beliefs of these writers, as in the review of Murder in the Cathedral, where the play's "dessicated pattern" of original sin and theological salvation is detached from T. S. Eliot's radical critique of a dying civilization (ours, not Thomas Becket's). Or, as Rahv makes the distinction in an essay on Dostoevsky: "Reactionary in its abstract content, in its aspect of a system of ideas, his art is radical in sensibility and subversive in performance."

The solution to the discrepancy between the critic's politics and his aesthetics was found in the idea of the artist's "creative contradictions," the gap between the professed ideas and enacted meaning of a work. For this concept Rahv draws on Freud's distinction between latent and manifest content in dreams, and agrees with D. H. Lawrence: "Never trust the artist. Trust the tale." His general view of the modern imagination is summarized in one of the essays on Henry James: "In modern literature . . . it is above all the creativity, the depth and quality of the contradictions that a writer unites within himself, that gives us the truest measure of his achievement. And this is not primarily a matter of the solutions . . . but of his force and integrity in reproducing these contradictions as felt experience."

There are other ways of thinking about imagination. My own tendency is to think of James and Proust, and Wordsworth as well, in terms of the psychology of loss and restitution. Art is a mode of recovery—of the past, of "the lost stuff of consciousness," in James's phrase. This view places a higher valuation on imagination than Rahv will admit, with his antagonism toward a primarily aesthetic appropriation of reality. But in criticism, metaphors matter less than their application; and Rahv's dialectical method succeeds remarkably in practice.

I admire especially the first of the Hawthorne essays (1941), with its epigrammatic concision and wit, and its cogency of argument. Divided between a longing for experience and a dread of sin, Hawthorne "was haunted," Rahv writes, "not only by the guilt of his desires but also by the guilt of his denial of them." Noting Hawthorne's ambivalence toward the dark ladies of his tales, Rahv notes aptly that it is their beauty that Hawthorne cannot forgive. They must be condemned because they coerce his imagination. It is remarkable how much of importance Rahv gets said about Hawthorne and, generally, about the timidities of 19th-century American culture in this synoptic performance of 20 pages.

The wit and vivacity of these early essays are a reminder how much good criticism is like good talk, how much it depends on a community of interest and the free flow of ideas. In the years of the Moscow trials, the Spanish Civil War, and America's entry into World War II, Rahv was able to derive as much from ideologically conservative critics like Eliot, Tate and Yvor Winters as he had earlier from Trotsky. In the writings of all of them the problem of belief holds a central place. Thus the Hawthorne essay concludes with one of Rahv's excellent codas, in which he contrasts Hawthorne's religious imagination with Dostoevsky's, denying to the American writer the profundity of the Russian's consciousness of sin and evil, which "flows from a mighty effort to regain a metaphysical and religious consciousness" in a disintegrating society suffering —unlike Hawthorne's America—from a chaos of experience and a derangement of values.

This Augustinian protest against the city of man appears also in the coda to "The Heiress of All the Ages" (1943), in which the emblem of Henry James's worldliness—the American heroine's imperial dream of conquering the Old World—is contrasted with Proust's less idealized vision of the "great world," and his overcoming of it in art. James's Americans, in Rahv's view, have arrived so belatedly at their conversion to experience that they cannot afford the spiritual luxury of looking beyond it, of challenging its authority.

These large literary-historical generalizations are the most stimulating aspect of Rahv's work, providing a conceptual frame for the close studies of texture and formal design of most American criticism. But his pleasure in literary ideas accounts for a certain impatience with most American writing, in which private sensibility and experience count for more than general ideas. Rahv appears most at home with continental literature, and he defines his own critical preoccupations and methods most clearly in essays on two European men of letters, Arthur Koestler ("Homeless Radicalism," 1946) and Arnold Hauser (whose Social History of Art is reviewed in "Art and the Historical Imagination," 1952).

The most brilliant of the European essays are the two on Kafka, which—together with Austin Warren's study of Kafka's form—provide the best available short introduction to this difficult writer. "I have powerfully assumed the negativity of my times," Kafka wrote in his diary. In Rahv's essays the prophet is justified. His work is powerfully apprehended as that of the artist in whose very flesh modern history has inscribed its cruel meaning. Rahv summarizes Kafka's "nuclear fable" about a victim of an unknowable and unappeasable power, and is most interesting on Kafka's insight into modern man's alienation from his own nature and his intuition of the historic depletion of the modern ego. In his essay on Koestler, Rahv writes, "Nothing is ultimately so enervating as unreal positiveness," and he praises those ideas which "help, in Kierkegaard's phrase, 'to keep the wound of the negative open.'" Certainly few critical essays are as relentless as these on Kafka in probing that wound.

The closest Rahv gets to a positive statement of belief is in the portrait of Tolstoy ("The Green Twig and the Black Trunk," 1946) as "the last of the unalienated artists." He contrasts Tolstoy's Apollonian sanity—his wholeness, his objectivity, his rationality—with the "fetishism of art" of later novelists, with their mystifications and morbidity. Above all, Rahv's Tolstoy is the artist of the normal, a writer who derived his world view from the secular and skeptical 18th century and was immune to the various appeals of Romanticism. The young Tolstoy is even likened to Benjamin Franklin, with his program for self-improvement and his belief in a secular and wholly rational salvation.

The neo-classical preferences revealed in this essay make for the very solid strengths of Rahv's theoretical writings on the 1950s, cold-war documents on the insipid religiosity of that decade and attacks on the confusion of modes in critical discourse. "Fiction and the Criticism of Fiction" (1956), for example, very usefully notes the failure to distinguish adequately between the function of language in poetry and fiction in recent comment on the novel. But Rahv's distrust of Romanticism and what he elsewhere refers to as "the motley strivings of the inner self" leads in more recent pieces to an inflexible and punitive manner, as in the humorless scolding of Leslie Fiedler and especially in his vendetta against Norman Mailer.

In the most recent essay in this collection, Rahv notes of T. S. Eliot that there existed in him "an empirical critic of genius . . . as well as a fretful ar conscience-ridden Christian preceptor There is nothing of the true believer Philip Rahv's make-up, but of late the has been all too much of the precepto He now seems trapped by a narrow ar reflexive moralism wholly absent fro his earlier work. His feeling for decoru has hardened to the degree that he ca describe as "sensible" Eliot's ex cathed dismissal of Lawrence. And Mailer discussed not as a writer but as the syn bol for everything Rahv detests in ou present cultural situation.

But jeremiads do not take the plac of concrete historical and literary analy sis. In his attacks on neo-primitivism pornography, narcissism and other her sies of contemporary Romanticism, Rah begins to sound like Irving Babbitt strug gling against the modernist flood in th twenties. The perverse subjectivity c recent fiction has its historical cause and a doctrinaire pessimism is no bette way of understanding them than a cor tentless religiosity. The fact is, indulge in long enough, saying no can also be come a kind of religion.

Doctor Dapertutto

MEYERHOLD ON THEATRE. Translated and Edited with a Critical Commentary by Edward Braun. Hill and Wang. 336 pp. $8.50.

HAROLD CLURMAN

Meyerhold on Theatre is an important, many-faceted book. Meyerhold was a great director—the greatest in my experience as a playgoer. His theories and work anticipate many of the catchwords associated with avant-garde practices today. "If the theatre is finally to rediscover its dynamic essence, it must cease to be 'theatre' in the sense of mere 'spectacle.' We intend not merely to observe, but to participate in a corporate creative act." This call for what we would now deem "total theatre" was written in 1907.

When I saw some ten or eleven Meyerhold productions in Moscow and Leningrad (1934 and 1935) his career was approaching its end. He had begun as an actor in 1898 in the role of Treplev in the Moscow Art Theatre production of The Sea Gull and was also the first Tusenbach in The Three Sisters. Because of his campaign against naturalism, Meyerhold came to be regarded as an aesthete and even a "decadent" in the years before the First World War. But in 1918 he joined the Communist Party. He was then assigned Chief of the Theatrical Department for the entire Soviet Union.

On all occasions he spoke as a dedi cated champion of the workers' revolu tion, even to the point of echoing o occasion the shibboleth of "Socialis realism" when that doctrine was intro duced as integral to Soviet ideology i 1936. But his productions had very littl to do with "Socialist realism." In 193 Pravda published an article denouncin Meyerhold's theatre as "stylized, mystical formalist." At a conference during tha year Meyerhold was expected to admi that "his false political and artistic poli cies had led his theatre to total disaster.' Instead he reaffirmed his theatrical credo His theatre was liquidated in 1938.

Stanislavsky attempted to save him b appointing Meyerhold assistant at hi opera studio. But with Stanislavsky' death in 1938 Meyerhold was arrested It is commonly believed that he was sho in a Moscow prison in 1940. During the Khrushchev "thaw" Meyerhold was "re habilitated" and it was possible for Sovie theatre people again to speak of him with respect.

In Meyerhold on Theatre, Edward Braun has collected the various essays. lectures, notes which Meyerhold had published from 1902 on. These papers have not been previously anthologized (in English). Braun, who has devoted re years to the study of Meyerhold's e and work, has so edited the Meyerold papers that one can follow the urse of his career in the context of e social scene before and after the evolution. Braun has thus rendered the ld of theatre knowledge an invaluable rvice.

It might be said of Meyerhold, what casso said of himself, that he did not ek but discovered. Meyerhold's work as nearly always fresh and new. It was t "experimental" for he was a master. ke Picasso, Meyerhold always struck it on new tracks, in apparent contradicn to his previous "manner."

Constant from the outset in Meyerld's productions was the refusal to adre to the "slavish portrayal of real life." e regarded the actor as the principal ment in the theatre. The spectator was ways to be aware that the actor was rforming before an audience. Hence eyerhold's defense of the cabotin, the ummer, the mime, the stage virtuoso, e divine "clown." He was opposed to e theatre as the "servant of literature." n order to make a dramatist out of a ory-teller," Meyerhold suggested, "it ould be a good idea to make him write few pantomimes. . . . The writer will allowed to put words into the actors' ouths, but first he must produce a enario of movement." At a later time wrote, "The role of movement is more portant than that of any other theatri- l element."

As with Craig, Brecht, Artaud and rotowski, Meyerhold's pronouncements e to a considerable degree hyperbole. e finally admitted as much in quasi-traction of his boldest statements. Invators in the arts often indulge in lemics, paradox and metaphors which y more (or less) than they mean. Such the strategy of the vanguard. Thus eyerhold, always an admirer of Stanavsky whose productions were at the posite pole from his own, ended by firming that Stanislavsky was not the alist he had always been held to be. ill Meyerhold's initial championship of decisively stylized theatre is typical of m. His theories planted the seeds of nat has inaccurately come to be known the nonverbal theatre.

He proceeded by way of Maeterlinck symbolism. He then went on to proictions of Lermontov and Molière—quisite, dynamically decorative and her sardonically romantic or obliquely storted in the direction of a conjuror's iticism of the societies which produced em. These tendencies—brilliantly origil and captivating—gave way to the nstructivism of the early years after e Bolshevik Revolution. Except for his asterpieces in the mounting of Ostrovy's The Forest and Gogol's The Inspecr General (the latter largely rearranged and somewhat altered in the writing) Meyerhold in his later period had little to work with in the way of sound dramatic literature. Yet he made some mighty fine plays out of exceedingly skimpy texts.

Some of these were propaganda pieces, but they were propaganda with a difference—I particularly remember one with a scene which gave me a greater sense of what it is to be caught in the midst of a battle then anything I've ever seen in the most elaborate of war films. There was such consummate skill and imagination in them that one felt oneself in the presence of epic drama.

Most of what I have described concerns only surface style, not content. The great director doesn't simply "do" plays supremely well; he has, like all true artists, a face of his own. No parallel between Meyerhold and the other notable men of his day or our own quite defines his quality.

It is not enough to say that it was compact with dash, irony, physical prowess, grace and a perpetually compelling vivacity. (Meyerhold fashioned a form of body training for the actors which he called "biomechanism.") Beyond and above all there was in his productions an aura of mystery and magic very nearly demonic. It gave everything he did a special glamour.

In his early articles Meyerhold repeatedly refers to the pre-eminence of Fate, that sense of life from which he believed the greatest art forms of the past emerged. In all his productions, lighthearted or grave, there was always something weird, menacing, which made all the dazzling display of the play's actions appear at once splendidly brave and tragic. He himself called this note of strangeness the grotesque.

He loved the nightmare world of E.T.A. Hoffmann, and chose "Doctor Dapertutto" (literally Doctor Everywhere), a character from one of Hoffmann's tales, as a pseudonym. Meyerhold was a masked man who with crafty artifices lured us to hellish realms which seemed to promise glory. He leaped from one enticingly dangerous peak to another. No wonder the proletariat on whose behalf he believed himself to be striving were suspicious of him; no wonder bureaucracy feared him and decided to destroy him. There was a Mephistophelean mockery in him, a challenge to complacency, to the doctrinaire, the academic, the momentarily fashionable.

This arch-sorcerer also rebelled against his apprentices saying that they were suffering from "Meyerholditis." At every crossroad he left them lagging in the dust behind. The Soviet establishment called his theatre "alien" and indeed it was, as every truly original art must for a time appear to be. It was therefore entirely characteristic of him when bid, in the Bolshevik mode, to devote a speech to self-criticism to begin by saying: "My entire career, all my productions, have been nothing but self-criticism. I never approach a new production without first shaking myself from the previous one."

Vivid and Dazzling

THEM. By Joyce Carol Oates. Vanguard Press. 508 pp. $6.95.

ANONYMOUS SINS AND OTHER POEMS. By Joyce Carol Oates. Louisiana State University Press. 79 pp. $4.50.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches in the English Department at the University of California, Los Angeles.

In 1966, a former student of Joyce Carol Oates wrote to tell her how much she hated her, envied her too, for her control in the classroom, for being "filled in" where the human ache should be, and for "knowing so much that never happened," for believing—so academically, so ignorantly—in literature and its "perfect form," when in reality the world is crazy and out of control. "I lived my life but there is no form to it," she challenged. "You write books. What do you know?"

Them is the story of this girl, here named Maureen Wendall, and of her brother Jules and her mother Loretta. Set in Detroit—that "hole with a horizon"—in the last three decades, it is, in part, a story of the crush of family life among the urban poor and, more deeply, of the radical anguish of all human relationships. Them is also a story of the folly and cruelty and, for the poor, the desperate necessity of the American dream of betterment. The book drills through almost immediately to that nerve of anxiety that forms part of all human beings simply by virtue of their being alive, subject to change, unsafe. And to Americans, especially, the Wendalls—so vulnerable in their self-conceited dreams of the future, so prone to defeat—will seem frighteningly familiar, nightmare versions of their own worst fears.

As the book opens, Loretta—16, pretty, naive, a child of the movies—exults that "anything might happen." Alas, only too true; impulsively, she invites a boy into her bedroom, and near dawn, while both are sleeping, her older brother shoots him in the temple, then runs off. Loretta wakens, screaming, to an explosion near her ear—and this book of disasters has begun. Fleeing out into the streets, she happens, at length, upon Howard Wendall, a young policeman whom she has known for years, and returns with him to the apartment. Howard, "agitated, red-faced, very strange," saves her. The price is marriage.

Sixteen years and three children later, when Howard is still climbing on top of her—"that fat bastard"—Loretta will lie about during the day puffy-faced in her soiled bathrobe, resting her can of beer on her belly; but like a hardy weed she'll still be hoping, in her own eyes pretty and 16 forever: "I want to get dressed and walk down the street and know something important will happen," she will say to her children, "like this man who was killed because of me . . . I wasn't meant to be like this—I mean, stuck here."

Her daughter Maureen, cold and intent, knows that at least she is meant for better things: in the 9th grade, feeling "nothing at all" like her mother at 16, she sells herself and hides her earnings in a book of poetry, living for the day that she can make her escape. Before this can happen, however, her mother's second husband spots her in a stranger's car, finds her money, awaits her return, bloodies her with his fists. Regardless, at least a part of Maureen will be free, will not be stopped—the part that soon thereafter steps down to the curb and "becomes vivid and dazzling, standing on the sidewalk with her head turned back at a painful angle, looking at Maureen on the bus, her face guilty and wild."

Even from this point, Maureen has far to go; and meanwhile her brother Jules—though more lively, charming, quick—fares no better. Every prize he reaches for comes down on his hand, a clamp; and of these the most binding is the rich girl he loves, who teaches him—what Maureen has also learned—how good it is to close one's spirit and go to sleep. Jules will wake again, and so will Maureen: testifying, possibly, to the stupidity, but also to the resilience, the heartbreaking heroism, of the human spirit.

POEM

I pressed the red leaf you gave me between
"It is dark
& the door is open to the depths"
At some time to awaken from this autumn's earth's sleep.

CLAYTON ESHLEMAN

Them has the historical validity and something of the factual discipline and verbatim reportage of a documentary—but how much more rare and deep it is than this black-and-white, shopworn term can suggest. For what Them really amounts to is an almost uncanny act of dramatic self-transmutation: it is not so much a literary performance as the compulsive product of a possession. Except for a few paragraphs of direct address—in which Joyce Carol Oates, that irrelevant personage, sounds quite outside her subject and unequal to it—the novelist, as such, does not exist in her novel. Neither stylist, architect, judge nor philosopher, she is simply, and astonishingly, them.

Had "Maureen" actually read her teacher's "books," she would have known that precisely such indifference to "perfect form," to wrought sentences, verbal tapestries, consoling symmetries of design, has been the risk and virtue of all Miss Oates's published work. The striking quality of this writer's imagination has always been its kinetic aspect of grip and gland, its way of entering her characters and grappling out their lives with them, its instant access to the psyche's confused and impossible needs, to the pain both of being connected and of standing apart. Above all, the pain of connection; for Miss Oates's characters almost always move in a thick, downdragging element of human relationships, exposed, gasping, embattled, yet now and then surprised by their own cunning or violence, as if by some monstrous stranger in themselves who is yet more themselves than any conscious self they have known.

The history of the Wendalls thus came to Miss Oates as virtually an extension of her own imagination, like a novel that, terribly and unwittingly, she had somehow thought into actual life. So immediate, so relentless an imagination, is obviously limiting; it has no distance, no "order," no leisure for disporting with ideas or for making words couple wi the alarming jolt of joining railw cars—no mind for tricks or patterns any of the cross-word paraphernalia sophisticated modern fiction. On t other hand, a novel like Them mak one realize how predictable and tiresor the artful novel has become, how caters to both the novelist and t reader's pride in his own ingenuity, hc merely life-dabbling it tends to be. The reduces "literature" to virtually t dramatic level alone, but at that lev it is so emotionally demanding and su cessful, so "hot" with life, so imposin that, brought within its range, phil sophical or aesthetic schemes, no matt how profound or elaborate, would shriv at once, unable to bear the temperatur

This is not to say, however, that The is a book without form. For Miss Oate student was wrong: though her life w "endless," as she insisted, it did inde have at least a narrative form, and Mi Oates not only adeptly makes h chapters rise to a climax, to still anoth fumble or recovery in the Wendal lives, but with great naturalness a surprise suddenly brings her novel rou to what feels like a "close"—to a fragi tender, shared moment of reprieve the lives of Jules and Maureen.

When Miss Oates's potent, i gripping imagination and her skill narrative are conjoined, as they are p eminently in Them, she is a prodigio writer, one of the best we now ha But she is not often at her best, a has perhaps published too much, t quickly, been too little self-critical. S seems not to know when one or the oth of her powers has gone dead. What mu be said of Anonymous Sins, her fi collection of poems, which has just cor out in a handsome volume, is that t most important of her gifts, her drama ic imagination, seems shut off. Thou about emotional experience, the poer do not connect with it but lie on top it, curious inorganic aggregates of word

We in love are a series of sleep like ridges of rock moulded to the soft convulsions of the brain.

Unfortunately, there is neither music n sense here, and poetry must have o or the other.

The truth would seem to be that, born novelist, Miss Oates needs t distance of objective characters—th distance which she so astonishing overcomes—in order to get her powerl imagination off the ground. And th how greatly her words take hold a matter, colorless though they may in themselves. So it is with the wor in some of the short stories, in pa of one of the earlier novels, A Gard of Earthly Delights, and above all a very wonderfully in Them.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Certainly there are faults in this latest the novels—but the book is written a level so high above what mere everness or literary flair could reach their own, that it could afford far ore and far worse faults than it has. this large, life-containing novel, Joyce Carol Oates definitely arrives, writing sustainedly at the top of her bent and with so much humanizing impact that a merely literary judgment comes to seem immaterial, though of such judgment the novel need stand in no fear at all.

Philadelphia Street Players

DE ADCOCK

r. Adcock, who spent last year in Palo to studying on a Stanford University pro- ssional journalism fellowship, has returned the Philadelphia Bulletin as a feature iter and reviewer of films and plays.

theatre relevant? Next thing you know, welers and fashion designers are going want to be relevant.

As far as many theatre people are now ncerned, "relevant" means relevant to eir own discontents. Witness the Living heatre with its Paradise Now, The Per- rmance Group with Dionysus in '69, e Free Store with Che. A theatrical action against discontents is often a vel show, full of thrills and titillation r the bourgeois theatre's jaded sugar ddy, old reliable audience—the $3, $4, , $10, $15-a-seat distraction seekers.

There's another kind of relevance ing, however: Street Theatre. It harks ck to a really old version of relevance, at of the classical Greek theatre or edieval churchyard plays.

Number one, it's free. Number two, s designed to edify, to instruct, to fire the audience with a few ideals. Num- r three, it's satirical. Number four, it's ght in the neighborhood, within walking stance, not off in some strange place here you sit elbow to elbow with stran- rs. In fact you don't sit at all. You nd.

Street theatre is going on in several ies, New York and San Francisco hong others, but I live in Philadelphia here I know it best. Philadelphia's So- ety Hill Playhouse Street Theatre comes aring into hundreds of red-brick-with- hite-stone-step row house neighborhoods ery year. The advance man has put sters on telephone poles and in stores ar the chosen intersection. Folks are pecting the show.

The troupe travels on a stake-body ck—their stage. Rock music announces eir arrival. "A little magic, a little ndness. . . ." Aretha carols. The cast of n, hanging over the truck's sides, shouts ree show! free show!" to pedestrians, op sitters and corner kids as they pull .

This time they're pulling up to, say, ed and Bouvier Streets in a black ghetto. A crowd gathers. The block association women are already out with a pot of boiled hot dogs. They're raising money to hire a bus to take the kids to Valley Forge for a picnic.

The first skit is The Magicians. The cast is integrated with perfect symmetry. There are four villagers, two white and two black, and two magicians, one white and one black. The all-black audience takes in the actors' easy interracial camaraderie. "That there's a white boy," one woman in the street says softly to another, nodding toward an actor who plays the husband of a black actress. The two women purse their lips for a moment and hold their counsel.

The Magicians is an allegory about the arms race in which sophisticated sorcerers (military technologists) talk innocent villagers into defending their security with increasingly dangerous weapons. Finally there's an accident and everyone is killed by a creepy, crawly miasma of greenish vapor. Like many of the troupe's pieces, The Magicians is performed in pantomime, while a narrator, on tape, tells the story.

Leaping out of the death scene, the master of ceremonies tells a dazed-looking audience that the foregoing drama is not a true story. "But it could happen," he says. He picks out a wide-eyed 3-year-old in the front row, points, and adds, "To you!" The players exit amid giggles and applause.

The next act is about a spunky ghetto lady named Madame Alberta K. Johnson. Rhea Wilkerson plays Mme. Johnson. Miss Wilkerson, who is a Get Set teacher by morning, has added a red fox scarf, a pink hat with a big flounce on top and a pink parasol to her basic black costume. She comes on very colored. The audience shows its delight at every pause—"All right!" "Tell it, honey!"

The lines, by Langston Hughes, include these about paying rent:

. . . Before I pay
I'd go to hell and rot away.
The sink is broke, the water don't run.
You ain't done a thing you promised to'v' done.
. . . The kitchen floor squeaks, there's rats in the cellar and the attic leaks.

Next comes an anti-war skit. On the sound track a normal, optimistic American recruit reads a letter home in which he says things aren't so bad, he misses mom's cooking, thanks for the cookies. On stage there's a slapstick mime of the bullying of basic training. Oriental music comes on the tape. The boy is shipped overseas. He finally gets killed. Phil Ochs's voice, singing, has the last word: rather than serving "your country in her suicide . . . treason might be worth a try. . . ."

"Yes, we get complaints," the street theatre's director, Mrs. Deen Kogan, admits. "People are sensitive. Lots of them have boys in Vietnam. But this isn't an anti-Vietnam play," she says without blinking. "It's an anti-war play. And after I've talked to outraged complainers on the phone for a while, we can usually agree that war is bad and we're both against it."

After the "anti-war play" there's a frenetic farce, set to nickelodeon music, about purse snatching, whimsical law enforcement, and citizens who don't want to get involved. The big moment for most of the audience came when the sweet, pigeon-feeding old lady socked it to the cowardly thief with her hefty handbag. Children squealed and women called, "All right! All right!" It seems obvious that purse snatchers are the object of a lively loathing around Reed and Bouvier Streets.

Then comes the finale. A gushing orchestral rendition of America the Beautiful is transformed into head-wracking electronic music in which cuckoo calls are a recurrent motif. On stage a farmer, a housewife, a factory worker, a cowboy and a "pretty stenographer at work in the city" are transformed into regimented zombies. Finally the zombies break out of their trance as the cast of Hair takes over the sound track, singing ecstatically "Let the sun shine in!"

After the people on stage and those on the street bugaloo a while, the M. C. thanks the audience. Hats, masks and bits of finery are thrown into gray plastic barrels. Costumes go onto a portable rack. Everything is heaved back onto the truck by the troupe itself and by two young assistants—a black boy with a copy of Julius Caesar sticking out of his hip pocket and a white girl wearing a Germantown Friends School jacket. In five minutes the street theatre players are off for another performance. That evening, after a delicatessen supper, there are two more shows.

The actors are paid $10 for each show; as much sometimes as $70 a week. They're what you might call "experienced amateurs." Most of them have other jobs. One works for the gas company, another is a jazz drummer, another is a lawyer. One of the women, a doctor's wife, is a housewife and mother, another is a model, a third is a secretary.

The group improvises its material. Money comes from the city, a foundation grant and private patrons. The pitch in fund raising is something like: "Street theatre makes the city a more pleasant place in which to live. It cheers the folks up." To city officials that means: "It cools, it soothes, it maybe makes riots less likely."

So is street theatre just circuses for the populace, contrived to keep things quiet? To the city council, maybe yes. Not however to the players themselves. Guerrilla theatre they admitted they're not. They don't go for confrontations. They feel friendly toward their audiences. But they are radicals by Philadelphia standards. They just like to think their propaganda is a pleasure to imbibe.

Only once have they run into censorship. In one skit they have a drunken, corrupt judge. "Horrors!" cried the local bar association. "You can't show the judge being bribed! What will that do to respect for law amongst your hoi polloi audiences!"

"Revise," said the city in response to bar pressure, without specifying how to revise. So the troupe put the bribe money in an envelope, rather than having it naked. "Revision of Skit Secured" gloated the bar association newsletter, and that was the end of that.

Most of Mrs. Kogan's mail and phone calls are of the "Thanks for the show, come back again" variety. Some audiences obviously resist the troupe's anti-war, anti-racism message. A man in a clerical collar was about the only person applauding at a water-front neighborhood where Ukrainian and Polish are still widely spoken. The crew-cut men, the teased-hair women, the whey-faced children just stared uneasily.

But the South Philadelphia Italians are something else. They go for anything that has style. The men—plasterers, tile setters, masons, with long hair and handle-bar mustaches—come home and change from spattered coveralls to bell bottoms and body shirts. Then they may stroll up the block to check out a street theatre performance.

Right next to the truck-stage is a weathered Wallace poster, tacked to a telephone pole. Applause and laughter punctuate the production, however, and when the show is over several young matrons in dazzling muumuus, a couple of them pregnant, jump up from their beach chairs and bugaloo with the cast. Their long, loose hair swings and hops.

As the players leave the stage, they flash the V-sign as usual. The audience flashes it right back.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

It is as well for the husband (Michel Bouquet) in Claude Chabrol's La Femme Infidèle that the police catch him out in the murder of his wife's lover. Moments earlier she had stumbled on evidence of his guilt, and as the police arrive she is walking down the garden to join him, with a spring in her step and the ghost of a smile on her lips that suggest she has found a delicious new way to be appreciated as a woman. I swallowed at the thought of the homicidal career that could be in store for this honorable man, intoxicated, as so many cuckolds are, by love for his beautiful wife.

This gives it away, I know, but I have no compunction on that score; Chabrol is not presenting a suspense entertainment, but a deft and appalling comedy of domestic interplay. On the surface, the family is elegant bourgeois, self-indulgent but restrained by taste, with manners so solicitous that they become a ritual of tact. The wife (Stephane Audran) is an admirable partner of her successful, cultivated, businessman husband. She is amused by their young son and devoted to his nurture; she presides over a serene home, is alert to her husband's needs, and warmly appreciative of his gifts and gallantries.

It is just that she has this need to lie with other men. It is not stated that she had been unfaithful before, but I think it. Her adultery is so divorced from her licit life, so driving and absorbing in an isolated segment of her character, as to suggest a compulsion verging on insanity. It would appear that her husband has not been a successful mate; he is quite man enough, but perhaps too constrained adoration. I doubt, however, that a husband could have kept her within t precincts of matrimony. With her, i fidelity is not a weakness but an appeti

The quality of Mr. Chabrol's film defined partly by the fact that almo none of this is stated. It progresses on cushion of propriety, with handsome pe ple moving easily through habitual for and duties. The revelations spring fro words unsaid, gestures interrupted; t lunacy is in the normalcy.

For the husband, of course, is as u balanced as the wife. His aberration control. He pays what must be called courtesy call on the lover—himself well-bred, considerate man—and th conversation is a miracle of embarra ment made tolerable by form. It is accident of sentiment that precipitates t killing, there being nothing more spo taneously lethal than a man in perfe control of his feelings.

Chabrol's film is a splendid piece maturity amid the current adolesce clamor. The acting is a gratificatio Bouquet twitching with amiability; Ml Audran so well-behaved that her ero cism passes for poise. The film pays t audience the compliment of supposi that it will appreciate the grotesque an atmosphere of decorum, will measu the truth of this extreme situation by re erence to less drastic experiences of own. La Femme Infidèle makes dram out of life instead of treating life as show, and if it does not match, it least calls to mind Chekhov's unblinki compassion.

A GAME

I am the people's Konrad Lorenz from a window on 7th Avenue
Fabre of the day-time hours but that's BULL says my wife don't stand naked in front'a the windows the rapists are everywhere and also our friends might walk by (I love those strange inductions)

She means it's the girls in the mini-skirts I think Can't see me up here I say but that IS Bull , it's simple exhibitionism.

I pretend jealousy in my wife it's a great diversion and makes me happy.

TOBY OLSON

With Milton Ginsberg's Coming Apart we are back in the world of the m's concern with itself. I won't say at its content is insignificant, but it a significance invented to be filmed. nd that trickily. A hidden camera, we e to suppose, has been set up to face sofa at a distance of about 5 feet. Im-ediately behind this furniture is a mir-r that fills the entire space. So, except hen the participants are on the sofa elf, we see them in a reflected room, hich looks, however, like space beyond e sofa. Through the looking glass.

Or, considering the material, at a peep ow. Joe Glazer (Rip Torn) is a psy-oanalyst who is coming apart, and ho has determined to record his dis-tegration via the hidden camera. It is t clear whether this device had been rt of his professional apparatus, but e dexterity with which he adjusts it, detected by his visitors, suggests long age. This sort of thing could give psy-oanalysis a bad name. Nor is it ap-rent what besets Glazer, but I would ess satyriasis coupled—as frequently—ith libidinal inadequacy. (If Mr. Gins-rg can play at psychiatry, so can I.)

In any case, stripped of its camera-ithin-a-camera-in-a-mirror dodge, the ring of episodes plays changes on the andard fantasy of pornography. That , the ladies arrive upon the sofa in a ate of garment-rending lust, or become immediately upon being addressed by r. Glazer. He is avid but relatively pine. So go all dreams of the hungry ale. There is also an orgy, which will ve that sort of enterprise a bad name: nly at gala nights on shipboard have I en people work so hard at revelry. nd there are a couple of episodes in hich, obscurely, Glazer's chickens come me to roost.

The trouble with this picture, again ke pornography, is that you know noth-g, and therefore care nothing, about e people on hand. That state of af-irs is made worse because the perform-s seem to have been hired less for their lent than for their lack of inhibitions. he camera-mirror business is entertain-g for ten minutes; then one settles down a long grind of distressing behavior by a crowd of unpromising strangers. An audience will take quite a lot of exhibitionism if it knows what the stakes are; lacking that data, the temptation is to cross the street and avoid the mess. I was never sure whether Glazer was really breaking up; it is as plausible to assume that he had shifted his occupation from therapy to stag movies. The trap in writing for the camera instead of for the audience is that this sort of ambiguity seems not worth resolving.

N.B.: Lest any of the above give readers ideas, I should add that Coming Apart is not explicitly a very dirty picture by present standards (implicitly, by innuendo, it is dirty enough). The line of vision is fixed and most of the grunting takes place off camera. One scene, in which Sally Kirkland rides Torn's knee, may recall seamy days in the nursery, but otherwise one gets a good deal of display and not much action.

In the end, Miss Kirkland heaves, I think, an ash tray into the mirror and the drama is resolved. Cripes.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

RECORDS / David Hamilton

BERLIOZ: Te Deum. Franco Tagliavini, tenor. Wandsworth School Boys' Choir. London Symphony Orchestra and Chorus; Nicolas Kynaston, organ. Colin Davis, cond. Philips SAL 3724. $5.98.

Irlande, Op. 2. Le trébuchet, Op. 13. La mort d'Ophélie; Chant de la fête de paques. Soloists; Monteverdi Choir. Viola Tunnard, piano. John Eliot Gardiner, cond. Oiseau-Lyre SOL-305. $5.95.

La mort de Cléopâtre; Sara la baigneuse, Op. 11. Méditation religieuse, Op. 18. No. 1: La mort d'Ophélie, Op. 18. No. 2. Anne Pashley, soprano; St. Anthony Singers. English Chamber Orchestra. Colin Davis, cond. Oiseau-Lyre SOL-304. $5.95.

Berlioz spoke of the Te Deum as one of his "architectural" works, and made use therein of some of his most audacious structural ideas—notably in the Dignare, in which the overall harmonic motion is laid out according to an arbitrary, nontonal plan, although the short-range motion is quite traditional. The similarity to the organization of the opening pages of Boito's Mefistofele is striking, and—given the other evidence of Boito's debt to Berlioz—almost certainly not coincidental. The "architecture" is almost audibly present from the opening bars, with their alternating orchestra and organ chords (strictly speaking, Berlioz wanted the organ to be at the audience's rear), which seem to test and define the limits of the space to be filled with sound; eventually, the opposite limits of audibility are also examined. For all that his motivation often seems more literary than musical, the success with which Berlioz carries off even his most arbitrary ideas affirms his great aural sensitivity. The new Davis recording is immeasurably superior to the foggy old Beecham version (the engineers' fault, not Beecham's), except for a weak tenor soloist, and the sonic problems are well solved by the excellent recording.

The other two discs fill in a number of gaps in the recorded Berlioz literature. SOL-305 is less interesting, for the Irlande song series is neither skillfully made nor well performed, and the sensitive setting for voice and piano of a French version of Ophelia's death does not spring to life until one hears the chorus-and-orchestra version on SOL-304—the pallid piano tremolos and wispy refrain do not "sound" until transferred to strings and winds. The solo cantata

Free to Authors

To The Author In Search of a Publisher

OF BOOK MANUSCRIPTS

Is your manuscript ready (or almost ready) for publication? Send for this valuable booklet packed with information every writer should have. Tells how to get your work published, promoted, distributed. Write Vantage Press, Dept. FR-59, 120 W. 31 St., New York 10001

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 12-1-69

[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York [illegible]

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State ..... Zip No. .....

Cleopatra's death lost Berlioz the Prix de Rome in 1829, but not for the reasons that it now seems flawed (e.g., an excessively stately repetitiveness); surely the pictorialism of the final pages, which now seems to us prophetic, was what offended the judges. Finally, there is one masterpiece unearthed: Sara la baigneuse, a virtuosic setting of Victor Hugo for multiply divided chorus and orchestra. The performances on the record conducted by Davis are quite satisfactory, although an even better recording of the Mort de Cléopâtre can be found on Columbia CMS-6438.

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2; Overture to Genoveva. New Philharmonia Orchestra. Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel S-36606. $5.98.

There have been fewer Klemperer recordings in recent years, and not all of them measure up to the standards of concentration—or, indeed, of orchestral execution—that made the bulk of his output in the years around 1960 a unique contribution to the recorded literature. This recent Schumann release shows some deficient ensemble, and there is a contretemps of tempo in the slow movement that should not have been let pass; but through most of the symphony (and all of the overture) the extraordinary clarity of phrase articulation is still to be heard. In a work so heavily reliant on dotted rhythms, Klemperer's monumental steadiness is especially valuable, and the clarity of chord voicings—as in the slow introduction, where each instrumental choir retains its character—is even more important than the occasional retouchings of orchestration in elucidating Schumann's thought. As on some other occasions (for example, his recording of the Mahler Fourth Symphony), the tempos, although individually unexceptionable, don't quite add up satisfactorily: with the fast movements on the slow side, and the slow movement on the fast side, there isn't enough variety overall. A flawed but illuminating performance.

PROKOFIEV: Piano Sonatas 7 & 8; Two Pieces from Romeo and Juliet. Vladimir Ashkenazy, piano. London CS-6573. $5.98.

PROKOFIEV: Piano Sonata No. 7. SCRIABIN: Piano Sonata No. 3. Glenn Gould, piano. Columbia MS-7173. $5.98.

The disparity in quality between the two Prokofiev sonatas is striking, although not more so than the difference between the two performances of the Seventh Sonata. "Socialist Realism" in the latter work consists mainly in saying relatively simple things and saying them often, whereas the Eighth Sonata leans heavily on an alternative formulation of that doctrine: saying things that other people have said, but with minor differences. The fine line between parody and pastiche is frequently crossed in the later work, with embarrassing results, whereas the Seventh Sonata maintains a certain level of interest by its harmonic adventures (in the first movement) and virtuosic inventiveness (in the Precipitato finale).

Even without the evidence of his flip liner notes, one can tell that Gould doesn't take the music very seriously; his cocktail-piano clichés (rolled chords and "expressive" delays, especially in the slow movement, already dangerously soupy) underline the music's least attractive elements. Ashkenazy, on the other hand, clarifies phrase structure and manages to generate textural interest in even the sparest transitional material. A further difficulty with the Gould record is its overheavy bass sound, which tends to drown out important upper-register material. (The Scriabin sonata is not one of his harmonically exploratory ones, nor does it present serious formal problems; Gould's facility at clarifying counterpoint is welcome, although this is not really a central issue in this music. Surprisingly, Gould phrases the slow movement tunes more convincingly in their elaborately decorated versions than in the original statements.)

LETTER TO THE RESISTANCE

I have swum in clear sweet waters all my days. . . .
— Theodore Parker

At a certain bend
in the Pine River

we tie our canoes to overhanging boughs

and slip into the clear sweet waters.
Our flesh gathers with the current.

We test our footing.
One can't stand still in this stream. Either you let it pull you down or you swim against it.

And even then one can't expect to go far upstream.

It is enough that with every muscle moving in perfect time

you keep among your friends and the canoes.

JONATHAN SCHWARTZ

Ultimately, the most satisfying part of these records is the two bands devoted to "encore-piece" arrangements from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet ballet—extremely skillful exploitations of piano sonority, without formal pretensions, and played to perfection by Ashkenazy.

Other recommended recordings:

BACH: Harpsichord Concertos, BWV 1052-65. Gustav Leonhardt, Anneke Uitenbosch, Eduard Müller, Janny van Wering, Alan Curtis, harpsichords. Leonhardt Consort; Concentus Musicus. Telefunken SCA-25022. $29.75 (five records).

DEBUSSY: Images for Orchestra; Danses sacrée et profane. Alice Chalifoux, harp. Cleveland Orchestra. Pierre Boulez, cond. Columbia MS-7362. $5.9

ELGAR: Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47. Serenade in E minor, Op. 20. Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. Argo ZRG-573. $5.95.

LOEWE: Ballads. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, baritone; Jörg Demus, piano. Deutsche Grammophon 139416. $5.98.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Serenade for Strings, Op. 48. Souvenir de Florence, Op. 7. Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. Argo ZRG-584. $5.95.

PERSONALS

IF YOU'RE INTERESTED IN LIVING AND WORKING in a sheltered cooperative community where you can devote yourself to social research and burning social causes free of commercial headaches, day to day pressures and distractions, we'd like to hear from you. All living requirements met but salary is small. A consortium of non-profit cultural, intellectual and educational organizations in the fields of book and magazine publishing, in the issuance of records and tape cassettes, is sponsoring this cooperative project. For further information: CONSORTIUM, Box 199, Ridgewood, New Jerey 07451.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

Crossword Puzzle No. 1323

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 One might not expect such a party to carry a broken spur get up. (8)
5 Not a good bet, as a matter of sound lessons. (6)
9 Cordial, but only at a fair revaluation. (7)
10 Possibly goes aground in such a state. (7)
11 Common jail, and one who should be there? (7)
12 Swallows like this, as a way of finding a soft spot. (7)
13 A source of trouble between the Twenties and the Forties, possibly. (10,3)
15 They might fall in April to presage June activity. (6,7)
21 It's strange, but I'm in our part of Africa now! (3,4)
22 Sounds like a cruel way to take an interest in something! (7)
23 The sort of hint not found in a way to prevent crowding. (4,3)
24 Stuck with the answer? (7)
25 See 6 down
26 Ask Barnaby, possibly, how it is to be reluctant to grant anything. (8)

DOWN

1 Points about a translation one might copy. (6)
2 Telling behavior of some old dogs? (7)
3 Keep oneself from getting air? (7)
4 Probably about eight hours, and possibly on the floor. (8,5)
6 and 25 across Doesn't prepare the dinner correctly, possibly because there was too much toasting before it. (5,2,1,5)
7 It might be stretching, but you can see what a double quintet could do! (7)
8 What one could do with a good plug! They shouldn't hold things forever! (8)
10 Perhaps no state's rights if they do! (13)
14 One could rule this to be equivalent to a sort of artisan, as at some mix-up about the hotel perhaps. (8)
16 Ore smelted with most of 21 proves more accommodating. (7)
17 No nurse, however qualified, could be so essential to a body. (7)
18 The one that got away? (7)
19 Seemingly headed more or less this way in a boat so propelled? (7)
20 Ooze. (6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1322

ACROSS: 1 Cross-grain; 6 Scum; 10 Rooters; 11 Putters; 12 Understatement; 14 Arranged; 15 Screen; 16 Endows; 18 Tellable; 22 Money in the bank; 24 Growled; 25 Entrain; 26 Date; 27 Underrated.
DOWN: 1 Corrugated; 2 On order; 3 Steering wheels; 4 Rosette; 5 Impute; 7 Cleanse; 8 and 23 Massaged; 9 Stamp collector; 13 Unreckoned; 17 Drop-out; 19 Extreme; 20 Blatant; 21 Midden.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

101 OFFICE SHORT CUTS

Magi Maxwell

Available again to the Discerning and Astute

A collection of office short cuts to save you and your employees time, money and nerves, with the opinions of about 40 PROMINENT AMERICANS, on what they want in a Secretary.

Included are exclusive ideas from J. Edgar Hoover, Margaret Mead, Arthur Krock, Dr. Karl Menninger, Bonaro Overstreet, W. M. Kiplinger, etc.

Available at bookstores or mail $1.98 to:

REAL NEW BOOKS
P.O. Box 1432, G.P.O.
New York City 10001

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

EDWARD M. KENNEDY QUARTERLY. Everything about the Senator. 4-issue subscription: $2.00. Sample copy: 50c. Write: EMK—N, 675 Tysens Lane, Staten Island, N.Y. 10306

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

BOOK PRINTING — Paperbacks, hard cover, pamphlets. As few as 200 copies. Quality printing at Budget Prices. Free details. Sua 285N, Floral Park, N.Y 11001

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

The Mystery Of The Missing Majority

Finally a clue to the whereabouts of the silent majority. Take a look at the letters column in this week's NATION. One of our readers, Ruth Goldberg, reports how her letter to the President denouncing his recent speech on Vietnam was answered by his office with a thank you note! The President appreciated her support.

How many of the much publicized "congratulatory" letters really condemned the President's speech? Has the Administration forgotten how to read, or has it suddenly developed a sense of humor?

The real majority of Americans is not silent, but silenced. Sometimes gassed and clubbed, sometimes ignored, vast numbers of people still struggle to be heard, seen and effective.

The NATION speaks for these people. The NATION speaks for those who, like Ruth Goldberg, find that a single voice can be more than useless, it can be used.

Join us. Support The NATION with your subscription. If you use the coupon below, we will add four bonus issues to your one-year subscription. We guarantee that even President Nixon cannot mistake us for supporters of his war.

BONUS OFFER: If you join us for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me four bonus issues at no additional cost.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 12-1

MORATORIUM IN PARIS PETER GEISMAR

THE NATION

DECEMBER 8, 1969 35 cents

S-TOR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
DEC 16 1969
LIBRARY

NOVEMBER IN HANOI
WILLIAM MEYERS

POLITICAL SURVEILLANCE
The Invisible Police
JOSEPH R. LUNDY

Open Letter
'DEAR MAYOR LINDSAY'
THEODORE J. LOWI

AMBASSADOR GALBRAITH / Joseph Lelyveld
Dennis Duffy on McLuhan

LETTERS

bases of trouble

McHenry, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: Anyone concerned with long-range peace plans must give attention to the world's predictable trouble spots. It would certainly be helpful if we could find permanent solutions for some of our international problems, rather than heaping new on old in unmanageable profusion. To that end, we suggest that the UN consider, develop and adopt a plan by which these predictable trouble spots could come under UN control and be converted from national liabilities into international assets.

We suggest that certain territories be acquired, by deed or long-term lease, by the UN, with the double benefit of removing such territories from international contention and providing the UN with valuable facilities and bases for extended operations. Consider American military installations on Okinawa and at Guantánamo Bay. . . . Both installations are a source of irritation to other governments and to the indigenous population. . . . Both are of declining strategic importance to the United States. In both areas the United States has a large dollar investment. Both present problems of extrication without loss of prestige.

We are not alone in our dilemma; to name one instance, the British have a similar involvement on Gibraltar.

Can the United States, unilaterally or in conjunction with other governments, propose cession of such territories to the UN? Could the UN Charter be revised to permit acquisition of such facilities? . . .

The ultimate usefulness of such sites may be as precinct stations for a permanent UN security force. At the present moment many people all over the world would support the creation of a UN force to deal with two specific crimes: the hijacking of airplanes and the worldwide drug traffic. These crimes should be defined by international law, and an organization adequate to the enforcement of that law, under UN command, should come into being. Many of the jurisdictional and operational problems attendant on the creation of such a force could be solved within this limited context, permitting expansion of the organization to cover other crimes and security threats by further international agreement. Mary and Charles S. Liebman through the veneer

Springfield, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: Your editorial, "Tough Questions" [Nov. 24] . . . cut straight through layers of veneer that conceal the significance of the "educational-industrial complex." As an educator, I had to discover in The Nation any incisive analysis of this sinister situation. It is frightening. Please follow it further.

The editorials of The Nation are the most penetrating and relevant of any commentaries upon current issues that I have found. Theodore Brameld, Springfield College letter from the ranks

Chu Lai, Vietnam

DEAR SIRS: You did an excellent job of exposing the Marine brig at Camp Pendleton [The Nation, Sept. 15]. . . . I have been informed this was also the subject of a feature article in a recent Life issue . . . "the boys in Vietnam" were never informed through the newspaper, Stars and Stripes.

I would also like to congratulate the two businessmen from my home town, Portland, Ore., on expressing their opposition to the war [editorial, "High-Level Disaffection" by Ralph Friedman, Oct. 20]. With more courageous men like Mr. Vollum and Mr. Kane stating their views publicly, I think President Nixon might have to reconsider his policy in Vietnam. R. W. Sheets, Jr., PN 3

EDITORIALS

Giving Up At Paris

It is difficult to understand the encomiums which are being showered on Henry Cabot Lodge as he prepares to leave his post as chief American negotiator in Paris. Lodge adhered to a completely sterile policy on Vietnam; it began in misconception and ended in failure. As envoy to the regime in Saigon which we had set up, he declared that we were "doing here in 1966 what wasn't done against Hitler in the Rhineland in 1936 or in Czechoslovakia in 1938. Thus we will . . . avoid World War III." He was committed to the "no-appeasement" policy, based on a manufactured analogy between Munich and Vietnam.

In Paris he complained that the enemy refused to negotiate because they insisted on American withdrawal as a prerequisite. Lodge wanted Hanoi to withdraw its troops while we were withdrawing ours, but our plan was to leave enormous amounts of materiel in the hands of the South Vietnamese regime, continue to give it logistic and financial support, and provide air power as long as the hostilities required. All of that is tantamount to continuing the war by proxy. The killing would continue, but public opinion at home would be mollified by the reduction of American casualties. Then, according to the Lodge theory, the war would fade away and the United States would have achieved an "honorable" peace. How Mr. Lodge could convince himself that the enemy would acquiesce in such an arrangement is beyond understanding.

Xuan Thuy, the North Vietnamese delegate, contends that Hanoi is ready at any time to meet the United States in private talks aimed at ending the war. Joseph Starobin, former foreign editor of the Daily Worker who left the Communist Party in the 1950s and now teaches at a Canadian university, reported recently on a series of talks he had had with his old acquaintance, Xuan Thuy, in Paris. The North Vietnamese, Starobin told Senator Fulbright, would accept "the principle of complete [U.S.] withdrawal" instead of "total and prior withdrawal" and said that they are prepared to "bargain" over the formation of provisional coalition government. This last is the sticking point; we will not negotiate the possibility of a coalition government. We want to negotiate mutual withdrawal. Such a position is the diplomatic equivalent of General Electric's strategy of Boulwarism in dealing with labor unions: set forth your terms and then stick to them.

In view of this rigidity, one might suppose that the resignation of Lodge and his absentee deputy, Lawrence Walsh, is of little moment. Unfortunately it carries considerable significance. President Nixon has indicated that he will not soon appoint a successor to Mr. Lodge. The rationale, of course, is that the Administration is bringing pressure to bear on the North Vietnamese to negotiate and, at the same time, increasing its "options." The difficulty with this argument is that the resignations of Lodge and Walsh indicate that President Nixon is now wholly committed to the strategy of "Vietnamization," but that strategy has been dealt a severe blow by the massacre stories and, also, by the accumulating evidence—it was already of mountainous proportions—that the South Vietnamese regime cannot take over now or in the foreseeable future.

The American Conscience

It is improbable that the alleged massacre at Song My ("Pinkville") is all allegation. The version of the South Vietnamese government—that some peasants were accidentally killed by an artillery barrage—may be dismissed out of hand. (To call this a government is blatant flattery. It is a tyranny set up with American aid on a Gargantuan scale; its sole purposes are propaganda and plunder. When it issues a statement, the opposite of what it says is more likely to be true.)

On the other side, we have the testimony not only of Vietnamese who escaped with their lives and who assert that they saw their neighbors and relatives machine-gunned, but also of the American combat veterans who could have no conceivable motive for bearing false witness (at considerable personal risk) against their countrymen. Ronald L. Ridenhour, a former Sp/4, who broke the case, says he is being deluged with "redbaiting, gut-level hate mail."

Ridenhour, however, was not an eyewitness to what occurred; his informant, Sgt. Michael Bernhardt, was. Bernhardt is still in the Army and was told to make no statements while the matter was under investigation. There may have been sound legal reasons for the order, but Bernhardt disobeyed it on grounds of conscience. He asserts that there was indeed a massacre, and that it was deliberate. "It was point-blank murder, and I was standing there watching it," he says. There was no resistance, he saw only three captured weapons, and the detachment accused of the shooting—Charlie Company, First Battalion, 11th Brigade, 20th Infantry Division—had suffered no casualties at the time, although they had taken heavy losses in that area previously. He did not see a single male of military age—"only old papasans, women and kids."

Then there are the photographs of the slain, taken by Ronald L. Haeberle, a former Army cameraman. Haeberle tells the same story as Bernhardt, and adds such items as this: "There were two small children, a very young boy and a smaller boy, maybe 4 or 5 years old. A guy with an M-16 fired at them, at the first boy, and an older boy went over to protect the smaller boy. The GI fired some more shots with a tracer, and the tip somehow seemed to be still burning the boy's flesh. Then they fired six more shots and just let them lie." There is also the eyewitness account of Paul Meadlo of Indiana, now out of service, who was interviewed on CBS News by Mike Wallace.

If these stories are true, the Americans involved behaved with an on-the-spot savagery that exceeded even that of the Germans at Lidice in World War II. The Nazis wiped out the village, shot all the men, and dragged the women and children off to concentration camps.

The reaction of the counsel for one of the accused soldiers is also reminiscent of Nazi reasoning. "It would have

IN THIS ISSUE

December 8, 1969

EDITORIALS

618

ARTICLES

622 November in Hanoi — William Meyers

624 Open Letter: "Dear Mayor Lindsay" — Theodore J. Lowi

627 The Moratorium in Paris — Peter Geismar

629 Political Surveillance: The Invisible Police — Joseph R. Lundy

632 The Biggest Dump: Pollution Goes Underground — David M. Evans

635 Co-ops on Campus: The Militant Consumers — Barbara W. Newell

BOOKS & THE ARTS

637 Galbraith: Ambassador's Journal — Joseph Lelyveld

638 McLuhan: Counterblast — Dennis Duffy

638 Limit (poem) — Betty Adcock

640 Coover: Pricksongs & Descants
Howe: Forty Whacks — Shaun O'Connell

641 Dennis: Operational Thinking for Survival — Frederick L. Schuman

642 Theatre — Harold Clurman

646 Art — Lawrence Alloway

646 Looking into my Granddaughter's Eyes (poem) — Carl Rakosi

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION Volume 209
No. 20

been better for the U.S. if these men had never been charged," this lawyer said to Barry Cunningham, a New York Post reporter. "These kinds of incidents give our enemies something to seize upon. I regret to see our country prosecute its own people for trying to carry out a mission and win a war." In short, anything goes.

The one redeeming feature of the Song My mission, insofar as one can judge at this stage, is that American GIs have come forward with their accusations. Commissioned officers have been silent. In the case of the documented story by Daniel Lang of the kidnapping, rape and murder of a Vietnamese girl, carried by The New Yorker and now out in book form, a GI was likewise the accuser. The commissioned officers told him to lay off: "You can't buck the system."

The Army has responded as it usually does when confronted with a major scandal. Lieutenant Calley will be given a general court-martial on charges of premeditated murder. Selecting a lower echelon officer to take the rap for the top brass is, of course, standard operating procedure in the Army. At the same time, the Pentagon has ordered Lieut. Gen. William R. Peers to investigate the facts anew—and also to determine what went wrong with the earlier investigation, ordered by Secretary Laird, which resulted in a whitewash. The argument will now be made that nothing further should be done pending the outcome of these proceedings. But that will not hold water. The public has lost confidence in proceedings by which the Army investigates itself, and notably so in this instance where it tried to cover up the massacre when it occurred.

Unless there is a full-scale public hearing by a Congressional committee, preferably a special joint committee, and failing that some committee other than Armed Services (Senate or House), another whitewash, as in the Green Beret case, is predictable. A public hearing can be held without prejudice to Calley's rights. Those portions of the evidence referring to him can be taken in Executive session or the committee can simply investigate "around" Calley's participation. But a public hearing is mandatory. Nothing less will suffice. For not only soldiers —and the Army—are on trial but the American conscience as well, and the nation and the world will be watching.

Never Mind the Experts

Having issued a stern warning to The New York Times and The Washington Post for their anti-Nixon bias, Vice President Agnew should next direct his attention to The Wall Street Journal, which all too often goes in for the kind of article that must make painful reading in the White House.

Take, for instance, Alan L. Otten's column of November 12. Through the efforts of Rep. Sidney Yates (D., Ill.) Otten got hold of the full record of President Nixon's "SST Ad Hoc Review Committee," a body of high-ranking men from twelve federal agencies, with Under Secretary of Transportation James Beggs in overall charge. The twelve divided themselves into four subcommittees, deliberated intensively, and sent in their reports, which were notably pessimistic on the future of the SST. For instance, the subcommittee studying environmental impact stressed not only previously discussed problems of sonic boom and noise but delved into hazards to passengers and crew from rapid acceleration, gravitational changes, increased ionizing radiation, reduced barometric pressure, temperature changes, aircraft vibration, etc.

But when Beggs wrote his summation, it had little to do with the views the panel had given him. For instance, he conceded that the hazards cited by the environmental subcommittee were "potentially serious," but added on his own, "They are largely known, and can be carefully examined, and a decision made to avoid them."

Beggs's summation was so far at variance with the panels' reports that some of the members protested forcibly. For instance, Lee DuBridge, the Presidential science adviser, complained that Beggs's conclusions do not "adequately reflect the range of uncertainties and generally negative character of the panel reports and committee discussions as I understand them."

The upshot was that the full committee was again convened and it was agreed that since no consensus was possible the entire voluminous record should be sent to the President. Mr. Nixon thereupon asked Congress for $96 million of new money to start construction of two SST prototypes. Challenged by Representative Yates to explain how Mr. Nixon could have arrived at this decision in view of the task-force findings, Mr. Beggs said blandly that the Ad Hoc Committee report was "the least definitive and most outdated of all the documents furnished to the President by the Transportation Department."

To imagine that the President actually studied the whole record would be plain silly. As usual, he made his decision on political grounds, for which Mr. Beggs provided the necessary backing. Everything else was ignored. Otten wonders how often this happens. More often than not, one may suspect.

USIA's Quickie

What Vice President Agnew means by his philippics against the press is quite clearly shown by the film, The Silent Majority, which was rushed into production by the United States Information Agency and sent to 104 foreign countries. Agnew wants the Nixon Administration, for which he speaks, to be in a position to make unimpeded propaganda for its policies. Critics will be free to agree or remain silent. If they say anything disagreeable, they will be blasted by Agnew, that master of devastating prose.

The Silent Majority is naked propaganda diaphanously clothed to make its message a little less blatant. It is a film follow-up of President Nixon's "Silent Majority" address on Vietnam, with the secondary purpose of neutralizing the impact abroad of the November 15 moratorium demonstration at the Washington Monument (even its detractors admit that it was the biggest event of its kind in American history). The film alluded to the demonstration but showed only a small section of the crowd as background for a USIA commentator who quoted "some observers" as saying that the demonstrators were speaking only for a minority. The "silent majority" was represented by about ten spectators looking on skeptically.

Another actor was Hubert Humphrey, in a clip which showed him chatting with newsmen after his meeting with the President. Mr. Humphrey was roped into expressing approval, only slightly qualified, for Mr. Nixon's Vietnamese policy. Still another actor was George Gallup, who explained that the public, by a ratio of 6 to 1, thinks that moratoriums and demonstrations do more harm than good. Asked whether this came as a surprise, Mr. Gallup said no: the public has never favored immediate and total withdrawal, nor have they favored all-out escalation.

But unquoted was a recent Louis Harris survey which shows a relatively narrow difference between those who approve of the demonstrations and those who do not. Nor was Gallup asked about his November 12 poll which carried his conclusion that: "The extent to which the public's views on the Vietnam War have changed over the last two years is dramatically seen in the shift from the 'hawk' to the 'dove' position since 1967." In December 1967 hawks outnumbered doves 52 to 33 per cent; in the November 12 poll, the reverse is shown: doves outnumbered hawks 55 to 31 per cent. The USIA may contend that the film was a "quickie" put together to counter the effect of the demonstrations, but the agency, which had little credibility before, has less now.

Last came the President himself, declaring that he would be untrue to his oath of office if he allowed himself to be dictated to by the minority who hold a view contrary to that of the "silent majority" and who "try to impose it on the nation by mounting demonstrations in the street."

The Silent Majority has a basic English sound track, but has also been dubbed into Spanish, French, Portuguese, Vietnamese, Arabic, Korean, Tagalog, Indonesian and the Mandarin dialect of Chinese. Why not Greek? There is a country that really knows what it means to be a silent majority.

Going Armed

The recent report on crime of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence was no doubt meant to shock, and it does. If present trends continue, it says, cities will be divided into "places of terror" and "fortresses." Central business districts will be fairly well protected by crowds during the day, but at night will become lonely caverns, except for an occasional prowl car. High rise apartments and residential compounds will be protected by private guards and security devices, and will be, in effect, fortified cells for the upper-income groups. Suburban neighborhoods will be protected to some extent by economic homogeneity and by distance from areas with high crime propensities. The well-to-do will leave their guarded compounds in the city and travel to work in armored vehicles through "sanitized corridors," and radical groups will possess "tremendous armories of weapons."

The ownership of guns will be "almost universal" in the suburbs; homes will be protected by an array of devices, from window grills to electronic surveillance equipment. Private automobiles, taxicabs and commercial vehicles will be routinely equipped with bulletproof glass, light armor and other security features; armed guards will ride "shotgun" on all forms of public transportation, and so on and on.

The Commission wanted, of course, to paint as chilling a picture as the facts would warrant, in order to emphasize the urgency of some of its recommendations for needed urban reform and social action. It is fully aware that the necessary funds are not likely to be forthcoming at once because of "other obligations"—read Vietnam, SST, moon shots, defense spending, etc.—so it suggests that the commitments and authorizations should be made now, and the money allocated on that bright day when funds might be available. In the meantime, however, there is a danger that the report will turn attention away from the causes of violence and toward a fetishistic pursuit of private security measures which in turn increase the fear of violence.

A few days before the Commission's report was issued, The New York Times carried a report on the boom market for guard dogs and, of course, the sale of guns has been increasing for some years. The trouble with guard dogs and guns is that both endanger the security of the home. Firearms in small shops, for example, are seldom used to ward off robbers. In the home, they account for a very high percentage of homicides, which are the result not of attempted robberies but of family rows. A well-trained guard dog is a lethal weapon. One expert is quoted as saying: "I equate a fully trained attack dog in the house with leaving a loaded cocked pistol on the kitchen table." Not so many years ago, a Doberman watchdog in New Jersey tore his mistress to bits. And only recently a police dog, through a mix-up of signals, nearly killed a policeman in Washington, D.C.

In fact many of the methods by which individuals seek private protection, through defense measures of one kind or another, turn out to be counter-productive. If a criminal wants to commit a crime, the chances are he will commit it. Guns and dogs will not necessarily deter him, nor will armored vehicles or electronic devices. On the other hand, the obsession with private security augments the fear of violence which, if it continues unabated, could trigger a repressive political movement of major magnitude. In the end, perhaps, the common sense of the citizenry will breed a reaction to the current preoccupation with personal security, very much as it finally produced a sharp reaction against the idea of building private bomb shelters. The more home owners think about the problem, the more likely they are to conclude that buying a gun or a guard dog may create more hazards than it would avert.

Minority of One

Those full-page ads urging the nation to rally round President Nixon and support his "Vietnamization" of the war—200 have appeared thus far, 120 more will appear—were paid for by the Texas tycoon H. Ross Perot (Electronic Data Systems, Dallas), at an estimated $200,000 for each run, and not by the nickels and dimes of "the silent majority," as you might have imagined.

NOVEMBER IN HANOI

WILLIAM MEYERS
Mr. Meyers is a New York attorney and businessman.

Some weeks ago, I received an invitation from the Jurists' Association of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam to visit their country—a trip that was for me a logical extension of an activity started a long time ago. Back in 1964, I knew little about the country that in 1969 I was preparing to visit. During the fall of that year, I had worked diligently for the election of Johnson, or was it the defeat of Goldwater? It is hard to believe today that I knew so little about the Gulf of Tonkin incident, which had occurred three months before that election. More than a year later, at the end of 1965, I was asked to help organize a Congressional Conference on Vietnam, to be held in Washington on January 21 and 22, 1966. Eight Congressmen and a group of experts and scholars met to analyze the current situation and prepare proposals for a negotiated settlement of the war. It was at this conference that I first began to understand the problems of Vietnam. However, it was not at all clear then, although it perhaps should have been, how soon and how seriously the deteriorating situation would bring disaster to our people.

The best way I knew of doing something to correct this situation was in my capacity as a lawyer. Late in February of 1965, I joined the Lawyers Committee on American Policy Toward Vietnam. It had issued a Memorandum of Law entitled "American Policy Vis-à-Vis Vietnam," a well-documented paper which concluded that the actions of the United States in Vietnam contravened essential provisions of the United Nations Charter; violated the Geneva Accords, which we had pledged to observe; were not sanctioned by the treaty creating the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, and violated our own Constitution.

In August 1967, I participated in a conference on Vietnam held in Stockholm where I met with several representatives of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the National Liberation Front. The bombing of the North, which had begun in February 1965, was causing untold destruction of life and property. The situation in the South was just as serious. I could not mistake the grim determination of these people to fight to their last man, if necessary, to achieve their independence.

I again met with several members of the DRV and the NLF in July 1968 at the First World Jurists' Conference on Vietnam, held in Grenoble. The bombing of the North was still going on, although President Johnson had talked of stopping it earlier that year. The determination was as evident and as grim as it had been a year earlier.

In October of 1969, on my way to Hanoi, I stopped off at Paris to obtain visas for Cambodia and North Vietnam. During a short stay there, I called on Col. Ha Ban Lau, Mr. Xuan Thuy's deputy negotiator for the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, and several members of his staff. We had an extensive discussion of the present situation in Vietnam. The determination of the Vietnamese was as strong as ever, but it was no longer as grim. A new buoyancy seemed to sustain them. Could it be that liberation was finally within reach?

My next stop was at Phnom Penh, Cambodia, where I had to arrange for a visa to Laos. While there, I spoke with Hanoi's ambassador to Cambodia. Again, I sensed a new element of confidence, indicating a belief that their freedom was obtainable in the very near future.

Four lakes and many interesting streets and buildings give the impression that Hanoi must once have been a beautiful city. The war has taken its toll and the need for repair as well as paint is very much in evidence. The man-size shelters stuck in the ground are not at all pretty, particularly now that many of them are partly filled with stagnant water and debris. On the other hand, the countryside is exquisite. It looks like all those porcelain vases and silk screens come to life; the jagged mountains rising from the mists, the black water buffalo in the lily-padded ponds. Amidst all this beauty, however, are the craters, repulsive reminders of American intrusion.

Except for a two-day trip to the province of Thanh Hoa, about 100 miles to the south of Hanoi, I spent most of my time in the capital, where I met many government officials. I had the privilege of talking for several hours with Premier Pham Van Dong. Here are some of my impressions of the point of view in Hanoi.

Fifteen years of battle against the American aggressor is no more than a moment, as compared to the twenty-two centuries in the life of the Vietnamese people as one nation. That is the source of their determination to fight on as long as need be to rid themselves of the oppressor. The Americans, they are convinced, will be forced to leave, as were the Chinese, the Japanese and the French before them. "Nothing is more precious than independence and freedom." Those words of Ho Chi Minh are never taken lightly.

That new spirit of confidence which I had observed in Paris and Phnom Penh was evident everywhere in the city and in the province of Thanh Hoa. It was best expressed by Premier Pham Van Dong:

> The more we fight, the higher our spirits, the more we are united. In the process of the war, our people have grown materially and politically. Our capacity has increased in many ways since the war started. At the same time, the U.S. faces a crisis such as it has never seen before. We have the capacity to intensify the war until it ends victoriously.

Nguyen Khoc Vien, editor of the twenty-two volume Vietnamese Studies, detailed the progress of his people. He said: "Although we are industrially less developed than was the United States at the time of George Washington, we have beaten your Mr. McNamara and your generals with all their modern weaponry." Minister of Trade Phan Anh, repeatedly expressed that new spirit: "We have built up much more than you destroyed. Our living standards are still low, but we are doing far better than before the war."

Here then is a country that has become stronger through fighting a long and difficult war. During the period of the bombings in the North from 1965-68, students at the university level increased from 50,000 to 70,000. Students below that level increased from 3.5 million to 4 million; illiteracy almost disappeared.

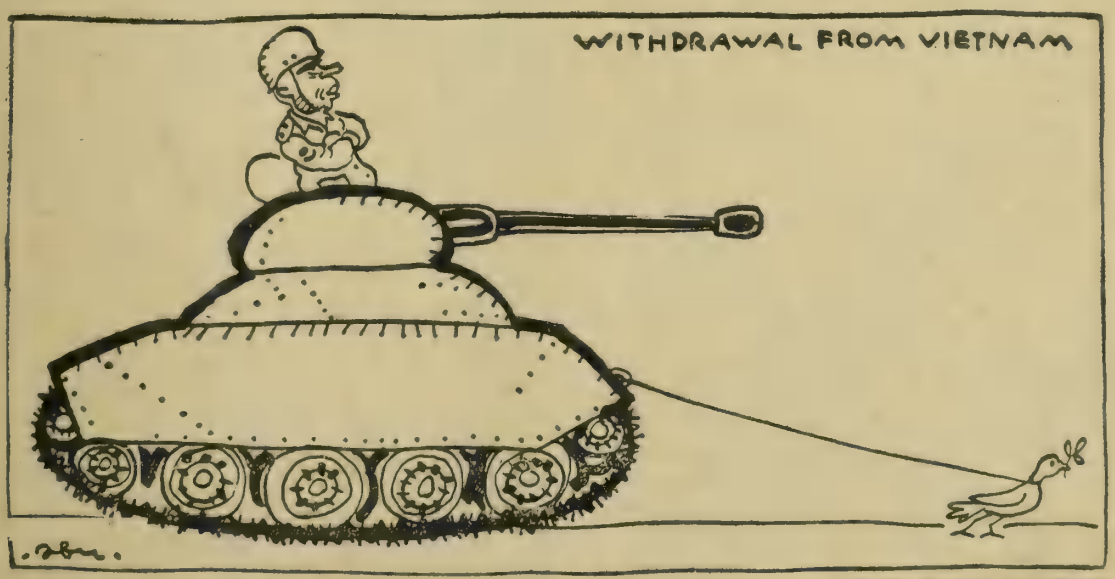
Major medical operations, hitherto possible only in the cities, can now be handled in each of 400 districts as well; the number of doctors has increased by 20 per cent. Malaria, cholera, yellow fever and smallpox have been eliminated. Measles, influenza and whooping cough have been brought under control. Rice production has increased, and crops have become varied. Factories have been dispersed to almost impregnable caves, forests and grottoes. Inflation does not exist because wages and prices have been held stable.

The North Vietnamese believe that their overall military situation is greatly improved. Instance after instance was cited to prove the inability of the ARVN forces to fight; why should they kill fellow Vietnamese, when they have been conscripted against their will? The men who talked to me said that American forces, cornered in a completely defensive strategy, are now largely confined to three cities, Danang, Hue and Saigon. In these cities they have set up three defenses, each of which has been penetrated. Moreover, within all three cities are strong forces of the NLF. Many instances of bombardment in the North are documented daily, despite the so-called cessation in August 1968, and the fury of the air war continues unabated in the South. Toxic gases and defoliants are used frequently. Those with whom I spoke are convinced that President Nixon still seeks a battlefield victory.



New strength to resist the American will has grown in the cities of the South from the "Alliance of Forces and Democracy," which has drawn to its ranks landowners, bourgeoisie, professional people and intellectuals. New leaders are beginning to challenge the Ky-Thieu-Khiem regime—Dran Van Don, Tran Ngoc Lien, Big Minh and Thich Pri Quag. Whether they become a third force or not depends on the extent to which the United States intervenes. However, the National Liberation Front thinks of them as possibilities for setting up a true coalition.

The spokesmen for the North believe that Saigon is also in a desperate economic plight. In many instances, prices have risen more than 100 per cent. Taxation has become so unbearable that the Saigon legislature has asked for the dismissal of several cabinet members. Black markets exist everywhere.

The Nixon speech of November 3 was brought up repeatedly in my conversations. His "Vietnamization" notion was taken as clear indication that he proposes to stay in Vietnam indefinitely, at the level of the "Special War" of 1960-65. He is trying to impose the Thieu government on the Vietnamese, and that government cannot last without American troops behind it. His "lull" is only a trick to capture American and world opinion—to convince some that the capacity of the Provisional Revolutionary Government (composed of the NLF and its allies) and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam has lessened, and to convince others that the United States has seriously de-escalated. Neither is true. Nixon never negotiated nor does he intend to do so now. He is searching for a victory through war, even if it means continuing to force Vietnamese to kill Vietnamese. His concept of the United States as an international gendarme is a violation of international law, preventing self-determination for people everywhere. And in Vietnam, they believe, it must fail, because the Vietnamese will continue to fight, and step up the fight if that is necessary to achieve their unity.

Nixon's prophecy of reprisals is, to them, another pretext for continuing the war by appealing to the emotions of the American people. The program of the PRG provides for a coalition government which will include all political viewpoints and social strata. The South will need such a government to establish social peace and to rebuild the country. Only such a program can bring reconciliation and security. Hatred is for the aggressors, not for the Vietnamese. The policy of the PRG favors the establishment of a broad national front. After twenty-five years of war such a coalition is essential.

The history of reprisals as given by Nixon is denounced as another distortion. In 1954, the North carried out a program against reprisals as ordered by Ho Chi Minh in

Indian Express (New Delhi)

Decree No. 218, dated October 1, 1954. I spoke to one of the signers of this decree, Minister of Justice Vu Dinh Hoe whose job it was to implement it. Few if any reprisals, he said, took place in the North. The situation in the South is another matter. The U.S. Government and its puppets, Diem and others through the years, provide good examples of what Nixon means by reprisals. Look, they say, at what happens to the villages of South Vietnam every day of every week.

The North Vietnamese leaders and their people have a grace and charm that are unusual attributes in a people who have suffered so much and so long. Their loyalty to Ho Chi Minh stemmed from love not compulsion, and I am convinced that their affection extends to the present Premier as well. They are much more charitable toward Americans than we have a right to expect.

I wish them peace, for when they have achieved it, we shall be able to heal our own wounds at home.

OPEN LETTER

'DEAR MAYOR LINDSAY'

THEODORE J. LOWI

Mr. Lowi, though now a professor of political science at the University of Chicago, has been watching New York mayors for years. He is author of At the Pleasure of the Mayor: Patronage and Power in New York City, 1898-1958 (Free Press); his most recent work is The End of Liberalism (Norton).

Mayor John V. Lindsay
City Hall
New York, N.Y.

Chicago

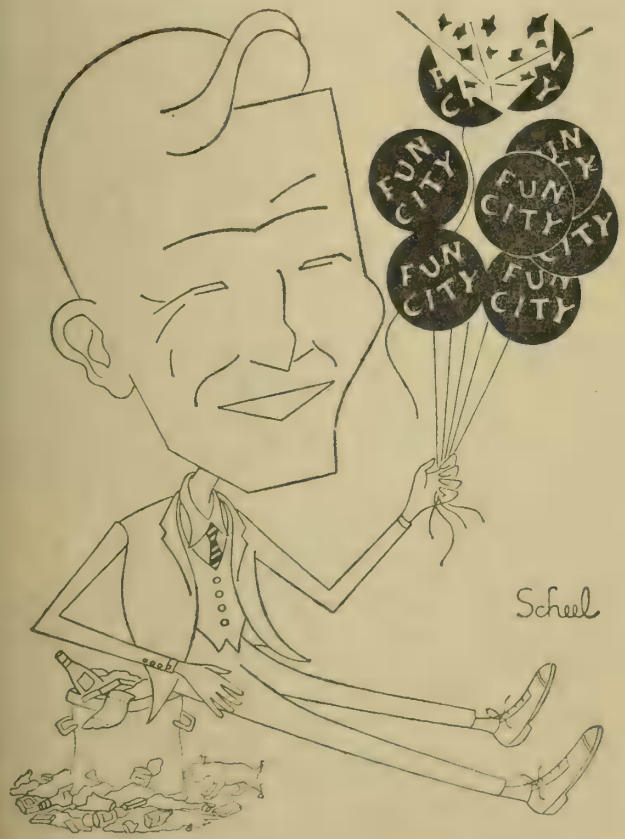
Your Honor: Congratulations on your stunning victory. I am proud to have been one of your early supporters. But I suppose I am fundamentally a typical citizen—I am never happy with the candidates I support. They never seem to understand that they are supposed to confirm quite specifically my reasons for supporting them.

This letter is an effort to catch you before you have read too many wrong meanings into your victory. I have had nightmares since November 4, imagining the consequences for New York and for urban life in this country if you come to the conclusion that your victory was (1) a personal one; (2) a triumph of fusion; (3) a triumph of liberalism over reaction; (4) a triumph of brilliant campaign tactics and strategies. Any one or a combination of such conclusions could easily lead to disaster as you plot out the next four years.

Lest your feelings be hurt and you refuse to read further, let me concede immediately that each of the four factors made some modest contribution to your victory. As an old and professional mayor watcher I can say that you are indeed a rare personality. It is just that personalities account only for marginal shifts in mass opinion. Obviously it was a brilliant campaign, but I need hardly call to your attention the help you got from the disastrous ineptitudes of your adversaries. And for a man who has suffered four years of office, I need hardly take the trouble of belittling the strength of liberalism in our time, whether we consider it as a mass movement or as a specific organization called fusion.

If you accept any one or more of these four explanations for your victory, you will all too likely continue to behave as though the solution to the problems of the cities is a matter of personal will, good intentions and cooperation among sincere and like-minded people. That would be a disaster. And worse, you might then tend to overlook the fifth reason for your victory. Without a complete awareness of number 5, you will continue to misunderstand the character of your own enemies. You will also fail to capitalize fully on your own resources. Explanation (5) is bureaucracy. It is a force that no mayor or campaign manager can create, but it can break and has in the past broken all the best intentions of office seekers and officeholders. It was probably the most important of all the factors in your election, and it will certainly be the most important in your future.

After the New York mayoral election of 1961, I observed that it would some day come to be seen as one of the most significant elections in American urban history. Deprived of the Democratic machine, Mayor Wagner created a "new machine" in the bureaucracies of New York City. It is not necessary to replay in detail the character of both his campaign organization and his administration. In brief, his City Council President had previously been Commissioner of Sanitation, following a lifetime career as a worker in the Department of Sanitation. His Comptroller, who is now your Comptroller, had been a career budget official and Director of the Budget Bureau. Major figures in his campaign organization and administration included one very popular Fire Commissioner and one very popular former Police Commissioner. It also included leaders of two union-based parties, the Liberal Party and the Brotherhood Party, which was formed just for the 1961 campaign. Within his top cadre were represented at least three large bureaucracies that are organized along precinct lines—fire, sanitation and police—and several unions with profound organizational relationships to large masses of city civil servants.



This pattern of organization was basic to Wagner's important victory in 1961—against odds only a little less formidable than yours in 1969. And his campaign organization had a great influence on the character of his 1961-65 administration. That helps to explain the unbelievable stalemate that characterized those four years, a stalemate he handed over to your administration when it began in 1966. Little wonder that your first crises involved you in (1) a major strike that Wagner had been completely incapable of handling because of the special conflict of interest that developed between himself and many of the strike leaders who had been instrumental in his re-election; and (2) the crisis of governmental incapacity that must have been responsible for your impressive but ineffectual efforts to shake up existing bureaucracies by setting up such new parent organizations as the Department of Human Resources.

But here's the rub. In 1969, you turned to a similar pattern of organization. So did most of the other candidates in the primaries, of course. (It is ironic that Wagner was the only major candidate in either major primary in 1969 who tried to revert to the "outside" route through electoral leaders and traditional constituency organizations.) It has been observed that your loss of the Republican nomination was the luckiest thing that happened to you in 1969, but you are only half the man I think you are if you do not now have the feeling of "out of the frying pan, into the fire."

You are now a man without a party. And you will soon discover, as fusionist mayors have discovered in the past, that the fusion base is woefully evanescent. Whatever happened, for example, to those store-front plans of yours? You will also discover—indeed you must know it already—that the Liberal Party is not a party but a front for some of the most oligarchic interests in the city. This is not to suggest bereavement for loss of the Republican Party; it is only to suggest the emptiness of your situation despite the extraordinarily effective organization you and Mr. Aurelio created for campaign purposes.

You are left with nothing but your bureaucracies. You are supposed to be their chief executive, yet you must depend upon them for your own political power. Unfortunately they do not have your interests at heart. Still more unfortunately, you may already have been captured; but none of us, least of all you, can know this until it is too late to do anything about it.

Your top administration is now composed of two bureaucrats. It is said that Inspector Garelik was an outsider among cops, but don't you believe it. Among the Irish he was an outsider, just as any Irish cop would be an outsider among Jewish cops, but that is merely at the ethnic level of police reality. There is also a professional and organizational reality which all career policemen have shared and continue to share. Urban crises have certainly led them to disagree more intensely with one another, and that in turn has led them to seek representation in each of the contending political movements of 1969. But below that is the reality of their unity when it comes to defense of the organization as such. Check the police Review Board issue of the past five years as a case in point. The police bureaucracy is an avidly sought-after resource, and one can always find contenders as well as sycophants where power is at stake. But one must always ask the old political question, just who is expropriating whom? The answer usually depends upon who last forgot to ask the question.

There are more than 32,000 cops in the city, and as many as half of them do essentially bureaucratic work, serving the other half and looking to the tasks of maintaining the organization. Their popularity is unusually low in the general community these days, but that tends to make them internally more unified than ever, to an extent not witnessed since the occasions in the old machine days when they were caught with their hands in the till. I would imagine there is even greater police solidarity today, because the unpopularity is less clearly justifiable.

With Inspector Garelik you will always have to live with the question of whose interests he is zealously serving—yours or those he picked up during his thirty-year career. But with your Comptroller, you are still worse off. At least Inspector Garelik will make every effort to behave as your deputy, despite the fact that he was independently elected. Comptrollers, in contrast, almost all have been notorious for their independence of the mayor in the history of New York. That has frequently been the case even when mayor and comptroller were of the same party. Even then, the comptroller was always from some county and some county organization other than that of the mayor, and there was always some kind of hell to pay. But now you have yourself a man who owes you nothing but enmity, who has ambitions utterly and completely contrary to yours, who is just as imbued with public spirit, who is just as convinced that he represents it, and who has a few resources you do not have: (1) He holds fewer purse strings, but he holds them tighter than do you. (2) Because of his career in Budget, and because he has the special bureaucratic temperament that never fails to ingratiate other bureaucrats, he can open doors to bureaucratic support that were never opened to you —and will be more firmly closed against you as you turn toward a more revolutionary rhetoric.

So, you have built your new machine out of many elements, but the most lasting ones are the pieces of the bureaucracy. It includes some top, bureaucratically recruited commissioners. It includes leaders of unions that have an immense stake in the city and an especially large share of control in such bureaucracies as sanitation, transit, housing and education. (For a real machine, check out DeLury's Sanitationmen's union. According to former Tammany leader Ed Costikyan, DeLury has a current file on every member and every deceased member's widow, arranged by assembly district and election district. When they wanted leaflet coverage, old-time party organizations could never guarantee more than 50 per cent; the Sanitationmen can get 100 per cent. This organization can be had by reformers for campaign purposes—it was instrumental for Wagner in 1961; how about you in 1969?) Finally, your new machine includes what some have called the liberal establishment; but when the casuals have gone back to their separate pursuits you will find that the real muscle there is the major newspapers, that the newspapers are reformist in the pre-modern sense, and that this means to them that any attack on the city bureaucracies is an attack on themselves.

Who, then, is expropriating whom? Do not be the last to ask the question.

I fear that you are not asking it now, and that you will certainly not ask it very frequently if you have become convinced that your victory rests only upon the first four explanations identified above. There is thus reasonable ground for fear that you will ultimately be expropriated by the bureaucracies. The result of that can easily be foreseen by taking a look at the last four years of the Wagner administration.

Bureaucracies exert a prodigious resistance to change. That does not mean that they are do-nothings or McKinley Republicans. Quite the contrary. It does mean that a bureaucracy, for all its efficiency, has no capacity to evaluate the consequences of its own actions or to plan for its actions against the actions of other bureaucracies. So the recent history of New York has been a combination of (1) dynamic stalemate, which prevents two or more bureaucracies from doing some desirable thing because they cannot get together in a common cause—for example, air pollution, water pollution, poverty, discrimination—and (2) elephantiasis, whereby one bureaucracy enjoying popularity or no opposition can attain its goals with little or no regard for other equally desirable goals —such as the extensive campaign some years ago for off-street parking in the midst of transit disaster.

Can a man of your immense capacity and considerable popularity counterbalance these historic organizational tendencies? I doubt it. And my doubts lead me to fear for the Republic. My fears were strong that you would lose in November because then there would have been even less hope for New York City. But even in the few days since your victory, my fears are rekindling because there are indications that you lean toward accepting the fourfold explanation of your victory and accept it as the basis of your power. My fear is based upon a single concept you have used on several occasions: home rule. You evoked it during the campaign, but of course one never believes anything anybody says during campaigns. But you have mentioned it since your election, and of course one believes almost anything candidates say after victory. Nothing you could say about abandoning your party, or destroying the two parties, or creating a new party, or doing without parties altogether could chill me nearly so much as those horrible words, home rule.

Home rule implies that you intend to face New York City all alone. You ask for more money as though more money will overcome the organizational flaws from which the city now suffers. Even if federal and state subventions were trebled, they would not go into your personal account. They would ultimately land in the accounts of the major bureaucracies, and these organizations have an immense power of discretion to do as their profession requires rather than as their mayor might dictate.

Home rule also implies that you feel that the sources of the city's problems lie within the boundaries of the city. It suggests that an independent city welfare system will solve the problem of poverty and its consequences in the city. Or, that a city can by itself and in isolation from its suburbs ever deal equitably with public education. From either of these two ills, or from housing shortages, employment discrimination, pollution or anything else, the city will die if it remains legally isolated from its environs.

If you wish to do something revolutionary, you first must revolutionize your own thinking. You must obviously quit depending on terribly old-fashioned notions, like efficiency and home rule, and you must also look toward things over which you might have some control. Otherwise, your revolutionary rhetoric only raises expectations with the prospect of dashing them.

As I look over the array of forces in your city (or in any other city) I am forced to conclude that the only truly revolutionary thing you could do is admit that the city is simply incapable of dealing with problems such as those just mentioned. Consider the advantages of this manner of thinking. Certainly the office of mayor and the legal instruments of the city are things over which you have a great deal of control—far more control indeed than you have over any neighborhood, any union or any economic pattern. If you offer to alter them or even to give them up in any significant amount, you must admit that, whether you like the results or not, it is revolutionary. If, beyond admitting that the city all alone is ungovernable, you then proceed to arrangements that are governable, for the city and for yourself, you would certainly guarantee your place in the history books. I sincerely hope this will appeal to you; it is so rare for a dynamic politician to offer to give up power.

In conclusion, then, it seems to me that such an admission would lead you, and you in turn would lead us, to direct identification of the problems we face and to a free-wheeling, supra-bureaucratic and supra-corporate approach to these problems. It would free you, in other words, to seek the proper level for each problem. Having recognized, for example, that the suburbs are parasites upon the city, you might, once you have admitted that the city is ungovernable, lead a fight to establish school districts and housing districts that would cut across all pre-existing boundaries—cut across the state lines of New York and into the real New York metropolitan area—but which would be organized along socially meaningful lines. Once you recognized that the city is ungovernable, you would be able to lead a true march on Washington for purposes of developing welfare districts that are of the size of the OPA districts and that supersede on welfare matters all the corporate districts within the larger district. You would then also be able to seek autonomy for districts far smaller than a city or borough, but they would be meaningful districts and not merely governmental ratification of the status quo.

This, Your Honor, is a revolution. What you promise for us in your prospect for home rule and for jousting with your bureaucracies, is near abdication.

Respectfully yours,
Theodore J. Lowi

THE MORATORIUM IN PARIS

PETER GEISMAR
Mr. Geismar, who has a doctorate in French history, is writing a biography of Frantz Fanon.

Paris

The Communist Party and a number of smaller leftist organizations had decided to use the moratorium observances of November 15 to test the reactionary policies of Pompidou's government. During the peace weekend, certain major features of the Fifth Republic's political physiognomy became clear once again. Pompidou, that smaller model of de Gaulle, showed his cleverness and strength—at least in tactics. The large Communist Party was revealed anew as an opposition so loyal as to be dutiful. The political sophistication and solidarity of the French youth was more than ever evident.

The moratorium gave Pompidou his first chance to try out the techniques of counterrevolution developed after May 1968. They worked. As part of the reversal of Gaullist foreign policy, to help rebuild Franco-American amity, the President forbade all political rallies within the city during the November 15 weekend. Nevertheless, the Communist Party went ahead with plans to mobilize 100,000 for a march through the center of the city from Les Halles to the Bastille. On November 14, the government put into action its latest anti-riot plans. Thousands of Compagnie Républicaine de Sécurité (CRS), the state police, using army equipment, were brought into the city to cooperate with the gendarmerie already there. By Friday almost 500 police were guarding the American Embassy and adjacent buildings. On Friday afternoon, when U.S. citizens began to gather outside, the CRS put into effect its most daunting method of crowd control. The embassy allowed only ten protesters inside the gates; the rest were quietly walking about outside. They all had to keep moving; anyone who stood still could expect to be arrested. As soon as a small group of Americans came together, the CRS would charge into it, grab one or two, rough them up in front of the others and haul them off to the waiting vans. The plainly visible beatings were an effective method of intimidation. The police announced that forty Americans were arrested between 2 and 4 P.M. It was probably somewhat higher.

Meanwhile, huge numbers of police were being dispersed to central points throughout the city for the real show the next day. At Place Blanche, near Pigalle, where I live, fifty CRS spent the night in their trucks. I could make no attempt to count the CRS in and around the Latin Quarter, which is not one of the city's political hot spots. Saturday morning, all over Paris, the government went into action.

Where the boulevards cross at Alesia, on the southern border of Paris, Le Monde reported: "All the passers-by younger than 30 were systematically put into police vans, and young people on motorbikes were asked to get off them; leave them there; and get into the vans."

Students from the Cité Universitaire might pass through Alesia coming into the center of the city. The official explanation for the mass arrests was that it was necessary to make "identity checks."

Anyone at all who tried to cross from the Left Bank of the Seine near Boulevard Saint-Michel, in the student quarter, received the same police hospitality. At other check points, in all the large places, the CRS was more selective, arresting according to dress and length of hair. By noon, all the subway stops near Les Halles were closed; and this old market area was blocked off by hundreds of army trucks and CRS carrying rifles. Still, groups of students were making their way to the neighborhood, and to the Bastille.

It has been rumored in the past that the Communist Party made secret agreements with the police when they marched. The CRS has seemed to give the C.P. militants clear passage when they do parade, even when demonstrations have been forbidden by the government. Now it appeared that the party had been negotiating with the police (the government) up to November 15, but with no success; Pompidou would not compromise. So, on the eve word went out to party members, a large percentage of the workers in Paris, that the demonstration had been canceled. The war in Vietnam wasn't that important; the Communists—more accurately the old men running the party—had no desire to confront the government on the issue; there might have been violence. Saturday morning, students and other leftists prepared for the demonstration with no knowledge of the C.P. retreat; L'Humanité had been urging participation right up through Friday.

I went to Les Halles Saturday afternoon to see how the government's counterinsurgency plans would work against 100,000 workers. Naturally, they weren't there (one can at least commend the party for its quick and efficient system of secret communication), and the police had very little trouble with the students who did make it to the old market area. The CRS always outnumbered the leftists and the fighting was very uneven; I was arrested trying to get away from one such encounter. I was beaten up a bit, to impress the others, then thrown into an army truck already packed with demonstrators and innocent passers-by. We waited about an hour, in darkness with no air and no room. Nursing our wounds, we began to talk. It happened to be my birthday, and at 31 I was the oldest prisoner in the truck. There was a pleasant sense of community within the van, each one asking about the injuries of the others. At one point they sang me happy birthday.

The first stop was the préfecture of the first arrondissement, where already several hundred prisoners were gathered in the open courtyard; they welcomed us with cheers. The crowd was full of spirit; there were continual songs and chants; the police became nervous and called in the water cannons. They were never used.

The authorities slowly emptied the courtyard, vans taking the prisoners to Beaujon for questioning. By 6 in the evening that center was filled to capacity; my group had to be taken out of Paris to the Fort de Vincennes which has been made over into a political concentration camp. We were left there in another police van for two hours. One prisoner had Le Monde, which he began reading out loud to the van, adding his own political comment. Then the Maoists started making fun of the Trotskyites, and vice versa. Nobody mentioned the Communist Party and when I brought it up a student turned to me and said, "Isn't that Pompidou's party?" There was a young Englishman in the truck who described his adventures. He had been teaching at Berlitz that day and didn't even know a demonstration was scheduled in the neighborhood of the school. He left work at about 3 P.M. and a CRS kicked him in the leg; he turned around ready to fight "the bugger"; another grabbed him by the collar; a third helped carry him off to the truck. It was only in the van that he learned why he'd been arrested. He intended to go to the next anti-government demonstration even if it meant missing work.

Le Monde wrote afterward: "The police chased demonstrators, but also others completely outside of the demonstration." That they caught a number of both variety was evident from a night of conversations at Vincennes.

At 9:30 in the evening we were finally thrown into a huge open courtyard; most of us had been under arrest for six hours. The men were lucky; they could urinate against the walls; no facilities were offered to the many young women. During the night, one of the older female prisoners fainted from cold and exhaustion; the police let other prisoners carry her inside.

The hours of the night were lightened by the sustained high spirits and humor of the crowd. Everyone was chanting and singing. "Ce n'est qu'un début; la lutte continue." "FLN vaincera." "Néexan Assassin." They sang the Internationale. Walking around the courtyard, I was amused to note that many of those from earlier conversations I knew were not part of the demonstration were yelling loudest. The Berlitz professor had lost all of his British reserve. The humor was mostly at the expense of the CRS agent patrolling the wall above us. At the beginning, each time that he reached the part of the wall in front of the crowd there were insults; and he would spit in reply. As the night wore on he seemed to run out of saliva, and the crowd became more inventive. At one point when he was pacing the rampart 500 voices would simultaneously shout "boom" each time his foot hit the walk. He was embarrassed; his gait faltered; he could hardly walk. Then the crowd was yelling, "Oh, he smiled. Oh, he smiled. Oh, he smiled."

Infantile disorders of the Left? Yes, in a sense. But most of those I spoke to had been arrested two or three times before. They'd all been beaten up. They were cynical, but also tough; completely unafraid of the government or its police. Outside of the order of things. It was nice to see people sharing their last cigarettes; giving up overcoats to those more painfully injured; able to joke about political differences in the face of a common enemy. The "innocent" people were impressed by the student radicals.

At 3 A.M., the police called for all of those under 18 years of age in the courtyard; I'd guess 10 per cent of the prisoners were in that classification. Later in the morning the rest of us were processed, photographed and questioned. Nobody that I heard would give any kind of straight answer to the questioners; it was always:

Were you in the demonstration?
What demonstration?
What do you do?
Nothing.
Where's your student card?
I lost it. Etc.

The youths knew just how much identification they had to produce and what they had to answer to stay out of jail. They were professionals. Young ones.

At 5:30 A.M. I was released with about twenty others from the fort. We started to walk toward Paris through the large Parc de Vincennes. The twenty of us thought we were alone until the first car passed us; its bright lights lit up ahead a solid line of freed demonstrators and freed innocent bystanders, trudging off to the distant city. The official figures were 2,600 arrested; it had seemed to me that there were many more than that at Vincennes alone.

I think of it as one of my better birthdays.

THE INVISIBLE POLICE

JOSEPH R. LUNDY
Mr. Lundy is legislative assistant to Congressman Abner J. Mikva of Illinois. He has written previously on police use of undercover agents for the George Washington Law Review.

Washington

Direct police infiltration of political groups is no longer merely a hypothetical possibility in America. The increasing use of police spies and undercover agents may have put us on the way to America's first experience with "political police."

Developments to date in the conspiracy trial of the Chicago 8 show that the government is relying almost entirely on evidence gathered by police undercover agents. Louis Salzberg, a newspaper photographer who, The New York Times stated, "had become a regular fixture at radical gatherings in New York City," revealed that he had been a paid informer of the FBI since 1967. A few days later, William Frapolly, a member of the Chicago Police Department since 1966, described how he had enrolled at Northeast Illinois State College, where he joined the SDS, the Student Mobilization Committee and the Chicago Peace Council. Earlier in the trial, Officer Robert L. Pierson repeated testimony he had given last year to the House Un-American Activities Committee, to the effect that he had infiltrated the Youth International Party in order to monitor its plans to disrupt the Democratic National Convention.

Spies and undercover agents are nothing new in law enforcement. For years, the Bureau of Narcotics has used undercover agents to solicit sales from pushers. The FBI's best-known undercover operative was Herbert Philbrick, whose I Led Three Lives was a best seller during the early 1950s; but the Bureau has employed the technique in other cases. A New York Times report in early 1966 indicated that the FBI had infiltrated the Ku Klux Klan hierarchy "to the Cabinet level." In August of 1967, FBI undercover operative Herbert Itkin was revealed as the key figure in exposure of James Marcus' underworld contacts in New York City. In March 1968, seven Minutemen were arrested for conspiring to hold up four Spokane banks, the evidence being provided by an FBI secret agent.

If the undercover agent has been an occasional convenience in cases of conspiracy, he has been a regular fixture of the FBI's war on organized crime. Herbert Itkin had worked within the New York Mafia for several years before he was "surfaced" in order to provide testimony against Marcus. A Boston businessman, Charles W. Grinnel, has related in The Saturday Evening Post how he volunteered to spy on Mafia representatives who approached him in connection with the "juice," or usurious loan, racket.

If Americans have tolerated police use of spies and agents, especially in cases of organized crime or consensual offenses which present difficult problems of proof, they have never been happy about it. In 1798, Rep. Edward Livingston expressed to the House of Representatives of the Fifth Congress his revulsion against a practice which immigrants from the continent had learned to fear. "The system of espionage being thus established, the country will swarm with informers, spies, delators, and all the odious reptile tribe that breed in the sunshine of despotic power. The hours of most unsuspected confidence, the intimacies of friendship or the recesses of domestic retirement, will afford no security."

This unfortunate European tradition reached what was probably its fullest flower under the despotisms of Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin. Allen Dulles, former director of Central Intelligence, was convinced that "it can't happen here." In The Craft of Intelligence, he wrote: "Our Government in its very nature—and our open society in all its instincts under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights—automatically outlaws intelligence organizations of the kind that have developed in police states." Recent examples of police reliance on secret agents raise doubts that the Constitution's protections are quite as "automatic" as Mr. Dulles thought.

The variety of clandestine investigative techniques employed by the police has always been considerable, but never as great as it is today, when science and technology have increased tenfold the possibilities of snooping. Wire tapping, the most feared, or at least the most widely recognized, has recently been brought under the supervision of the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches and seizures. Theoretically, after the rulings in Berger v. New York (1967) and Katz v. United States (1967), wire tapping is subject to all the requirements of a judicial warrant that have always applied to more traditional forms of search and seizure. What about secret agents?

Police secret agents may be distinguished roughly by what function they perform, at whose initiative they work, and what kind of accompanying gadgetry they carry. A fourth distinguishing factor, and a crucial one, seems to have been little considered by the courts—the kind of alleged criminal activity being investigated.

Informers are the best-known type of police secret operative. Working on their own, they need not be, and often are not, full-time informants. Informers usually live on the fringes of crime, and can readily provide useful information in return for small police favors, protection or guarantees against harassment. The Supreme Court has given some constitutional sanction to their use by carving out an "informer's privilege" as an exception to the rule that police must divulge the sources of information on which "probable cause" for arrest is based. On the other hand, the Court has said that if divulgence of an informer's identity is necessary to guarantee a defendant's fair trial, as opposed merely to proving probable cause for his arrest, that identity must be revealed.

Informers are among the most innocuous of the secret agents, for they work on their own, usually do nothing beyond mere information gathering, and carry no concealed transmitters or recorders. In the same category can be placed plea bargainers, known in England as "approvers," who supply information to the police by turning state's evidence once they are in custody.

Decoys and stool pigeons are used by the police, usually at an officer's initiative, to lure would-be criminals into action. To the extent that the decoy does not provoke the crime, or implant a criminal intent in the suspect's mind, his activities have been uncensured. When the agent, whether an outsider working at police instigation or a member of some official law-enforcement organization, strays over the line and stimulates some other person to commit a crime, the courts have protected the object of such provocation under the theory of "entrapment." Difficult as the distinction may be between an already present intent and one implanted from outside, the defense of entrapment does provide some protection against the wiles of the agent provocateur. Its deterrent effect on police resort to secret agents, however, has been minimal.

The types of police secret agents that seem to have been most recently in vogue, and with whom we should be most concerned, are the spy and the undercover agent. A spy is a non-policeman who is hired, targeted, trained, managed and paid by the police to gather information about some target group. The undercover agent performs the same function, but is himself a police officer who has assumed a "cover" identity. Such spy or undercover agent may have several functions, which can be best discussed in a review of the Supreme Court's evolving attitude toward such persons.

The Supreme Court first dealt with the secret agent problem in the case of Gouled v. United States in 1921. A government secret agent had gained access to the defendant's office by misrepresenting his identity and later, while the defendant was out of the room, had searched his desk and papers. The Court, equating entry by force and by deceit, held that a search where access was obtained by deception was barred by the Fourth Amendment's ban against unreasonable searches and seizures.

More recent cases have often involved the use of electronic devices. In 1952, the Court held that a miniaturized transmitter carried by a government spy, which enabled a narcotics agent stationed nearby to monitor the defendant's criminal proposition, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. A more difficult case was presented in 1963 when a government agent carried a miniature recorder to preserve for evidence the defendant's bribe offer. Here again, the Court approved, although it can be argued that the decision does not really apply to secret agent situations because the defendant knew that the person to whom he was offering the bribe was a law-enforcement official. Finally, in 1966, the Court approved the FBI's seeking approval from a federal judge before sending an agent to record a bribe offer in the case of James Hoffa. As in the 1963 decision, however, the FBI agent was not "secret," in the sense that he did nothing to conceal his identity.

It was not until 1966 that the Supreme Court reviewed two cases involving secret agents, unaccompanied by electronic devices, who merely infiltrated, listened, and reported. In Hoffa v. United States and Lewis v. United States, the Court decided that using unwired undercover agents for information gathering was not "per se unconstitutional." On the other hand, Justice Stewart, writing for a majority of four Justices in Hoffa, cautioned that "this is not to say that a secret government agent is to the slightest degree more free from all relevant constitutional restrictions than is any other government agent." What is included in "all relevant constitutional restrictions" the Court did not feel compelled to say.

The Lewis case involved a situation which has become commonplace in modern law enforcement—use of an undercover agent to buy narcotics from a suspect. Aside from the government agent's telephone offer to buy narcotics and consummation of the sale in the defendant's home, the officer's conduct was innocuous. Lewis, the defendant, did not even raise the question of entrapment. The combination of a serious crime, the agent's neutral behavior, the absence of socially useful activity which might be discouraged by the undercover technique, and the difficulty of procuring evidence of "selling crimes," all make it likely that the Lewis precedent will stand for years to come—at least until some alternative approach is found to the problems of narcotics addiction.

The Hoffa decision rests on far shakier ground. In the first place, only seven Justices participated in the decision —and only four concurred in approving the government's use of a former friend of Hoffa, who had recently been released from jail and infiltrated Hoffa's coterie, as an undercover agent. Chief Justice Warren dissented vigorously from the four majority Justices, arguing that the Court's supervisory power over federal courts allowed it to control such use of secret agents by the federal agencies, even if the practice was not unconstitutional.

Most significant, the Hoffa case involved a crime—jury tampering—which, like narcotics peddling, would be extremely difficult to prove without undercover investigative activity. Moreover, it is difficult to conceive of any socially useful activity which Hoffa could claim might be discouraged by the use of secret agents in jury tampering cases. In this respect, jury tampering is like narcotics peddling, prostitution, gambling or other consensual or sumptuary crimes.

What is most disappointing about the opinion of the four-Justice majority in Hoffa is its failure to deal forthrightly with the competing social interests involved in police use of undercover agents in a free society. Perhaps it was too early to anticipate the widespread use of police spies and undercover agents in the peace movement, the anti-war/anti-draft movement, and even the civil rights movement. (This kind of use, Norman Mailer noted in Armies of the Night, is "now accepted as a chronic joke" by participants in New Left politics.) But certainly the Court's overconceptualistic approach was unsatisfactory.

The Hoffa majority based its decision primarily on the "assumption of risk" or "misplaced confidence" argument. "Assumption of risk" is a phrase borrowed from the law of torts. But the first requirement of "assumption of risk" in torts is that the assumer should have had an accurate knowledge of the nature of the risk he was taking, and taken it anyway. In a secret agent case, by definition, the target individual does not know the nature of the risk. If Justice Stewart meant to say that the defendant waives the right to protection of his privacy when he "agrees" to deal with a secret agent, there is a similar conflict with previous Court decisions requiring that waivers of constitutional rights be knowing, intelligent and specific.

What Justice Stewart and his three colleagues in the Hoffa majority obviously believed, whether they said so or not, was that regardless of the apparent unfairness of using secret agents to gather evidence of crime, these agents are necessary in some circumstances, that their use in certain cases is itself of benefit to society. The fact that secret agents are sometimes necessary and do serve some useful purposes does not, however, mean that they should always be allowed. That is undoubtedly what Justice Stewart meant by saying that "all relevant constitutional restrictions" apply to police spies and undercover agents. But by failing to specify those situations in which secret agents would violate the protections of the Fourth Amendment, the Court has left the field wide open for infiltration of political and quasi-political groups by Red Squads, Congressional investigators and secret agents of all kinds.

It is not easy to measure how great a threat police secret agents present to the traditional American values of free speech and free political debate. Lack of information on the extent of police use of undercover agents, reluctance of law-enforcement officials to discuss their clandestine operations, and the absence of publicity about and recorded public reaction to police spies have combined to frustrate the balancing of conflicting social interests. But the balancing process is necessary, for when the Court decides that one must "assume the risk" of speaking, not, as one supposes, to a friend, relative or business associate, but to a secret government agent, it takes a position whose implications endanger the essence of a free society.

Application of the Fourth Amendment to secret agents who move into political groups would not ban their use elsewhere. It would not, if the Court chose so to limit its decision, affect their infiltration of such nonpolitical activities as dope peddling, gambling or prostitution. Nor would it even absolutely preclude their use against groups which call themselves political, but which are actually aimed at violence, destruction of property, or other illegal activity. The Fourth Amendment's ban is only against "unreasonable" searches and seizures. But the determination of when a search is reasonable is one which the Constitution wisely leaves not to the police but to a neutral judicial officer. Thus the issue is not that secret agents should never be used against groups which claim to be political; it is who shall decide when such use is appropriate. That decision should rest with a court, not with a policeman.

The Supreme Court is not alone in having avoided the difficult problems of secret agents in a free society. State legislatures and Congress, as well as police agencies at all levels of government, have done little to provide guidelines. In fact, it could be argued on the basis of past experience with judicial warrant procedures that even when the warrant requirement is in effect, it offers minimal protection. Moreover, any judicial guidelines for the use of police spies will inevitably require elaboration in state rules of criminal procedure or police administrative regulations. Thus Supreme Court action would be only a first step to protect sensitive First Amendment activities against police espionage.

The examples noted earlier of secret police operations in political contexts are only a few of many which could be cited. In recent years the training of Americans in military and civilian intelligence agencies has made sophisticated agents, formerly confined almost exclusively to the FBI, available to police departments at state and local levels. The existence of "special investigation" units in state and local law-enforcement agencies was documented by the Organized Crime Task Force of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice. It noted that in 1966 there were "effective intelligence programs" in only a handful of jurisdictions. How many *in*effective programs exist, the Task Force report did not say. Activities of the Chicago, New York, San Francisco and Los Angeles city police departments, as well as the New York County department, are discussed briefly in the report.

The extent of police "intelligence" operations cannot be precisely documented. A survey of such activity, made for the President's Crime Commission by Prof. G. Robert Blakey and entitled Local Law Enforcement Response to Organized Crime, has been suppressed by the Justice Department, despite specific requests that it be made public. A report in the February Chicago Journalism Review indicated that in Chicago, at least, the police intelligence unit is active enough to keep under surveillance a member of the City Council—a member who also happens to be black.

Former FBI agent William Turner has noted how hard it is to assure unbiased use of police undercover agents, especially in a time of growing political activism among police officers. "Every department of any size has what is variously called a Subversive Squad, an Intelligence Unit, or a Red Squad. With their jurisdiction tenuously hinged on archaic state anti-radical syndicalist or anti-anarchy laws, or no law at all, they constantly pry into the public and private activities of Communists and Socialists, liberals and intellectuals, beatniks and peaceniks, et al., while ignoring the subversive menace from the right."

Senators Hart of Michigan and Long of Missouri said in dissenting from the Senate Judiciary Committee's report on the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act that "traditional military intelligence has furnished [to local law-enforcement agencies] both the vocabulary and the tools by which it wages constant war upon [organized crime]. Almost every metropolitan police department and almost every major State has a bureau engaged exclusively in the collection of criminal—and political—intelligence. It was particularly interesting to find that these bureaus had no direct responsibility to investigate any specific crimes." The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act specifically authorized federal money and FBI technical assistance to local police departments to develop "special" investigative capabilities.

The New York Times reported recently that the Justice Department has begun its program of assisting local law-enforcement agencies by demonstrating "tiny electronic listening devices [and] undercover agents. . . ." Ironically, the officials to whom these new techniques were being demonstrated were from the South, an area which may not need instruction in undercover techniques. In 1964 the Subversives Unit of the Alabama Department of Public Safety was reported to be secretly compiling dossiers on civil rights workers, including some officials of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division.

More information on the extent of police use of secret agents against various types of alleged illegal activity is the first requirement. It is no coincidence that the Supreme Court's decision to bring wire tapping within the protection of the Fourth Amendment followed shortly after revelation of the extent of government wire tapping and the public's increasing fear of it. The necessary information could come through legislative inquiries, through administrative reviews brought about by political pressure on mayors and governors, and through tough-minded journalistic investigating. Once the extent of the practice is known, some hard decisions will have to be made—by courts, by legislatures and by the mayors and governors who ultimately control the police.

As Norman Mailer said, the infiltration of political groups by police secret agents had become, in 1968, a chronic joke. In a country whose traditions include what Justice Brandeis called "the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies," and which continues to pride itself on unfettered political exchange, it is not a very funny joke.

THE BIGGEST DUMP

POLLUTION GOES UNDERGROUND

DAVID M. EVANS

Mr. Evans, a geological engineer with the Colorado School of Mines, is the scientist who traced the cause of hundreds of small earthquakes in the Denver area to the pumping of waste into a deep disposal well.

A few years ago, cyanide, oozing from the ground, was found in the Buffalo, N.Y., drinking water. Recently, a well on the shore of Lake Erie blew out and spewed 150,000 gallons of stinking paper-mill waste into the lake every day for three weeks. Last July, the front yard of the James A. Lowe family in Wichita, Kan., puffed up, split open, and spilled tons of salt-saturated water. The walls of the Lowe home settled and cracked; lawn and flowers were killed.

If you still think of old oaken buckets and crystal pools at the mention of wells or bubbling springs, you might be surprised to know that near Denver, Colo., a farmer named Jesse Powers has a well that produces the weed killer 2,4-D. And Powers has a neighbor who discovered his well was flowing anti-knock gasoline when a visitor flipped a lighted match into a cabbage patch he was irrigating. In Ponca City, Okla., there are springs that flow oil. This is not too unusual in oil-producing Oklahoma, but these springs are different: the oil is refined motor oil—and some of the springs are in people's basements.

We hear a lot these days about pollution: smog in the cities; dead fish in the lakes and rivers; poisons in food, and a silence of birds in the land. As yet, we have heard little about pollution of the earth beneath our feet —but we should and will. As laws are passed to clean up the air and water, government agencies and industry are turning to the earth itself as the next great dumping ground. Pollution experts say there is more room for dumping underground than in all the surface waters of the land. If they have their way, the earth will become a garbage pit larger than all the Great Lakes, the Hudson, Mississippi and Columbia Rivers, plus all the rest of our lakes, rivers and streams combined.

To dispose of liquid industrial waste in this new dump, you drill a hole to a salt-water bearing rock layer, cement watertight pipe in the well and pump the poisons away. The dumpers point out that oil companies have pumped billions of gallons of salt water, produced with the oil, back into the ground. There are 30,000 such disposal wells in Texas alone, but this solution to a disposal problem has not been as successful as some people think. The spectacle of brine erupting from disposal projects has been compared to that of Norris Geyser Basin in Yellowstone National Park. L. G. McMillion, an official of the Texas Water Commission, warns that "A very large number of water wells, including wells in municipal fields (city water wells) have been affected by brine contamination." He says that in vast areas of north and west central Texas the fresh water is deteriorating and farmland is getting salty.

Most of Texas' salt-water disposal problems are out in cattle country. In contrast, industrial disposal wells will be located at factories near cities, where they will add to the already serious problem of underground pollution. The situation today in northern Illinois (around Chicago) is typical of that in many U.S. urban areas. There, streams and shallow underground waters are contaminated by surface dumping, land fill and sewage. Then, as fresh water is pumped from deeper formations for city and farm use, polluted water from the shallow zones is sucked along natural cracks and crevices into the fresh-water formations. Also, natural salt water, from deeper zones, moves up into the fresh-water formation. J. E. Hackett, ground water geologist with the Illinois Geological Survey says: "The problem is one of continuing deterioration of ground water quality over all or large parts of the urban region. It may proceed unrecognized until there is considerable and possible irreparable damage." That is the present state of affairs. One hesitates to picture what it will be like when hundreds, perhaps thousands, of disposal wells are pumping poisonous wastes into underground salt waters.

How poisonous are disposal well wastes liable to be? Dr. Don L. Warner of the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration (FWPCA) answers that waste can be considered suitable for deep-well injection when it is toxic "or otherwise highly objectionable and cannot readily be treated or disposed of in other ways." Some of the wastes now being pumped underground today are steel pickling liquors, cyanides, carbolic acid, radioactive wastes and organic chemical poisons from the drug and insecticide industries. Often several different chemical combinations are dumped into the same well. The 2,4-D pumped from Jesse Powers' well was not dumped in that form. It was produced spontaneously from various chemicals collected in disposal ponds by the nearby U.S. Army Rocky Mountain Arsenal. The grass in Powers' meadow died; so did his beet crop. The cows aborted and lost their calves. Many of the young pigs and some of the registered heifer calves died. If waste chemicals reacted to form new poisons in the holding ponds of the Rocky Mountain arsenal, chemicals pumped into disposal wells might react similarly.

In 1967, the FWPCA published a list of the known industrial disposal wells in the United States. From one or two wells in 1950, the number had climbed to 110. By 1968, 114 wells were in service and another thirty-six were being constructed. How do they perform? A check of their published histories reveals that 14 per cent of the wells were shut down or suffered "failures" in the first few years of operation. Half of the failures were due to corroded or collapsed pipe in the shafts. Some wells were abandoned when the chemical wastes plugged the disposal zones.

If at least 14 per cent of all disposal wells are going to fail after the first few years of operation, this may not prove as cheap a method of waste disposal as had been hoped. Certainly, the record should create some doubt that disposal wells will, as claimed, keep their poisons locked up "for all eternity."

One well was shut down when I proved that it had triggered hundreds of earthquakes in the Denver area. After admitting that it was responsible for poisoning the water beneath 4,000 acres of farmland (including Mr. Powers' fields and pastures), the Army drilled a 12,040-foot-deep disposal well at the Rocky Mountain arsenal. Waste injection began in March 1962, and the following month Denver suffered the first earthquake it had felt since 1882.

In November 1965 I pointed out that the 710 small earthquakes recorded up to that time correlated with the volumes of fluid pumped into the arsenal well. Periods of high injection resulted in many quakes; low pumping rates resulted in fewer earthquakes. When injection pressures were doubled, the number of earthquakes doubled. All earthquakes originated near the well.

Since the history of salt water disposal in the oil fields indicates that deep well disposal is not foolproof and since 14 per cent of reported industrial disposal wells have failed in the first few years of operation, it may seem surprising that anyone could continue to recommend this technique. And it may seem more surprising that one sponsor is the FWPCA, the agency charged with cleaning up the nation's water.

In 1965 Congress passed the Water Quality Act giving the federal government power to enforce a cleanup of the nation's waters. The following year, it took note of the need for a vastly expanded program of research in the Water Restoration Act. The FWPCA has apparently decided that the laws stop at our feet, since it is still promoting "properly planned and implemented" underground dumping. It is obviously unfamiliar with the conclusions of many thoughtful studies: Dumping—any dumping—is no solution to pollution.

Testifying before the Daddario Subcommittee on Environmental Quality in 1968, Dr. William T. Pecora, director of the U.S. Geological Survey, said: "No one is properly prepared to recharge water or liquid wastes into complex underground systems with certainty of the results that such an operation may yield. . . . Hopefully, the time is approaching when large quantities of polluted material cannot be dumped into the ground without considerable thought being given to the consequences."

In a report to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, the Task Force on Environmental Health pointedly omitted mention of any dumping schemes as possible solutions to pollution. The Task Force concluded: "What is possible is to find ways to eliminate contamination at its source. Or, next best, to capture a pollutant and use it in a non-harmful way; or, finally, to bring the level of pollution down to a point compatible with the requirements of human health and welfare."

Nevertheless, in a series of government publications

Peterson, Vancouver Sun (Canada)

issued since 1965, Dr. Don L. Warner of the FWPCA has advocated disposal wells. David Bird, writing in The New York Times (September 1), quoted Warner as defending the proper use of deep wells: "But the volume should be so small that the effect on the surface should not be observable."

One wonders what Warner means by "small volume." In a 1967 FWPCA publication, he described the well I have already mentioned as spewing 150,000 gallons of waste a day into Lake Erie. According to Warner, Hammermill Paper Co., owner of the well, was injecting "spent sulfite pulping liquor containing fibers, fiber fragments, paper filler materials such as clay, titanium oxide and lignin-like compounds in a colloidal and semi-colloidal particle-size range" into the well at a rate of more than half a million gallons a day. When the Times reporter asked about the blowout, Warner replied, "This was an engineering failure you don't expect routinely. We learn from these failures." Don't we just!

Once millions—or billions—of gallons of poisonous wastes are pumped underground, no one can promise that they will stay put. The pollution experts say that one check is to watch the pressure at which the waste is being pumped underground. If a well suddenly starts accepting more waste while pump pressures remain the same, one should suspect that underground rock formations have ruptured and that fluid is escaping from the disposal zone. Another check: Carefully monitor the fresh water wells in the area for any sign of contamination! We are not told what to do once we discover that a city's water supply has been poisoned. One possibility would be to keep pumping and abandon the city. These "checks" illustrate the point-of-no-return hazard of disposal wells: when something goes wrong underground, it is impossible to retrieve the poisons that have broken loose.

This brings up another question: What legal recourse does a landowner have when someone pumps poisonous waste beneath his property and causes contamination, or even earthquakes? The laws are a bit hazy, but in general he must prove that he is being damaged —and by whom.

In Ponca City, Okla., springs of refined motor-oil flow after heavy rains. Authorities do not know the source, though they suspect a leaking pipe line. Meanwhile home owners whose basements are flooded by the oil have no one to sue.

In Denver, Jesse Powers was able to prove that the Army was responsible for contaminating his well. But what if there had been a dozen disposal wells in the area? It would have been impossible to pinpoint the source, especially since the offending 2,4-D was not dumped. Powers' neighbor, whose irrigating well flowed high octane gasoline, was less fortunate. He sued a major oil company that had gasoline storage tanks nearby, and lost his case.

It is bad enough when oil, gas or salt water from some unknown source is erupting from the ground. A few years from now it may be poisonous chemical and radioactive waste. But not if Stan Spisiak of Buffalo, N.Y., has anything to say about it. Mr. Spisiak is chairman of the Water Resources Committee of the New York State onservation Council. He and his committee are leading he battle against disposal wells in New York.

Hooker Chemical Corp. of Niagara Falls, N.Y., has ust been granted a permit to pump 288,000 gallons of ydrochloric acid, carbolic acid and "organic traces" into 3,000-foot well. A similar permit has been granted to Bethlehem Steel Corp. Applications for other disposal ells to be distilled by FMC Corporation and the Nuclear uel Services Corp., have been filed with the New York tate Health Department.

Spisiak describes a 1953 incident in which cyanide ppeared in the Buffalo water supply. It was finally traced o a disposal well "blowout" in the nearby Sturgeon Point rea. He tells of another mishap in East Aurora, N.Y. There they found a spring of whey water a mile from a heese factory that was pumping it underground. I asked Spisiak what should be done to stop the pollution of the earth. He replied that it would be a giant step forward f we could just get state and federal agencies to obey and enforce the laws already on the books.

. .

At Spisiak's invitation, I attended the New York State Conservation Council's 36th annual convention at Lake Placid. New York's Governor Rockefeller addressed the council. He described the state's conservation problems. People: Ten years ago 28 million people visited the state parks; last year 44 million people descended upon them. Power: New York will demand twice as much electric power in 1980 as it does today. Pollution: There must be some pollution if we are going to give everybody the things they need. Then the Governor told a joke. He quoted Pogo, the comic-strip hero: "We have met the enemy—and they are us." Later I asked Stan Spisiak if he agreed with Pogo and the Governor. "Absolutely not. The enemy is them—the government agencies that will not enforce the laws!"

He told me of taking to state agencies documented proof that specific industries were polluting the rivers. He showed them photographs of open ditches carrying filth into the Buffalo River. "They simply will not enforce the anti-pollution laws," Spisiak said. "This 'damn the public' attitude is illustrated by the present dispute over disposal wells in New York State. The law says that public hearings must be held on the applications for disposal wells. Hearings are not being held. Yet, permits to drill the wells are being granted by state agencies."

At the federal level Spisiak describes the activities of the Army's Corps of Engineers, one of the worst polluters of dying Lake Erie. The corps dredges the filth from individual harbors—and dumps 6 million cubic yards of it out in the open lake every year so that all the water can be contaminated.

My own experience confirms Stan Spisiak's charges. In Denver, the Army first dumped its waste into the ponds which poisoned the well water beneath the farmland. Then it dumped into a disposal well—which triggered thousands of earthquakes. Finally, it changed its procedures at the arsenal plants so that disposal is no longer necessary. If the Army had been willing at the beginning to clean up the contamination at its source, taxpayers would have been saved millions of dollars for damages to crops and real estate by pollution, another $1.5 million for the cost of the disposal well—and Denver would still be an earthquake-free city.

The right way to fight pollution is to decide that waste must be re-used when possible; or that production methods must be revised so that disposal is unnecessary. In the Department of the Interior publication, "Man—An Endangered Species?" there appears this statement: "We can no longer afford a one-way ticket for our junk. Utility and beauty both demand a round trip." The automobile must not stop at the junkyard—it must complete the trip back to the steel mill. And harmful waste must not leave the factory.

CO-OPS ON CAMPUS

THE MILITANT CONSUMERS

BARBARA W. NEWELL
Mrs. Newell is acting vice president of the University of Michigan.

Ann Arbor, Mich.

A public accustomed to the opposition of the student community to war, imperialism and the military-industrial complex may have been surprised by the recent jailing of 105 University of Michigan students who engaged in a sit-in to support their demand for a store which would sell basic school supplies, including textbooks, at cost. The wide press coverage given to the anti-war aspects of student unrest has obscured the development of a student consumer movement which may turn out to be more enduring than the significant but ephemeral protests waged against the policy of the United States in Vietnam.

The students of the sixties have been subjecting their social environment to intense scrutiny. The whole thrust of the civil rights marches and the movements for academic reform, as well as the anti-war efforts, have been challenges to an environment that has permitted racial inequality, the injustices of war, and the continuation of tradition-ridden academic procedures.

In recent months students have turned to what they view as unfair and exorbitant profit taking by local merchants. In the recent inflationary years, educational costs have mounted even more rapidly than has the general price level. Consequently college youth is vividly aware of price trends in room rents, books, meals and student supplies. The convergence of this personal price squeeze consciousness with the rise of student political action has produced in the last year a dramatic growth of the student consumer movement. Since students at the University of Michigan have been leaders in this respect, I have been close to their activities in this field, but it is evident from the national press that the paths that Michigan students have broken are already being followed by other student groups.

The most dramatic expression of this new consumer consciousness is the rent strike to effect changes in both the price and the quality of local housing. University of Michigan students have accused local landlords in the courts of conspiring to maintain monopolistic prices. They have successfully sued for rent reductions in a number of cases where owners have not adhered to local housing codes. Student pressure has been brought both on the university and on the community for stricter housing inspection. The tactic of placing rents in escrow until corrective negotiations are concluded appears to have slowed the pace of rent increases in the Ann Arbor community. After six months of activity, one landlord and the student tenants union have begun their first formal negotiations.

The initial success of the student strategy at Michigan has registered at other institutions, and students at the University of Massachusetts, the University of Wisconsin and the University of California have this fall begun to employ similar tactics. The body of experts in the techniques of rent strike and effective negotiation that is now forming recalls the movement toward collective bargaining in labor law thirty years ago.

While the rent strike is the most dramatic device of the new student consumerism, it by no means exhausts the program. Committees now active on campus combine the investigating functions of a consumers' union with the demand for business honesty of a better business bureau and the social attributes of the nonprofit consumer cooperatives. In the last year, the University of Michigan student government has conducted a detailed price survey on personal and school supplies, rousing thereby sufficient consumer consciousness to mobilize the picketing of a popular local establishment because of unfair prices. A more lasting achievement is a store for basic student supplies, sold at cost. This enterprise started on $5,000 and has grossed $90,000 in six months.

The widespread support of this store intensified the student push for a student-faculty operated nonprofit bookstore. At that point the surrounding business community became alarmed, but despite its resistance the bookstore is now being organized.

Recognizing the support available for student-run enterprises, the University of Michigan students this year established the first entirely student-run credit union in the country. Six weeks after its formal opening, the president of the university and the president of the Student Government Council became the union's one thousandth and one thousand and first members. Consideration is now being given to student cooperative grocery, appliance and general merchandise stores.

The breadth and depth of this new area of student concern is directly linked to the fact that the large university is becoming more and more an institution of older students. Thus one-third of the current University of Michigan student population is married; 40 per cent of the enrollment is in graduate school. Increasingly, the leadership of the student consumer movement is being drawn from the older and more experienced militants who can unite the interests of both faculty and students. Students enter this new type of campus crusade for several reasons. For some, it is a way to save money and secure a better quality of goods and services. Others, concerned with the problems of the poor, see the consumer movement as the basis for an alliance for action. The New Left students look on it as an expedient to animate community responsiveness, so that an increasing percentage of those on campus will break with traditional practices.

Whatever the ultimate objective, this newly emerging campus coalition may pose a far greater long-run threat to the Establishment than slogans of "socialism now" or of opposition to the war in Vietnam. In all academic communities, traditionally, the relationship between town and gown has at best been uneasy. The growing challenge to the local bookstores, real estate agents, landladies and druggists is far more likely to touch a sensitive nerve than are anti-war demonstrations. Disillusionment with the military has become widespread in business as well as academic groups, but on most university boards of trustees are men chosen because of their close identification with business institutions and their experience in the conduct of businesses. They are not apt to applaud the emergence of a militant consumer movement, for their own careers have conditioned them to look with dismay at movements aimed to commit a university or its student body to competition with existing profit-seeking businesses, or which seek to disturb the right of individual contract in the market place.

Yet as long as inflation presses in on the students, the consumer movement will grow and take ever more significant forms. For a great many years the cooperative movement has ebbed and flowed on college campuses. Today it has become a new way to give shape and substance to the democratic process, while students gain from it a new understanding of the fields of housing, student supplies and credit unions. If there is any precedent for this revitalized effort, it is that of Scandinavia where such services have for some time been supplied on a cooperative basis. Nonprofit enterprises for selling and lending may appear unglamorous to the outsider but for today's students they are a highly constructive activity. Who knows, they may even continue their concerns after graduation.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

A Passage to India

AMBASSADOR'S JOURNAL: A Personal Account of the Kennedy Years. By John Kenneth Galbraith. Houghton Mifflin Co. 656 pp. $10.

JOSEPH LELYVELD

Mr. Lelyveld has served as correspondent for The New York Times in India and Pakistan. He now reports from New York.

"I should have preferred arriving, as did the Viceroys, from the sea at the Gateway of India in Bombay and a triumphal train passage to New Delhi, but one must make do with the twentieth century." This first jotting from India of John F. Kennedy's most extraordinary proconsul is as revealing, finally, as it is amusing. For, although Galbraith never does get around to confiding to his diary and its eventual readers why it was he wanted to go to India in the first place, it's plain that he is not going to be satisfied with merely manning an outpost for the State Department. He takes it for granted that he will be a shaper of events, that the subcontinent's encounter with him will prove to be a noteworthy diplomatic engagement.

In less than a week after his arrival, he has already resolved to build not only a swimming pool for official Americans in New Delhi but also India's first atomic power plant and a public-sector steel mill, a schedule of construction worthy of the Moghuls. Before another week has passed, his first luncheon with the Nehru family inspires him to gloat: "We have obviously been taken into the fold in a most agreeable manner." ("Agreeable"—a properly viceregal term of approbation if ever there was one—is his favorite adjective, sometimes appearing on every other page.) His influence will reflect his own prestige and that of the government he represents in roughly equal measures. Beyond any doubt, it means something to be the American ambassador—one especially who regards himself as "a member of the Administration," as he "brutally" informs a nominal State Department superior—just as it means something to be a well-published professor. But that has to do with credentials and he will not stand on formalities.

Thus he is quick to inaugurate a direct correspondence with the young President that is as often witty as (unavoidably perhaps) at least a trifle unctuous. He is quick also to inform Jawaharlal Nehru that he is an amateur diplomat, provoking Nehru, inevitably, to describe himself as an amateur Prime Minister. ("We then chatted about our respective books," he continues, "and Cambridge University in our respective days there.") Two of the world's most urbane and literate statesmen, then, are to be linked by an envoy who is their match in both respects. Diplomacy, it appears, is like a dinner party: if the company is good, it will be a success.

But Nehru disappoints Kennedy; and India, one soon senses, disappoints Galbraith. It is hard to say which happens first, but the turning point appears to come when Nehru visits Washington in November 1961. The visit is the occasion for Galbraith's fourth trip out of India and third homecoming to Washington in only seven months. (These regular excursions away from his post, which eventually become a matter of embarrassment, have an irresistible gustatory appeal. "Rarely have I felt such bliss," he writes after a dinner in Rome. Back in New Delhi a few weeks later he comments: "Nothing repels me so much on returning to India as the food.")

Galbraith calls the first day of the Indian leader's talks with Kennedy "the most interesting day in my memory." The interest would appear to consist wholly in his own proximity to the fulcrum of power, for the encounter between the two leaders becomes, by the lights of Kennedy and Galbraith, a minor social fiasco. Nehru insists on behaving like a distracted head of government from a poor, problem-ridden land who's performing a diplomatic chore in a country on which he is unhappily dependent for economic support. He is unresponsive to the challenges of Free World leadership as seen from the New Frontier and "rather negative" when asked how to solve Kennedy's perplexing Vietnamese problem. Perhaps he thinks he has enough difficulties of his own. In any case, the President doesn't find him inspiring and conversation wanes on Air Force One, which carries the party from Newport to Washington. Kennedy scans official papers, Jackie reads Malraux, Indira flips through Vogue and Jawaharlal Nehru peruses the New York Daily News.

A few days later Nehru departs for Disneyland and Galbraith stays behind in Washington where he attends a White House party at which everyone has "that fine glow that comes from being 'in.'" India is never to have that glow again during the Kennedy administration, even when the President's wife makes her well-heralded tour of its monuments. And the Ambassador soon becomes restless. Only a year after his arrival we find him asking the President how much longer his "exile" will last. It isn't hard to guess at the sources of his restlessness, for Delhi society is, indeed, unrelievedly tedious, and India at the end of the Nehru era could not help but be "less exciting," as Galbraith finally notes, than it was when he first saw it. But Ambassador's Journal does make us guess, for in this book (prodigiously, the fifth that has its origins in his two years as a diplomat) Galbraith is surprisingly uninteresting and even uncommunicative on subjects of some importance to his experiences—India and Indians.

In part, this is deliberate, for he believes it would be a violation of his trust as an ambassador for him to be indiscreet now about Indians he met. Thus we are told that Krishna Menon—whom all Americans and many Indians belabored in those days as a matter of patriotic duty—has been spared a terrible skewering in these pages. But Galbraith has little memorable to say about Indians he admires, including Nehru. He also doesn't burden his journal with reflections on problems of economic development (rather, nondevelopment); only enough to show he isn't taken in by the "breakthrough" and "takeoff point" metaphors that have afflicted so much official discourse. Overpopulation, malnutrition, modernization and cultural loss, social change and turmoil—these are the real issues in India, as an economist and social critic of Galbraith's stature must be fully aware. Yet his mind seems otherwise occupied.

His descriptions of the Indian land and environment—as he tours the country in fulfillment of an ambassador's duty to make copy for the local press—are, at best, minimally engaging. He writes stiffly of visits to romantic places like Bhutan and Sikkim, which takes some doing. Excessive discretion and preoccupation with himself are to blame. But then the diary is intended mainly to be an account of himself as a political activist—"A Personal Account of the Kennedy Years," as its subtitle puts it, rather than of his own time in India.

The strained perspective of exile is, therefore, its greatest weakness. Had Galbraith gotten the wish he tentatively broached to the President and been appointed to Kennedy's old Senate seat, rather than the New Delhi chancellery, we might have had an essential piece of literature. But for the most part Ambassador's Journal comes alive only when Galbraith gets a respite from his Delhi duties.

His repeated salvos at the State Department and Dean Rusk (whose reputation did not survive long enough to be blasted by the publication of this diary) are always on the mark. Rusk, he says, is "a traditionalist" who "thinks that because foreign policy was bad under Truman and bad under Eisenhower, it should be at least mediocre under Kennedy." On Vietnam he is wise and prescient to an uncanny degree, though generally overoptimistic about the prospects that the President or McNamara will heed his advice. A visit to Saigon leaves "a horrible taste" and he warns Kennedy: "Politics is not the art of the possible. It consists in choosing between the disastrous and the unpalatable. I wonder if those who talk about a ten-year war really know what they are saying in terms of American attitudes." Eight years later the question can still be asked: Do they know yet?

The most absorbing section of the diary deals with the Sino-Indian border conflict in the autumn of 1962. Here, at last, Galbraith is where the action is. (Though not at first, for word of the outbreak of hostilities reaches him in London.) To appreciate his performance one has only to imagine what might have happened had the gentleman who was in charge at the American Embassy in Santo Domingo in 1965 been in charge in New Delhi three years earlier. Instead of reading the Chinese advance over the Himalayas as one stupendous refutation of nonalignment and vindication of SEATO, Galbraith grows concerned about the danger of having to sustain "a new, large and extremely expensive ally." In a letter to Kennedy, he remarks: "The Indians are busy worrying about the end of nonalignment. It is we that should be doing the worrying on this."

The diplomatic problem is hopelessly tangled: the United States can't assist India without offending Pakistan, an ally by treaty. Galbraith tactfully presses Nehru to make overtures to the Pakistanis that might help ease this embarrassment. But after a further debacle in the mountains he finds the Indians "pleading for military association" and "yearning for the sight of American uniforms."

It is only when the Chinese call off their advance—to universal astonishment—that Galbraith's "steadying and tranquilizing influence," on which he justly congratulates himself, shows signs of wavering. He proposes what he calls "a semi-military pact" for India's air defense and urges the importance of a Kashmir settlement in order to draw Pakistan into the defense of the subcontinent from the Communist hordes. (Kennedy names the pact GATO, Galbraith's All-Purpose Treaty Organization.) "This is a time of change and we should take it by the ears," Galbraith declares grandiosely, sounding like the "crypto-Talleyrands" in the State Department he despises. It isn't hard to imagine General Westmoreland setting down a similar sentiment in his diary after requesting an additional 200,000 troops for Vietnam in the wake of the Tet offensive.

"It is remarkable," the Professor writes, "how hard-nosed one becomes on China. I used always to take a relatively tolerant view. A few more months and I will be as warlike as anyone." Finally he becomes so taken with the cause of arms for the Indians that he sends a telegram to the Joint Chiefs of Staff fantasying that "if the Chinese should come back and drive the Indian Government to the Andaman Islands, we would then undoubtedly see India as a bastion of the free world and finance it heavily."

This still sounds comical because Galbraith's project was never taken very seriously in Washington. India was just too big a domino. But if Nehru had made a stronger impression on Kennedy a year earlier, or if Galbraith had managed to be more charitable to Rusk, who knows what we might have done in the Himalayas? Galbraith bemoans the "anonymity" of American assistance to India. That is why he wanted to build his steel mill (which the Russians are now building and regretting) and why GATO must have appealed to him. But something should be said for anonymity—if only we still had it in Vietnam.

LIMIT

We have done what we can for each other:
one abrupt flesh broken
like light upon another.

BETTY ADCOCK

Fortune Cookie

COUNTERBLAST. By Marshall McLuhan. Designed by Harley Parker. Harcourt, Brace & World. 144 pp. $6.50.

DENNIS DUFFY
Mr. Duffy teaches English at the University of Toronto. He is the author of Marshall McLuhan (Toronto: McClelland & Stewart).

Anyone attempting to follow the career of McLuhan can find in Counterblast an instance of either courage or numbness. Unfazed by the trenchant and thoughtful criticism his theories have received, unwilling to re-examine anything written since The Mechanical Bride (his first, best book, which he forswore years ago), he serenely continues to publish his collections of nuggetry, his oracular bijouterie.

Bantam put one out, so did Harper, so did McGraw-Hill; it is now Harcourt's turn.

But it could be that the market is shrinking for these costly fortune cookies. The audience that bought The Medium Is the Massage and War and Peace in the Global Village may have been sufficiently bombarded to balk at buying yet another "book of revelations," to employ the jacket blurb's blasphemy. Connoisseurs of McLuhanisms—instant solutions to ageless problems—will find that they've heard some of these one-liners before and may even conclude that the oracle's utterances don't always add up to a great deal after deciphering.

For example, what does it mean to talk of the "x-ray quality of TV (the inner-trippiness)"? Is TV-watching any more introspective a pastime than movie-watching, bird-watching or masturbation? And what is so inner-trippy about an X-ray? Does anyone really think an X-ray shows the way we look inside? What about X-ray photography as an equivalent to psychoanalysis ("psychology without walls")? Who is more fuzzed-out by that sort of facile comparison—Roentgen, Freud or the reader?

Counterblast, especially when compared with its model, Wyndham Lewis' Blast (1914), has little that is revolutionary in it. (How can you describe as revolutionary the message of an era's most invoked thinker?) Still, it illustrates in a more essential form than elsewhere the difficulty with McLuhanism: its determinist stance toward the technological change it analyzes.

The McLuhan apologia, repeated throughout his work, is essentially Freudian, resting upon the assurance that "where id was, there ego shall be." Only by bringing into consciousness the extent and quality of the effects of media change will we be enabled to make the best of what is happening to us. If this is not a flabby determinism, what is it? Unless is willing to believe that media shifts not always and inevitably alter both e content of the medium and the perptions of its audience, a belief which es against the grain of his system, then cLuhan has to see his efforts as atmpts to mitigate the effects of the derminism in play around him.

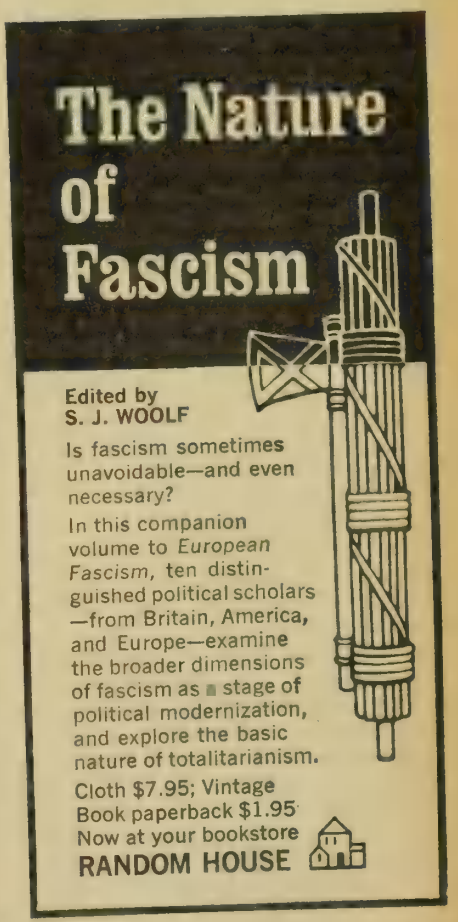
Media change inevitably produces hange in the environment—this is McuHan's argument. The choice? Either to op it altogether (impossible in today's orld) or to prepare for its dislocations. he argument is determinist in that it sits a certain order of inevitability, ough that inevitability doesn't extend to very possible effect of media change. ut in a world as shaky as today's, even limited determinism is far from comrting in view of the shock our social nd political systems have sustained from ne new media. Yet Counterblast has one the trick and made inevitability uddly.

A figure as concerned as McLuhan with piloting through the currents f the present might be expected to comnent upon the destruction of the nonuman environment, and so he does. In is typically detached manner, he curses pace technology and all it represents: 'Blast Sputnik for enclosing terrestrial nature in a man-made environment that ransfers the evolutionary process from iology to technology." There are surely more feeling comments one could make about the destruction of life on this planet, but McLuhan's works have always been notable for their impersonality, their ability to screen or block feelings through the use of jargon and word play. Given the context, the "blast" is strong indeed!

Compare with this, however, some sentences at the book's conclusion:

> When we put satellites around the planet, Darwinian Nature ended. The earth became an art form subject to the same programing as media networks and their environments. The entire evolutionary process shifted, at the moment of Sputnik, from biology to technology. Evolution became not an involuntary response of organisms to new conditions but a part of the consensus of human consciousness.

Quite a change has come over the thought, with an outraged earth changing from a monument to human folly to a found object in a Pop painting. Here we have in its starkest form that belief in technology which has brought the West to its present condition. The earth will become a gilded ark through technological planning. Running nature through a power grid will humanize the planet. There is nothing new in this; Whitman said it in "Passage to India" and our corporate and academic planners proclaim it in each succeeding chart of the year 2000. The view that technological change, whatever its short-term effects, can always be programmed into doing good on a long-term basis is seductive. McLuhan's talk of art forms allays the fears of his audience that the machines may have gotten out of hand.



Now we know the reply to anyone speculating about the implications of McLuhan's doctrines as I am; "McLuhan isn't approving all this, silly, but merely describing it. Your messy little moralisms serve only to block perception." This counterblast ignores the most salient feature of the analysis-of-the-present-as-future game as it is played today: the deck is stacked. There can be no such thing as an objective look at the present. The predication of "major trends" and "ongoing developments" reveals the analyst's biases at least as much as it spotlights the concerns of an age. E. M. Forster captured the dilemma of the self-fulfilling prophecy when he wrote in Howards End that every newspaper headline screaming "War with Germany Inevitable" made such a conflict that much more likely. Thus McLuhan's message that, essentially, technological change is drawing us closer despite the side effect of destroying every institution we have conceived of, is anything but coldly descriptive, anything but value-free.

Getting down to cases, what assurance have we, beyond blind technetronic faith, that technology and the technological mentality can get us out of the mess they have gotten us into? For example, how much do we know of the long-range effects of even the anti-pollutants we are beginning to put in our waters? How irrevocable is the damage done by the DDT habit we are attempting to kick? Does understanding one's predicament always lead to getting out of it?

The questions remain long after the Teilhard de Chardinesque invocation of "the consensus of human consciousness" has been hymned. Human experience in these matters tends to predict that that consciousness has a penchant for comfy, quickie solutions and prophetic salesmen. For a salesman of the continuation of present trends is what McLuhan has become for his audience, however unwillingly he may see himself in this role, however great his private doubts about the future.

The salesmanship lies in the supposedly objective analysis which assures the powerful in our society that their actions are progressive and groovy. Thus we are told that electronic media have decentralized power within and made obsolete the hierarchical structure of our great corporations. Even if true, and there is at least a chance that electronic sophistication permits closer surveillance, the important thing is that improvements in communications media have extended greater power to those in charge of them and that the multi-national corporation, however much room it may have for eccentricity in dress, constitutes the central thrust of American imperialism, which is doing just about anything but loosening its power over people's lives.

For the audience in the schools, academies and media slabs there is balm in Gilead. How comforting to the purchased intellects of the universities, their every work and research pattern revolving about the needs and grants of the corporate structure, to bask in the thought that "the ivory tower becomes the control tower of human navigation." Heady stuff indeed to a middle-management level of society that fantasizes itself—à la Galbraith's New Industrial State—as a managerial elite because it has demonstrated great skill in preserving a system most profitable to those who own it. Hard narcotic for a culture choking on its artifacts and helpless before the emergence of a million buried angers to be told that the environment is an art form and that we are now in the second phase of the original creation. Well, I think we can find better scriptures for the new age than we have here.

Apples and Applesauce

PRICKSONGS & DESCANTS. By Robert Coover. E. P. Dutton & Co. 225 pp. $5.95.

FORTY WHACKS. By Fanny Howe. Houghton Mifflin Co. 195 pp. $4.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL
Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

A few years ago, when I was teaching sections of freshman composition at Harvard, I often got into long, beery discussions with my colleagues about writing. Many of us felt that we should offer assignments which engaged our students, topics which got them into and helped get them through their lives and times, topics resulting in essays which cohered around some issue or other, essays which meant something to them and their readers. But there were others who would have nothing to do with this utilitarian conception of prose. One guy—intense, cape-bedecked, brilliant—harangued me for hours one afternoon about his private prose passion.

Writing, he said, wasn't about anything but itself. Asking a student to write on his responses to radical politics, say, was as bad as asking him to recount his significant summer experiences. We should really be getting him to shape his prose as a pure experience of form and structure. The ideal assignment, from my friend's view, would be a description of an apple! That way the writer could really show his stuff: describe a neutral object for its own sake, without connotations or implications, see what kind of a writer he is without being judged on his messy views or values, mold into a private symmetry remote from the hangups of his real life, a shimmering product of undefiled imagination.

Perhaps he was on the cutting edge of the new. Certainly a body of literature has sprung up among us lately—by Barth, Barthelme, Sontag, Gass and their avatar, Nabokov—which reads like the collected papers submitted to my eccentric friend's classes. The latest apple from this tree to drop on our heads is Robert Coover's Pricksongs & Descants, a collection of "fictions"—see Borges' orphic, cryptic ficciones—which, in Coover's mid-book prologue explanation, are designed to use "the fabulous to probe beyond the phenomenological, beyond appearances, beyond randomly perceived events, beyond mere history."

Coover doesn't care what his characters feel about radical politics, not even what they did last summer; he is concerned with them only as types which put readers on, onto "new modes of perception and fictional forms." To that end he reconstructs fairy tales—"The Ginger-Bread House," "Jack and the Beanstalk" and "Little Red Riding Hood" —and Bible tales: Joseph and Mary, Noah's flood. All this is done to blow our minds out of their ruts of conventional responses to traditional formulations, demonstrate to our satisfaction that "anything can happen," in art if not in life.

In his best stories Coover cleverly constructs patterns to contain that thesis. In "The Elevator" seemingly infinite human possibilities are held in the little room of a self-service elevator which "contains them all: space, time, cause, motion, magnitude, class." In fifteen short sequences—some develop earlier actions, others deny them—we learn that the central character either has an uneventful ride or plunges to his death, fights or doesn't fight an office bully, has or doesn't have a girl on the floor of the elevator while it plunges or doesn't plunge.

It's a technique which calls attention to its own artifice, like watching film rushes of the same scene shot several times. However, it is not so original a technique that it requires pretentious prologue explanations from Coover. After all, they do much the same thing every week on Laugh-In: create a pattern of disconnected but recurrent bits (the Egyptian mummy, the mountain-top guru) which complement and contradict one another in a mindless rapid fire. Coover's demonstration of the theme that "anything can happen" is clever here, but no more original than the theme itself.

Still, even bad ideas and limiting techniques can yield worthy results if they are applied with skill. In his best story, "The Babysitter," Coover shows his stuff. Here the "anything can happen" conception has more plausibility—we are not boxed in a literary symbol (coffin?, orgone box?) as we were in "The Elevator" —and more human dimension. The Tuckers' baby sitter has an uneventful evening. Or, she is raped by two boy friends in either the bathtub or the living room. Or, Mr. Tucker comes home, discovers her with her boy friends, either excuses himself or kicks them out and has her himself. Or, one or another of the children dies. Meanwhile, in a lovely comic topper to all this, at the party they attend, Mrs. Tucker gets stuck half out of her girdle; a party game develops: buttering her and stuffing her fat back in. But others pull the other way and Mrs. Tucker falls apart. This is a narrative jeu d'esprit which overrides Coover's questionable aesthetic and thematic motives.

However, all this doesn't seem to m to have much to do with anything, wor help us get through our lives and time We are not asked to be concerned wi resolutions in his characters' lives, b with resolutions in his techniques. Coov has written fine fiction before—The Or gin of the Brunists and The Univers Baseball Association—fiction which dea with people who create their own fi tions (religion, baseball), then live an die in them. But these novels were l cated in the world, not in the anti-worl of Pricksongs & Descants where, if an thing can happen, anything and nothin happens and it all doesn't matter muc anyway.

Things matter very much to he characters, her readers and herself i Fanny Howe's collection of stories, Fort Whacks. Girls are hung-up and strun out in a variety of artfully apprehende ways. Though Fanny Howe unlik Coover makes so little of her techniqu seems really just to be telling straigh stories about anxious girls, that doesn necessarily mean that her technique neither apt nor original. Her techniqu in fact, is more than sufficient to he ends: it is in the service of perception about the ways we create and destro not only fictions but one another.

Two of her stories are related fro the perspectives of half-mad, rationali ing narrators. They are as tightly told a Browning's dramatic monologues. Th girl in "Forty Whacks," though not full clear to herself, is worming her way i between two of her friends, breaking u their marriage so she can have the hus band (whom, of course, she no longe wants after she gets him). She keeps careful journal, a record of her self-de lusions, in which she sets down her ma rationalizations for doing things (lik sleeping in her friends' bed when the are away)—(1), (2)—as though care ful, numerical ordering of her motive justified her actions. In "The Other Sid of Lethe" a woman explains to us— precisely and delicately, as though sh were arranging flowers—how she mur dered David, her lover, and was finall released from prison for insanity. Thoug she doesn't mind having killed, she i quite concerned with maintaining deco rum in her discourse. ("David would di if he saw me now. But please excuse tha vulgarity.")

Fanny Howe creates characters wit angular collages of details which catch personality. ("Lizabeth controlling the car as if it were a motorcycle and re quired her shifting weight from side to side. She wore white-rimmed sunglasses, her nails were talons. The floor of the · was littered with beer cans.") She atly interconnects her stories with otifs of symbols (sea gull), actions hacks) and dialogue so that we have ore than just a collection of stories, as Joyce's Dubliners, fragments of a little orld circumscribed in art.

"Dump Gull" is her longest and st story. A lovely, funny, not so comic ic of a girl of feeling, Astrid, who oves from her mother's shaping of her o the world of men. First Patrick, a oe salesman who kisses her instep while ling her shoes, quits his job and goes f to marry her. Later, separated from trick, engaged to Julian, she frees her-lf from her mother at her rich fiancé's gagement party by placing a wax apple her supinely drunken mother's mouth the woman lies stretched out on the or beside the dinner table. (In the ntext of the story, this wax apple is as al as an apple could be!)

Astrid promises to divorce Patrick and marry her fiancé, Julian. However, he, though decent enough, misuses language. So in a perfectly dramatic and alogically sound move, she turns away from him in the middle of her divorce proceedings, turns again to Patrick who, though crazy, used to comfort her by saying "Be loving, Puss." This may not be a rational or self-serving move for Astrid, but that's the way a sea gull over a dump survives, extracts "the sweet piece from the whole mess."

Pricksongs & Descants convinces me that there was much in what my old teaching colleague used to say; there is delight in prose which cleverly contains emptiness. But Forty Whacks convinces me that I wasn't wrong in preferring purposeful prose; there is painful truth in Fanny Howe's artful apprehension of people caught in one another and the dilemmas of living.

Reflections of a Pragmatist

PERATIONAL THINKING FOR URVIVAL. By Lawrence Dennis. Ralph yles, publisher. Colorado Springs, Colo. 34 pp. $5.95.

REDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Mr. Schuman is currently professor of political science, Portland State University, regon. He is the author of, among other ooks, International Politics, now in its eventh edition (McGraw-Hill).

awrence Dennis was for many years friend and neighbor of mine in the erkshire Hills of western Massachusetts. Ve seldom agreed about anything. I enaged him in public debate in many forums in the 1930s. He was then, as I often aid, the "only intelligent American isolationist." I was an "interventionist," not n the sense of advocating recourse to orce but arguing that unless the United tates, Britain and France took effective teps by way of diplomatic, economic nd financial pressures to "deter" and contain" (to use terms of a later vocabulary) the mad ambitions of the then ulers of Germany, Italy and Japan, the nly result would be another world war.

Lawrence disagreed. He contended that American national interests would best e served by a policy of nonparticipaion in wars to come. In retrospect, I m bound to confess, in view of the ad results of U.S. "interventionism" all ver the globe, that a policy of abtention would probably have contributed more to the welfare, health and survival of the human race than the course which Washington policy makers did in fact pursue since 1945—or since 1917.

By way of further identification, Lawrence Dennis (whom older readers of The Nation will recall, but younger readers will not) had a distinguished career in the Foreign Service in Romania and Central America; resigned in protest at U.S. policies; worked in Wall Street, and wrote Is Capitalism Doomed?: The Coming American Fascism (1935: a book not of advocacy but of analysis and prediction, premature for the 1930s but not perhaps for the 1970s); The Dynamics of War and Revolution; and A Trial on Trial, a detailed commentary on the absurd "sedition trial" of 1944. In recent years he has published a stimulating weekly, The Appeal to Reason.

Dennis' latest book is worthy of careful attention by all American policy makers and opinion makers, along with all citizens concerned with the tragic pass to which we have been reduced by the follies of our rulers. He warns against reliance (to borrow a phrase from George Kennan) on "legalistic-moralistic abstractions," and urges a pragmatic approach to foreign policy in terms of "what works" and what does not work. Thus:

> Two points about war in the nuclear age call for operational rather than moralistic, legalistic, or normative thinking about the challenges faced. In the first place, war in the 20th century has become incalculably bigger and deadlier

IN SESSION

CONGRESS v. THE SUPREME COURT
Raoul Berger, J.D., L.L.M.
Article III of the Constitution states: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction . . . with such exceptions as the Congress shall make." In a pioneer study to find the purpose of this provision, Mr. Berger re-examines whether the power of "judicial review" is a "usurpation" or something granted by the Constitution. Every legal mind will be fascinated by his meticulous sifting of the historical sources which lead to his important conclusion. $15.00

THE EVOLUTION OF A JUDICIAL PHILOSOPHY
Selected Opinions and Papers of Justice John M. Harlan
David L. Shapiro, Editor
This rich selection of judicial opinions, addresses, and extrajudicial writings by one of our truly remarkable justices provides a vivid and complete portrait of the man. Able, learned, perceptive, Justice Harlan delivered nearly 500 opinions during his first fourteen years on the Court. He possesses a comprehensive and consistent view of constitutional legal principles, and has developed a judicial philosophy that is influenced by those he most respects — among them Justices Cardozo, Jackson, and Frankfurter — but which readers will find is very much his own. Sponsored by The William Nelson Cromwell Foundation. $6.95

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE USES OF HISTORY
Charles A. Miller
The uses to which the Supreme Court puts history in deciding and explaining cases in constitutional law must be viewed and evaluated, contends Mr. Miller, in light of the Court's important political role in the American system of government, as well as in light of the complete social, cultural, political, and legal context of each particular case. To this end, he presents five chapters of pertinent case histories. Belknap Press $6.95

THE WARREN COURT
Constitutional Decision as an Instrument of Reform
Archibald Cox
"A coherent package . . . the analysis is superb . . . a must for anyone who hopes to speak thoughtfully about the Court's work."—Washington Post $4.95

A circular regarding other Harvard books on law is available at your request.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge, Mass. 02138

than it ever was before. It now costs somewhat more than $50,000 to kill a man; in Napoleon's time it cost only $3,000 and in Caesar's day only 75c. War has become bigger in costs and deadlier in consequences. . . . In the second place, war in the middle of the 20th century is serving purposes or performing social functions such as maintaining full employment with continuous economic expansion, which wars of the past were not started, fought or kept up to serve or to perform. . . .

He recalls, with justifiable pride, that he wrote two articles in The Nation of March 15 and 22, 1933, in which he argued that devaluation of the dollar would not cure the Great Depression, which (he correctly predicted) would be ameliorated only by military spending and by postwar spending for future wars. Here is much other wisdom on inflation, "defense," and the irrationality of current American priorities.

War and preparation for more war, argues Dennis (soundly, I believe), has become a means toward larger corporation profits, higher wages, and escape from the dilemmas of a mature capitalist economy. "For long run, big, overall purposes, the United States at the end of the nineteen sixties is following in the footsteps of the Fuehrer Hitler." If this sounds Marxist, be it noted that Dennis is and has consistently been an anti-Marxist. Modern war also means "socialism" in the sense of public control of private enterprise and governmental domination of the market (Dennis gives details, facts and figures).

The debacle to which this condition of affairs can lead is deemed probable by Dennis, but not inevitable. It can be averted by a greater measure of realism and rationality. We have behind us a history, this century, of ghastly miscalculations, here recounted in part. Dennis' two appendices are not encouraging. One is a list of "The Wars of England, France and the United States Since 1775." The other, "Is the 'New Economics' A Success or a Failure?," concludes that the Keynesians have done much better than apostles of the old economics, but that their effectiveness depends upon operational, rather than dialectical, thought and action.

A chapter entitled "Semantic Awareness an Essential for Survival" surveys the literature of the problem, beginning quite rightly with Alice in Wonderland. Dennis notes that in the natural sciences, including medicine, words have precise and uniform meanings, whereas in politics, law, ethics, religion and the social sciences this is not the case—e.g., "isolation" and "appeasement." There is no viable solution to the semantic problem.

Americans, duly brainwashed with legalism and moralism, are natural believers in monodiabolism. And nothing can more surely or more speedily land a country in a world war or keep it in a state of perpetual war than this monistic cult about evil, sin, or wrongdoing. It is good municipal law. But it is not good world power politics, good international law, good diplomacy and foreign relations or good statesmanship. The only monism about evil that makes sense is one that postulates the total depravity of man or that we have all sinned. And just as any monism about evil is likely if not certain to be fallacious, so too is any monism about good, right or justice. Those terms have meaning and validity only in an operational frame of reference. As plain absolutes or abstractions in no operational frame of reference, they are almost meaningless when subjected to realistic analysis.

Lawrence Dennis is no preacher panaceas. His concern is not what think, but how to think, about t challenges of the space age. I do n know, nor does Dennis claim to kno whether sadly misnamed Homo sapie is likely to survive his own irrationaliti and brutalities. Prospects of survival w be enhanced if large numbers of peop ponder this challenging book.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

In one of his occasional writings Jean Cocteau cites a Chinese proverb: "Genius creates hospitals." Whenever a towering personality appears, a host of lesser men become warped in imitation of the greater one.

Jerzy Grotowski is a genius, but I shudder to think how many misbegotten "Grotowskis" his Polish Laboratory Theatre will spawn. Peter Brook, being a highly gifted craftsman, knew how to popularize certain aspects of Grotowski's art in his production of Marat/Sade. Other such adaptations—most of them inept—are already in use and more are sure to follow. To be influenced by a master is natural, but for the most part the result is dilettantism or disaster.

The reason for all such unfortunate developments is that the superficial characteristics of the original model are mistaken for their meaning and value. The artist's inner history, his basic sources, the social and emotional circumstances of his growth, are very rarely operative in his disciples. Thus a new "manner" is contrived, a fashion sold by the insensitive to the ignorant.

I am sure that Grotowski's methods of training, chiefly designed as preparation for his productions, may prove stimulating and constructive for student actors and other professionals, but they do not constitute the essence of his art. For its better understanding one must turn from the theories and formal techniques (a collection of Grotowski's writings and speeches is called Toward a Poor Theatre) to the works themselves. Three of Grotowski's productions (none of them more than an hour long) were staged at the Washington Square Methodist Church in New York from October 16 to November 26, for limited audiences: 100 at most; in one case, only forty.

The first of these was based on a Grotowski scenario which he made from a romantically baroque adaptation Calderón's The Constant Prince. Th second was Acropolis, no more than a extract from a play by the 19th-centu Polish dramatist Wyspianski; the loca and stress were entirely altered. Apo alypsis cum Figuris, the third produ tion, was "evolved by its performers und the guidance of the director by means acting exercises and sketches." The sp ken text was culled from brief passag of the Bible, The Brothers Karamazo one of T. S. Eliot's poems, and fro something by Simone Weil.

Grotowski is all paroxysm. Thu his is the most contemporary of all thea tres, for it can no longer be denied tha we live in a time of cataclysm. Our ver entertainments mask the face of agony In the internal and outer upheaval, form disintegrate, language decays, communi cation is conducted in jerks. Electric ci cuses serve as temples. Flesh is macer ated. What is left of the soul goes int hiding or cries out in howls in which th difference between mirth and sorro can hardly be distinguished. Even th gayest expressions contain the infernal.

These tendencies were already dis cernible in the expressionist theatre afte World War I. But at that time there wa an element of journalism and propa ganda (especially in Germany) in the outcries of horror. With the end o World War II—in the work of Beckett Pinter, Genet and others—an element o private anguish became apparent, of with drawal into secret chambers of conscious ness where mainly grotesque (sometime muted) signs of agony were displayed a if more overt declarations were somehow indecently sentimental.

As we ordinarily understand the terms, story or plot does not exist in Grotowski's plays. There is only a design of fantastically contorted bodies and symbol-ally violent relationships hardly continuous with realistically purposive action. The figures move in space which with one exception (Acropolis) does not resemble any identifiable environment. We are in a fearsomely imagined Gehenna where laws of time, gravity and natural logic have been suspended.

Grotowski's theatre (I speak of it as a unit because he does not consider himself to be its sole creator) is distinct from its predecessors in the vein of modern artyrdom. The tone and inspiration of his theatre derive from the extermination camp. His productions bring us into the realm of the Last Judgment. Acropolis takes place on the labor threshold of mass extinction. The figures are last seen descending into a hole beneath the floor and when they have disappeared under its stovelike cover there flows back a final murmur, "Now we die."

Acropolis may not be the "best" of Grotowski's productions, but it is the most representative. Here the prisoners re-enact moments of the mythical past —Hebrew and Greek—distorting them by the use of the props at hand—metal pipes, rags—so that a wedding ceremony is made hideous and the cohabitation of Paris and Helen is performed by two men. The lines spoken at incredible speed are not dialogue; they are tortured exclamations projected in the direction of another being, but with no shape as personal address. (It has been said that a knowledge of Polish does not make the lines readily intelligible, but it is evident in Apocalypsis cum Figuris that they are not meant to be taken as are the lines of an ordinary play; solemn and poetic passages are delivered in a mode which brutally contradicts and virtually obliterates their initial intent.)

In Acropolis the executioners and their victims become nearly identical: they are kin. The rhythm of the meaningless tasks assigned them is set by one of the prisoners who plays a violin while their labors are accented by the drumlike tread of their rough boots. This vision has nothing in common with the factual exposé of the Nazi crimes in Peter Weiss's The Investigation. There is no redemption here and except for the closing moment —the march to the holocaust—very little pathos.

What we have seen is the tragic farce of civilization's values utterly despoiled. The prisoners themselves have been reduced to savage blasphemy. They are no longer individuals but the debris of humanity. If pity and terror are evoked in the spectator, if his moral sensibility is affected, it is through a kind of impersonal revulsion, from which he recovers as if from an anxiety dream he remembers as something intolerably spectral. One cannot normally sustain or assimilate such experiences.

Still, there is nothing chaotic in the spectacle. The names of Breughel, Bosch, Grünewald are frequently invoked for purposes of comparison; but that is misleading, for there was a sumptuousness in those artists. Grotowski's stage, architecture, costuming are bare. Everything has been stripped to the bone. (It is in this regard that his is a "poor theatre.") The structure of the playing area changes with each new play, so that the spectators are always in a different relation to the actors. Sometimes they look down as into an enclosed pit, sometimes they surround the action at stage level, sometimes they are ranged in a tierlike elevation slightly above. The actors are always very close, but they never move into or mingle with the audience.

Much has been made by various commentators of the company's extraordinary technical achievements in the use of voice and body. They are certainly striking and display training, prowess and command of a most remarkable sort. The voices unfalteringly emit sounds which remind one of the strange leaps of the twelve-tone system, with startling crescendos followed by crushed whisperings that do not resemble ordinary speech. They convey an other-worldly sphere in extremis. The lament of the constant prince (the play itself might be called the slaughter of innocence) is so desperate and prolonged as to exceed the bounds of human grief. We have arrived at the point of doomsday.

Yet all this has been given precise form. The exercises of Grotowski are intended to make the actor surmount his supposed breaking point, to stretch him vocally and bodily so that he can hold nothing back; to remove his restraints, those "blocks" imposed by his usual social comportment. He is wracked so that he becomes nothing but his id and thus releases what he primally is. Whether he actually succeeds in this, or whether it is altogether desirable that he do so, is another matter which I have no desire to question or capacity to determine at this juncture. One may say that in this respect the outstanding actor is Rizzard Crislak as the constant prince and as the "simpleton" in the Apocalypsis.

To understand Grotowski's form and content as a single process one must consider certain other elements which have gone into its creation. Grotowski is an intensely cultivated theatre artist. He has absorbed Stanislavsky's lessons in regard to acting; he has responded to the impulse in Artaud; he has learned from Meyerhold's precepts on movement, and has felt the impact of the apocalyptic artists already mentioned. In addition and not unlike Brecht, he seeks to establish a certain space between the spectator and the spectacle so that for all their ferocity his plays may be appreciated contemplatively.

Grotowski's art is imbued with strains from Catholic and other litanies and rituals. In Acropolis, especially, one hears echoes of Roman and Jewish services, as well as Slavic melodies. It is inescapable that while Grotowski is not a "believer," his is a ritualistic, indeed a religious art. (He has said that he wished his productions to be received in strict silence.) He seeks purification and salvation through their opposites, a return to the humane through the inhuman. We are to be redeemed through hellfire.

Goethe has said that no man can thoroughly capture the meaning of an art form who fails in some knowledge of the land and people of the art's provenance. Grotowski is a citizen of that Poland which was razed and decimated through the Nazi invasion and by the concentration camps which were its concomitants. Born in 1933 he is the witness and heir—as are most of his actors—of his country's devastation. The

Gift cards sent on request, orders filled immediately

ROSE GRAUBART:
PORTRAITS OF POETS
Drawings of Ginsberg, Snyder, Bly, Schwerner, Ignatow, and nineteen others . . . . . .

$3, postpaid
Tennessee Poetry Press, Box 196, Martin, 38237

The Best Way To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 12-8-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

SPONSORS

Jeremiah Stamler, M.D. Legal Aid Fund

(Partial List)

JAMES LUTHER ADAMS, D.D.
Harvard Divinity School
E.H. AHRENS, JR., M.D.
The Rockefeller University
NELSON ALGREN
Chicago
EDWARD ANDERS
University of Chicago
BROOKS ATKINSON
Durham, New York
GEORGE BAEHR, MD
Mt. Sinai Hospital, New York
A. CLIFFORD BARGER, M.D.
Harvard Medical School
LEONA BAUMGARTNER, M.D.
Boston
RODNEY BEARD, M.D.
Stanford University
HERBERT BIBERMAN
New York
ROBERT BIERSTEDT
New York University
HERBERT BLAU
Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center
KONRAD BLOCH
Harvard University
HARRY BOBER
New York University
CLAUDE BROWN
Newark, New Jersey
ALLAN M. BUTLER, M.D
Emeritus, Harvard University
WILLIAM ALLINGTON BUTLER
Yale Law School
ALEXANDER CALDER
Roxbury, Connecticut
MSGR. DANIEL M. CANTWELL
Chicago
RUDOLF CARNAP, Ph.D.
University of California at Los Angeles
HAYDEN CARRUTH
Vermont
FR. W. VAN ETTEN CASEY, S.J
Holy Cross College
EDWARD S. CASTLE, Ph.D.
Harvard University
BENJAMIN CASTLEMAN, M.D.
Harvard Medical School
DAVID F. CAVER, LL.B.
Harvard Law School
SIDNEY COBB, M D.
University of Michigan
PROF. ROBERT C. COBURN
University of Chicago
PROF. ROBERT H. COLE
Berkeley
BARRY COMMONER, Ph.D.
Washington University
E. U. CONDON
University of Colorado
CHARLES D. COOK, M.D.
Yale University School of Medicine
MARTIN CORBIN
The Catholic Worker
LEWIS A. COSER
Brandeis University
LEONARD S. COTTRELL, JR
Russell Sage Foundation
DAVID W. CUGELL, M.D.
Northwestern University
WILLIAM DAMESHEK, M.D.
Tufts University School of Medicine
OSSIE DAVIS
New York
W. P. DEARING, M.D.
Group Health Association
New York
JAMES DIXON, M.D.
President, Antioch College
ALBERT DORFMAN, M D.
University of Chicago
WILLIAM HUSE DUNHAM, JR. Ph.D.
Yale University
L. C. DUNN
Columbia University
FREEMAN DYSON
Institute for Advanced Study
JOHN T. EDSALL, M.D.
Harvard University
RABBI DAVID MAX EICHHORN
National Jewish Welfare Board
MARTHA M. ELIOT, M.D.
Cambridge
PHILIP EVERGOOD
Connecticut
STEFAN S. FAJANS, M.D.
University of Michigan
JULES FEIFFER
New York
JOHN HENRY FAULK
New York
W H. FERRY
Santa Barbara, California
JOHN HOPE FRANKLIN, Ph.D.
University of Chicago
ERICH FROMM, Ph.D.
New York University
ARTHUR W. GALSTON
Yale University
PETER GAY
Columbia University
DEAN ROBERT P. GILBERT, M.D.
Jefferson Medical College
ALLEN GINSBERG
New York
RABBI ROLAND B. GITTELSOHN
Boston
HARRY GOLDEN
Charlotte, North Carolina
LEON GOLUB
New York
MARTHA GRAHAM
New York
ALAN F. GUTTMACHER M.D.
Planned Parenthood
MARVIN HARRIS
Columbia University
WILLIAM B. HARVEY
University of Michigan Law School
PHILIP M. HAUSER, Ph.D.
University of Chicago
ROBERT HAVIGHURST
University of Chicago
HAROLD HAYDON
University of Chicago
MICHAEL HEIDELBERGER, Ph D.
Emeritus, Columbia University
PROF. CLEMENT L. HENSHAW
Colgate University
NAT HENTOFF
New York
JULES HIRSCH, M D.
The Rockefeller University
HUDSON HOAGLAND, Ph.D., Sc.D.
Worcester Foundation for Experimental Biology
ERIC HODGINS
New York
HALSTED R. HOLMAN, M D.
Stanford University
IRVING HOROWITZ
Rutgers University
EVERETT C. HUGHES, Ph.D.
Cambridge
H. STUART HUGHES
Harvard University
PROF. ALEX INKELES
Harvard University
H MERRILL JACKSON
National Council of Churches
JOHN B. JOHNSON, M.D.
Howard University
HARRY KALVEN, JR., LL.B.
University of Chicago
EDWARD, KASS, M.D.
Harvard Medical School
STANLEY KAUFFMANN
New York
WALTER KAUFMANN, Ph.D.
Princeton University
EDWARD C. KENDALL, Ph.D.
Princeton
ANCEL KEYS, Ph D.
University of Minnesota
OTTO KLINEBERG, Ph.D., M.D.
HERMAN KOGAN
Chicago
KATHERINE KUH
Saturday Review
DR. WESTON LaBARRE
Duke University
WILLIS E. LAMB, JR.
Yale University
LOUIS LASAGNA, M.D.
Johns Hopkins University
PAUL F. LAZARSFELD, Ph.D.
Columbia University
SIDNEY S. LEE, M.D.
Beth Israel Hospital, Boston
ALEXANDER H. LEIGHTON
Harvard School of Public Health
LOUIS LEITER, M D.
Montefiore Medical Center
RACHMIEL LEVINE, M.D.
New York Medical College
THEODOR LIDZ
Yale University
DR. ROBERT J. LIFTON
Yale University
BERNARD LOWN, M D.
Harvard School of Public Health
BRIAN MacMAHON, M.D.
Harvard School of Public Health
BERNARD MALAMUD
Cambridge
KIRTLEY F. MATHER
Harvard University
ARTHUR MATTUCK
Massachusetts Institute of Technology
MACLYN McCARTY, M.D.
The Rockefeller University
W. W. McCRORY, M.D
Cornell University Medical Center
PETER . McEWAN, Ph.D.
Editor, Social Science and Medicine
PAUL MEIER
University of Chicago
GARDNER MURPHY, Ph.D.
Menninger Foundation
OGDEN NASH
New Hampshire
DR. OTTO NATHAN
New York
NATHANIEL L. NATHANSON, LL.B.
Northwestern University
THEODORE M. NEWCOMB, Ph.D.
University of Michigan
WILLIAM L. NUTE, JR. M.D.
National Council of Churches
JEAN R. OLIVER, M.D.
Emeritus, New York State University School of Medicine
TALCOTT PARSONS
Harvard University
DR. LINUS PAULING
Santa Barbara, California
RICHARD M. PETERS, M.D.
CONRAD L. PIRANI, M.D.
Michael Reese Hospital
HANS POPPER, M.D.
New York
HORTENSE POWDERMAKER
Queens College
C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of California
Santa Barbara
EUGENE RABINOWITCH, Ph.D.
University of Illinois
RICHARD D. REMINGTON, Ph.D.
Houston, Texas
YOSAL ROGAT
Stanford University School of Law
ALFRED S. ROMER, Ph.D.
Harvard Unversity
PROF. A KIMBALL ROMNEY
Harvard University
DR. VICTOR H. ROSEN
Past President
MRS. THEODORE ROSENTHAL
New York
PETER H. ROSSI
Johns Hopkins University
HARRY RUBIN, D.V.M.
University of California, Berkeley
ROBERT RYAN
New York
CARL SAGAN, Ph.D.
Harvard University
MARIO G. SALVADORI
Columbia University
DR. HOWARD SCHOMER
National Council of Churches
PETER SEEGER
Beacon, New York
JOHN R. SEELEY
Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions
BENJAMIN SEGAL, M.D.
New York
WILLIAM SILEN, M.D.
Harvard Medical School
GEORGE E. SIMPSON
Oberlin College
S. J. SINGER, Ph.D.
LaJolla, California
DAVID D. SMITH, M.D.
Duke University
RAPHAEL SOYER
New York
LEO SROLE
Columbia University
SAM STANDARD, M.D.
New York University
WENDELL M. STANLEY
University of California
EUGENE A. STEAD, JR., M.D.
Duke Hospital
H. BURR STEINBACH, Ph.D.
University of Chicago
GARDNER H. STERN, JR.
Chicago
JOSEPH STOKES III, M.D.
GENE H. STOLLERMAN, M.D.
Memphis
SOMERS H. STURGIS, M.D.
Harvard Medical School
SOL TAX, Ph.D.
University of Chicago
HAROLD TAYLOR
New York
STUDS TERKEL
Chicago
DR. ETHEL TOBACH
American Museum of Natural History
ANTONY TONEY
New York
DAVID B. TRUMAN
Mt. Holyoke College
DALTON TRUMBO
Los Angeles
MELVIN M TUMIN
Princeton University
LOUIS UNTERMEYER
Connecticut
HAROLD C. UREY, Ph.D
La Jolla
MARK VAN DOREN
Connecticut
MAURICE B. VISSCHER, Ph.D., M D.
University of Minnesota
MYRON W. WEGMAN, M.D.
Ann Arbor, Michigan
E. RICHARD WEINERMAN, M.D.
Yale University
JACOB J. WEINSTEIN
Past President, Central Conference of American Rabbis
KERR L. WHITE, M.D.
Baltimore
WILLIAM FOOTE WHYTE Cornell University
RICHARD WILBUR
Connecticut
WILLIAM B. WILLCOX
University of Michigan
EDWARD L. YOUNG, M.D
Brookline

Institutions listed for identification only.

A LANDMARK DECISION

The House Committee on Un-American Activities has been challenged many times in its 30-year history.

A new challenge was begun in 1965 . . . and this time, things have gone differently.

> . . . The intended victims of HUAC took the initiative to bring the Committee to trial . . Dr. Jeremiah Stamler, renowned heart researcher, and his assistant, Mrs. Yolanda Hall, filed civil suit to test the constitutionality of HUAC . . . both its charter and its practices over the years.
>
> . . . For four years and through three appeals, HUAC resorted to every possible legal stratagem to avoid this judicial review. They pressed contempt of Congress charges against Dr. Stamler and Mrs. Hall. They even tried a name change to help improve their image.

But, on August 5, 1969, The U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago, in a landmark decision, unanimously ruled that this civil suit must be heard. The court postponed the criminal contempt trial and ordered that, at long last, the Committee would have to stand trial, stating:

> "... The judiciary has always borne the basic responsibility for protecting individuals against unconstitutional invasions of their rights by all branches of the Government. The Congress has no more right, whether through legislation or investigations conducted under an overbroad enabling Act, to abridge the First Amendment freedoms of the people, than do the other branches of government . . . we hold that the civil litigation should proceed to the long-delayed trial on the merits."

The Committee, through its government attorneys, in one more attempt to stave off the trial, is appealing this decision to the Supreme Court. But sooner or later, this Committee will have to face its past.

YOU CAN HELP MAKE IT SOONER...

Thousands of dollars have been spent these past four years to pursue this challenge. And thousands of citizens have given both financial and moral support. You now have a chance to share their effort.

Your generous support is needed NOW . . . in a fight we can win!

JEREMIAH STAMLER, M.D. LEGAL AID FUND

PAUL DUDLEY WHITE, M.D.	ROBERT W. WISSLER, M.D.	THEODORE J. LOWI, Ph.D.
Chairman	Treasurer	Secretary

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

.....

.....

Send contributions to: Jeremiah Stamler, M.D. Legal Aid Fund
Faculty Exchange Box 36
University of Chicago, 60637

mark of that carnage is on their work. It is an abstract monument to the spiritual consequences of that horrendous event.

And that is why most productions done à la Grotowski must be largely fraudulent. His theatre has roots in a specific native experience. It is organic with a lived tradition which was shattered and defamed by unimaginable iniquity and boundless shame. Where an art lacks the foundation of corresponding realities it is ornament, entertainment or mere pretense.

Countless times I have been asked apropos of these performances of the Polish Laboratory Theatre (in existence since 1959 and still engaged "in research") whether or not I liked them. My answer: It doesn't matter whether any of us "likes" them. This troupe is what I have repeatedly called true theatre. It may always remain a theatre for the few (I do not refer to snobs), even a cult. Its "message" is well-nigh intolerable and its fanaticism forbidding. But its dedication to its vision of life and art is unparalleled in any theatre of our day.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Plastics used as plastics, rather than in disguise as other materials, are fine for jewelry, utensils, clothes and furniture, but for art there are difficulties. It is no longer a question of whether in principle the new synthetic materials are compatible with fine art; after forty years or so of use there can be no doubt about that. Nonetheless the exhibition at the Jewish Museum, called "The Plastic Presence," is a flop and the reasons are worth attention. First the credits: the show was arranged by Tracy Atkinson and John Lloyd Taylor of the Milwaukee Art Center. After New York, the exhibition will go there and then on to the San Francisco Museum of Art. The show is sponsored by Philip Morris, Inc., and a couple of affiliates. To quote the president of the company: "The artists in this exhibition, with their vision, have shaped a large variety of plastic materials in the medium of fine art. Just so, has Milprint [one of the affiliates], in diverse and experimental ways utilized plastic materials in the field of commercial art." Seldom has the big second-floor gallery of the Jewish Museum looked so terrible.

The first phase of the use of plastics in art, in the 1920s, was linked with the sculptural method of construction, the addition and joining of separate bits and pieces. (This third working method had recently been added to the traditional procedures of carving and modeling.) The combination of a new material, like celluloid or bakelite, and a constructive technique (like engineering, it was thought at the time) conferred a symbolic value on the works. They were regarded as prototypes of what the age demanded; a truly technological style of art.

At the core of the constructivist phase of plastic art, however, was an unsatisfied desire, expressed in a poem by Lazlo Moholy Nagy of 1917: "Space, time, material—are they one with Light?" In 1920, in their Realistic Manifesto, Naum Gabo and Antoine Pevsner, picked up this topic. They rejected color in art when it was only "the idealized optical face of objects, the external and superficial expression of them." The impulse to handle color or light by equating it with the structure of sculpture, rather than by symbolizing light or by textural play, as earlier artists had done, was hampered by the materials available. Probably it was not until the mid-40s, when Moholy Nagy used molded plexiglass for sculpture, that light and form could be said to be joined, as light and glass are a unified visual object.

When Moholy Nagy molded plexiglass art entered a second phase in the use of plastics, a period of sophistication and diversification, as is clear from the present plethoric show. In his introduction, Tracy Atkinson gives an interesting profile of plastics, a bit more technical than most texts on the subject intended for an art audience, which I hope will have the effect of conferring greater precision on future art criticism. He points out also, and fatally, that he has excluded "synthetic resin painting materials" fro his exhibition because "they simply not have the plastic 'presence' to ar where near the same degree as sculptu in the new medium." Thus he bars t one area in which plastics have inco testably contributed to the achieveme of art in a way that is both desirable a technically unique. (Benefits includ color intensity, liquidity and dryi speed.) The physiognomy of the pain ings of Frank Stella (Castelli) and Hele Frankenthaler (André Emmerich), their different ways, are inconceivab without plastics and they do not look the least like oil paint. Plastic paints ha made the kind of difference to Abstra painting that the introduction of ne dyes into pigment made to 19th-centu painting. The English Pre-Raphaeli Brotherhood at mid-century and the Im pressionists in the 1870s had at the disposal a range of colors without preced ent in the history of art. It was a cas in which a technical resource had, afte use, a far-reaching stylistic consequenc and plastic paints have done hardly les Atkinson and Lloyd are no stran gers to plastics; the Milwaukee Art Cente has an excellent and early founded co lection of light art. However, the fac that many of the light works are made o plastic is not what is interesting abou them. (The presence of the artist count for more than the presence of a ma terial.) Once the decision was made t leave out the best things that "the new medium" has made possible, what fol lows is, inevitably, this show. The dream of Moholy Nagy for a material/ligh equation has been realized in a profusion of gaudy and ostentatious objects. Mos of the artists have an infatuated preoc cupation with visual effects. Their tricks whether gross or neat, of reflection, re fraction and transparency enable them to use light as a medium, and so what. The results are ponderously voluptuous or flashily ornate.

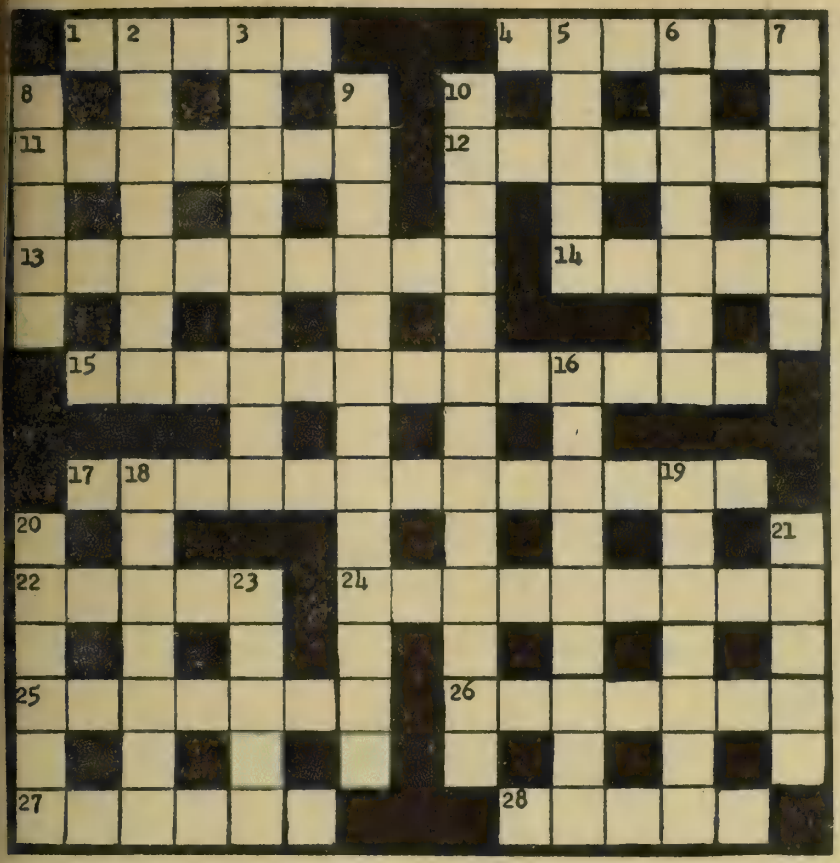
The show is an agglomeration of bana effects with a minimum of content. (By content I meant that property, that knot of symbols, in a work of art, that is continuous with the formal display but not identical with it.) Hence these ob jects are exhausted by our attention: the act of looking is all there is to do. They are crystal balls with only one view or they are television screens when the set is off and the traffic outside is making lyrical lights on the tube. Most of the object-oriented sculptures partake of these faults, but some of the spreading or environmental pieces (Eva Hesse, Les Levine—though his modular piece was shown with too small a sample—and Richard van Buren's scatter of tattered wisps of fiberglas) escape from the prevailing Bronx-Murano aesthetic.



LOOKING INTO MY GRANDDAUGHTER'S EYES

o for a world with a string and a kitten and the gentle muzzle of the fawn and colts who trot and scamper everywhichway and Tipsy who loves us so much he pees and you and I

CARL RAKOSI

Crossword Puzzle No. 1324

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 A wooden support directly opposite the middle? (5)
4 Like a blanket with a hole in it, letting in no drop, but putting out no chop. (6)
11 Ruined towns in England should remember this name. (7)
12 It sounds like a vacation trip comes in addition. (7)
13 Impatient drillers might get a real flower. (9)
14 Referring to the beginning, however, offer opposing proof. (5)
15 Looking for those that might slice? The woods would be an appropriate place to find them. (7,6)
17 An answer to how the tightrope-walker does it? It should be in your favor! (6,7)
22 By the sound of it, drinks a couple of times around in error. (5)
24 They just go to show how far we've gone in transportation! (9)
25 And this might keep you going. (7)
26 Hunter of what might be considered a two-eyed sort of shark? (7)
27 They could improve your 17. (6)
28 The part of the mistletoe used in making carpets? (5)

DOWN

2 A nice fillet, and especially in a lover. (7)
3 Sounds as though it implied a relative take-out assigned to an earlier time. (9)
5 Happen to suggest itself? (5)
6 Disappear piecemeal. (7)
7 Attacks with stones, possibly. (6)
8 It might be on a line covered with water. (5)
9 You might translate it into near-Latin, but it's much more world-wide. (13)
10 Put on the nose-bag, as a stout trencherman might! (3,4,1,5)
16 They might be mirages, i.e., likenesses of things. (9)
18 Note from 14 a sort of 22 formally withdraws. (7)
19 What might help the actor dance, possibly giving one a good break. (3,4)
20 A palm's distilled liquid is medically important. (6)
21 A spicy, but incomplete garnish. (5)
23 Some people might be put out if you do. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1323

ACROSS: 1 Surprise; 5 Abates; 9 Ratafia; 10 Durango; 11 Brigand; 12 Nesting; 13 Generation gap; 15 Spring showers; 21 Rio Muni; 22 Accrual; 23 Thin out; 24 Impaled; 26 Begrudge. DOWN: 1 Scribe; 2 Ratting; 3 Refrain; 4 Standard shift; 6 and 25 Burns to a crisp; 7 Tensing; 8 Stopgaps; 10 Denationalize; 14 Tsaritza; 16 Roomier; 17 Neurons; 18 Escaper; 19 Sculled; 20 Sludge.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

PUBLICATIONS

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

TRAVEL

JAPAN EXPO JET CHARTERS. $350 R. T. from Los Angeles. For complete details send $1.00 to: AMERICAN TOURS, POB 1125, Pasadena, California 91102

PERSONALS

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Looking for something out of this world to give for the Holidays? If so read no further.

We have nothing exotic to offer. Just something challenging and informative. The kind of magazine that engages you, rouses you to write angry letters when you disagree. A magazine that wants to know what you think.

Why not give The Nation as a holiday gift this year? Our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one. Act now and we will send you as a free gift from us, The Age of Protest, edited by Walt Anderson.

clip & mail

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY ..... STATE ..... ZIP .....

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free THE AGE OF PROTEST. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N 12-8

OCTANE NUMBERS GAME A. Q. MOWBRAY

THE NATION

DECEMBER 15, 1969 35 cents

S-7OR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
DEC 22 1969
LIBRARY

End of Separation? CHURCH, STATE AND THE COURTS

GEORGE R. LA NOUE

Nixon's History Lesson
THE MYTH OF REPRISALS

WILLIAM MEYERS

The Holidays: Part One

Kevin Sullivan on Frank O'Connor

Anselm Hollo on Anna Akhmatova

GIFT BOOKS—RECORDS—CHILDREN'S BOOKS

LETTERS

false equation

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: With regard to your editorial "Tough Questions" in the November 24 issue, the Emergency Committee for Full Funding of Education Programs is nonpartisan, in that it believes that no administration of the past two decades has adequately met, through the appropriations process, the findings of financial need as set forth in the authorization statutes. If should be noted that for most of the educational programs, the $1.04 billion added to the Nixon budget simply keeps the percentage of entitlement or the dollar amounts the same as in fiscal year 1969.

The term "educational-industrial complex" applied to the activities of teachers, librarians, guidance and counseling personnel and home economists is strained to the point of the absurd, just as is the false equation of $80 billion from the federal treasury for defense activities, with the nearly $60 billion from all sources, public and private, which pay the cost of all levels of American education. The diversity of monetary sources for and the widespread involvement of many independent public and private sources in educational expenditure clearly point up the differences between the two operations. Defense is centralized, with but a very few individuals involved in decision. Educational decisions are literally made by hundreds of thousands of public-spirited men and women, lay and professional.

The plain fact of the matter is that the federal government, through the Office of Education, funding of education under the House version of H.R. 13111 (passed July 31, 1969) amounts to only $4.2 billion or about 7 per cent of the total cost of the education of American students of all ages. Arguments based upon equity can be made that the "federal share" should be closer to one-third or one-half. . . . Charles W. Lee, Executive Secretary
Emergency Committee

not dead

New York City

DEAR SIRS: I believe it was a little premature for Larry David Nachman to deliver an "Obituary for SDS" before he produces any evidence of a dead body [The Nation, Nov. 24]. He is, I think, correct when he complains that the SDS abandoned its legitimate base on the campus a year or so ago for some mystical alliance with factories and the Third World, but that is expressing a personal gripe, not producing a corpse.

For the last several months, in the course of writing a book on the history of the SDS, I have been doing research on the current campus scene, and it seems to me that the SDS is very much alive. It is splintered, of course; it is as decentralized as ever; it is tripping over the coils of its own ideologies; it is bewildered, frustrated and angry. But it exists. SDS activities at a dozen universities this fall (Yale, Harvard, M.I.T., etc.), as well as in the streets of Chicago and Washington, suggest that as long as student radicalism exists, so will the SDS. . . . J. Kirk Sale wrong pejorative

Martin, Tenn.

DEAR SIRS: If Charles Molesworth in his review of Richard Howard's Alone With America [The Nation, Nov. 17] is quoting James Dickey from the Tennessee Poetry Journal (Robert Bly issue; Winter, 1969), then he has the quotation wrong. What Mr. Dickey said of Mr. Bly's work was not "disgusting" but "pitiful." As far as I know, this is the only "recent one-word comment by James Dickey" in print. . . . Stephen Mooney, Editor
Tennessee Poetry Journal

EDITORIALS

The War System

There is nothing that the American public relishes more than the opportunity to wallow in a sty of pseudo-moral discussion. When something happens to tarnish our national image of moral excellence, we try to restore its pristine brilliance (which never existed except in our imagination) by rituals of public atonement led by priestly commentators. This would be a good thing if it resulted in a lasting change of heart, but it is as ephemeral as the frontier evangelism from which it is derived and which went hand in hand with the slaughter of Indians. After every major ghetto riot of recent years such exhibitions of piety were the rule, and they lasted about as long as the headlines.

At the moment we are luxuriating in the emotions aroused by the Song My massacre which, on the word of the Thieu government, never occurred. Here we accept the evidence that it did. The American public, on this premise, has split into two camps. One holds that it is just another Communist plot, that those shot were all Vietcong and deserved their fate. The other seeks expiation by punishing the guilty. Who, then, is guilty? Lieutenant Calley, who commanded the platoon? Captain Medina, the company commander? Lieutenant Colonel Barker, who was killed later in a midair collision? Or Colonel Henderson, the brigade commander, who declares that he never heard of the incident while he was in Vietnam but who now is beginning to believe that it did indeed occur?

We find ourselves unable to get into the spirit of this discussion; we are not interested in finding scapegoats. However, if we were to ascribe guilt, our preference would be to start well up the ladder, as at Nuremberg. A War Crimes Commission of our choosing would begin its investigations with former Vice President Nixon who, in company with Admiral Radford and Secretary of State Dulles, wanted us to go to the relief of Dienbienphu, reportedly with nuclear weapons if TNT would not suffice. That insanity was overruled by President Eisenhower, who may therefore be exculpated. President Kennedy is beyond the reach of earthly tribunals, but he began the escalation in part to cover his humiliations at the Bay of Pigs and in Vienna. A star defendant would be President Johnson, who was responsible for the major escalation, after assuring the voters that he would do nothing of the kind. Robert McNamara went along, Nicholas Katzenbach furnished the legal underpinning. McGeorge Bundy was another high-level operator until he jumped off the bandwagon, while W. W. Rostow stayed on.

Not to be neglected, also, are Dean Rusk, next to John Foster Dulles the chief crusader against communism. And of course generals and ex-generals—all members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in particular General Westmoreland who has just prepared the ground for a stab-in-the-back rationalization by asserting that if we had persisted in bombing North Vietnam we would probably have won the war by now. And General Taylor, who encouraged President Kennedy's intervention. We would also include in the indictment all those American intellectuals who beat the anti-communism drums until they got what was implicit in their agitation, namely, the war in Vietnam, and then were horrified by their ideological handiwork only because the military could not manage to win the war. And the companies that have made money out of the war all these years, the labor leaders who supported and still support it, the legislators who have competed for military contracts. It is hard to know where to stop.

For the moment, then, it might be better if we left morality out of the discussion. It is our intellectual dishonesty that should be examined. Why didn't the American public question those "body counts" which persist to the present day? Whose bodies? How did we think we could intervene in a civil war and not kill civilians? Did we think that the South Vietnamese torture and liquidation of prisoners shown here on TV were unknown to our own military? In what sealed dimension of time and space have today's soul-searchers and scapegoaters been living since 1954?

Nothing could be more senseless than the distinctions we are now trying to make in order to justify our indifference to the consequences of our actions in Vietnam. It may be "more savage" to kill civilians by rifle or machine gun than to obliterate a village with a bomb from the air, but to the civilian victims the distinction is meaningless. Given the fact of our intervention, it is not relevant that the Vietcong have committed "atrocities." We should stop looking for scapegoats in high or low places. And we should stop trying to make distinctions between this war and that. General Sherman said that war is hell. What war has not been, with only the reservation that some, adventitiously, are more hellish than others? What about the senseless bombing of Dresden in which 150,000 were killed or the atom bombing of Hiroshima? The war system itself should be the focus of our indignation, not its incidental variations and degrees of hellishness. There is evil enough in this system to keep our moralists preoccupied for the balance of the century if they will but concentrate their attention on it.

The New Politicians

The "silent" Americans who have been down on the "kids" lately would do well to look in the other direction once in a while for their villains. If they did, they would discover a U.S. Army Major, in uniform and with the apparent approval of Army Chief of Staff Gen. William Westmoreland, criticizing elected members of Congress.

Major Rowe, in his capacity as a one-man, pro-war Pentagon public relations man, has been utilized by at least twenty-six Congressmen to film twenty television interviews and cut six radio tapes for playback at home stations of the Congressmen. On several shows the Major has questioned the patriotism of Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.) and has cast doubt on statements by Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D., Ark.) and former Sen. Wayne Morse (D., Ore.).

The Major's criticism of Sen. George McGovern, which appears in at least two of his political tapes, stems from the Senator's appearance at the Washington Monument

IN THIS ISSUE

December 15, 1969

EDITORIALS

650

ARTICLES

654 Nixon's History Lesson: The Myth of Reprisals — William Meyers

656 End of Separation? Church, State and the Courts — George R. La Noue

659 Regular or Premium? The Octane Numbers Game — A. Q. Mowbray

661 Dogma from Cleveland: Infiltrating the Curriculum — Terence Sheridan and Donald L. Barlett

664 Statehood for Micronesia — Ernest Gruening

BOOKS & THE ARTS

666 Akhmatova: Selected Poems Akhmadulina: Fever and Other New Poems — Anselm Hollo

667 Fowles: The French Lieutenant's Woman — Annette Grant

668 O'Connor: My Father's Son — Kevin Sullivan

668 Lacuna (poem) — Robert Morgan

670 Books for Children — Ned O'Gorman

670 Flying (poem) — Stephen Mooney

672 Gift Books — Sherman Paul

673 Records 1969 — David Hamilton

675 Theatre — Harold Clurman

676 Film Scene at Pula — Curtis Harnack

676 Jenifer (poem) — Stanley Cooperman

678 Winter Afternoon (poem) — Harold Isbell

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

THE NATION Volume 209
No. 21

peace rally. The Major asked whether the Senator (who, by the way, is a decorated World War II pilot) cherished the American flag or the Vietcong flag.

The Pentagon-sponsored Major is a greater threat to the traditions of America—where an Army career and political activism are not supposed to mix—than are several million rebellious youths who are opposed to dying in Vietnam. But the Major doesn't see it that way. He says: "We are entering into an ideological conflict where politics and the military are married into one. If someone says you can't speak and stay in the military, I would resign. . . . The thing is, you're going to have to choose sides."

The surprising thing is that no one has asked Major Rowe to resign. On the contrary, Col. Lloyd L. Burke, an Army legislative liaison officer and Rowe's boss, stated recently that General Westmoreland "knows of all his [Rowe's] activity on the Hill and approves of it." According to a Washington Post article, Westmoreland had a private fifteen-minute interview with Rowe after the Major was brought to Washington from Fort Sill, Okla. And it didn't end there. Bernard D. Nossiter, writing in the Post, reports that "the House Armed Services Committee was impressed with the Major's story and arranged a meeting at the White House between Rowe and President Nixon on November 12. They were closeted for twenty-five minutes."

A review of the Major's activity, and the approval it is getting from his Commander in Chief and from the Army's Chief of Staff, makes it appear that the United States military has finally succumbed to the temptation to enter politics. Considering its close association with military dictatorships around the world, it is not surprising that it has caught the disease. What is surprising is that the Administration appears to be encouraging the sickness rather than performing an immediate amputation of the offending limb.

By accepting uniformed military political activists as allies against loosely organized civilian dissent, President Nixon is messing around with forces that have submerged more clever and farsighted leaders than himself and destroyed nations as proud as is America of their democratic traditions.

Pleasant Reading, for a Change

In this era one must be grateful for snippets of good news, and in the past few weeks several such antidepressants were bunched together. Even cumulatively they provide no basis for loud cheers, and separately considered each case induces reservations. Just the same, they are small reliefs, gratefully recorded.

The coincidental items were President Nixon's decision to resubmit the forty-five-year-old Geneva Protocol, dealing with chemical and biological warfare, to the Senate for ratification; the signing of the nonproliferation treaty on nuclear weapons by West Germany; and the American agreement to return Okinawa to Japan in 1972.

As to the first, Mr. Nixon made a unilateral declaration that the United States would never resort to biological weapons, even in retaliation. This sounds good, but actually it is not much of a sacrifice. The microbes which cause pneumonic plague, anthrax and other high-mortality diseases are as ineffective a weapon as can well be imagined. In general, bacteriological weapons are as great a danger to the user as to the prospective victim, so it is hard to see why the Joint Chiefs would have liked to retain them except that, on principle, they are opposed to relinquishing any item in their variegated arsenal.

It is not certain that the earlier signatories to the Geneva Protocol will accept our belated acquiescence. Chemical warfare is also banned under the treaty, and apparently we have no intention of giving up the use of so-called riot-control agents in Vietnam or wherever they may suit our purposes. While these gases are in themselves nonlethal, they are commonly used to flush enemy troops from underground shelters, so that they can then be killed by high explosives. Published figures show that in the last five years, the Army has procured more than 15 million pounds of CS and CS-2, which are among the most potent agents in this category. Herbicides are another borderline application. The Army has defoliated 4.5 million acres in Vietnam, including a half-million acres of cropland.

The timing of Mr. Nixon's announcement indicates that he wanted to divert attention from the Song My situation, which has done grievous damage to the U.S. reputation abroad, and the obvious political implications are certain to detract somewhat from the act itself. This is another instance of Mr. Nixon's eternal addiction to politics—it is often so obvious as to be at least partly self-defeating.

The Okinawa action, which provides not only for the return of the island to Japan but also for surrender of the U.S. right to store nuclear weapons there and to conduct combat operations from Okinawa bases without Japanese approval, was essential if Premier Eisaku Sato hoped to stay in office. On the strength of the concessions he obtained in Washington, he has already scheduled general elections for December 27. Actually much more than Sato's political future was at stake in the Nixon-Sato negotiations. If Sato had returned without Okinawa, the U.S.-Japan security treaty relationship would have been a casualty. As it is, the United States retains military bases on Japanese territory, including Okinawa. Come what may in Vietnam, the American beachhead in Asia is unimpaired.

The decision of the West German Government to sign the nuclear nonproliferation treaty, after three years of acrimonious controversy, may augur well for the SALT talks in Helsinki. West Germany became the ninety-second nation to sign, and other nations, including Japan, may now follow its lead. But formal ratification by West Germany awaits clarification on the question of control over nuclear research and development, which bears importantly on future electric power development in Europe. The West German Government has notified every government with which it has diplomatic relations that it insists on continuing work on peaceful uses of nuclear energy, and that it must be protected, through NATO or otherwise, in any future nuclear war. The signing of the treaty is therefore only a projected step, although an important one, in curbing the spread of nuclear weapons.

Greece and the Council

On December 12, when the Foreign Ministers of the Council of Europe meet in Paris to decide whether or not to suspend Greece, they will have read the Report of the European Human Rights Commission. This long-awaited, 1,200-page study finds that the Greek Government tortures political prisoners as an "administrative practice," that there was no danger of a Communist overthrow of constitutional government on April 21, 1967, and that the military regime has violated all the articles of the European Human Rights Convention cited in the original Scandinavian complaint of September 1967.

Despite these findings, the suspension of Greece is not at all certain. A two-thirds vote is required, and the past weeks have been marked by considerable diplomatic activity. The busiest nation has been the United States—not even a member of the eighteen-nation organization. It has been vigorously lobbying for the colonels, first urging the Scandinavians to drop the case, now telling its NATO partners that suspending Greece might so irk the colonels that strategic U.S. bases in the Aegean would be in jeopardy. It is most improbable that Greece would quit NATO in a huff; more likely, expulsion from the Council of Europe would be followed by demands for ejection from NATO. Neither the Greek military nor the Nixon Administration would care for that.

More than half the report is devoted to Article 3, which prohibits torture. Despite the legal style of the text, the horror of the situation comes out in extracts of testimony describing sexual tortures, the falanga (bastinado), electric shock, etc. The jurists were unanimous in their decision: "The commission has found it established beyond doubt that torture or ill treatment contrary to Article 3 has been inflicted in a number of cases." Most important, the commission found that these were not isolated acts but part of an official system.

The other article on which the commission concentrated was Article 15, which allows a member state to depart from some of its obligations under the Human Rights Convention (though not Article 3) "in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation." The Greek Government argued that on April 21, 1967, there was danger of a Communist take-over and a crisis of public order. On this the report states: "There is evidence indicating that it was neither planned at the time nor seriously anticipated by either military or police authorities." Losing this point, the Greek Government rather ingenuously argued that bombs and "illegal" resistance after April 21, 1967, had produced a "public emergency" justifying the state of siege. The council rejected this argument also.

After finding that Article 15 did not apply, the HRC declared the Greek Government to be in violation of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed under the convention, such as freedom of expression, association, right to fair trial, effective remedy, inviolability of home and correspondence, etc. Though the applicant governments had not cited Article 2, the right to life, the commission pointed out that a number of persons had died under torture and that Article 2 had also been violated.

The confrontation at the Council of Europe has made U.S. policy on Greece clear. It was always obvious that such individuals as Maj. Gen. Samuel Eaton of the U.S. Military Mission and James M. Potts, head of the CIA in Greece (who is notorious in Athens for his comment about Papadopoulos, "He's my boy!"), were openly pro-junta, but the White House and the State Department insisted that their policy was "neutral," their role "marginal." Washington's basic concept has always been that the colonels themselves should "evolve" toward "more democratic practices." After nearly thirty-two months of this regime, Greece is no closer to elections, no closer to the rule of law than it was the day after the colonels took over. Greeks can only draw the conclusion from Washington declarations of "neutrality" that if they want freedom, they must gain it through armed struggle, a bloody civil war.

Dissent in Boston

On Sunday, November 30, the Boston Herald-Traveler ran a column from The New York Times syndicate in which music critic Harold Schonberg compared Vice President Agnew's recent speeches to the reaction of a performer who has received bad reviews. One wonders whether the Herald-Traveler management appreciated the irony: Schonberg's column was substituted at the last minute for a scheduled article by George Gelles, the Herald's regular music critic, who had been suspended a few days earlier following several negative reviews of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Public uproars over music criticism have not been unusual in Boston; since the appointment of Michael Steinberg as critic of the Globe six years ago, Boston has had access to some of the most literate, informed and courageous music criticism in the country, but it is no secret that the trustees of the Boston Symphony and other interested parties have often longed for a return to the Pollyanna notices of earlier days ("Brahms and Tchaikovsky were played and a good time was had by all"). Last spring, Steinberg shared an award as the best music critic in the United States, and the Globe was entitled to some self-congratulation for its unwavering support of a controversial but valuable civic asset.

In September, Boston's "other" paper, the Herald-Traveler, appointed a new music critic, George Gelles, a professionally trained musician with background and qualifications similar to Steinberg's. Since Gelles had written for other Boston papers over the previous four years, his knowledge, skill, literary style and the general tenor of his approach can scarcely have been unknown to the Herald. Indeed, the encouraging inference might have been drawn that the presence of one serious reviewer had induced a major competitive paper to follow suit. With two such pens at work, the standpatters of Boston's musical establishment would find it more difficult to dismiss Steinberg as a solitary crank.

In early November, a series of unfavorable (but by no means parallel) reviews of the Boston Symphony in both papers once again brought out the letter writers, and elicited a telegram from the orchestra members asking their management "not to welcome" Steinberg at their concerts. Management declined to withdraw the Globe's press tickets, but promised to pursue the matter with the newspaper; it evidently learned that the Globe, as before, stood behind its critic. However, after Gelles' third adverse orchestra review of the month, the Herald informed him that his pending reviews would not be printed; then that he was not to cover the next orchestra concert (it was given out that he was sick); and, finally, that he was through as music critic.

Nothing Gelles said in the apparently offending reviews had been questioned as to factual accuracy, nor did any of it exceed the boundaries of legitimate comment. But given the Symphony's willingness to "pursue the matter" of Steinberg, one can imagine a similar willingness to approach the Herald about Gelles, whether or not the reliably attested threat of advertising withdrawals was actually made. The Herald's cold feet certainly did not result merely from a stack of subscriber mail.

The official reason given for the suspension was that the publisher felt Gelles "was not competent to handle the job," and he had therefore been reassigned to cover other cultural events of a nonmusical nature. When a spokesman for the paper was questioned about the improbable circumstance that a fully trained musician should be considered competent only on nonmusical subjects, he declined comment. Leaving aside the question of how this supposed failure to measure up to the Herald's standard was discovered only after the publication of some unfavorable reviews of a powerful institution, one still wonders whose standards of newspaper publishing the Herald seeks to meet—perhaps Mr. Agnew's?

NIXON'S HISTORY LESSON

THE MYTH OF REPRISALS

WILLIAM MEYERS
Mr. Meyers is a New York attorney and businessman.

In the attempt to justify the U.S. intervention in Vietnam, those responsible for the action have created a mythology of catastrophic proportions. Future historians will be appalled by our rewrite of the Geneva Agreements of 1954, particularly our conversion of the 17th Parallel from a line separating two parts of one country into something quite different. To find successive pretexts for continuing the war, we have moved from one discredited thesis to the next. On November 3, President Nixon treated us to a new one: reprisals. We are told that if we try to get out of Vietnam "precipitately" (undefined) we shall jeopardize the lives of those we leave behind. Many will accept this argument because of a mistaken notion as to what happened in Vietnam in 1954 and what is likely to happen today.

On July 20, 1954, the French and Vietnamese signed an "Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities." Article 2 stated: "The period during which all forces of either party shall move into its regrouping zone on either side of the provisional military demarcation line shall be completed within 300 days from date." Article 15 (c) stated: "Each party undertakes to refrain from any reprisals or discrimination against persons on account of their activities during the hostilities and to guarantee their democratic liberties."

On a recent trip to Hanoi (The Nation, December 8), I talked with some of the people who implemented the decrees. On October 1, 1954, Ho Chi Minh issued Decree No. 218, ordering that no reprisals be taken against those who had collaborated with the enemy during wartime. Those who had been prosecuted were to be released and granted democratic rights. I spoke at great length to Vu Dinh Hoe, Minister of Justice, one of the signers of Decree No. 218, and the man responsible for enforcing it. His job was primarily educational. He sent teams into each of the localities of the four zones in which the North was divided. Three categories of people were affected by the decree: Those who had been sentenced were released; those who had been prosecuted were not sentenced; those who had been accused of crimes were not formally charged. Mr. Hoe said that the decree had been successfully carried out within three months of its promulgation. I spoke also to Nguyen Trac, chairman in 1954 of the Tribunal in the Fourth Zone, who corroborated the situation as described by Mr. Hoe.

The report of the International Control Commission indicated that there were some violations, but that "on the whole, they had been vastly exaggerated by Diem for propaganda purposes." I found no evidence of what Mr. Nixon, in his November 3 speech referred to as "massacres which followed their take-over in the North fifteen years before" (referring to 1954). Documentation of the International Control Commission, statements by its staff, literature either out of Saigon or any pro-Administration source clearly indicate that the contrary is true. Nixon is wrong in stating that "a million and a half Catholic refugees fled to South Vietnam." The authorities agree that the number was no more than 500,000. Frank Traeger, a strong proponent of the Johnson-Nixon policies, wrote in 1966 that 861,000 persons left the North for the South. Bernard Fall also wrote in that year that "860,000 persons went South, 500,000 of them Catholics." These figures are accepted by all the authorities in the field.

Mr. B. S. Murti, of the staff of the International Control Commission, confirms that the Hanoi government cooperated fully, even to the point of supplying food and money; and that a considerable number of Catholics remained. (There are a large number of Catholics in the North today.) Many people were frightened into going South by their priests who not only told them that "the Virgin had gone South" but also that the Americans would drop an atomic bomb in the North. Coral Bell in Survey of International Affairs (published for the Royal Institute in 1957) comments: "A number of English observers were critical of the methods used in the campaign and doubted whether the peasants concerned fully understood the realities of the situation or indeed wished to move." Altogether, this is quite a different picture from that described by Nixon.

Nixon's next statement is even stronger: "They then murdered more than 50,000 people and hundreds of thousands more died in slave labor camps." There is absolutely no evidence of the latter assertion. As to the former, if Nixon is talking about deaths that occurred in 1956-57, it is clear that some deaths did occur because of forced expropriation policies, but certainly not in the numbers Nixon indicated. However, at the end of 1957, the government re-evaluated its policies and this situation was corrected. (1)

His remarks on Hue, where 3,000 civilians allegedly were killed, are certainly questionable. Conversations with leaders at Hanoi, as one would expect even though one would credit their sincerity, produced a different version. Our own press seems to question the Nixon version, as evidenced in an article in The New York Times of November 25, 1969:

> Saigon, South Vietnam, Nov. 24 (AP)—Enemy troops who seized Hue during the 1968 Tet offensive "eliminated" nearly 2,900 Vietnamese, according to a captured enemy document made public today.
>
> Disclosure of the document by official sources here came as the United States Army continued its investigation into an alleged massacre of between 100 and 567 villagers by American troops on March 16, 1968.
>
> One United States source conceded that cynics would see the sudden disclosure of the document as an effort to offset North Vietnamese and Vietcong charges that American troops had committed mass murder. But he said that the document had been unnoticed in United States military files for about 19 months until last week when a writer asked to see captured documents.
>
> "I know it sounds incredible, but that's the truth," he said. . . . (2)

What is perhaps most interesting about Nixon's discussion of his new pretext, is what he does not say about the situation in the South in 1954 and the years after. The records show no substantial reprisals in the North, but a shifting of 860,000 people (500,000 Catholics) to the South. The story in the South is altogether different. The massacres by Diem, a paid ally of the French from 1954 to 1963 and then of the Americans, resulted in the deaths of hundreds of thousands and the ultimate incarceration of a third of the people in concentration camps (according to Sen. Edward Kennedy, among others). I spoke to Phan Lac Tuyen, an officer in the Diem army, who cited a series of laws promulgated by Diem which resulted in a police state second to none.

Mr. Nixon's language on November 3 certainly served to inflame rather than instruct. The Democratic Republic of Vietnam is referred to only as the Communists; South Vietnam is designated as South Vietnam. Reading his speech, one would get no idea that Vietnam has existed as one country for centuries. No one would guess that as many as two-thirds of the population in the South

The Special (Brussels)

(1) Writing in The Christian Century of November 5, D. Gareth Porter and Len E. Ackland say that complaints investigated by the International Control Commission disclosed no evidence of reprisal killings on a scale that could possibly be called a massacre, let alone a "blood bath." They note also that the killings which did occur were in connection with the land reform program, that by mid-1956 Ho was aware that the program had been a disaster, that he dismissed Truong Chinh, primary advocate of an extreme, "Chinese" policy in agriculture, and launched a "campaign for rectification of errors."

(2) One of the authors of the Christian Century article previously cited was in Hue shortly after its recapture. From interviews with officials in the city, he learned that the Vietcong arrived in the city with a very short list of names—mostly special police—marked for execution. A much longer list contained those—soldiers, police, government functionaries and employees of the Americans—who were to be placed under observation. It was not until late in the siege of the city, when the Vietcong knew that it would have to get out, that a considerable number of these were killed. "The mass executions perpetrated [in Hue] were not the result of a policy on the part of a victorious government but rather the revenge of an army in retreat."

may agree with the Northerners, and that many families have members in both parts of the country. Few Vietnamese would heed his ultimate call for inhumanity of a most callous sort, his Vietnamization policy that calls for Vietnamese to kill Vietnamese.

All of Hanoi's leaders to whom I spoke talked of the need for reconciliation amongst all Vietnamese. The coalition they call for is broad enough to include representation from all groups, including even members of the Thieu-Ky cabinet. I believe that it is their intention to re-enact what was in fact the nonreprisal policy of 1954 at the end of this war. If Nixon were serious about his eagerness for peace, and if he were also serious about his fear of reprisals, he would be talking about the need for reconciliation. If he thought that some method would be necessary to insure proper safety, a reconstituted International Control Commission would be surely acceptable to Hanoi; in my discussions, it was considered as a possibility. Instead, the President conjured up a bloody specter in the future to excuse and justify the blood that is being spilled today, tomorrow and for as long as myths are permitted to prolong this war.

END OF SEPARATION?

Church, State and the Courts

GEORGE R. LA NOUE
Mr. La Noue is associate professor of government and education at Teachers College, Columbia University.

Since World War II, there has been a radical transformation of church-state relations that has passed almost unnoticed. Church and state are linked today in a whole series of federal programs. Indeed, under current laws and operating practices, a church institution can obtain its land from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare via the General Services Administration; its mortgage insurance from the Housing and Home Finance Agency; its food from the Department of Agriculture; its wine from the Department of the Treasury; and its prospective members from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Should it encounter an act of God, the church institution can turn to the Small Business Administration for a disaster loan. This is something less than separation of church and state.

There is no need for a conspiracy theory to explain this departure from the separation tradition. It is simply that many men in many programs made pragmatic and political decisions until the principle was overwhelmed. Madison and Jefferson's separation of church and state is, after all, an 18th-century concept of limited government that does not fit easily into the operation of a welfare state. For example, when the Hill-Burton Act of 1946 put the federal government into the business of financing hospital expansion, it certainly seemed practical to include the 13 per cent of the hospitals that belonged to churches. Similar decisions were made as new housing, foreign aid and educational programs were created. In the struggle to increase public services, liberals found that churches were valuable allies; conservatives, loath to multiply public bureaucracies, preferred to fund church and other private agencies to carry out the new programs. Churchmen were not only pleased to offer their institutions' services as a matter of social conscience; they also intensively lobbied for the privilege, as a matter of financial necessity. Beyond money, in an era when the existence of God is questioned in clerical circles, churches gain prestige and a sense of purpose from participating in federal programs.

What does the Supreme Court think of this abandonment of the principle of separation of church and state? We have only clues, since the Court does not render advisory opinions and previous cases have not dealt with federal programs. Nevertheless, in opinions on other questions, Justice Black has suggested that tax aid to church colleges is unconstitutional, and Justice Douglas, after listing many of the federal activities involving churches, tersely concluded: "I think it an unconstitutional undertaking whatever form it takes."

These programs, nevertheless, appeared to be forever immune from legal challenge. In 1923, in Frothingham v. Mellon, the Court adopted the sensible rule that being a taxpayer did not give one sufficient enough stake to initiate litigation regarding federal expenditures. Consequently, even if Congress had made a direct grant to a particular church, there seemed no way to bring the issue into court. Yet the Establishment Clause was specifically designed to protect citizens from being taxed for religious purposes, so last year in Flast v. Cohen the Court made a special exception to the Frothingham rule to permit taxpayer suits against federal programs which allegedly aid churches. Before these cases arrive, however, the Court has decided to straighten out the old question of whether the churches themselves should pay taxes.

Like most tax questions, the issue of ecclesiastical exemptions is enormously complex, both legally and fiscally. Nobody is even certain how much money is at stake. A CBS News special last year reported that taxes on church property would amount to $1 billion, but that nice round figure looks suspiciously inexact. Martin A. Larson, in Church Wealth and Business Income (1968), suggests that church property totals $102.5 billion, which if taxed at ordinary rates would produce $6.5 billion in federal and state revenue.

Estimates of the yield of proposed taxes are notoriously optimistic, but exemption for churches extends considerably beyond the property tax privilege. Tax loopholes for churches are scattered throughout state and federal revenue codes. Although clerics pay income taxes, they do not have to include church-provided living quarters or cash housing allowances as income. Nor need they pay Social Security taxes unless they choose to, and their religious employers are exempt from unemployment taxes. Gifts to churches, whether the donor is alive or dead (estate taxes) are privileged deductions. Churches are exempt from excise taxes on musical instruments and jewelry used for religious purposes; even when they promote a gentle vice (lotteries), they need not pay federal wagering taxes.

However, the most controversy has been caused by the fact that churches are permitted to engage in ordinary secular business without paying income taxes. The sharpies have discovered this gimmick: new "churches" have been set up to run businesses and old churches have found themselves "owners" of businesses under lease-back arrangements. The parade of horrible examples has become so long that even the men who must balance the church ledgers are embarrassed. In the last two years, spokesmen for the major Protestant denominations, joined by Catholics and Jews, made statements favoring the end of exemptions on church-run secular business, though their generosity has not followed their logic to the point of paying taxes on stock profits (where the real money is). Nevertheless, volunteer taxpayers are a rarity and the IRS and Congress quickly accepted the churches' offer. The tax reform bill, which at this point has passed the House and the Senate Finance Committees, would gradually phase out the churches' privileges as business owners. On at least one tax issue, then, it seems that church and state are about to quietly compromise.

Render Unto IRS

That sets the stage for the next step. Last June, the Court announced that it had accepted for review the case of Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York, which involves the exemption of property used for religious purposes. Civil liberties lawyers were stunned. Four times before, in 1956, 1961, 1963 and 1966, the Court had refused to hear such cases. Now in the middle of the new Congressional debate about church taxes, the Court had elected to decide a case that had not received a single dissenting vote in three lower courts.

Frederick Walz, an elderly lawyer, bought a 22 by 24-foot piece of Staten Island in order to create a $5.24 property tax that would give him standing to sue. His insistence on arguing his own case finally led the ACLU (despite deep differences within the organization on both tactics and principles) to offer its services, so that the issue could be seriously presented. On November 19, Edward Ennis, Chairman of ACLU, made the oral argument to the Court. Mr. Walz's other supporter is Madelyn Murray O'Hair, who initiated one of the cases that ended public school prayer and Bible reading and who now claims to be the "sole spokesman" for 6.5 million non-believing Americans. After reading her brief, Mr. Walz may have recalled the saying, "With friends like that who needs enemies?" He has, of course, already made legal enemies in abundance. Opposing his suit are no less than the City of New York, represented by J. Lee Rankin, who is the former Solicitor General of the United States; thirty-seven states, and the National Council of Churches, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Synagogue Council of America.

Most professionals concerned with church-state problems are convinced that Walz will lose, although respectable arguments can be made for his position. The Supreme Court has previously defined the Establishment Clause as forbidding "laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another." Tax exemption is certainly a form of aid, but it is very unlikely the Court will require taxation of religiously used property.

What is in doubt, however, is the kind of rationale the Court will use to uphold the practice. This is a tricky matter because the adoption of a particular position in this case may determine future Court decisions on church-state problems and influence the responses of other courts and governmental agencies to other religious issues.

The lower courts appeared to be convinced by the fact that this kind of tax exemption is an ancient practice, deeply embedded in local custom, but a lazy judicial historicism is not in itself sufficient. Practices with equal historical validity, segregation, school prayers and malapportionment, have recently been barred by the Supreme Court. Nor can the Court follow earlier state decisions that upheld exemption on the ground that church charitable activity would otherwise have to be provided by the state. The quid pro quo won't apply here, because the tax in question is on religiously used property, and worship is not a function the state can constitutionally perform. A more subtle position is the defense of tax exemption because of the value of churches as a civilizing agent. Any judicial statement in that direction could be expanded by others to argue for more direct governmental encouragement of religion. While recognizing the historical and cultural significance of religion, the Court nevertheless made a firm commitment in the school prayer cases to a philosophy of legal neutrality between religion and irreligion.

This leaves the principle of separation of church and state itself as the best reason for exempting church property. But isn't tax exemption really the same kind of establishment of religion that a grant to a church would be? Not quite. Churches benefit from both, but the church-state relations are very different. Under the exemptions, churches must appeal for support to the conscience of their members, not to the state. Grants depend on regular legislative and administrative action, which necessarily engages churches in contests for political power (even to the point of blocking public programs which do not include them). That is exactly what separation was meant to avoid. Exemptions minimize church-state contacts; indeed their removal would involve the government in the sticky business of assessing church property and occasionally auctioning it off for nonpayment of taxes. The National Council of Churches' brief expresses this separationist rationale by saying: "The First Amendment is in perfect balance. It forbids the State to give to or take from the Church."

If the Court accepts this position it will be a signal to the lower courts now confronting suits over legislative grants to church-related institutions, and it may be the clue that explains why the Court went out of its way to decide this strange case. If the Court, at the same time that it moves to restrict the tax funds which church agencies have been receiving through public programs, also protects the religiously used property of the church from taxation, the blow will be softened. This kind of judicial concern for religious sensibilities has occurred before. In 1963, on the same day, the Court eliminated public school prayers (Abington) and affirmed the right to unemployment compensation of a Seventh Day Adventist who had lost his job through a refusal to work on Saturday (Sherbert v. Verner). Last summer, when the court opened the door to suits against federal grants to church institutions (Flast), it upheld, again on the same day, state provision of textbooks to parochial school students (Board of Education v. Allen).

Two major kinds of institutional aid should arrive in the Supreme Court in the next two years: aid to church-related colleges and support of parochial schools. Cases are already in the courts in Vermont and New Jersey on the validity of state loans to church colleges, but the critical case will be Tilton v. Finch. There the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Jewish Congress are using the new privilege granted in Flast to support a taxpayer who is trying to halt federal funds at four Connecticut colleges: Albertus Magnus, Annhurst, Fairfield and Sacred Heart. (These are all Catholic; the colleges that Protestants founded in the 18th century no longer have church ties.) Edward Bennett Williams has been hired by the colleges and Leo Pfeffer is the attorney for the plaintiff. Oral argument that will try to document the actual religious practices in the colleges began on December 2 before a three judge federal district court. No matter who wins the first round, the other side will surely appeal.

Also coming up the judicial ladder are cases involving the use of public funds in parochial schools. Last spring more than twenty states experienced conflict over this issue that embittered local elections and tied up legislatures. More than 90 per cent of all students in private education in this country attend Catholic parochial schools; great issues of money, educational values and equality of opportunity are at stake.

From 1940 to 1960 Catholic school enrollment grew three times faster than that of public schools, but recently it has begun to decline slowly. Other private school systems are booming, but the movement of Catholics to the suburbs, growing division within the Church and the defection of the teaching clergy have had negative effects on parochial schools. The bishops are worried; parents are apprehensive; legislators are feeling their concern and wondering themselves about the cost to the state if many Catholic schools should close.

Reflecting these anxieties, the Pennsylvania state Assembly last year passed a new kind of law (since copied in Rhode Island, Ohio, Connecticut and pending in Michigan) to prop up parochial schools. A part of horse-racing revenue was set aside for payments to private schools for the teaching of sciences, for languages, mathematics and physical education, the theory being that the state was merely purchasing a service. This act is now being challenged in the U.S. District Court of Eastern Pennsylvania by the State Council of Churches, the Jewish Community Relations Conference, Americans United for Separation of Church and State, and the ACLU.

These organizations have traditionally been interested in religious liberty questions, but this law has broader implications. In order to provide a patina of constitutionality, the legislature had to include nonsectarian private schools in its provisions. These schools are often wealthy academies like the 726-student Penn Charter School, which despite its $3.7 million endowment, four gymnasiums, two swimming pools, and a separate parking lot for juniors and seniors, will receive $57,000 under the state program. By adopting the purchase of service theory, the legislature has committed itself to subsidizing the high per-pupil cost of the prep school, while the traditionally low-budgeted parochial schools are not receiving nearly as much as they expected.

There is a grimmer aspect. To fund this program fully, allotments to urban public schools were cut, even though some ghetto children in Philadelphia attend double sessions and the school year may have to be reduced for lack of money. Escape from these conditions, as well as integration, are, of course, reasons why the white middle-class private schools are growing. The circle is vicious and the Pennsylvania State Educational Association and the NAACP have also joined the litigation to stop it.

On the other side, the Commonwealth is naturally supported by the Pennsylvania Catholic Conference, the Jewish Day Schools and the Association of Independent Schools. They concede that it would be unconstitutional to finance religious education, but they argue that the particular subjects being aided are secular. Even if that is true, Justice Douglas has pointed out:

> The most effective way to establish any institution is to finance it: and this truth is reflected in the appeals by the church groups for public funds to finance their religious schools. Financing a church either in its strictly religious activities or in its other activities is equally unconstitutional, as I understand the Establishment Clause. Budgets for one activity may be technically separable from budgets for others. But the institution is an inseparable whole. . . .

Even if the parochial schools were to win this case, they might lose in the long run. To obtain tax support, they must get the courts to agree that they are providing a public service. But institutions that provide a public service with public funds are increasingly bound by a whole series of constitutional interpretations regarding discrimination and due process. Justice Jackson once said:

> But we cannot have it both ways. Religious teaching cannot be a private affair when the state seeks to impose regulations which infringe on it indirectly, and a public affair when it comes to taxing citizens of one faith to aid another, or those of no faith to aid all. . . . If the state may aid these religious schools, it may therefore regulate them. . . .

Yet if a parochial school cannot use religious criteria to select its students, faculty and curricula, what is its reason for existence? In the long run the price of state aid is secularization.

Church agencies that control public funds in educational, medical or housing programs cannot be permitted to discriminate religiously or follow sectarian restrictions. They will become secular holding companies for the carrying out of legislatively determined activities. Except in unusual circumstances, do we today really need to have churches manage such public programs? It might be a sounder policy to preserve churches as independent, voluntarily supported centers of moral concern about the goals of man and society. Why not preserve the separation of church and state?

REGULAR OR PREMIUM?

THE OCTANE NUMBERS GAME

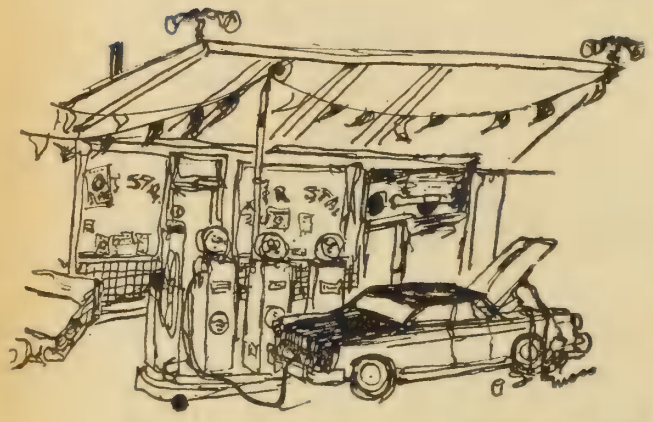
A. Q. MOWBRAY
Mr. Mowbray is the author of Road to Ruin and The Thumb on the Scale (both J. B. Lippincott).

The men of the oil industry, whose recent public works include the slick along the Santa Barbara beaches, and whose plans for improving Alaska include a 48-inch pipe line 800 miles long from the north coast to the south, have also been laboring to prevent the Federal Trade Commission from making a fool of itself over a thing called the octane number of gasoline. To appreciate the scope of the oil men's public service, one must first understand octane number.

The mixture of gasoline vapor and air in the cylinder of an automobile engine should burn evenly and smoothly. The flame should move steadily outward from the spark and sweep through the cylinder like a ripple on a pond. Sometimes, however, after the flame has consumed only part of the mixture, the remainder flashes spontaneously like a miniature explosion. This tiny detonation wastes power, and can damage the engine. The motorist hears it as a sharp "ping" or knock. The way to prevent this knock is to increase the octane number of the gasoline.

In their eager search for higher horsepower, engine designers usually resort to higher compression ratios, which means that they squeeze the fuel-air mixture more tightly in the cylinder before igniting it by the spark. As compression ratio rises, the tendency to knock increases, so a higher octane number is demanded of the gasoline. High-performance engines thus require higher-octane fuel. This is why the beetle gets along fine on "regular" gasoline, while the V-8 bomb thirsts for "premium."

Since it is the key to good engine performance, high octane is first in the oil men's thoughts. Indeed, in exchanges of gasoline among the various brand-name producers, which occur regularly as one facility or another suffers from a brief shortage, the octane number is often the only basis for barter. One can see tank trucks with various brand names painted on their sides drawn up at the same pipe-line terminal and feeding from a common dug. So many gallons at a given octane number.



High octane is also expensive. It costs the petroleum industry about $150 million per year to increase the rating by one number, from 94 octane, say, to 95. The cost to the motorist is roughly a penny per gallon for each unit increase in octane number. Typical "premium" gasolines, with octane ratings around 100, cost about 6c more per gallon than typical "regular" gasolines, with ratings around 94.

The American Society for Testing Materials (ASTM), the authority in this field, names octane number as the most costly element in gasoline production. The industry is also proud of high octane. Sun Oil Co. is now advertising that its "260 blend" will give you the highest octane number available in any gasoline station. Getty is touting its single-grade gasoline—no regular, all premium—"the finest premium gasoline money can buy (every gallon 100 octane plus)."

The motorist, however, should not get carried away with the notion that a sufficiently high octane number will make his old bus fly like a kite. He should use the lowest octane number that prevents knocking in his engine. As one petroleum expert puts it, octane number is like vitamins—once you have enough there is no gain in paying for more. Beyond that, it is a civic duty to fill up with just the right octane number. If it is either too low or too high, the car pours abnormally high pollution out of its tailpipe. According to the National Air Pollution Control Administration, a fuel too low in octane will produce more smog than it should, and one too high in octane will fill the air with highly poisonous lead fumes.

Now back to the Federal Trade Commission. Some weeks ago, the FTC officially observed that the petroleum industry does not tell the motorist the octane number of the gasoline he buys. The words "regular" and "premium" on the pump mean only that the octane number, allegedly, falls somewhere within an ill-defined range of values. This the FTC called "unfair" and "deceptive," and it announced its intention to force service stations to post the "research" octane number right on the pump, so that we can all count the stripes on the tiger going into our tank.

The petroleum people were jolted by this threat to their habitual reticence on trade matters and, during the three-day hearing held by the FTC on its proposal in the middle of October, top officials from most of the oil companies hurried to Washington to explain carefully that the FTC proposal is unwise and unworkable. For one thing, said Standard Oil's C. R. Elder, Jr., posting of the octane number would exaggerate the importance of that single measure of quality, causing the consumer to turn his back on all the other fine qualities of gasoline on which the petroleum industry has lavished so many advertising dollars. Things like good mileage, fast starting, clean carburetors. At one point in his testimony, apparently carried away by the virtue of his cause, Mr. Elder stated flatly that "octane rating is not indicative of gasoline quality."

The specifications for gasoline published by the ASTM give, as the other qualities of gasoline: volatility, corrosive properties, sulfur content, gum and residue. ASTM puts these qualities in perspective by stating that "specifications covering anti-knock quality and volatility define the general character of a fuel. The other requirements limit minor components of undesirable nature to concentrations so low they will not have an adverse effect on engine performance."

One other attribute of gasoline is mileage. The miles he gets per gallon is a point of pride with every car owner. Knowing this, the oil companies spend untold millions on uncounted hours of public air time to push mileage as a benefit of this or that brand. Yet Phillip S. Meyers, a professor of mechanical engineering at the University of Wisconsin and this year's president of the Society of Automotive Engineers, told the FTC that miles-per-gallon "does not vary markedly between typical commercial gasolines."

Refiners also add pinches of this and that to their brew to affect storage stability, detergency, carburetor icing and other aspects of gasoline performance. These additives comprise a world of utter mystery to the consumer who can only wonder vaguely whether it is possible that Mobil knows something that Humble does not.

Having made their point that octane number is not the only measure of gasoline quality, the oil industry experts neglected to recommend the next logical step: a regulation requiring that all the major quality characteristics be posted. Instead, they went on to a second argument for keeping octane numbers pleasantly vague. It was presented by a Mobil Oil vice president, Joe E. Penick. If the consumer understood the meaning of the octane number, said Mr. Penick, then perhaps the FTC might have something. "But it is safe to say that the consumer does not understand octane and, likely as not, he attributes meanings to it that bear little relation to fact. Compulsory posting would further mislead him."

But the American people believe in nothing if they do not believe in education, and it is easy to visualize massive advertising campaigns, sponsored by the petroleum industry, saturating the nation's television viewers with facts about octane. Still, the oil men worry that giving the motorist too much information about the octane number of his gasoline would lead him into the error of believing that higher octane is always better. This could end only in what several of them termed an "octane numbers game" at the service station. The petroleum industry is well known for its aversion to games of any kind, and for its meticulous efforts to suppress the tendency of some operators to run their stations like bingo parlors!

The oil experts had one final carp. The so-called "research" octane number, which the FTC proposed to write on the pumps, is measured in a laboratory under precisely controlled conditions, and does not necessarily tell the motorist what the actual octane rating is for his particular engine under a given set of road conditions. Here again, however, industry spokesmen pointed the way out of the difficulty. Leo A. McReynolds, a Phillips Petroleum official, told the commission that his company "recognized over a year ago that research octane number was not an adequate measurement of how a gasoline performed in the automobile of the consuming public." His company knew that "we could give the customer the most for his money and dependable, consistent performance by manufacturing our gasolines with octane quality control on the basis of road performance." To accomplish this, it is using "a combination of research and motor ratings to arrive at a predicted road octane performance." This, said Mr. McReynolds, "is distinctly of benefit to the consuming public."

This line of thought was confirmed by other industry witnesses: Francis C. Moriarty, Marathon Oil Co., told the FTC that "road octane tests closely describe how a commercial gasoline is likely to perform in the average motorist's car." Walter Famariss, Jr., president of the American Petroleum Refiners Association, stated categorically that "the only true test of gasoline quality is road or performance octane." The solution is so plain that one wonders how the oil men missed it. The FTC should simply change its proposed regulation to require the posting of the "road" octane number, rather than the "research" number.

Sun Oil's Theodore A. Burtis offered the commission an alternative to its proposal—"custom blending." This system is based on eight "custom blending" numbers, from 190 to 260, which are posted on the Sun Oil pumps, and which give the motorist a choice of eight blends. The meaning of the numbers is known only to Sun Oil and to God, but it is probably safe to assume that the octane number of the gasoline increases with the blending number. Mr. Burtis outlined the following gasoline shopping scenario to the commission:

> We recommend this approach: try the recommended fuel: if it is satisfactory, try the next lower priced blend; if that is also satisfactory, go another step lower; if the car knocks, then go back up a blend. In this way, each motorist will end up with the proper octane for his automobile, as proven in his own car, without having to buy a fuel of higher octane, and at higher cost, than he needs.

The solid wisdom of this advice, to anyone who understands octane rating and its central role in engine performance, is inescapable. Only one small revision seems necessary; remove the mystifying and confusing "custom blending number" from the pumps and replace it with octane number. This apparently did not occur to Mr. Burtis at the moment.

L. E. Kincannon, Rock Island Refining Corp., told the commissioners that the motorist himself is "the best judge of a gasoline's quality, based upon the performance in his own car." If he hears his engine knocking, he will know that the octane rating of his gasoline is too low and that he "should move up to a higher octane." Mobil Oil's Joe Penick said that the solution would be to "switch to a higher grade or perhaps even to a different brand." All excellent advice, but how is the motorist to follow it unless he knows the octane rating of the gasoline he proposes to buy?

All these things must by now have occurred to the representatives of the petroleum industry—even to Mr. Famariss, whose parting words to the commissioners admonished them to look elsewhere for salvation: "If the Federal Trade Commission will withdraw this proposal, I can assure you the good old spirit of red, white and blue free enterprise will give the public the best gasoline possible at bargain prices."

DOGMA FROM CLEVELAND

INFILTRATING THE CURRICULUM

TERENCE SHERIDAN and DONALD L. BARLETT

Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Barlett are investigative reporters for the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Cleveland

Few things are as impressive as dedicated bankers and industrialists, the silent minority, in hot pursuit of a mission. When Sputnik went up spectacularly in 1957, Cleveland's corporate elites sat down quietly to assemble an educational strike force to fight communism. The result was a businessmen's $14 million Tinker Toy, the Educational Research Council of America (ERCA), a nonprofit, tax-exempt organization which does little research but a lot of propagandizing of "moral and spiritual" values.

ERCA materials are used by more than 250,000 students in twenty-five school districts. The participating school districts include nineteen in suburban Cleveland (the schools in Cleveland itself have declined to sign on, despite some subtle pressure by the business community) and six from other states—Bradford, Pa.; Brockton, Mass.; Muskegon, Mich.; Niles, Mich.; Owatonna, Minn., and Summit, N.J.

In addition, millions of other students in all fifty states use textbooks developed by ERCA, which has received and spent some $14 million in the last decade, much of the money coming in the form of tax dollars from the school districts, contributions from tax-free foundations and tax-deductible donations by prominent businessmen and major corporations.

When formed ten years ago, the council was called Educational Research Council of Greater Cleveland. It had fewer than thirty employees and a budget of less than $400,000. Today, with a new name and offices sprawled across more than 50,000 square feet on six floors of the Rockefeller Building in downtown Cleveland, the council employs about 230. The free-spending council, lately living in the shadow of controversy, went through $3.6 million last year.

School districts that are members pay a percentage of their operating budget to ERCA, with the maximum figure at 0.6 per cent. Council officials say the maximum will eventually rise to a flat 1 per cent. Fees levied during the 1967-68 fiscal year ranged from a low of $7,000 for Owatonna, Minn., to a high of $33,623 for Brockton, Mass.

In the council's first annual report—made possible by a $100,000 seed-money grant from the Cleveland Foundation—it was noted: "We live in an age in which military peril and ideological conflict relentlessly challenge our most cherished democratic concepts. If we are to meet such a challenge successfully, our schools must do their part by rising to higher levels of purpose as well as excellence."

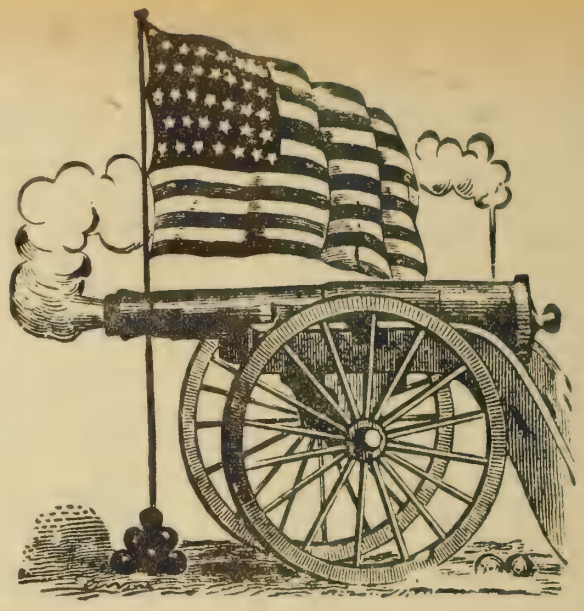
It soon became clear that ERCA's chief concern was ideology, not gifted use of slide rules. Dr. George H. Baird, council founder and $37,000-a-year executive director, summarized those higher levels of purpose in a 1966 meeting of ERCA trustees and school board members: "The [school] superintendents said that moral and spiritual values should be brought into the curriculum. It was logical and right that these values be brought into the curriculum in the field of social sciences. As a result the effort is being made." The values, as defined by the corporate fraternity, were predictable: My country right or wrong, the work ethic and an omniscient God to endorse establishment values.

One of the largest contributors, the Cleveland Foundation, has awarded the council grants totaling some $615,000 from the time it was organized in 1958. Every year since then, ERCA has had at least one trustee serving with the Cleveland Foundation; as many as three ERCA officers and trustees have been associated with the foundation at one time.



When the foundation midwifed the council, the late George Gund, vice president of ERCA, was president of the Cleveland Trust Co., and chairman of the foundation's trustee committee. Harry F. Burmester, one of four organizers of ERCA and board treasurer, was president of Union Commerce Bank, one of the four Cleveland banks then responsible for management of the foundation's assets.

Raymond Q. Armington, president of Triax Co., was appointed in 1965 to the foundation's five-member distribution committee, which selects recipients for grants. He has served as ERCA president and has been a council trustee since 1959. He is currently chairman of the ERCA board and a member of the foundation distribution panel.

When the foundation gave $88,000 to the council in 1966, Armington was on the distribution committee, Gund was chairman of the trustee committee and Burmester was a member of the trustee committee. And all were ERCA board members.

Another example of philanthropic inbreeding is the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Foundation, which has made grants to ERCA. It is headed by Ralph M. Besse, board chairman of the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Co. (CEI) and one of the organizers of ERCA. He has served as either vice president or vice chairman and secretary of the council since 1959.

Besse, professional industrialist and amateur poet, played prophet in a 19-page summary of a book, The Ruling Masses, that he said would never be written. The summary was about power and was written in 1951. Bound in a plain brown wrapper and entitled, "The Role of Power in the Future Course of Western Civilization," the summary was given to the Cleveland Public Library in 1955. In it Besse wrote:

To those who have the ability and the inclination to manage others, there is a satisfaction in power—in its development, its use, its very existence—unmatched by any other emotion.

The control of institutions is normally in the hands of just such men—able, energetic and ambitious. This is the stuff of which successful management is made, whether it be management of a religious, political, business, welfare or labor institution.

Wary of the masses, the CEI president opts for enlightened leadership, as expressed in his poem, "Rubaiyat for Moderns," also presented to the Cleveland Public Library:

The lesser blessed must seek the sage's sight
Like tiny tendrils reaching for the light.
Why else would God give man alone the power?
To blind divine-like justice with his might.

And to the masses, a word from an able, energetic and ambitious corporate leader:

The opiate of leisure fogs the mind
Of misled men whose leadership is blind
Forgetting what their heritage has taught
They let their right to work become confined.

Thus value teaching as a tool to fight communism is at the base of ERCA. At the 1967 meeting of council trustees and school board members, Dr. A. B. Bonds, president of Baldwin-Wallace College, warned: "There are apostles of discord abroad in this land. . . . A pattern has gradually become apparent to me to suggest that there are deliberate efforts afoot to disrupt the total school system of this beloved country of ours.

"I despise and reject the specter of McCarthyism, but I must say to you that we must be especially vigilant in the days ahead because public schools are the next target of these apostles of discord and those of you who labor there are in for trouble."

Later, Dr. Baird, one-time director of research for the Shaker Heights schools, was asked about the apostles of discord. He said: "The central committee of the Communist Party has decided that the logical place to make an attack on America is through the school board and education." Joe McCarthy's specter must have been mollified by Dr. Baird's interpretation of Dr. Bonds.

An ERCA handbook distributed to social science teachers urges, as one of the course's objectives, the "appreciation of the concept of the American nation, indivisible, under God, extending the blessings of earned responsibility and freedom under law to other nations."

To every donor goes a thank-you letter from Baird. When Harry L. Jackson, president of the Lubrizol Foundation, sent in $15,000, Baird wrote: "As you know, we are striving to bring thousands of youngsters under a curriculum that communicates values while it makes them competent citizens, and, Harry, we are succeeding little by little." In a letter to Arthur Holden, Baird comments on a $75,000 donation from the Martha Holden Jennings Foundation: "We are trying to build the best possible program in social science so that the youngsters of today will be the right kind of citizens tomorrow." Richman Bros. Co. received this social insight for a donation of only $300: "Nationally, rioters are, in general, non-readers, and non-readers can be led easier to do wrong things than readers."

But while ERCA was sailing along, teaching values and making readers of potential rioters in suburban schools, something went awry. Inept bookkeeping, under the direction of Leonida (Coca) Romanos, former Romanian newspaper man, one-time wine salesman, resident financial expert and close personal friend of Baird, put the council in a fiscal crunch. Romanos, co-founder of the council, is a high school dropout who was once described by Baird as a product of three European universities. His credentials to be second in command at the council appear to be that he is Baird's friend and that he has written an anti-Communist manifesto, "This World War III," as yet unpublished.

Also, ERCA's social science material, in its haste to inculcate all those seemly values, took a short cut through scholarship and produced a distorted view of minority groups. Slavery in elementary texts, for example, is curiously idyllic. Slaves are viewed as a commodity much in demand by benevolent cotton and tobacco growers. The master is genteel and the slaves sing a lot.

Two years ago Encyclopaedia Britannica Educational Corp. (EBEC), an affiliate of Encyclopaedia Britannica, paid ERCA $1.2 million to buy its way out of a contract that called for publication and nationwide sale of ERCA textbooks. The underlying reasons for the rejection, according to sources close to both the council and Britannica, were that ERCA social science textbooks were largely "lily white" and that the few references made to minority groups were considered paternalistic at best, racist at worst. The contract disaster sparked an executive explosion at Britannica that blew EBEC president William Benton out of his job.

Asked about the treatment of minority groups, social science program director Raymond English, British-born former chairman of the Department of Political Science at Kenyon College and an ex-major in the British Army, replied: "It's not racist. It was simply a 1950s approach rather than a 1960s approach. Some things slipped in, but unless you are sensitive to those things you don't notice. We work fast here. You can't spend time inspecting your navel. You got to get the stuff out."

Responding to ERCA's recent financial crisis, the Martha Holden Jennings Foundation, which shares offices with the Cleveland and Greater Cleveland Associated Foundations, commissioned a secret, $20,000 study of the council by a five-man team of Harvard educators, headed by Dr. Herold C. Hunt, Eliot Professor of Education at Harvard and former superintendent of Chicago schools.

The 140-page report charged that director Baird was "engaging in fiscal brinkmanship" and that the council's "administrative management is not satisfactory, at least on the financial side of the operation." The report pointed out that school districts which are council members pay three times for materials produced by ERCA. It stressed that there "will be a need for cash donations of something approximating $3.3 million by the end of fiscal 1970."

The team found that, over the last six years, the council has spent from 138 per cent to 191 per cent of its annual earned income, and estimated the council's operating loss for the current fiscal year at $1,835,420—nearly double the loss of last year.

All this, needless to say, distressed the corporate leaders, particularly banker Burmester, who had boasted in 1965: "We operate on budgets and we will not spend more than we receive. I want to pay a compliment to our financial staff. We have a very competent staff."

Yet the Harvard study was admittedly restricted and definitely in-house. No attempt was made to conduct a detailed audit to show where the money was going or to evaluate curriculum material. The team said its "over-all evaluation of ERCA as a curriculum development center is generally favorable. The work deserves to continue—in some form."

When a copy of the secret documents was leaked to the press, Besse and colleagues reacted predictably. They hired Selvage, Lee & Howard, the nation's sixth largest public relations firm, and called a press conference, during which they blithely repudiated such parts of the report as displeased them. However, ERCA board chairman Armington expressed the sentiments of the closely knit consortium of financiers when he bravely observed: "This will probably mean some short-term embarrassment." Armington's connection with ERCA is personal as well as professional. His son, a college flunk-out, spent last summer writing social studies material for the council, at $28 a day.

Despite the efforts by the silent minority to keep things operating smoothly and quietly, the albatross of controversy persists. Washington Township, a management-oriented, predominantly Republican community of one polo field and several rolling hills just south of Dayton, Ohio, split two years ago on the issue of ERCA membership—a five-year, $87,405 contract. Six taxpayers challenged the legality of the continuing contract and raised the question of conflict of interest in the dual position of school board member Edwin H. Vause, who is also vice president of the Kettering Foundation, which contributed $675,000 to ERCA's social science program, the largest single grant received by the council.

Following an investigation by the Montgomery County prosecutor's office in Dayton, a clause was added to give the school board the option to review the ERCA contract annually. Vause was absolved of conflict of interest, Paul Fleischauer, assistant county prosecutor, asserting: "It was found that donors to the Educational Research Council are quite numerous and are big institutions such as General Electric. They are all top-notch."

That sort of faith in the establishment is the value that ERCA likes to see taught in the schools. Or as poet Besse puts it:

Impartial nature gives to each at birth
A chance to demonstrate his social worth—
The power to choose lets high or low elect
To walk with pride and purpose on earth.

STATEHOOD FOR MICRONESIA

ERNEST GRUENING

Inept and disastrous as our foreign policy has become—Vietnam; support of loathsome dictatorships in Greece and Spain; the multiple fiasco in Latin America, strikingly disclosed in Rockefeller's visits; the exploding Middle East and, as a consequence of our extravagant global policing and our military superkill obsessions, including nerve gas and until recently germs, the neglect of the pressing issues at home—there lies in between the foreign and domestic failures an area of success and achievement. It is in our colonial, or better said, our anti-colonial policy.

It goes back a third of a century, to the enlightened policies of Franklin D. Roosevelt, reaffirmed and expanded by Harry Truman, which succeeding administrations have not disturbed. They began when FDR, by Executive order, created a new agency, the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the Department of the Interior.

In September 1934, when I became director of this new agency, Roosevelt briefed me on each of our outlying dependent areas. He was well-informed on them all. In general, the new agency was to have supervision of their federal relations, and to assist them in every way possible in compensation for their lack of voting representation in the Congress.

"Isn't this agency," I suggested, "the equivalent of the British colonial office?"

"I suppose it is," said the President.

"Well, I think a democracy shouldn't have colonies," I said.

The President smiled and nodded in assent. "See what you can work out."

It was not very specific, but I felt that it was a mandate to proceed.

Now what is the record thirty-five years later? The Philippines are independent; Alaska and Hawaii are states; Puerto Rico has the political status that its people desired; elective governorship has been granted to the Virgin Islands and Guam. And concomitant with this validation of the most basic of American principles—government by consent of the governed—each of these former dependencies enjoys unprecedented economic well-being.

These two—political equality and economic self-sufficiency—should be our ultimate objectives for all our dependencies. While Samoa has had some increased attention and economic progress, it has not yet achieved the degree of self-government of our other two small island possessions, the Virgin Islands and Guam. Samoans are United States nationals but they are not citizens of the United States.

Nor is political and economic equality quite achieved with the elective governorships of the Virgin Islands and Guam. However, the impeding factor in these cases is lack of population and, as yet, an economic self-sufficiency to warrant the ultimate objective. It would be difficult to justify statehood for either of them now. The same applies to Micronesia, the trust territory mandated to the United States by the United Nations since 1947, and administered under the direction and supervision of the Department of the Interior.

Is there a remedy? I proposed a possible long-range solution which occurred to me after a study trip to Samoa and Micronesia in 1960. Paradoxically, the idea originated in the Senate debates on Hawaiian statehood. Opponents of the measure argued that since Hawaii, far out in the Pacific, was separated from the forty-eight states by international waters, and even graver, since international waters separated the several Hawaiian Islands, statehood was unthinkable. Nevertheless the objection proved to be without validity and Hawaii achieved statehood. The various islands are counties of the fiftieth state.

Why not, at some future time, all parties being in agreement, annex Micronesia, Guam, Samoa, Wake, Midway, Johnston, Palmyra and other U.S. Pacific islands to Hawaii as one great Pacific state? Hawaii, if its people prove willing, is ideally suited to be the parent of this larger state. Hawaii, with its ethnic diversity, racial fusion and exemplary racial tolerance, makes natural its focal position in such a plan. As time passed and there was mutual assent, could not the various subdivisions of the prospective areas be incorporated as counties of Hawaii piecemeal—the Marshalls, the Marianas, the seven islands that constitute American Samoa, etc.? In that way each of them could achieve the full equality of statehood. If they did not wish to join they would retain their lesser political status.

My proposal for ultimate annexation of Micronesia to Hawaii was brought up in the Senate in 1965 by Hiram Fong, Hawaii's senior Senator, who said he considered it "a great idea" and that he was working toward its fulfillment.

Meanwhile, Micronesia faces economic problems which depend for their solution in large part on the wisdom of the Congress and the administrative performance of the Department of the Interior. The Congress has already shown its enlightenment by authorizing the creation of a bicameral Micronesian Congress, a vital step in developing self-government and territorial solidarity, and there is also self-government on the local levels. But further progress in economic development and experience in self-government are desirable before the territory can wisely decide on its future status. The problems involved are by no means simple.

First, there is the physical problem. Only ninety-six of the 2,100 islands and islets are inhabited. While many Micronesians share the same natural heritage, there are also wide differences. Nine different languages are spoken; some islanders are just emerging from the stone age; others are well advanced. The ethnic heritage is mixed, with the original Malayan-Polynesian strains mingled with the infusion of the Spanish, German and Japanese occupations. If any area of the world is destined for sectionalism it is Micronesia—obviously a difficult problem for administration, financing and all the aspects of just and nondiscriminatory treatment for everyone.

Moreover, the limited land area of 700 square miles—half the size of Rhode Island—is not very productive; probably the territory's greatest natural resource is the marine wealth of the surrounding seas, which remain to be wisely exploited. The usual economic studies propose, in addition to fisheries, tourism, some diversification and improvement in agriculture and the service industries.

The impending and basic fact is that before long the Micronesians will decide what future status they want. Given the desire of United States administration to retain the islands under some form of American sovereignty or control, it is not only desirable but essential to obtain the good will and affection of the Micronesians.

The United States desires to retain control of the islands because of their strategic importance. No other nation can now imaginably seek to acquire them. Japan? China? Russia? Obviously not. But the alternative which Micronesians may consider is independence. Despite the problems it would create, it has an allure, strengthened by the example of other small entities in the Pacific and Caribbean which have become independent and sovereign nations. Last year, the small island of Nauru, just outside the invisible boundary of the trust territory, was granted independence and became the Republic of Nauru. It had been under a New Zealand mandate. Its area is less than that of several Micronesian islands.

Secretary Walter Hickel, on his first visit to the trust territory, stressed his determination to increase the islanders' voice in their government, to provide training to help them assume governmental functions, and to make no major decisions affecting them without their full consultation. Secretary Hickel's background of experience with Alaska's long struggle against absentee controls and with the underprivileged status of Alaska's Eskimos and Indians should fit him sympathetically for this taxing assignment. Its difficulty is increased by shortage of funds because of the war in Vietnam, and the probable reluctance of Congress to vote money for what is needed in ninety-six different islands—and there are substantial needs in each: water and sewer systems, a hospital or clinic, adequate schools, waterfront facilities to accommodate ship and plane landings—for a total of 97,000 Micronesians when the Congressmen's own more numerous constituencies are being squeezed by drastic budget cuts.

An area of conflict will also become critical if the United States military wish, as they doubtless will, to establish bases, or testing stations, or other installations, on the islands. Certain islands are adamantly opposed; others see material advantages. The arbitrary removal of the people from Bikini and Eniwetok and their resettlement in what they considered less desirable areas, has left its residue of discontent and apprehension. Some Micronesians argue that under independence they could make better arrangements which would satisfy both the Micronesian and the American interest.

New York Times

I discussed the Hawaiian annexation proposal with Secretary Hickel. He thought well of it, but ventured that a state built on Guam and Micronesia might be an alternative. This could be a possible variant. The Micronesian Status Committee has also suggested it. The only difficulty is that I doubt whether Congress would vote it in the foreseeable future. The legislators would, I believe, be unwilling to grant statehood to an area so recently adopted and without previous self-governing experience or American tradition: Adding it to an entity already established as part of the Union would meet with much less opposition, especially since the proposal would no doubt receive the support of the Hawaiian Congressional delegation, which has impressed itself so favorably on the Congress and the public.

In any event the opportunity is there to continue our nation's fine anti-colonial record and to demonstrate once more that we want no second-class citizens under the Stars and Stripes. In other words, we should, as in the case of the Philippines, Puerto Rico, Alaska and Hawaii, give the Micronesians the political status they desire.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

A Different Smile

SELECTED POEMS OF ANNA AKHMATOVA. Translated by Richard McKane. Oxford University Press. 111 pp. $3.75.

FEVER AND OTHER NEW POEMS. By Bella Akhmadulina. Translated by Geoffrey Dutton and Igor Mezhakoff-Koriakin. William Morrow & Co. 66 pp. $5.50.

ANSELM HOLLO

Mr. Hollo, who is currently a visiting professor in the Creative Writing Program at the University of Iowa, is the author of several volumes of poems, including the coherences (Trigram Press) and the translator of Selected Poems of Andrei Voznesensky (Grove).

When a man dies
his portraits change.
His eyes look in a different way,
his lips smile a different smile.
I noticed this on returning from the funeral of a poet.
Since then I have often checked it,
and my theory has been confirmed.
(1940)

Bertolt Brecht could have written that; or Antonio Machado; Ezra Pound; or Arthur Waley; or Po Chü-I, before them all. Anna Akhmatova wrote it, and it works, for this reader at least, in the context those other names call to mind. In her time, initially the 1910s and '20s, and place, Leningrad, Akhmatova was one of a small group of poets, the "Acmeists" (which included her first husband, Nikolai Gumilyov, and Osip Mandelstam). They turned their backs on Symbolism and decided to travel light (or hard, as far as facts of writing go), disdaining metaphysical theory and "mystical," strenuously metaphorical word-music. "Their own poetic credo demanded the use of words in their exact, logical meaning, precise and concrete imagery, visual vividness, and conciseness of style. . . . Their poetry was concerned with the visible world" (Dimitri Obolensky, The Penguin Book of Russian Verse, 1962).

Akhmatova remained faithful to those tenets despite the noisy upsurge of Futurism and the great polluting clouds of Stalinist "Realism" she had to live through; a faith that in her case strikes one as both justified and well rewarded. In the poems dated 1922, the publication year of her fourth book—after which she was silent, silenced, for eighteen years—there is a restrained plangency and haunting beauty equal to Sappho's:

The freak autumn built a high vault in the sky,
the clouds were ordered not to darken the vault.
The people marvelled: September is passing and where are the chill, damp days?
The murky canal waters turned emerald, the nettles smelled like roses, only stronger.
The air was sultry with sunsets,
unbearable,
devilish, crimson,
we will remember them till the end of our days.
The sun was like a rebel forcing the capital,
and the spring-like autumn caressed it so thirstily that it seemed the transparent snowdrop would blossom white . . .
That was when you, cool and calm, came to my door.

Or again:

It is good here: rustle and snow-crunch, frost fiercer every morning,
a bush of blinding ice roses bows in white flame.
On the splendid finery of the snow a ski-track—memory that long ago
we passed here together.

The last two lines, an obvious echo and reference: it is curious but certainly no accident that Anna Akhmatova shares this empathetic ear for Sappho with H.D., although the autobiographical directness in Akhmatova's work is not matched in H.D.'s poems so much as in the novels, Bid Me To Live and Palimpsest. On the other hand, Akhmatova in her later work does not seem to attain the power and coherence of H.D.'s great final meditations on destruction and rebirth—though there are, in McKane's selection, flashes of similar visionary insight:

And it seemed that these were fires flying with me until dawn, and I did not find out what color were these strange eyes.

And everything around trembled and sang,
and I did not find out if you were friend or foe,
if this was winter or summer.
("Fragment," 1959)

It may very well be that we have to wait for a translation of Akhmatova's longest work, "Poem Without a Hero," which she wrote from 1940 to 1962, before making such comparisons with any semblance of finality. About this poem McKane says in his introduction: "Its complexity and allusions demand a detailed knowledge of the way of life of the poet and her friends which put it beyond the scope of this selection."

Perhaps all we need to know is that Anna Akhmatova's life in Russia, 1889-1966, in itself, in its obvious temporal and geographical conjunctions, caused her to pass through actual, as well as emotional and psychological, trials of a degree hardly dreamt of by her contemporaries in Western Europe and North America, least of all by the more recent poets (male and female) of the "confessional" persuasion. "In 1934 her son, Leo Gumilyov [whose father, the poet Nikolai Gumilyov, had been executed in 1921] was arrested on a charge which has never been fully revealed," McKane tells us. "He was soon released but in 1937 was arrested again, and only released during the war to fight in the army. He returned home in 1945. In the autumn of 1949 he was arrested and finally released in May 1956. Most of this time he spent in concentration camps."

The quiet Don flows quietly, the yellow moon goes into the house, goes in with its cap askew,

the yellow moon sees the shadow.

This woman is sick,
this woman is alone,

husband in the grave, son in prison, pray for me.
("Requiem," 1939)

The book contains an article originally published in 1964 in the magazine Novy Mir, "The Unshackled Voice" by Andrei Sinyavsky whose sufficiently known fate parallels that of the Gumilyovs. The final words of his article refer to "the arguing voices of the living and the dead"—among whom Anna Akhmatova's voice, as now given to us in this book, does come through, quiet and clear.

The introduction to Geoffrey Dutton and Igor Mezhakoff-Koriakin's translation of Fever and Other New Poems by Bella Akhmadulina was provided by Yevgeny Yevtushenko, this considerably younger (born 1937) poet's ex-husband. It is, as Yevtushenko's prose writings and many of his poems tend to be, rather unctuous and cliché-ridden, though no doubt well-intentioned. Seven pages of verbiage like "the great harmony of bloody, disgusting and at the same time beautiful life," or "great suffering always was and will remain the basic content of great poetry," do not predispose one toward what is to follow—less so if one assumes that the author of the introduction has an intimate and concrete understanding of the work.

It would be a great pleasure to be able to report that Bella Akhmadulina's poems then proceed to obliterate that unfavorable first impression, but they reinforce it. They are striking proof for the correctness of a long-standing suspicion in this reader's mind that the formulation and acting out, in the works of Akhmatova, Mandelstam and by somewhat tenuous extension Sergei Yesenin, of the Acmeist principles quoted earlier in this review, were the best things that happened in Russian poetry post-1912—and are potentially still the most promising. For all its exhilarating birth-noise the Futurism of Khlebnikov and Mayakovsky resulted in a dissipation of every form of verbal energy except for what Dimitri Obolensky refers to as "the violent assertiveness" and "deliberate coarseness of much of the avant-garde poetry of the Revolutionary period."

It is not that Akhmadulina's poems are "Futurist," any more than those of her contemporaries Yevtushenko and Voznesensky—less so, in fact. But the idolization of Mayakovsky (a great proportion of whose work, when all is said and done, does not rise much above the level of Vachel Lindsay's "Congo") seems to have perpetuated a taste for a tub-thumping beat, jingle-jangle rhyme schemes, and the general idea that you can sincerely strive for hortatory or even outspokenly moralistic effect while using the formal devices of William McGonagall and Ogden Nash.

In such a scheme of things, the ideals of "conciseness of style" and "precise and concrete imagery" obviously lose out. The younger Russian poets' tendency, nay, almost dogmatic insistence on "having their say" on any "subject" for at least ten minutes where ninety seconds would have done just fine, produces time-slot designed poems, highly literary in tone, that end up as boring artifacts. And only extreme histrionic effort in their oral performance could delude an audience into believing that they are attending a verbal and spiritual event comparable to a reading of, say, Philip Whalen's "Sourdough Mountain Lookout" or Edward Dorn's "The North Atlantic Turbine."

This concept of the marathon as the only honorable distance vitiates the work in Fever, even though there are some poems that stop at the bottom of the page. The translators make Akhmadulina sound a little like Stevie Smith, the grand and delightful lady of present-day British poetry:

Even a child may ride
a bicycle,
pedaling like mad,
and suddenly look at the wide world and feel serene and sad.

That is one stanza out of six; and it does not have the wild Blakean glint in the eye Smith's poems do glitter with. Again, cutting out four stanzas, Akhmadulina's "Small Aircraft" becomes a fairly enjoyable experience—these are its first and last quatrains:

Ah, surely I've got troubles enough nearly sending me daft—it really does seem a bit rough to be dreaming about small aircraft.

■ ◆ ■

You chase them away—from the darkness they are back again with you, in high polish their long bodies float by, looking sideways like dachshunds.

The jacket blurb says: "Famous for her beauty as well as for her poetry, Bella Akhmadulina has acted in a film and was the subject of 'scandalous' love poems by Yevtushenko in the late fifties." Looking at the photograph on the back, the late fifties seem like a long time ago. Looking at the cover photo of Akhmatova, on her book, one wishes that human beings, once they have acquired, earned, such faces, could go on forever. Her "lips smile a different smile."

Idle Transcendental Chatter

THE FRENCH LIEUTENANT'S WOMAN. By John Fowles. Little, Brown & Co. 467 pp. $7.95.

ANNETTE GRANT
Miss Grant, a free-lance writer, was formerly a book reviewer for Newsweek.

You must lie upon the daisies and discourse in novel phrases of your complicated state of mind.
The meaning doesn't matter if it's only idle chatter of a transcendental kind.
—Gilbert and Sullivan, Patience.

John Fowles writes curious books. His novels seem to spring full armed from his fantasies. An inventor, not an observer, the geography of his books, however faithfully rendered, remains an inner landscape, often fascinating, but often exasperating.

Although capable of maintaining a powerful story line, Fowles infuses his tales with so much arcane mystery and obscure philosophy that they often resemble either science fiction or intoxicated lectures. The Collector, The Magus and now The French Lieutenant's Woman: this is Fowlesland, the place where all good college sophomores go when they die. Fowles has even provided a guidebook, The Aristos, a collection of aphorisms based on the fragments of the pre-Socratic philosopher, Heraclitus. Fowles's notion of a struggle between the many (hoi polloi) and the elite (the aristos of his title), which he elicits, however fortuitously, from Heraclitus, has become all but obsessive. Upon all his novels, he inflicts this schematic burden. Even his most intelligent characters are sacrificed to it: all fight a losing battle to free themselves from philosophic pigeonholes.

Combine Fowles's Aristos with a Victorian novel (particularly one by Hardy, a Fowles idol) and the result is The French Lieutenant's Woman. The novel is admirably exact as to costume, decor, wildlife and social manners. The story itself—an eternal triangle predicated on duty, desire and guilt—is persuasively Victorian in outline and style. It is difficult, in fact, to think of any Victorian writer who failed to write it—but impossible to imagine one who could have written it as Fowles has.

The French Lieutenant's Woman takes place in the village of Lyme Regis in Dorset (Jane Austen country) in 1867. The principal characters are Charles Smithson, 32, a Darwinist, amateur geologist and gentleman of independent means; his fiancée, Ernestina Freeman, the daughter of a rich dry-goods merchant; and Sarah Woodruff, a mysterious outcast who has, or so she claims, lost her honor to a French naval officer.

In Lyme Regis, where the chief entertainment is local scandal, a triangular affair can hardly go unobserved. Charles is fascinated by his glimpses of the enigmatic Sarah, who makes Ernestine appear giddy and shallow. He senses an undefinable kinship in Sarah. Both are "progressive," both must reject the world that made them what they are, both have "passion and imagination." They represent—though not very convincingly—the first members of a new species, subsequently to be formalized as existentialists. Their first accidental encounter is suitably portentous: "Charles did not know it, but in those brief poised seconds above the waiting sea, in the luminous evening silence . . . the whole Victorian Age was lost."

Charles, the Darwinist, is—how not?—"a highly intelligent being, one of the fittest, and endowed with total free will." And so, against his better judgment, he listens to Sarah's tale of her misfortunes. When she is dismissed by her benefactor, Charles feels duty bound—or so he rationalizes it—to help her. A chance trip to London encourages him to pursue Sarah, but he resists the temptation, returning dutifully to Ernestina to live unhappily ever after.

Matters rest there—or do they? For Fowles adds two other endings in which Sarah triumphs. The reader chooses. (Fowles's method is an immense elaboration upon the principle of Stockton's "The Lady or the Tiger" and O. Henry's "Roads of Destiny.") Fowles has, to be sure, an attractive justification for having second, or even third, thoughts: our desire "to fictionalize our past and our future, to speculate on the way things might have or may turn out."

All Fowles's novels are theatrical, and all require a willing suspension of disbelief if they are to be persuasive. But though all obscure the line between the real and the pretended, The French Lieutenant's Woman takes the multi-layered cake. The ostensible subject is a properly engaged Victorian couple whose lives become unexpectedly complicated. On the second level, the novel is a lecture on comparative (1867-1967) literature, traditions, life-styles and morals. On the third and most intense level, the writer-philosopher expounds his Heraclitean ideology: "Death is not in the nature of things; it is the nature of things," and "All through human history the elect have made their cases for election." On the fourth level, the author, the omniscient "I-eye," constantly obtrudes himself (in one case he claims to be in a train compartment with Charles) and devotes whole chapters to his problems in writing a novel about Victorian life and manners. On the fifth level, the author insists on viewing his creation with skepticism, suggesting that perhaps it doesn't exist at all: he's just pulling our (probably nonexistent) leg.

Fowles takes every possible—or impossible—advantage of so open a framework. He moves cavalierly through history, treating time as an instant replay that can be run forward or backward in response to his imperious and often ridiculous will: "Needless to say, Charles knew nothing of the beavered German Jew working, as it so happened, that very afternoon in the British Museum Library: and whose work in those sombre walls was to bear such bright red fruit." Much of his hindsight is conditioned by Alain Robbe-Grillet and the nouveau roman, so it isn't really surprising to find that within every thoughtful Victorian there is a crypto-existentialist. "He had not the benefit of existentialist terminology; but what he felt was really a very clear case of the anxiety of freedom—that is, the realization that one is free and the realization that being free is a situation of terror."

Fowles's style has always been somewhat overripe. What are we to do with tears that are "slow-welling, unstoppable, creeping like blood through a bandage," or cheeses lined up like "squadrons of reserve moons," or blue flowers "like microscopic cherubs' genitals"? It is, perhaps, the combination of the style and the obtrusive philosophizing that makes the characters seem so shallow, like costumed actors cast against too vivid a background.

Fowles tries to seem captivated by his creations. "It is only when our characters and events begin to disobey us that they begin to live." From time to time, he interrupts his narrative to inform the reader that his fictitious people are resisting, or directing, his work; that they may cry out indignantly when he tries to make them do something against their grain. Eventually he succumbs—or so he would have us believe: "I let the fight proceed and take no more than recording part in it; or I take both sides in it."

Following the ideas advanced in The Aristos, Fowles claims that he is not in control, that some element of "hazard" takes over and relieves him from responsibility for the outcome of the events he initiates. This is the "irresponsible god" game, more effective in The Collector where the creator's voice is implicit in the story and not exterior to it. In The Aristos, he observes, "If there had been a creator, his second act would have been to disappear." If that is what he has attempted in The French Lieutenant's Woman, he has scarcely been successful.

Fowles is a writer of enormous ingenuity and learning, like Nabokov and Barth. But, unlike both of them, he lacks—perhaps willfully—the knack of meshing his inner universe with the outside world.

The result is disconcertingly similar to flipping a television dial from channel to channel: images, shadows and echoes that may illustrate the complexity of life, but fail to illuminate it.

LACUNA

(She's gone)

*

After the camera's flash
a blue hole in the air

ROBERT MORGAN

Apostolic Succession

MY FATHER'S SON. By Frank O'Connor. Alfred A. Knopf. 235 pp. $6.95.

KEVIN SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan teaches Anglo-Irish literature at Columbia and is completing a study of Oscar Wilde for the Columbia Essays on Modern Writers.

The first volume of Frank O'Connor's autobiography (An Only Child, 1961) was the story of young Michael Francis O'Donovan, the name under which O'Connor came originally into the world or, to be more precise, out of the baptistery. That story began in the back lanes of Cork in 1903 and ended with the young man's release, courtesy of the Irish Free State, from an internment camp in 1923. This second, posthumous volume picks up the story at that point and brings it forward in time, though with no apparent regard for chronology, to the eve of the Second World War—or, to use O'Connor's own measure of his days upon earth, to the death of Yeats early in 1939.

It was during this period that Michael O'Donovan transformed himself into Frank O'Connor (his mother's maiden name added to the second of his baptismal names). There were reasons other than literary for adopting the pseudonym. Shortly after his release by the Free State he had become a librarian. His boss, Lennox Robinson, an unfortunate man whom no amount of alcohol could redeem from melancholy, published a little story widely denounced in Ireland as "blasphemous." As a result, not exceptional in those times, Robinson was forced to resign. The in-ident was fresh in mind when a few ears later young O'Donovan began to rite little stories of his own.

But there is nothing in this second olume about that more important ransformation, the process by which ne man O'Donovan—young, untutored, gnorant really, but of high intelligence, nd great intellectual inquisitiveness—ecame the writer O'Connor, the Chekov of modern Ireland. There are one r two passing references to the short tories and a brief mention of The Saint nd Mary Kate, nothing more. Nor loes O'Connor have anything to say bout the more intimate details of his ife, about the women he loved or who oved him, about marriage or children r what he called in the title of an early ollection of stories "domestic relations." All that sort of thing is disposed of in single sentence: "I found myself responsible for a woman and her son, waiting for the end of ecclesiastical and divorce court proceedings so that I could marry." Succinct certainly, and even a bit chilly.

About his mother and father he is occasionally more revealing. He loved the one, could hardly endure the other, and as a self-confessed mama's boy his feelings about both are set down with little show of reserve. The essentials of his relationship had been adumbrated years before in an almost perfect and utterly hilarious short story called "My Oedipus Complex." But what is funny in fiction is not always amusing in life; and a sense of incredulity now accompanies the discovery that the attitudes of a 40-year old writer were not much different from those of his 4-year-old persona. As a result, though this was no part of O'Connor's intention, a reader may find himself increasingly sympathetic toward the old man and more tolerant by far than his son could ever be about those alternating bouts, equally drawn out, of booze and piety. Sympathetic because the old fellow's only alternative, one is inclined to think, would have been to take young Oedipus by the scruff and banjax the bejasus out of him.

It will be clear from this that O'Connor's title My Father's Son has nothing to do with that dumb decent man who sired him according to the flesh. In this sense fatherhood was for O'Connor, as for Stephen Dedalus, no more than a necessary evil, perhaps no more than a legal fiction, while true paternity was to be thought of as "a mystical estate, an apostolic succession, from only begetter to only begotten." O'Connor, however, was to find a more likely papa than Leopold Bloom. It seemed at first that this might be AE (George Russell), but in the end he fixed on W. B. Yeats for spiritual filiation. He is quite explicit about this relationship:

> When [Yeats] began to bully me I always gave him lip, almost on principle. After my father, I never quarrelled so much with anyone, and even if one allows that I am a bit in the same line myself, it takes two to make a disagreement last as long as ours. One might say that I was discovering my real father at last, and that all the old attitudes induced by my human father came on top. Yet I can truthfully say that when, towards the end of his life, I became his devoted slave, it was entirely due to his generosity, because with no one else was I so crude and uppish.

What O'Connor admired most about Yeats, aside from the majestic talent, was the older man's profound capacity for friendship, a deep-rooted personal loyalty that was proof against the strains and vicissitudes to which any friendship may be subject and to which in literary Dublin, then as now and forever, all friendships are constantly subject. There was nothing at all sentimental about this. One day, for example, reminiscing about Lennox Robinson ("Lennix," Yeats called him), the poet enumerated a dozen minor treacheries their relationship had involved and then, raising a finger, said sternly: "But remember, O'Connor, that was Lennix Robinson the drunken intriguer, not Lennix Robinson who was your friend and mine." It is easy to see how young O'Connor would be attracted to such magnanimity. His is the same kind of magnanimity that informs so much of Yeats's poetry and imparts much of its ineluctable quality.

> For friendship never ends
> And what if mind seems changed
> And it seems changed with mind;
> When thoughts rise up unbid
> On generous things that he did,
> And I grow half-contented to be blind.

O'Connor thought—one of the few critical opinions he ventures here—that as a poet of friendship Yeats had no equal, and in this he may have been right. But then, perversely, he must mar the judgment by adding cantankerously: "I never did think him worth a damn as a love poet." That is the judgment of a love poet manqué.

In turn, Yeats's admiration for O'Connor was such that at one time he began to develop a theory that young O'Donovan was really the illegitimate son of some Protestant big house. The theory may not have been entirely uncongenial to O'Connor who had, however, the good sense to pass it lightly through

Can we achieve full employment without inflation?

THE WELFARE STATE U.S.A.

AN EXPLORATION IN AND BEYOND THE NEW ECONOMICS

by Melville J. Ulmer

With uncommon lucidity, the author appraises the variety of measures, attempted or proposed, through which we seek to solve our economic problems — various hand-outs, training programs, negative income tax plans, high interest rates, price guidelines, fiscal and monetary manipulation — and the theory of the "new economics" underlying them. With all the cards on the table, he then proposes a comprehensive plan designed not only to provide a better future for impoverished Americans but to achieve for the overall economy a stability it has not yet enjoyed.

"It is certainly useful to have these notions argued so competently." — BERNARD D. NOSSITER

At your bookstore • $4.95

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY, Publishers

imagination whence it would emerge years later as the motif of another of the delightful stories about childhood.

Yeats is more fully sketched (it is by no means a full portrait) than any of the other figures whom O'Connor here assembles, and occasionally disassembles: AE, Robinson, Osborn Bergin, Geoffrey Phibbs and a dozen others whom he came to know as he made his way up in the world. This was the world of Dublin in the last years of the literary revival, very much a man's world and, as Joyce would have it, all too Irish.

The young provincial-turned-librarian —first in Sligo, later in Wicklow and his native Cork—was eventually co-opted onto the board of directors of the Abbey Theatre, its great days already part of memory, and the last half of his autobiography is devoted in large part to still another account, more personally rancorous than most, of the feuds and infighting that went on in and out of the Green Room among assorted actors, directors, producers, poets and playwrights.

But a fight is only interesting if it is heroic or amusing. These scraps at the Abbey were neither, and one wonders why O'Connor chose to worry them over as he has done. The reason may be that when he died on March 10, 1966, much of the material for this second volume of autobiography existed only in early drafts and it fell to Dr. Maurice Sheehy of University College, Dublin, to collate these drafts and edit the present text. Dr. Sheehy appears to have performed the task most skillfully so that we do indeed have here a coherent and unified text. But no amount of skill can conceal the fact that there is a world of difference between an early draft and a fully finished piece of prose—especially in the case of Frank O'Connor who was known to have rewritten a story a score of times before he thought himself, subject always to recurring second thoughts, satisfied with it. Had he lived he might have turned his account of these Abbey squabbles into high entertainment, elevated the meanness and intrigue and treacheries, all minor to be sure, into fine comedy as he had so often done with other events in his past.

In the end we are left with the unfinished story of a man of great talent, akin to if not really a kind of genius, in whom the life of the imagination and the exigencies of practical intellect were never fully reconciled. In the young man a public official consumed the aspirations of a poet, in maturity a man of affairs intruded upon the private provinces of a born storyteller; and throughout the whole of his life, whatever his private or public role at the time, he was constantly scouting the encampments of scholarship but without ever realizing the full satisfactions of that fellowship.

O'Connor saw all this clearly for himself. In the last sentences of his autobiography he casts a rueful eye backward, then turns at once from the past toward the future, facing that term of his years for which, unfortunately, there will now be no further first-hand account:

> Before Yeats died he told me that the time had come to decide whether I wanted to be a good writer or a good public official, and I had resigned my job as librarian. Now I saw that the man of action was still on top; with nothing like Yeats's talent I had been playing Yeats's game. At once I resigned from every organization I belonged to and sat down, at last, to write.

FLYING

I see my face going past, young again, amused and happy.
This is the circus. I love the dangerous acrobats,
the aerialists. That one is me.
He is taking everything with him.
My childhood—I see nails, hammers, wood, pianos, watercolors going past.
I am becoming my father,
the golden trapeze-artist, and now
I see my mother, the blonde on the white horse. Their eyes meet.
He swings her up in the air.

I ride back and forth on the high-wire that runs between their glances.

STEPHEN MOONEY

Books for Children

NED O'GORMAN

Mr. O'Gorman is a poet, and the author, most recently, of Prophetic Voices: Ideas and Words on Revolution (Random House).

There are few children's books in the shops that are illustrated or written by people who know very much about children. It is easy for an adult to think he knows what children think, see and dream. Adults must be careful when shopping for books: so readily seduced can we be by every bright color, every arch, sweet, sentimental, innocent, dizzy and fairy notion.

The choice is narrower than the layouts and the New York Times children's book supplement would have one think. Publishers produce children's books with as little taste and care as the trade departments publish their torrents of adult penny dreadfuls. Leaping on the watchwords of the moment, they announce "relevant" and "meaningful" on their flyleaves. Beware of such books. Beware of the "big sell": such a book as Bruno Munari's The Circus in the Mist, a cocktail-table object filled with fold-outs, claptrap overlays, holes, etc., could not possibly interest a child but might lure an adult. A kid couldn't get his hands through a Pop pourri like that. Don't buy "exciting," "unusual" books; they are all frauds. Children are Olympian in their hatred of novelty.

Beware also of people who write poems for children, except of course for the likes of A. A. Milne, Robert Louis Stevenson, Edward Lear, Lewis Carroll and Robert Service, whose The Shooting of Dan McGrew and the Cremation of Sam McGee (illustrated by Rosemary Wells, William R. Scott, $4.25) were the first poems I ever read. Rather bullish but for a young mind they are filled with the sinew of poetry.

Avoid any book by Joyce Walsh Anglund. What a creepy bunch of kids they are, little monsters with no noses or mouths, dwarfed Marie Antoinettes and Louis XIVs.

I'd not buy these either:

Squaps the Moonling, by Sita Jucker, is a "relevant" book. A moon creature comes to earth with a returning astronaut. Sentimental drawings. Fantasy all out of whack. A child would not find it amusing though an adult might. Moon creatures hideous. Nothing really unpleasant about Timimoto's Great Adventure, written and illustrated by Frank Frances. But it is flat, bland, soupy. The narrative is typical of that rambling prose that characterizes a good many children's books.

I find most alphabet books uninspiring. Letters and Words, by David L. Krieger, is. The letters clutter up the page; colors are boring pastels. I feel this way too about Beni Montresor's A For Angel. For all the brilliant design it is like a set for a Menotti opera. Too crowded, a little creepy. Children will, I think, reject it. A child's mind cannot put up with clutter. (That is why Beatrix Potter is so beloved by children.) But I think Still Another Alphabet Book, by Seymour Chwast and Martin Stephen Moskof (McGraw-Hill, $3.50) is a witty and ious leap into the possibilities of the phabet. The illustrations give a locus the letters and, I'd expect, it would light a child to find words so gently dden in such colors.

Ask of a children's book first mystery d truth: ask that it be written well, arly and honestly, that it doesn't mock ildhood by assuming that a child's rld is an adult's world, except smaller. would hope parents would ask of a ok they'd give their children as much they'd ask of a book they'd buy and erish for themselves. It is of those oks I want to write now.

HE WINNER. By Kjell Ringi. Harper Row. $3.95. No words, the tale of a st of vanities. A stern moral excitement child can feel. An odd one but terrific.

ANG, BANG YOU'RE DEAD. By uise Fitzhugh and Sandra Scoppettone. arper & Row. $3.75. A stunner. Very uch the kind of pastoral vision of utality kids know from television but ised to art by the authors. The pictures much as the text might shock an adult it a child will see the wisdom. A folk le.

OLDIE THE DOLLMAKER. By M. B. offstein. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $3.50. fy favorite of all the books (but for e other). About a little girl who makes olls with the love and care of an artist. e buys a Chinese lamp on credit and en has a visit from the boy who made e vase. The drawings are of the essence a child's movements, abstractions and dness and joy.

AIN, RAIN, RAIN. By Uri Shulevitz. arrar, Straus & Giroux. $4.50. The feelgs of rain. Lovely children's faces, hair specially. A plant grows on a window f the first picture and thus the beautiful hord of the last line. The little girl editates: "The plant on my window is eginning to grow. I know it." It takes man who knows children to write that.

HE CAT AND THE COFFEE RINKERS. By Max Steele. Drawings y Erik Blegvad. Harper & Row. $2.95. Ay other favorite book. About a school the South and of the old lady headistress who serves her students black offee in the morning. A death of a cat nd some wise things said about the ature of teaching little ones. A picture f the perfect school—only kids will now that, however.

ROCODILE AND HEN. Retold by oan M. Lexau. Pictures by Joan Sandin. Harper & Row. $3.95. A fable about two nimals—the hen is an epic creature. She arries the whole tale in her tail feathers.

POP CORN AND MA GOODNESS. By Edna Mitchell Preston. Illustrated by Robert Andrew Parker. Viking Press. $4.50. Illustrations really dazzle. Tale about life, marriage, birth, death, violence. Rather symbolic nonsense rhymes. Children will hear it all.

THE SEARCH AFTER HAPPINESS. A tale by Charlotte Brontë, written at the age of 13. Simon & Schuster. $3.50. Older children, from 8 up, will be enchanted by this wild tale of noble men meeting wild people in wild places. Filled with symbols, mysteries and non sequiturs that ring true with adventure and wonder.

THE IMAGE IS YOU. Text by Robert Coles. Edited by Donald Erceg. Houghton Mifflin Co. $4.95. The book is reviewed in these pages by Sherman Paul. But I'd like to add my recommendation for it as a children's book. The photographs are taken by black children at random with a Polaroid camera. I know of no photographs taken by anyone so beautiful and true. Children will be able to tell you what they are about.

Others I have found grand enough for children:

DANCE IN THE DESERT. By Madeline L'Engle. Pictures by Symeon Shimin. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $4.95.

OVERHEAD THE SUN. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $4.95. Antonio Frasconi's woodcuts illustrate lines from Whitman.

CELEBRATION OF THE SUN. By Betty Nickerson. J. B. Lippincott Co. $6.95. Children have painted the celebrations of the world. Text dull. Paintings beautiful and primitive and true to the feasts they sing of.

THE BIRDS OF BASEL. By Marian Parry. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.95. The drawings are the book. Like tapestries. Children—any age—will know what they are about. The story of the Basilisk trying to get a curse lifted from the people of Basel is a bit long. The pictures conquer.

ETIENNE-HENRI AND GRI-GRI. Story by Anico Surany. Pictures by Sylvie Selig. Holiday House. $4.50. Again the illustrations are the lure. They'd almost be fine without the story: a boy and his cat jump the boy's family barge and seek adventure.

A LODESTONE AND A TOADSTONE. By Irene Elmer. Illustrated by Nicolas Sidjakov. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50. Story

How to become an Albert Schweitzer Fellow.

The Fellowship seeks to foster the spirit and ideals of Albert Schweitzer and his philosophy of "Reverence for Life" and to provide support for continuing his work as embodied in the Albert Schweitzer Hospital in Lambaréné and other undertakings that have been inspired by his example.

Dr. Schweitzer's appeal is universal, and association with the aims of the Fellowship as an Albert Schweitzer Fellow is open to all who are interested in his ideals and work.

Fellows receive an identifying card as well as The Courier and other publications of the Fellowship. They are encouraged to plan and participate in community activities related to the Schweitzer ethic and work in his spirit.

Since the purpose of The Albert Schweitzer Fellowship is to bring together those who share a common interest in Dr. Schweitzer's humanitarian endeavors, no dues are required for enrollment as a Fellow. Contributions, however, are needed and deeply appreciated since the Fellowship cannot carry on without them, and they are tax deductible. If you are interested please complete and mail the form below.

The Albert Schweitzer Fellowship
866 United Nations Plaza
New York, N.Y. 10017

I am interested in the ideals and work of Dr. Schweitzer and would like to become an Albert Schweitzer Fellow. Enclosed is my contribution of _____ to indicate my interest.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____ Zip _____

too long but illustrations are like clumps of raw jewels and ore.

GILBERTO AND THE WIND. By Marie Hall Ets. Viking Press. 75c paper. A little boy and the wind. This is one of those gracious books so splendid for quick reading: filled with joy and that passion for the world that children are blessed with.

STEVIE. By John Steptoe. Harper & Row. $3.50.

A MONKEY'S UNCLE. By Wilhelm Hauff. Retold by Doris Orgel. Pictures by Mitchell Miller. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $3.95. The story is splendid and the writing wonderful. A model of good, literate prose—stylish and very witty.

HEE HAW. Story by Ann McGovern. Pictures by Eric von Schmidt. Houghton Mifflin Co. $3.75.

A CHILD'S CHRISTMAS IN WALES. By Dylan Thomas. Illustrated by Fritz Eichenberg. New Directions. $4. If a parent would give himself a gift, he'll learn here what childhood is really about.

Something for Everybody

SHERMAN PAUL
Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Iowa. His latest book is The Music of Survival: A Biography of a Poem by William Carlos Williams (University of Illinois Press).

The photograph or reproduction is the sine qua non of all the volumes under notice here. All these books are abundantly, even richly illustrated. They provide delight for the eye and, in the case of the more sumptuous books, an occasion of cultural gluttony. The texts, which in most cases are inferior to the illustrations, are merely the matrix for them, an excuse for utilizing for the purposes of either high or low popularization the holdings of archives and museums. (Next year, around Christmas time, some of the same pictures will appear in other texts.)

All have attractive formats, are slick and sleekly jacketed. Most are expensive —as high as $29.50 after the holidays. Their range of feeling, interest or appeal is wide—social concern, cultural improvement, historical voyaging and voyeurism, genteel sexual titillation. Not all are gift books, but if chosen carefully any one of them would make a good gift.

History

AMERICAN MANNERS & MORALS: A Picture History of How We Behaved and Misbehaved. By Mary Cable and editors of American Heritage. American Heritage. 399 pp. Pre-Christmas $14.95; thereafter $18. This potpourri, making an antique shop of American history, is true vulgarization ("Zion was girt by suburbs of sensuality").

AN ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By André Maurois. The Viking Press. 296 pp. $20. This simple, well-illustrated historical overview is another version of the author's The Miracle of America (1944). Large format.

THE PRINCE OF PLEASURE AND HIS REGENCY: 1811-20. By J. B. Priestley. Harper & Row. 304 pp. $15. Though amply illustrated, this social and cultural history is not a picture history but a useful work of high popularization.

THE CRUCIBLE OF CHRISTIANITY: Judaism, Hellenism and the Historical Background to the Christian Faith. Edited by Arnold Toynbee. World Publishing. 368 pp. Pre-Christmas $25; thereafter $29.50. This beautifully designed book is a "learned" illustrated history, lavish of photographs, maps, plans and expertise. It covers the culture of the Levant from 200 B.C. to 200 A.D.; among its fourteen contributors are David Flusser and Harry Wolfson. Large format.

LINCOLN: A Picture Story of His Life. By Stefan Lorant. W. W. Norton & Co. 336 pp. $7.95. This revised and enlarged edition of a book variously titled and first issued in 1941 is one of the indispensable and fascinating works of Lincoln hagiography. More than 700 pictures; large format.

THE HERO: Myth/Image/Symbol. By Dorothy Norman. World Publishing. 244 pp. Pre-Christmas $8.95; thereafter $10. The design of this book matches its riches of iconography and proverbial wisdom, but the book itself is pretentious —serio-popular.

THE MEDICI: A Great Florentine Family. By Marcel Brion. Translated by Gilles and Heather Cremonesi. Crown Publishing. 216 pp. $15. Florence and its art, as much as the Medici family, the subject of this useful pictorial cultural history.

Current History and Sociology

I HAVE A KIND OF FEAR: Conversions from the Writings of White Teachers and Black Students in City Schools. Edited by Richard Larson and James Anderson. Photographs by Howard M. Bigliani. Quadrangle Books. 139 pp. $6. The photographs in this serious book like those in The Image Is You, try to free our response from the overuse of language of social concern. So does the text, in which the confronting testimony reveals an almost insuperable impasse of understanding and communication.

THE IMAGE IS YOU. Text by Robert Coles. Edited by Donald Erceg. Houghton Mifflin Co. 101 pp. $4.95. The pictures in this ghetto book were taken of black children of Boston's inner city. The essay includes the views of dwellers in this area. As the title suggests, our response incriminates us.

SELF-PORTRAIT: U.S.A. By David Douglas Duncan. Harry N. Abrams. 240 pp. $18.50. This work of photojournalism covers the two national conventions of 1968. The camera is searching; the text is personal, worldly, skeptical. Large format.

The Arts

THE ARTS AND MAN: A World View of the Role and Functions of the Arts in Society. UNESCO. Prentice-Hall. 17 pp. $12.95. The serious essays on the various arts, by Herbert Read, Pier Luigi Nervi and Yehudi Menuhin, among others, are accompanied by a "parade of images." Large format.

ARCHITECTURE IN NEW YORK: A Photographic History. By Wayne Andrews. Atheneum Publishers. 188 pp. Pre-Christmas $17.50; thereafter $2 Most of the 255 photographs are the excellent work of Mr. Andrews. The book covers the period from 1700 to the pre

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

; its captions are sometimes anecdotal. rge format.

IE DECORATIVE TWENTIES. By artin Battersby. Walker and Co. 216 . Pre-Christmas $17.50; thereafter $20. serious, well-illustrated history of Art co, especially in France, England and nerica, covering a wide range of de- n. Large format.

IE STORY OF THE BLUES. By ul Oliver. Chilton Book Co. 176 pp. $12.50. The text of this history of an art form is solid and substantial and is documented by photographs of the milieu and performers. Large format.

AGES OF ELEGANCE: Five Thousand Years of Fashion and Frivolity. By Gisèle d'Assailly. New York Graphic Society. 251 pp. Pre-Christmas $24.95; thereafter $29.95. Popularization ("The history of fashion is rather like a fairy tale"), but its splendid plates may be useful to designers. Large format.

ecords 1969 / David Hamilton addition to the category "Records of e Year," this compilation includes sec- ns devoted to "Repertory of Special terest" (in first recordings, or signifi- ntly better ones than have been recently ailable), and "Performances of Special terest" (unusual readings of more stand- d literature).

A final section lists "Significant Re- ues" of older recordings. Except in this st category, all records listed are stereo- onic.

RECORDS OF THE YEAR

ACH: Cantatas 89, 90, 161. Soloists, amburg Monteverdi Chorus; Concerto msterdam; Jürgen Jürgens and Jaap chröder, directors. Telefunken SAWT 540. $5.95.

oldberg Variations; The Art of the ugue; Ricercars from The Musical Of- ring. Charles Rosen, piano. Odyssey 2-36-0020. $8.94 (three discs).

ERLIOZ: Roméo et Juliette. Soloists; ondon Symphony Orchestra and Chorus; olin Davis, cond. Philips PHS 2-909. 11.96 (two discs).

e Deum. Franco Tagliavini, tenor; Lon- on Symphony Orchestra and Chorus; olin Davis, cond. Philips SAL-3724. 5.98.

ARTER: Sonata for Cello and Piano. el Krosnick, Paul Jacobs. Sonata for ute, oboe, cello and harpsichord. Har- ey Sollberger, Charles Kuskin, Fred herry, Paul Jacobs. Nonesuch H-71234. 2.98.

HOPIN: Six Polonaises. Alfred Brendel, iano. Vanguard Cardinal C-10058. 3.98.

AVIES: Revelation and Fall. Mary homas, soprano; Pierrot Players; Peter Maxwell Davies, cond. Angel S-36558. $5.98 (with Gerhard: Collages).

DEBUSSY: Images for Orchestra. Cleveland Orchestra; Pierre Boulez, cond. Columbia MS-7362. $5.98.

MENDELSSOHN: Octet. Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; Neville Marriner, director. Argo ZRG-569. $5.95.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Serenade for Strings; Souvenir de Florence. Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; Neville Marriner, director. Argo ZRG-584. $5.95.

REPERTORY OF SPECIAL INTEREST

BACH: Cantatas 50, 83, 197. Soloists, Vienna Boys' Choir; Concentus Musicus; Hans Gillesberger and Nicolas Harnoncourt, directors. Telefunken SAWT 9539. $5.95.

BERIO: Sinfonia. Swingle Singers; New York Philharmonic; Luciano Berio, cond. Columbia MS-7268. $5.98.

BRITTEN: Holy Sonnets of John Donne; Poems and Proverbs of William Blake. Peter Pears, tenor; Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, baritone; Benjamin Britten, piano. London OS-26099. $5.98.

COPLAND: Short Symphony; Dance Symphony. London Symphony Orchestra; Aaron Copland, cond. Columbia MS-7223. $5.98.

CRUMB: Eleven Echoes of Autumn. Aeolian Chamber Players. WOLPE: Trio. Group for Contemporary Music, Columbia University. Composers Recording, Inc. SD-233. $5.95.

DEL TREDICI: Syzygy. Phyllis Bryn-Julson, soprano; Festival Chamber Ensemble; Richard Dufallo, cond. Colum-

IN SASKATCHEWAN

- At a rapidly growing new campus of an established University
- Where student sport is only "for fun" and there is no fraternity system
- Where ethnic diversity resists the cultural "melting-pot"
- Where social innovation (e.g. Medicare) and a range of developmental stages (from the hunting-and-fishing economy of Northern Indians and Metis to the urban centers of the South) provide a natural laboratory for social research
- Where all research is unclassified
- Where a divisional academic organization permits a combination of interdisciplinary and traditional teaching and research
- Where the sun shines 87 per cent of the days, winters are tough and challenging, and the summers are beautiful.

You are invited to apply for the following positions for 1970-71:

Geography

--three positions; one to teach Economic Geography with quantitative methods; one to teach Physical Geography with specialization in climatology and the third to teach Cartography.

Political Science

--three positions; Political Theory; Canadian Government and Politics; and European Political Systems.

Social Studies

--Symbolic Basis of Behavior; Man and Time; Information and Systems Theory; Statistics.

Sociology

--Three positions; one to teach in Ethnic and Minority Group Relation; other two fields open.

All positions are filled according to qualifications.

Salaries in current academic year—

Professor	$17,350 minimum
Associate Professor	13,400—17,250
Assistant Professor	10,000—13,000
Lecturer	7,800—10,400
Instructor	7,400—9,400

Reasonable allowances made for removal expenses.

Teaching duties:

Normal teaching load two classes for eight hours per week, September to April.

For further information, write to:

F. W. ANDERSON, Associate Dean

Division of the Social Sciences

University of Saskatchewan

Regina Campus,

Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada

bia MS-7281. $5.98 (with works by Nono, Takemitsu, Xenakis).

HAYDN: Schöpfungsmesse. Soloists, Choir of St. John's College, Cambridge; Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; George Guest, cond. Argo ZRG-598. $5.95.

HINDEMITH: Kammermusiken 1-7. Concerto Amsterdam; Jaap Schröder, director. Telefunken SLT-43110/2. $17.85 (three discs).

JOHNSTON: Quartet No. 2. Composers String Quartet. Nonesuch H-71224. $2.98 (with Cage & Hiller: HPSCHD).

KIRCHNER: Quartet No. 3. Beaux-Arts Quartet. WEINBERG: Quartet No. 2. Composers String Quartet. Columbia MS-7284. $5.98.

SESSIONS: Symphony No. 3. Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; Igor Buketoff, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC-3095. $5.98 (with Lees: Concerto for String Quartet & Orchestra).

SHAPEY: Incantations. Bethany Beardslee, soprano; University of Chicago Contemporary Chamber Players; Ralph Shapey, cond. PERKINS: Music for Thirteen Players. University of Chicago Contemporary Chamber Players; Ralph Shapey, cond. Caprice. Easley Blackwood, piano. Composers Recording, Inc. SD-232. $5.95.

WEINBERG: Cantus Commemorabilis I. PUTSCHE: The Cat and the Moon. University of Chicago Contemporary Chamber Players; Ralph Shapey, cond. Composers Recording, Inc. SD-245. $5.95

WOLF: String Quartet in D minor. La-Salle Quartet. Deutsche Grammophon 139376. $5.98.

WUORINEN: Time's Encomium (electronic). Nonesuch H-71225. $2.98.

Spectrum: New American Music, Volumes I/III. Contemporary Chamber Ensemble; Arthur Weisberg, cond. Nonesuch H-71219, 71220, 71221. $2.98 each.

Performances of Special Interest

BACH: Cantatas 211, 212. Soloists, Concentus Musicus; Nicolas Harnoncourt, director. Telefunken SAWT 9515. $5.95.

Mass in B minor. Soloists; Vienna Boys' Choir; Chorus Viennensis; Concentus Musicus; Hans Gillesberger and Nicolas Harnoncourt, directors. Telefunken SKH-20 $17.85 (three discs).

Holiday Issues

This is the first of our two holiday issues. Next week's Nation will contain additional gift listings: Lawrence Alloway's roundup of art books, a film book bibliography compiled by Robert Sklar, and the annual list of books published this year by Nation contributors.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concertos 1-5; Choral Fantasy. Daniel Barenboim; New Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel S-3752. $23.92 (four discs).

MOZART: Cosi fan tutte. Leontyne Price, Judith Raskin, Tatiana Troyanos, George Shirley, Sherrill Milnes, Ezio Flagello; New Philharmonia Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC-6416. $23.92 (four discs).

Symphony No. 40; Serenata Notturna. English Chamber Orchestra; Benjamin Britten, cond. London CS-6598. $5.98.

SCHUBERT: Songs. Elly Ameling, soprano; Jörg Demus, piano. RCA Victrola VICS-1405. $2.98.

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2; Genoveva Overture. New Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel S-36606. $5.98.

STRAUSS: Salome. Montserrat Caballé, Regina Resnik, Richard Lewis, James King, Sherrill Milnes; London Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC-7053. $11.96 (two discs).

WAGNER: Der fliegende Holländer. Anja Silja, Ernst Kozub, Theo Adam, Martti Talvela; New Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel SCL-3730. $17.94 (three discs).

RECITAL: French Operatic Arias. Beverly Sills, soprano; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; Charles Mackerras, cond. Westminster WST-17163. $5.98.

Significant Reissues

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 5. Robert Casadesus; Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra; Hans Rosbaud, cond. Odyssey 32-16-0326. $2.98 (stereo).

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 2; Academic Festival Overture. London Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, cond. Philips World Series PHC-9123. $2.98 (stereo).

BRITTEN: The Prince of the Pagoda Covent Garden Royal Opera House Orchestra; Benjamin Britten, cond. Lond STS-15081/2. $4.98 (two discs, stereo

STRAUSS: Don Juan; Till Eulenspiegel Tod und Verklärung. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; Wilhelm Furtwängl cond. Seraphim 60094. $2.49.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 4. Emi Loose, soprano; Philharmonia Orchestr Paul Kletzki, cond. Seraphim S-601($2.49 (stereo).

Das Lied von der Erde. Maureen F rester, Richard Lewis; Chicago Sympho Orchestra; Fritz Reiner, cond. RCA V trola VICS-1390. $2.98 (stereo).

MASSENET: Manon. Victoria de Angeles, Henri Legay, Michel De Jean Borthayre; Paris Opéra-Comiq Chorus and Orchestra; Pierre Monteu cond. Seraphim ID-6057. $9.96 (fo discs).

MONTEVERDI: Madrigals. Vocal a instrumental ensemble; Nadia Boulange cond. Seraphim 60125. $2.49.

PUCCINI: La Bohème. Licia Albanes Tatiana Menotti, Beniamino Gigli, Af Poli; La Scala Chorus & Orchestra; Ur berto Berretoni, cond. Seraphim I 6038. $4.98 (two discs).

Manon Lescaut. Licia Albanese, Jus Bjoerling, Robert Merrill; Rome Ope House Chorus & Orchestra; Jonel Pe lea, cond. RCA Victrola VIC-602 $7.47 (three discs).

STRAUSS: Die Frau ohne Schatte Leonie Rysanek, Christel Goltz, Ha Hopf, Paul Schoeffler; Vienna Philha monic Orchestra; Karl Böhm, con Richmond SRS-64503. $9.96 (fo discs, stereo).

VERDI: Aïda. Zinka Milanov, Fedor Barbieri, Jussi Bjoerling, Leonard Wa ren, Boris Christoff; Rome Opera Hous Chorus & Orchestra; Jonel Perlea, con RCA Victrola VIC-6119. $7.47 (thre discs).

Macbeth. Leonie Rysanek, Carlo Be gonzi, Leonard Warren, Jerome Hine Metropolitan Opera Chorus and Orches tra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Vic trola VICS-6121. $7.47 (three discs stereo).

RECITAL: The Art of Artur Schnabel Seraphim 60115. $2.49.

RECITAL: Bach and Mozart works Dinu Lipatti, piano. Odyssey 32-16 0320. $2.98 (pseudo-stereo).

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

When Henry Kahnweiler, Juan Gris's dealer, complimented him on one of his exercises in synthetic cubism, the painter asked, "But does it make a picture?" In other words, did what Gris had painted constitute an entity, did it say something coherently?

Much of what passes with us as "new" theatre may be set down permissively as actively experiment, and is perhaps to be encouraged as progress on a path to some future completion, but very little of it makes sense as valid statement now. Clever notions, bright metaphors in a scene here and there, cute inventions, even refreshing impudences, occasionally occur, but almost never can we value what is created as better than interesting fragments or gimmicks.

The productions of Piscator, Meyerhold,* Brecht, Grotowski are not "experiments": they all embody fully articulated ideas. They are therefore plays, even when they offend literary prescription. Meyerhold's The Inspector General, for example, did not employ Gogol's text exactly as he wrote it, but it was eloquently meaningful as well as entertaining in its own right.

The recent production of Henry V by the American Shakespeare Festival Theatre of Stratford, Conn., at the ANTA Theatre, is a reverse case in point. It contains many tricks purporting to show that Shakespeare's "history" may be viewed as anti-war propaganda, even though it is generally regarded as a jingoistic tract. That is by no means an untenable interpretation, but Michael Kahn, director of the Connecticut production, has simply toyed with the play, offering neither original substance nor traditional justification in the matter.

It is not enough to begin the performance with the cast as a bunch of kids sporting around in a gymnasium and then to transform them for the opening scene into caricatures in ludicrous costumes of the author's characters. Or to proceed further with a thoroughly conventional reading of other scenes, occasionally using broomsticks as swords at the very time when other personages are dressed in medieval armor, while faces of bloodstained white masks serve purposes of both horror and fun.

My objection is not that the result is a travesty of Shakespeare—which might even prove to be a relief from stuffy Shakespeare—but that whatever the production's intent, it fails to provide a clear picture of anything but theatrical adolescence.

Richard Schechner's Dionysus '69 was certainly crude and while it made hash of Euripides' text and didn't say, or mean to say, what Euripides did, it was a youthfully gay message from the East Village. Not so the same director's Makbeth, which the Performance Group is now giving at its seat on Wooster Street.

I don't at all mind that the show is "taken from Shakespeare" (Shakespeare himself borrowed from many sources now known only to scholars), but I was utterly indifferent to what was done with the loan. The fact that the stage was "environmental" (the actors prance all over the place, often where they cannot be seen or heard) does not in the least impress me, nor does having Banquo played by a (pretty) girl shock me into any particular awareness of thought or sensation. One cannot even say "confusion hath now made his masterpiece." I got nothing from the strenuousness of the event except that the group, all out of breath from skipping, running, jumping from one area to another, is composed of nice and very "sincere" children.

Stomp at the Public Theatre on Lafayette Street is play, though not a play. It is a joint effort by a number of boys and girls (named "The Combine") from Texas (several of them college dropouts) who improvise all sorts of fun and games to proclaim their "freedom" from or rebellion against the environment that produced them. They are at loose ends and seem to be delighted to find themselves in that condition. Their theatrical innovations are nonexistent, but here and there they do set up a few pleasant surprises. They will some day have to do something besides bombinating.

I rather enjoyed seeing them because while their show makes no artistic pretension, it reveals what a good part of our disaffected but on the whole charming youth is really like. One recognizes, to some extent, what they are made of and something of what they wish to escape. A group interview with them would have more sociological interest than their performance. I cannot tell from their stomping whether they are actually talented. They are still only raw material, but as such they are by no means ungracious.

Oliver Hailey's Who's Happy Now? (Village South Theatre, 15 Vandam Street) is a modestly endearing play. It has authenticity. Its author has gathered from his early experience as a boy in a Texas village something that he has wrought into a kind of nosegay. The experience must have been painful: there was a coarse "peasant" father who was a butcher, a man who lived openly with a likable slut of a waitress while his patient wife, who had had no more intention of leaving her husband than he had of abandoning her, stood by bearing it all. But out of this essentially drab material Hailey has made something funny, tender, compassionate. He does not prevaricate: he makes it perfectly clear that he is embellishing with kindness and humor what was once ugly. His play is sentimental but not fraudulent.

Unfortunately the production is not all it should be. None of the acting is bad, but the casting and direction are barely compatible with the nature of the play's writing. Only Rue McClanahan as the heartily silly waitress is in tune. The "hero" is not naive enough. The father is villainous when he should simply be

* In my column of December 1, Meyerhold's system of body training was erroneously called "biomechanism." It should have read "biomechanics."

Gift cards sent on request, orders filled immediately

ROSE GRAUBART:
PORTRAITS OF POETS
Drawings of Ginsberg, Snyder, Bly, Schwerner, Ignatow, and nineteen others . . . . . .

$3, postpaid
Tennessee Poetry Press, Box 196, Martin, 38237

MAIL ORDERS FILLED PROMPTLY, PRICES: Mon. thru Thurs. Evgs.: Orch. $12.; Mezz. $9.; Balc. $7, 5.; Fri. & Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $15., 12.; Mezz. $10.; Balc. $8., 6.; Mats. Wed. & Sat.: Orch. $8.; Mezz. $7.; Balc. $6., 5. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with mail order and suggest alternate dates.
46th STREET THEATRE, 226 W. 46 St., N.Y. 10036

oafishly thickheaded; the mother too genteel for the circumstances: a pervasively earthy innocence is lacking. Still the play's good nature and purity emerge.

I cannot bring myself to say anything harsh about the revival of Our Town at the ANTA Theatre. The play is part of an American dream, a memorial to the myth of the sweet past in rural America. It strums a string—rather slack now—of our national culture. Its optimistic view of life is a sugary Platonic distillation of what we imagine we once were, what we yearn to believe we still "in our hearts" might be. Thornton Wilder is a tactful craftsman: he found the right form for his content. His is a feathery touch: he doesn't push. Hence the play's endurance.

The production under Donald Driver (who directed Your Own Thing) is somewhat overcharacterized, especially at the outset. All the actors—Henry Fonda, Mildred Natwick, Ed Begley among the best known—are capable of achieving the needed effects with more simplicity. Still, moments preceding and during the ice-cream parlor scene induced a tear, as Elizabeth Hartman, an actress of genuine sensibility, and Harry Evans play it. And I was struck by Denise Nickerson, a child player with prodigious powers of projection!

The fabric of Our Town is fragile; a smaller theatre would serve it better.

Film Scene at Pula

CURTIS HARNACK

Mr. Harnack has recently returned to the faculty of Sarah Lawrence, following a sabbatical spent in part in Yugoslavia. He has published two novels (a third is finished) and a travel book on Iran.

Only the Yugoslavs thus far have thought of appropriating a Roman coliseum for a film festival, assembling tens of thousands of spectators to watch—not a contest between gladiators and beasts—but flickering images on a silver screen! Each year for the last fifteen, the magnificent Roman arena on the shores of the Adriatic at Pula, built between 30 B.C. and 14 A.D.—the most perfect such structure in the ancient world—is lit by floodlamps and strung with gaily colored bulbs. The grayish-yellow three-tiered shell, golden in the light, is stunning against the deep blue night sky.

In the city (part Italian watering resort, part Austro-Hungarian Empire naval base) the streets are barred to motor traffic and jammed with ordinary middle-class Yugoslavs streaming toward the great stadium for the double feature. Tickets cost $1.50, compared to the 20c tariff in local movie houses. The attractions are the premières of fourteen feature-length Yugoslav films, glimpses of glamorous movie personalities, and the pleasure of being part of the country's liveliest art. "We have the audiences, we have the interest," one director told me. "You in the West have heard a lot about Polish and Czech films, but now it's our turn."

My first evening there, upon entering the coliseum well after the first feature had begun, I felt that the atmosphere echoed with Roman ghosts. The imperious audience was quick to roar disapproval over one film sequence and hastily cheer another. Manners still tended to follow impulse, as I realized to my surprise when I felt stones the size of walnuts hurled against my legs by irritated spectators behind me, who couldn't see because I was standing in the graveled aisle, unable to find my seat. When I told my companions what was happening, they laughed. "A few years ago, the audience hated a film so much that when the director walked on stage, afterward, to be introduced to them—they stoned him."

No doubt, Plekhanov, the social theorist of Lenin's day, would have been heartened by such a spontaneous response: art should always be subject to the innate good judgment of the people. The official Yugoslav film brochure stated a similar sentiment: "These festivals are public social platforms where the public and the critics are informed of the state of our film industry as a whole. Here they can judge their aesthetic values and the failures, they evaluate them and arrive at conclusions. . . ." Possibly in the form of a stone.

Or, more happily, with the Yugoslav version of the Oscar. The climax of each festival is the awarding of the Golden Arena trophy for first prize, the Silver Arena for second. Just in case the jury of respectable cinema experts strays too far from the Communist ideal, a People's Prize is also presented—invariably to a patriotic film full of marching Partisans, twanging peasant music and proper Socialist messages.

This year's festival entries, in the opinion of most Yugoslavs with whom I talked, showed a fashionable pessimism and excessive violence. Some thought this might be the result of having awarded last year's prizes to films of that sort. Others pointed out, and I think it more likely, that Yugoslav directors are sensitive to trends in modern films everywhere and quickly become part of them. "The Czechs," observed an editor of the journal, Politika, "have every reason to despair, considering what's happened to their country, and yet their films are basically more optimistic than ours."

Horoscope was typical of this mordant drift, a thoroughly "modern" film, with a little from Godard, from Polanski, from Fellini, from almost everybody. The film is so modish it cannot help but travel well, internationally. First of all, it fits the requirement of centering on the very

JENIFER

Plant fire into the earth
until it grows
like a green tree:
your pain took precedence over all there is of death

in place of screams water:
your silence
broke me,
and I brought a woolen doll
to make you laugh:

you took my hand
through a rain of stones afterward they said it would not live:

nurses
stepped around us, friends were people falling off a cliff

under a white nightgown you held us
roped to some terrible assertion, and when the child broke from her cage of glass

you named her Galila-Yael:
she who fights with waves of light

STANLEY COOPERMAN

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES!
POPULAR PRICES!

"'FUTZ' IS IMPORTANT BECAUSE IT CHALLENGES AND EXPANDS OUR UNDERSTANDING OF WHAT IS POSSIBLE IN CINEMA! No one in this country has been making feature movies anything like 'Futz'. We are drawn in. We are shoved away. We become involved. 'Futz' makes a modern audience of a movie audience; forces it to examine its own responses!" —Jacob Brackman, Esquire

"'FUTZ' IS A BEAUTIFUL MOVIE! IT IS GOING TO DRIVE AMERICA A LITTLE NUTS BECAUSE 'FUTZ' MAY BE THE MOST PURELY AMERICAN MOVIE EVER MADE! 'Futz' is far out! It is about as far out from any of the syndrome of techniques we've come to expect in contemporary films. The first American movie about bestiality; the first American movie about anality. It deals at heart with the question of private freedom. O'Horgan is a genius!" —Jason McCloskey, After Dark

"A BRILLIANT FILM! Exciting, offbeat and quite simply a bitch of a motion picture. It assaults the senses on every level from the aesthetic to the physical; from intellectual to emotional; and leaves the viewer challenged, disturbed and somewhat limp. 'Futz' incites, inflames and stimulates." —John L. Wasserman, San Francisco Chronicle

"'FUTZ' ERUPTS ON THE SCREEN! AN AWESOME AND UNFORGETTABLE EXCURSION INTO THE GROTESQUE, THE MYSTICAL AND THE SAVAGE ELEMENTS OF MAN'S SOUL! A BLEEDING IMPRESSIONISTIC PICTURE OF AMERICA! Tom O'Horgan has transferred the dynamism and electric vitality of his stage production to the screen. He has unleased primitive and tumultous furies and splashed them on a violent canvas of colors and sounds. He has created an exuberant, remarkably funny and affecting commentary on the plight of the pariah in contemporary society and the destructiveness of man. The La Mama cast is superb!" —Donald J. Mayerson, The Villager

"A CONTROVERSIAL SUCCESS! A brilliant combination of all the new-found arts and techniques of modern theatre and cinema. Shocking, artful, funny, and saturated with social comment. Director Tom O'Horgan and the La Mama Troupe have achieved an excellent transition from the stage to the screen!" —Kings Point College

COMMONWEALTH UNITED PRESENTS A GUVNOR PRODUCTION

Futz

a ritual celebration of the death of personal liberty

Directed by TOM O'HORGAN • Produced by [illegible] SHAPIRO and ALAN STROH • Starring the LA MAMA TROUPE • Executive Producer LEON MIRELL • Screenplay by JOSEPH STEFANO Based on the play by ROCHELLE OWENS • Music by TOM O'HORGAN • Eastman COLOR Released by COMMONWEALTH UNITED

Although we prefer not to, we are forced to invade the personal liberty of everyone under 18 by refusing them admission to "FUTZ."

AIT KIPS BAY
on 2nd Avenue & 31st St.
LE 2-6668

young: a group of semi-naked post-adolescents, perhaps on holiday from their university studies—all of them in a kind of summer limbo and mesmerized by the moment. Bora Draskovic, the youthful director, set the action in a railway switching yard, between the flats of the sea and the steep locomotive haul into the mountains. Despite its rather pretentious symbolism and second-hand cinematic ideas, the film is skillfully put together and contains some brilliant scenes: such as the confrontation between an old-fashioned, peasant-world wedding party and the playful, mocking, dégagé youths.

Considering the unsophisticated audience, I was surprised by the courtesy shown Horoscope; they respected, perhaps, the tender age of the director and the seriousness of his intent. Later that evening on the terrace of the Riviera, a gray Austrian dowager of a hotel where the film colony gathered each evening after the screenings, long-haired Draskovic in velvet mod clothes was properly lionized. Radio and TV journalists kept calling him away for interviews. It was a triumphant evening for him, perhaps because he hadn't been torn apart by the beasts in the darkness of that great arena.

Film companies in Yugoslavia compete with one another and must show profits or go bankrupt, as in any capitalist country. One of the most successful and respected companies, Avala Films, counted heavily on Cross Country. It did not receive the audience support expected, although it starred the popular actress, Milena Dravic, and was directed by Purisa Dordevic ("The streets of Belgrade are noticeably emptier when his television serial is being shown," a Yugoslav told me).

Cross Country began as a funny, daffy comedy, somewhat reminiscent of the early Doris Day films, at least in spirit (and perhaps because blonde Miss Dravic resembles her): and the film was beautiful to look at, having been shot in color in a wild, primitive area of eastern Bosnia, near Serbia. The story concerns an Orthodox priest whose love of sports inspires his pretty daughter to become a champion cross-country runner. After the initial absurdity, all she runs into is a lot of heavy symbolism. The hoots and whistles began to gather momentum in the restless crowd, drowning out the sound track. The verdict was clearly thumbs down, Roman style.

None of Avala's films fared well, and the company's director, with whom I had dinner one evening in the fashionable Venetian fishing village of Rovinj (which was as crowded as Positano) kept repeating in English: Oh, my God! Oh, my God!

What is healthy in this painful scrutiny by both one's peers and the untutored mob is that the merit of a film remains somewhat open to question, and no clique of powerful critics can have too much influence. The ordinary moviegoer is roaring in the dark amphitheatre, having his blunt say. He cannot be entirely laughed off; officially, he certainly cannot; and even the directors, actors and other cinema personnel feel close to those vibrations from the masses. For centuries in the European theatre the ideal drama has been—like Shakespeare's—appreciated in different degrees by the gentry in the boxes and the standees in the stalls.

While the festival was a vacation attraction for the masses, for the cinema crowd it was largely a continual party. I saw a film and later met the actress; I met an actress and then saw her film. At a picnic beach supper one night, the fragile, blonde star, Snezana Niksic, adroitly broiled fresh mackerel over a makeshift charcoal fire—an hour before she was to drive with her husband, director Vuk Babic, to Pula in order to be presented to the audience, following the screening of her film. (Her name means Snow White, his Wolf; "Two fairy tales that got mixed up," said Babic.) They were living in a pup tent pitched in a wheat field, not merely because of the hotel room shortage but because it is stylish for the young, successful, moderately rich Yugoslavs to don jeans and travel poor. "We are proud of our close connections to the peasants. I'm only one generation removed," said Babic. One afternoon during the festival he helped his uncle in Ljubljana sell ripe apricots in the farmer's market.

"There are as many film festivals in the world as there are days in the year," said a former director of the Pula event, "but none of them is quite like ours." For one thing, the celebration is a national affair, beginning with fireworks in true Balkan style. Marshal Tito makes his appearance—this year under exceptionally heavy security guard. Among the press was a Canadian journalist who'd been effusive with every Yugoslav he met, telling them what a wonderful country theirs was, how much better things were here than in Russia or America. "This is the true social system of the future—here you have real freedom." In fact, he'd been in the country only a few days—in the company of a girl he intended to marry in this paradise nation.

On the night of Marshal Tito's visit to the arena, the Canadian tried to break through the police lines to reach an exit. The troops laid hands on him and demanded his passport, which unfortunately he'd left in his hotel room. He was promptly arrested and hauled roughly to jail, where he spent the night. After the matter was straightened out, to make amends, the Lord Mayor of Pula not only attended the journalist's wedding, the day after the close of the festival, but even paid for the nuptial supper and all the wine. "From a night in jail to celebration and joy! What a typical Yugoslav experience," said one young director. "If only I'd had a camera—it would all have been perfect on film!"

WINTER AFTERNOON

Before the storm breaks the olive tree turns up its leaves and I am drawn within that explosion of white against a purple sky.

HAROLD ISBELL

PUBLICATIONS

"WRITING FANTASTICALLY GOOD" says a subscriber, of stories, verse in current PANACHE Magazine. Just $1.00 brings an abundance of engaging writing by exciting new writers, plus news of fiction contest. Or, "free page" on postal brings sample pages, contest news. PANACHE, Rm. NA., 153 East 84 St., New York City 10028

LAST CHANCE FOR XMAS!
The Nation's Best Puzzles
Book 3 — $2.00
All 3 books $4.00
Frank W. Lewis
119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md. 20770

The Best Way To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 12-15-69
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York 10011
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1325

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 But such an offspring is not necessarily both large and imposing. (5-10)
9 It might well be Brahman, but many have a thing about one. (6,3)
10 Duck. (5)
11 If American, a different 4 than may be associated with 9. (6)
12 One would have to move a dozen times before getting even one foot off the ground! (8)
14 An inclination to be treading somewhat awkwardly? (8)
16 One step taken to overcome a big 14? (5)
17 The measure of 12 confused with a different measure. (5)
18 Instruments found in foreign romances.
20 You wouldn't refer to it for a clincher, though it might help if cut to the quick. (4,4)
21 Forbid a mild expletive of a riverman, possibly. (6)
24 Quoted as describing the medal-winner, perhaps. (5)
25 Provoke a sort of riot, and it could become a custom! (9)
26 Scotch and water association with it? (4,4,7)

DOWN

1 Talk about the old girl-friend! (6)
2 Ruy Diaz de Bivar. (2,3)
3 An original plot? (3,6,2,4)
4 Run in the family, broadly speaking? (4)
5 Occasionally present, too, in consequence. (3,3,4)
6 Bohemians could well be, if authentic. (15)
7 Possibly a lover of Rome. (9)
8 Visionary. (7)
13 Store place designed for filters? (10)
15 An 8 isn't supposed to be. (9)
17 Holding a low opinion of mankind. (7)
19 Is one who cries more capable of being severer? (6)
22 Ground meal—a sort of coarse hominy. (5)
23 Some boy about 13 might start off with such yeast. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1324

ACROSS: 1 Abeam; 4 Poncho; 11 Winston; 12 Accrues; 13 Speedwell; 14 Rebut; 15 Hunting knives; 17 Credit balance; 22 Lapse; 24 Odometers; 25 Stamina; 26 Shikari; 27 Assets; 28 Istle. DOWN: 2 Bandeau; 3 Antedated; 5 Occur; 6 Crumble; 7 Onsets; 8 Awash; 9 International; 10 Eat like a horse; 16 Imageries; 18 Repeals; 19 Cue ball; 20 Plasma; 21 Aspic; 23 Evict.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

TRAVEL

JAPAN EXPO JET CHARTERS. $350 R. T. from Los Angeles. For complete details send $1.00 to: AMERICAN TOURS, P.O. Box 1125, Pasadena, California 91102

PERSONALS

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

WORK from within: become a card-carrying member of the Great Silent Majority. Send 50c for membership card to: Great Silent Majority, Box 165, Schenectady, N.Y. 12301.

SERVICES

WELL-KNOWN BOOK REVIEWER: Publishers' reader; reviews—revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 632, c/o The Nation.

BOOK PRINTING — Paperbacks, hard cover, pamphlets. As few as 200 copies. Quality printing at Budget Prices. Free details. Box 285N, Floral Park, N.Y 11001

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WRITING, EDITING, RESEARCH by published writer. Contemporary Authors and Who's Who biographee, free-lance basis. Moderate fees. Box 633, c/o The Nation.

SITUATION WANTED

FORMER Unitarian Minister, with Master's Degree in Social Ethics, seeking editorial position with publishing house or first-class journal or magazine. Intellectual. Social activist. Restricted to Northeast U.S. Box 631, c/o The Nation.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
(212) 924-2400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Looking for something out of this world to give for the Holidays? If so read no further.

We have nothing exotic to offer. Just something challenging and informative. The kind of magazine that engages you, rouses you to write angry letters when you disagree. A magazine that wants to know what you think.

Why not give The Nation as a holiday gift this year? Our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one. Act now and we will send you as a free gift from us, C. Wright Mills and the Power Elite, edited by Domhoff and Ballard.

clip & mail

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY ..... STATE ..... ZIP .....

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free C. WRIGHT MILLS AND THE POWER ELITE. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N 12-15

FRANCO'S LAST DEAL LOREN JENKINS

THE NATION

DECEMBER 22, 1969 35 cents

5-70R PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
DEC 22 1969
LIBRARY

Half a Loaf: WASHINGTON CONFRONTS THE HUNGRY

JENNIFER CROSS

Ghost Town Vigilantes
THE RACIAL PALLOR OF CAIRO

G. LOUIS HEATH

The Holidays: Part Two

J. Bronowski on William Blake

ART BOOKS—FILM BOOKS

BOOKS BY NATION CONTRIBUTORS

LETTERS

objectivity

Kansas City, Mo.

DEAR SIRS: Regarding David Deitch's article promoting "advocacy journalism" ["Change or Stagnation: Case for Advocacy Journalism," The Nation, Nov. 17], I would like to make a few observations.

The daily press is no place for bias and opinionated personal views, unless they are labeled as such. The polemical journals such as The Nation and others are designed to fill that need. Of course, absolute objectivity is difficult, if not impossible, to attain. However, fairness to a high degree is not impossible. As I read news accounts of various controversial issues, I see little fairness. Recently, the major daily in Detroit scuttled its "Crime in the Streets" column because it reflected poorly upon that city's Negroes. A nice gesture, perhaps, but what happened to truth and the people's right to know?

Laird M. Wilcox

It was precisely Mr. Deitch's point that objectivity is impossible to attain and that advocacy is therefore both more honest and more informative. And what sort of "fairness" is served by instituting a "Crime in the Streets" column, which implies that it has become a normal aspect of community life—like the weather, fashions and the movies? Editors

down from the moon

Austin, Tex.

DEAR SIRS: President Nixon's ill-advised attempts to tie the space program to the war in Vietnam are likely to be as successful as tying a kite to a sinking battleship.

Astronaut Collins has been hired to propagandize for Richard Nixon, but he can only serve to discredit the space program. Emerging from the insulated, hothouse environment necessitated by the Apollo program, Collins has been persuaded by Nixon to accept the preposterous conclusion that he is just the man to set the war critics right. His first encounter with the articulate critics who have studied the disastrous war for years should give him a rather different perspective. How long after that that he allows Nixon to misuse him will depend primarily on how deep he wants to sink the space program. Don W. Allford heard and overheard

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: A tourist who has been a bit bewildered by the Nixon-Agnew line on Vietnam tells of a funny parallel which he found to it on a road in Ireland's midlands. He had struck up acquaintance there with a farmer who was taking a pig to market, and asked him where he was going.

"To Cork sure," replied the farmer.

"But you are headed for Belfast," remarked the surprised tourist.

"Whist, he'll hear ye," whispered the farmer as he hurriedly escalated north with his unsuspecting treasure.

Don Molony

limit on technique

Bath, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: In a recent speech, Vice Admiral Rickover reminded us that there is an important difference between pure science "which is pure thought and can hurt nobody," and technology which is "action" based upon applied science with an enormous potential for injury to man and his en-

(Continued on page 699)

EDITORIALS

Indians and Others

It is axiomatic that war brutalizes the most ordinary and normal man. It is also clear that the nature of the fighting in Vietnam—with no defined battle lines—contributes to the brutalization process. The very nature of the fighting endangers civilians. The concept of "free fire zones" is false, for the zones are seldom if ever really cleared of civilians. Even so, there is an aspect of the Pinkville and similar situations which cannot be fully accounted for by the "war breeds brutalization" thesis.

Raymond R. Coffey, who covered the war in Vietnam for two and a half years, regularly for the Chicago Daily News and occasionally for The Nation, points out that, with exceptions of course, "the most evident and most profound feeling toward the Vietnamese among American GIs is contempt." The South Vietnamese on "our side" are included. "There ain't no gooks on my side" is the way one Marine expressed his feelings to Coffey. Friendly or unfriendly, North or South, the Vietnamese are commonly referred to by such terms of contempt as "gooks," "dinks," "slopes" and similar expressions. Dr. Morton H. Fried, professor of anthropology at Columbia University (also a Nation contributor), reports in a letter to The New York Times that in the course of two or three trips a year to East Asia, he has often heard Americans, both officers and nonofficers, express "the most horrifying opinions of the Asians among whom they were serving. To put it mildly, they did not regard Asians, whether friend or foe, as quite human." In a recent interview with GIs at a veterans' hospital, a reporter for the New York Post collected such statements as this: "One million of them ain't worth one of us." The saddest aspect of these interviews was that some of the veterans quoted were black or Puerto Rican.

How account for this prevalent feeling? It may relate far back to our brutalizing experience with Indians as "the course of empire" moved westward. Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, who was not a particularly bloodthirsty general as generals go, said at Fort Cobb in 1869: "The only good Indian is a dead Indian." On another occasion, when asked if his soldiers had killed Indian women and children, he is said to have replied: "Nits make lice." Over a period of many years, the attitude reflected in such statements became "structured," so to speak, as part of the folklore if not the psyche of many Americans. In how many penny dreadfuls, bad movies, plays and tales of one kind or another has the killing of Indians been equated with the killing of coyotes? The massacre continues on TV, whites killing Indians, Indians killing whites, with the ratio about 10 to 1 in favor of the whites.

The notion that the Indian is not a human being, endlessly repeated, from one generation to the next, is easily transferred to Vietnamese and other Asians (read Mark Twain on the "Heathen in Outer Darkness," which dates from an earlier war in Asia), the counterparts of Indians to many Americans. How long it may take to exorcise this tragic blindness is suggested by the circumstance that Hollywood has only recently produced a film which picures an Indian as a credible human being, Tell Them Willie Boy Is Here. It was written and directed by that fine talent, Abraham Polonsky, who was blacklisted out of the industry for some twenty years. The film comes at an opportune time; it just might help some Americans to understand how and why it is that they think of Vietnamese very much as General Sheridan thought of Indians.

The Larger Issues

The President has said of Song My that "what appears was certainly a massacre" and he added that "under no circumstances was it justified." So Mr. Nixon seems to have little doubt as to what happened. There never was much doubt, at least not after Life printed the color pictures which the professionally meticulous Army photographer had taken, after urging the firing squad to "Hold it!" while he focused on women and children about to be executed. It does not seem to have occurred to him to turn his camera on the firing squad. Such a picture would now be extremely useful.

The victims are dead, the perpetrators may or may not be punished, the most important consideration now is to ascertain the correlations of the massacre with American policy in Vietnam from the beginning. It is in the Army's interest to clear its name as far as possible by probing what happened and making a clean breast of its culpability, but that is not easily done. It may, in fact, be impossible. In his "Capitol Stuff" column for the New York Daily News (December 10) Ted Lewis discusses some of the difficulties. Lieut. Gen. William R. Peers has been assigned by the Army to find out why the massacre was not disclosed within a reasonable time after it occurred. But Peers at the time was acting commander of the I Field Force, to which the soldiers of Song My belonged. It appears that Maj. Gen. Samuel Koster was flying in a helicopter over the killing ground and Captain Medina says that Koster ordered him not to take his company back into "all that mess." But Koster was subordinate to Peers. There's a delicate situation: if there was a cover-up—and there is certainly prima facie evidence of one—could Koster and Peers have been unaware of it?

Moreover, the Peers panel was set up by Army Secretary Resor and Army Chief of Staff Westmoreland. Resor was President Johnson's Army Secretary at the time of the massacre, Westmoreland was U.S. commander in Vietnam. They, Secretary Laird and President Nixon knew about the massacre in August or September, but took no action to investigate the earlier whitewash until November 24, when the basic facts were known to every daily and weekly newspaper reader and every TV viewer.

So who shall investigate? The House Armed Services Committee is in the act, but its chairman, Rep. L. Mendel Rivers, was not convinced (as of December 10) that there had been a massacre. There were piles of dead civilians, sure enough, but: "We didn't see [pictures] of anybody shooting anybody." (Too bad about that Army photographer.) Mr. Rivers' undying love for the Army is one of Washington's most affecting romances.

Sen. John Stennis, chairman of the Senate Armed Serv-

FEB 24
MAR 15

IN THIS ISSUE

December 22, 1969

EDITORIALS

682

ARTICLES

687 Half a Loaf: Washington Confronts the Hungry — Jennifer Cross

689 Franco's Last Deal — Loren Jenkins

692 Ghost Town Vigilantes: The Racial Pallor of Cairo — G. Louis Heath

695 Legitimate Deductions? Conscience and the Income Tax — Ralph S. Rice

697 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

700 Raine: Blake and Tradition — J. Bronowski

701 Bridges (poem) — Karen Swenson

702 Books on Film — Robert Sklar

703 Theatre — Harold Clurman

704 Art Books — Lawrence Alloway

707 Music — David Hamilton

708 Books by Nation Contributors

710 Films — Robert Hatch

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July, the first biweekly period in August and the last biweekly period in December) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION Volume 209 No. 22

ices Committee, must be taken more seriously. He has called for the creation of a Presidential commission, "outside the government and outside the military." President Nixon has indicated that he would consider setting up such a body, but only if the military machinery already in motion should prove inadequate. More to the point is the proposal by a distinguished group of lawyers for an impartial tribunal of retired jurists and former military men "to investigate America's conduct of the Vietnamese War."

And not only that, we would add, but also the inception of the war. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has once again pulled back from the brink in its proposed general investigation of American policy in Southeast Asia. The case for an impartial investigation does not rest solely on the conduct of the war, nor on the Song My we know about and other Song Mys which may emerge. The whole record is studded with ambiguities, contradictions and suspicious circumstances that cry out for clarification. It is on this whole context that the investigation should center, with Song My as the springboard.

'Marked for Extinction'

Those who surmised—or hoped—that the article by L. F. Palmer, Jr., in the July 28 Nation, "Out To Get The Panthers," was an exaggeration may now reconsider their position. It is becoming increasingly apparent that a campaign of repression and assassination is being carried out against the Black Panthers, and that a continuance of this course will see the entire leadership behind bars, or dead. Charles Garry, the white San Francisco lawyer who represents the Panthers, says that so far twenty-eight Panther leaders have been assassinated. Since killings, whether legal or illegal, are usually carried out in what military men call the "fog of battle," one might apply a 50 per cent correction to Garry's claim. But that would still leave fourteen murders, and one would be too many.

The recent affray in Chicago seems conclusive evidence of a police tendency to treat the Panthers as outlaws on whom there is an open season for slaughter. Just before dawn a fourteen-man police detail, armed with side arms, shotguns and at least one submachine gun, knocked on the door of the apartment of Fred Hampton, the Black Panther chief in Illinois. A few minutes later Hampton and Mark Clark, another Panther, were dead, four more Panthers were taken to the hospital with multiple gunshot wounds, and three others were put under arrest. Two policemen were hurt, neither of them seriously.

The military analogy is appropriate. The police had a search warrant, but was it imperative that the search should proceed at the cost of human life? The police claim is that they were fired on when they entered. In military ground operations, when a platoon receives fire the men take cover and the platoon leader and his sergeant decide what to do next. They don't stand up and fight it out in Wild West fashion. If the police were indeed fired on first, they should have withdrawn, tried to get at the occupants of the apartment with tear gas, and used other measures to avoid unnecessary loss of life. Even if this gave the Panthers a chance to get rid of the weapons the police were seeking, it would have been preferable from any humane standpoint, even from the standpoint of law and order, to the slaughter which took place.

That it was slaughter is indicated by the fact that more than thirty-six bullet holes were found in the walls near where the slain men lay, and none adjacent to the police positions. The surviving Panthers are conducting tours of the premises, with particular emphasis on the signs of battle, for crowds of Negroes, and some whites. Edward V. Hanrahan, the State's attorney who organized the operation, brushes off the ballistic evidence. He defends this and other raids "because of the viciousness of the Black Panther Party." Jay Miller, head of the American Civil Liberties Union in Chicago, has said on C.B.S. television that he believes "the Panther leadership is marked for extinction."

Renault Robinson, president of the Afro-American Patrolmen's League, looked over the scene with other black officers and said he did not believe the official police version of the incident. The door was not broken down, so somebody let the police in. If there had been a gun battle, as the police assert, the police would have suffered casualties in such close quarters.

The Black Panthers' rhetoric has been provocative and their displays of firearms foolhardy, but if these assaults continue there will be more trouble, not less. What is needed is a thorough, nationwide investigation, taking in the lawlessness of the authorities as well as any offenses of which the Panthers have been guilty. But most potential investigating agencies are either biased or impotent. The National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, which has a better record than most such bodies, should not be allowed to shut up shop without probing these escalating acts of violence.

Gas Scare

Hermiston, Ore., a quiet farming town of some 5,000 people, lies 7 miles below McNary Dam, on the Columbia River, and about 40 miles south of the giant atomic plant at Richland, Wash. On December 2, the Army announced that all poisonous gases would be removed from Okinawa and stored at the Umatilla Depot, near Hermiston. The announcement added that five shipments from Okinawa would be required to handle the many tons involved, and that the chemical munitions would include lethal GB and VX nerve gases as well as mustard gas of World War I vintage. The decision to bring the gas home from Okinawa was made last summer, after word leaked out that twenty-four Americans had received medical treatment when a container of nerve gas broke open at the U.S. base.

Oregon's first reaction was one of shock. Scarcely anyone in the state had known that the Umatilla facility was a chemical depot. Then people started saying, "But President Nixon said he had ordered the destruction of gases which killed or incapacitated." He had said nothing of the sort but the way he phrased what he did say gave a lot of people the wrong impression.

Shock quickly turned to apprehension. Stockmen around

Hermiston, remembering what had happened in Utah, voiced concern. So did wheat farmers in the area. Conservationists worried about what an accident might do to the Columbia River. Among the concerned Oregonians was Gov. Tom McCall, who said from Washington, D.C., where he was visiting, that he would try to identify the nature of the chemicals and Army plans regarding their disposition in Oregon. "If these findings disclose that the chemicals would be a hazard," he declared, "I will bend every effort to stop the proposed Army action. If unsuccessful, I will utilize every capability I have as chief executive of the state of Oregon to insure our citizens' safety through whatever use of state manpower and equipment may be necessary."

These were strong words for the Governor, who usually lines up firmly behind the Nixon Administration, but they are mild reflections of the anxiety and anger many Oregonians already feel.

Pentagon Hucksterism

There is little new about the outrageous activities by which the armed services try to manipulate public opinion through elaborate and skillfully planned public relations programs. Fred Cook dealt with the subject in "Juggernaut: The Warfare State," a Nation special issue of some years back. But now Senator Fulbright has explored this massive PR effort quantitatively, and his findings fill more than 12 pages (some 24,000 words) of the Congressional Record for December 1. American corporations have never been backward in proclaiming their virtues and trying to make friends and influence people on a mass scale, but surely none is more active in this sphere than the armed services.

Senator Fulbright suggests to Vice President Agnew that here is a fertile field for his crusade against journalists who may seek to analyze and evaluate the pronouncements of government officials. In this case, however, there is no danger that anything adverse to the Nixon Administration will come to light. The group which is seeking to manipulate public opinion consists of some 2,800 publicists, a regiment made up of government employees and military men on active duty, all using government facilities and all financed with taxpayers' money. Last year the Defense Department's PR funds amounted to a trifle under $28 million, representing a tenfold increase over ten years. But since this figure leaves out the cost of using military aircraft, aircraft carriers and other costly equipment, the total cost is certainly much larger.

The Air Force "information objectives," according to Mr. Fulbright, emphasize the need for "unmistakable strategic superiority" and "clearly superior U.S. aerospace forces." With appropriate substitutions, this is also the policy of the other services. In this aspect the services' PR programs aim to reach the public with the military's insatiable appetite for more materiel, and to show that unless they get all they ask for the national security will be imperiled. The arms suppliers, and the quasi-civilian associations that promote the interests of each of the services gladly support these efforts.

The Navy disburses about $10 million a year for PR propaganda. It has produced some 850 films for public use, including one titled Why Vietnam? It seeks to gain the "understanding and support" of the public for the goals of "modern ships, aircraft and equipment throughout the Navy," and points to growing Soviet naval strength, which reaches especially threatening proportions whenever budget time rolls around. Support is also recruited with cruises, including twice-a-year junkets to Hawaii for "top media executives."

An important aspect of Pentagon PR activity is speechmaking by general officers. Gen. Lewis Walt, assistant commandant of the Marine Corps, is said to recite the same basic speech twice or more a week before Rotary Clubs and other gatherings. In October he told the state convention of the Florida Red Cross that those who oppose the Vietnamese War must bear a part of the responsibility for the deaths of 10,000 American soldiers in the past year.

Army Chief of Staff William C. Westmoreland may not have been very successful while he was in command in Vietnam, but as a speechmaker he has no peer in the services. Between August 7, 1968, and the end of May 1969, he totaled fifty-nine separate engagements. Handsome and self-assured, his accomplishments in a PR capacity may well outweigh whatever he contributes as Chief of Staff.

The GIs who are trying to propagandize against the war by issuing newsletters and operating coffeehouses may well envy the brass, spending millions and lending the prestige of their insignia and medals to the continuance of the war. And, of course, a distinction must be made between GIs, most of whom were drafted into the service or who volunteered to avoid conscription, and career officers, most of whom serve of their own volition. Career officers are not "muzzled," as General Walker contended. Many of them, like Major Rowe (see "The New Politicians," editorial, The Nation December 15), speak with the evident approval and authority of the Pentagon. They have established channels through which to communicate their views; they testify before Congressional committees and regularly brief the Secretary of Defense and the President. Retired officers opposed to the war, such as General Shoup and Admiral True, speak now essentially as private citizens. What the officers on active duty are doing in this gigantic boondoggle is something quite different—and ominous. They are gradually breaking down the American tradition that the military should have no role in politics.

Cutting Back on Health

Every businessman understands that research is vital to industrial progress and future corporate profits. Research is at least equally essential to biomedical progress. The bulk of health research money comes from the government. At its peak, health research never exceeded 0.3 per cent of gross national product. GNP has averaged $880 billion over the past eighteen months, producing the figure of $2.64 billion annually for health,

The Nation customarily publishes 48 issues a year, in past years skipping four weeks in July and August. This year, however, only three of the summer issues were dropped, so that the fourth might be omitted during the Christmas-New Year period. Accordingly, the issue which would normally be distributed in the last week of 1969, and dated January 5, 1970, will not appear.

or roughly half of what has been spent for the "conquest" of space.

Or compare the health budget with the military budget, which is declining from $80 billion in 1969 to a projected annual rate of about $77 billion in the spring of 1970. Health research would run at about 3 per cent of "defense," which has led us into such insane ventures as the despoliation of Vietnam.

That is bad enough, but on the plea of curbing inflation, the health section of the Health, Education and Welfare budget has been cut by an as yet undetermined percentage that may be as high as 20 per cent. (See editorial, "The Wrong Place To Cut" The Nation, October 13.) Nineteen organizations, including the American Medical Association, the American Heart Association and the American Cancer Society, have formed an Ad Hoc Committee on the Nation's Health Crisis for the purpose of adding $640 million to the present House appropriation for the HEW budget for medical education, research and delivery of medical care.

On behalf of the committee, Dr. Sidney Farber, retiring president of the American Cancer Society, suggests that the effect of the projected cuts may be "catastrophic." Dr. Campbell Moses, medical director of the American Heart Association, says that controlling inflation by cutting health research is equivalent to "balancing the budget by sacrificing human lives." Dr. Michael E. DeBakey, the Houston heart surgeon, says that unless the cuts are restored we can expect "a paralysis of our health system, with fewer doctors . . . and with little new knowledge or progress in delivery of health services."

Burning for Freedom

It was logical that the Massachusetts Young Americans for Freedom should have chosen December 7 for a pro-Vietnamese War rally: What could be more fitting, YAF tacticians reasoned, than an appeal to "Tell it to Hanoi" on the anniversary of Pearl Harbor? Also, they speculated, a rally on that date was certain to attract a number of American Legionnaires, VFW members and their families.

Only 2,500 turned out to march to Boston Common, where, six weeks before, 100,000 had urged, "Give peace a chance." The numbers game may be misleading, however. If anything the paucity of the crowd affirms rather than disputes Administration contentions that the majority is silent. If Boston is any gauge, Nixon's people do prefer to sit at home and wait breathlessly for a return to their brand of win-the-war normalcy, all the while viewing phenomena like last month's Washington demonstration as aberrations, the games of freaks.

With 15,000 members, YAF is the largest national right-wing campus organization. In addition to loudly and frequently denouncing critics of the war, YAF grapples with a whole spectrum of touchy issues which are not, strictly speaking, war-related: "Issues Papers" distributed on Boston Common called Social Security "a fraud on the young," East-West trade "national suicide," and the minimum wage "a crime against the Negro."

The list of speakers at the rally gave some idea of the kind of support YAF depends upon to set the Republic right again: Nguyen Truong, third secretary of the Vietnamese delegation to Washington; a Pueblo veteran; the Massachusetts liquor licensing commissioner, Albert "Dapper" O'Neil. L. Mendel Rivers and Spiro Agnew had been invited too, but both sent regrets.

The apple-pie simplicity of the candlelight affair was shattered, though, when it came to wind things up. After a rendition of the Star-Spangled Banner, the M.C. announced the finale. A pair of burly Vietnam veterans strode to the platform and unfurled a Vietcong flag, which standard was roundly booed by the crowd. After a short speech, one of the veterans set the flag afire. It was a ritual sacrifice akin to those rites whereby primitive man seeks the favor of his gods, an eerie conclusion to an evening arranged by those neat, tough-minded, career-oriented Young Americans for Freedom.

Mitchell's 'Law and Order'

Lawyers working out of the Washington (D.C.) Research Project, a legal aid group, have filed suit against Attorney General John Mitchell on behalf of 150 black complainants in seven Southern states, alleging that he has acted unconstitutionally by failing to enforce the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling in Alexander v. Holmes. The Holmes ruling ordered an end to the "all deliberate speed" formula and required desegregation "at once"; the suit was filed because the Justice Department failed to take action in those cases in which it is the sole party to the case, and which the Court did not specifically mention in its order.

Generally, a specific Court order such as the one in Holmes is sufficient guidance for the government to take action in similarly situated cases. In instances where the United States is the sole representative of the plaintiff to a school case, its inaction blocks further relief for black school children and their parents and is a clear indication that, in the words of the lawyers, "there is no intention" on the part of the present Administration to enforce the law.

The suit promises evidence that staff-prepared papers for action in the government cases have been blocked by high Justice officials. It seeks a summary declaratory judgment that the Attorney General is acting unconstitutionally. The hope is that if such a judgment is issued, the government will be both legally and morally bound to enforce the law. At this point, that may be a forlorn hope.

Washington Confronts the Hungry

JENNIFER CROSS
Miss Cross has written a consumer book on the food industry, The Jolly Green Giant, which will be published shortly by Indiana University Press. It developed from earlier articles published in The Nation.

Washington

How much money and what kind of political power will it take to feed the hungry in America—to insure that the 25 million poorest citizens get sufficient food, and that everybody has an adequate diet? Few of the 3,500 delegates to the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health, which met from December 2 to 5, had the slightest doubt that the job could be done properly only by a drastic reversal of the national priorities. Their list of key recommendations added up to a virtual blueprint for a social revolution to end poverty that would probably cost as much as we are now spending on defense.

The delegates asked the President to declare hunger a state of emergency, and to free sufficient funds to feed all needy people this winter. They asked for a guaranteed annual income of $5,500 per family of four; an expansion of the food stamp and commodity surplus program to all counties; free lunches and breakfasts for all children; and a transfer of all hunger and nutrition programs from the Department of Agriculture to Health, Education and Welfare. They also outlined a huge number of back-up programs (final drafts to be ready by December 25) to improve the food supply, to increase health care and surveillance, to provide nutrition education, to protect consumers, and to involve the public, particularly the poor, more actively in planning and executing such programs.

The astonishing thing about these suggestions is that they were made by a middle-class gathering, only slightly to the left of Center. They were a mixed bag of housewives, community organizers, nutrition specialists, teachers, students, toxicologists, food industry men and nuns. Many had arrived in a state of gloom generated by advance press comment implying that internal feuds at the White House and lack of Presidential commitment would turn the proceedings into a farce, and waste $400,000 of the taxpayers' money, not to mention a further $500,000 in foundation contributions that would have been better spent on food for the poor.

The conference had been set up on such short notice that few delegates had had time to read, let alone digest, all the advance reports of the twenty-six panels and eight voluntary task forces. Moreover, they were poorly briefed because of disagreements among the organizer, nutritionalist Dr. Jean Mayer, the White House conservatives, and some radical community groups on exactly why the conference had been called. No one was quite certain whether the group was supposed to advise President Nixon on how to spend the $1.3 billion in food-program money already appropriated, to plan the modest increase he might be expected to appropriate for fiscal 1971, or to say what, regardless of cost, the situation required.

After three days of high-pressure debate, delegates had been won over to the slogan "Bread now!" Their conversion was effected by the straggling efforts of a coalition of activists, all burning with moral commitment and impelled by a large professional stake in the hunger business: jobs, reputations, or an obligation not to return home to their supporters without a bird in the hand. These comprised the Community Action Task Force, representing more than seventy organizations, a small radical group including a pediatrician, a California rural legal assistance attorney and a Nader raider; and by the National Welfare Rights Organization, a caucus of minority groups representing blacks, Chicanos, Indians, Puerto Ricans and Appalachians. Aligned with this faction was John Kramer, hard-hitting executive director of the National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition; and two back-room politicians: William Smith, counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Hunger and Human Needs (the McGovern committee), and Robert Choate, assistant to Dr. Mayer and the Ralph Nader of the hunger movement.

One tactic used by the militants was to make the kindhearted and well-fed delegates feel very guilty to be talking about hunger while tucking away a $40-a-day expense account at the moderately opulent Sheraton Park Hotel. They were urged to fast, or to live on a welfare diet, give money, turn in their $18.30-a-day meal tickets; they were bombarded with photographs of starving children, and with such slogans as "the poor can't afford cottage cheese with ketchup." Underlying the emotional pitch lay a threat that the poor would go on causing trouble until something was done. Fanny Lou Hamer, an NAACP delegate, harangued a gathering of some 2,000 in her revival meeting style: "You are scared to death, white America, because you think we might do to you what you have been doing to us!"

While delegates had their heartstrings pulled, the hunger politicians were busy reminding each group that the main purpose of the conference ought to be a discussion of how to end poverty and hunger. Panels were urged to vote on the short list of priorities before getting down to their particular business and possibly losing their sense of direction. John Kramer and William Smith also briefed some 200 people, who then dutifully trooped up to Capitol Hill to lobby for or against some critical legislation. Primed with statistics they visited the House Agriculture Committee to plead for the Senate-passed McGovern-Javits food stamp reform bill (S.2547) and urged the Senate Agriculture Committee to support the Talmadge school lunch bill (S.2548), which could provide an extra $100 million in free or reduced price lunches. They also called on their Congressmen, asking them to kill the Green-Quie amendment to the 1969 Economic Opportunity Act, which even more than the Murphy amendment would effectively stifle the OEO by putting it under control of the states.

Thanks to all this activity, spokesmen dropping in from the Administration got a lukewarm reception. When President Nixon reiterated his intention to "put an end to hunger in America itself for all time," and then asked the conference to support his meager income maintenance and food stamp reform bills, many delegates felt their intelligence had been insulted. How, they wondered, had he the nerve to offer a guaranteed annual income of $1,600 for a family of four ($2,400 with stamps) when everyone present knew that $5,500 was the minimum? Or to suggest a food stamp reform that would provide less coverage than the McGovern-Javits bill ($610 million instead of $750 million)? How could he talk about "moral imperative" and the Administration's "responsibility" to end hunger, while behind the scenes he was using his influence to kill every one of the more liberal pieces of legislation the conference supported?

Few people present retained much hope that the Administration had substantial plans to meet this country's tremendous hunger. Even while the conference was in progress, Arthur F. Burns, counselor to President Nixon and chairman-designate of the Federal Reserve Board, said in New York that expensive government programs to solve social problems would risk economic disaster. Even the food stamp and school lunch bills favored by the conference are running into the usual roadblocks in the House and Senate Agricultural Committees, and stand a chance only if people exert a good deal more political pressure, or accept the traditional trade-off for continued farm subsidies.

Which tactical approach is likely to bring the better result—the direct confrontation which the radicals advocate, on the ground that hunger is the most pressing social and moral issue of our time; or polite but hard bargaining through usual political channels? The conference used both methods, though (despite a number of threatened crises) it ended with the politicians in control. Six sober citizens went to see the President with a shopping list of priorities for an immediate end to hunger. When he stalled, they did not press him very hard. "We had to counter the impression that all this conference was interested in was theatrics," explained Fr. Robert McEwen, S.J., chairman of the Consumer Task Force, to one of the angry and disappointed radicals. In short, the group was advised to cool it.

They did not, however, come away totally empty-handed. President Nixon promised during the conference to see to it that the food stamp program is installed in all 307 counties which continue to refuse it by June 1970. Also the maximum allowance will be increased from the present $65 to $100 a month to the limit of existing funds. He promised to investigate all that could legally be done to feed the hungry by Christmas—which could include release of surplus commodities, use of OEO emergency funds, or even the declaration of a state of emergency under the 1969 California Disaster Act (which despite its name could apply to the whole country). He also undertook to study the conference findings, to instruct the appropriate government departments to review them, and if necessary, to follow up with another meeting in one year's time.

A major complication is the negative atttitude shown by Daniel P. Moynihan, another counselor who had the President's ear throughout the whole conference planning period. He fought a running battle with Mayer to try to steer the proceedings away from the more urgent but politically embarrassing subject of existing hunger and malnutrition toward the calmer waters of a ten-year national nutrition policy which would not require immediate Presidential commitment. Moynihan was reportedly so angered by the failure of the conference to come to heel by putting their seal of approval on the Administration's plans (particularly on his own pet projects for income maintenance), or even to give the President a big hand, that he tried to delete the radical priorities list from the conference recommendation.

Action between now and Christmas will depend on the outcome of the Moynihan-Mayer struggle, with the possibility of intervention by a more sympathetic though uncommitted third party, John Erlichman, the President's assistant for domestic affairs. The easiest way for the Administration to fulfill its promises would be to use the California Disaster Act to release funds for the immediate issue of surplus commodities, a possibility which Erlichman is now investigating. This would also solve a problem for the Department of Agriculture which is committed to forcing food stamps into hold-out counties without having the legal power to do so unless a state of emergency is declared.

Louisville Courier-Journal

"Where? Here? Goodness Knows I Can't See It"

Quite apart from emergency action on hunger, the conference may also prove a milestone in the intelligent discussion of some longer-term consumer affairs. As food company presidents, top scientists and housewives met, clashed and began to talk business, they developed fresh insights into one another's point of view. Substantial agreement was reached on some important measures to improve food safety. Among these are the need to control food additives by reviewing the FDA's GRAS list (chemicals generally recognized as safe, but which may never have been formally evaluated), and to amend the Delaney clause, which produced the recent ban on cyclamates. In the next few months there may be a move to change the law to allow the enrichment of staple foods, such as rice, flour and baked goods, which will primarily benefit the poor, but may also improve nutrition throughout the whole snack-loving, starch-eating nation. The present unsatisfactory labeling situation may be studied once again, either by the Food & Drug Administration on its own initiative, or under the terms of the Fair Packaging and Labeling Act. An attempt may be made to get more information on the labels, as by listing all ingredients and then the percentages in which they occur. There is also likely to be a more concerted push for unit pricing, but that depends somewhat on the experience in New York City, where it will be introduced in February.

The fight will be long and hard, probably as long as the five-year hassle over the Packaging and Labeling Act. But at least industry came away with a healthier respect for the political seriousness of the consumer movement, and with the chastening feeling that people are better informed and more suspicious than they had thought. For their part, the consumer delegates realized that some industry representatives were offering them a dangerous trade-off, pledging cooperation in the hunger fight, but asking in return for the relaxation of many marketing standards. They also realized that many of the reforms they pushed so airily would be extremely costly. There are signs on both sides that future bargaining may be more sophisticated.

FRANCO'S LAST DEAL

LOREN JENKINS

Mr. Jenkins is a special correspondent for Newsweek in Spain. His articles have also appeared in New Statesman, Atlantic Monthly and Jeune Afrique.

Madrid

Almost from the inception of Franco's dictatorship over Spain in 1939, there has been no more fertile topic in Spanish conversation than speculation as to his successor. Talk of who, or more to the point, what, would follow the Caudillo has obsessed supporters and critics alike for more than thirty years. At the heart of the discussion, of course, has been the uncertainty in many quarters—including some close to Franco himself—about whether his peculiar personal brand of dictatorship could be institutionalized for posterity, or whether his departure from the Spanish political scene would again usher in a period of political instability. All the answers are not yet in, though the mystery of the immediate future has finally been unveiled. Despite the fact that the aging dictator rules on, the post-Franco period has already dawned.

The transition began last July when the Generalissimo finally ended the regime's longest guessing game by formally investing the bland, 31-year-old Prince Juan Carlos de Borbon y Borbon, grandson of Spain's discredited last king, as the legal heir to the chieftaincy of state and the future king of Spain when Franco either retires or dies. At the end of October, the transition was confirmed by the most sweeping cabinet shuffle in the history of Franco's reign. "The Caudillo is getting old," one official commented. "This is certainly the last cabinet he intends to name and it is his vision of the team he wants to rule on after the succession."

The government shake-up had been in the wind at least since 1966, when a carefully staged plebiscite gave the country a new constitution, or Organic Law of State, as it is officially called, which laid down the skeletal guidelines for the institutionalization of the regime. What caught almost all the cabinet ministers by surprise, however, was the cold-blooded thoroughness of the reshuffle. After three decades of keeping his mixed bag of heirs guessing as to who would inherit the property, Franco made his will public. The strategy of balancing all the elements of his support—the old guard militarists, the conservative Catholics, the neo-Fascist Falange and the technocrats of Opus Dei—in one vast coalition of the Right was scrapped. Instead, Franco entrusted the government to one group—the ambitious members and allies of Opus Dei, the powerful Catholic lay order whose faithful already play a dominant role in the Spanish economy.

Almost all the big names in the past government were unceremoniously dropped. Out went Fernando María Castiella, the nationalistic Foreign Minister who framed Spain's extortionary demands in exchange for accepting U.S. bases in Spain. Out went the mercurial Manuel Fraga Iribarne, the aggressive Minister of Information and Tourism who had relaxed press censorship and presided over Spain's exploding tourist boom. Out went Jose Solís Ruiz, who had run both the government-controlled unions and the National Movement, the Falange-dominated sole political party. The tough boss of the police, 80-year-old Interior Minister General Camilo Alonso Vega, was also dropped (because of age) as were all three of the cabinet's military ministers (army, air force and navy).

To replace these men and others, Franco chose a crop of younger, mostly post-Civil War professionals in their 40s and 50s, half of whom are either members of, or closely allied with, the Opus Dei. "This was an Opus Dei coup d'état, a palace revolution if you will," one well-known Spanish editor said. "The Opus members have been trying to seize control of the government for years. They have finally succeeded." While that is perhaps an overstatement, based on the antipathy for Opus Dei felt in many quarters of Spanish life, there is no doubt that the cabinet is tailored for the influential Minister of Economic Planning, Laureando López Rodó, 48, and the new Foreign Minister (and former Minister of Industry) Gregorio López Bravo, 45, both of whom are holdovers from the previous cabinet. López Rodó and López Bravo are avowed members of Opus Dei (as is a third member of the new government, Housing Minister Vicente Mortes Alfonso), while at least seven other ministers in the nineteen-member cabinet have links of one sort or another with the order. The strong man in the cabinet remains the enigmatic Vice President, Admiral Luis Carrero Blanco, López Rodó's patron and an old-time crony of Franco, who is expected to be named Premier when the Caudillo finally decides to disengage.

Chief among the dispossessed is the old Falange, which has always thought it owned the franchise by virtue of its fanatical support of Francisco Franco through the Civil War and the lean years that followed. But the blue-shirted Falange has been mortgaging its claims for years by clinging to the good old days, and the present reshuffle finally declared its bankruptcy. In nostalgic recognition of past service, three ministries were left in the hands of Falange members; but only one of these, Interior, is significant and all three Falange ministers are a world apart from the old-guard zealots who used to strut about the government ministries as if they were personal fiefs. Having lost the favor of its master, the Falange is left with no powerful voices in the cabinet.

The shake-up brought to an end a bitter internal struggle for power between the dated, aging Falange and the more modern-looking Opus Dei ministers, who were first brought into the cabinet in the late 1950s with orders to salvage the nation's almost bankrupt economy. The subsequent rivalry has had more to do with style and personal jealousies than with ideology. Both groups believe in Franco's authoritarianism, though the Opus interlopers seek by refinement to make it more acceptable to the rest of Western Europe and the United States, on whose good will Spain's economy must depend. So intense had the battle become in the past year that the cabinet was virtually paralyzed, unable to enact such long overdue reforms as the restructuring of the government unions, the modernization of the educational system, and the creation of political associations within the amorphous National Movement. The broader fight was distilled into personal struggles between the strongest and most influential ministers: López Rodó and López Bravo on one side, Fraga and Solís on the other; while such an independent-minded man as Castiella sought to play out his obsessive fantasies of imperial grandeur all by himself.

Because the Opus Dei has drawn heavily on the younger professional and managerial classes, its members in the government have gained the reputation of being nonideological pragmatists, or "technocrats," hostile to reactionary cronyism of the old order. The situation, however, is not that clear-cut, for in practice the Opus Dei ministers have shown themselves to be true believers in Francoism. To think of them as a liberal element emerging from within a decaying dictatorship—as much of the world press has done—is to miss the point. For the Opus Dei ministers are conservative capitalists to the core, a fact that no doubt explains the satisfaction with which U.S. Government officials have greeted the Opus take-over. Their ties and orientation are with the business and financial communities dominated by so many of their fellows in the lay order.

The much touted liberalism of Opus Dei ministers relates only to their efforts to perfect and refine Spanish capitalism; it has nothing to do with political reform. Since their incorporation into the government in the late 1950s, the Opus ministers have indeed moved to put the Spanish economy on a more businesslike basis, bringing in more than $1 billion in American capital, seeking association with the Common Market, and trying to modernize Spanish industrial development. In the political sphere, however, they have shown an unflagging devotion to the authoritarian principles of their patron.

Indeed, the modest efforts to advance liberalism in Spain came only from those now scrapped: Castiella, Fraga and Solís. Castiella, in an off moment from his foreign policy obsessions, almost single-handedly pushed through a religious liberty bill; Fraga liberalized press censorship, and Solís sought to free the unions from government control (albeit for his own political ends). "The irony has been that the ministers most generally associated with the old order have been the only ones to formulate measures to liberalize the system," a government official close to the cabinet said. "In almost every case it has been the so-called liberal technocrats who have opposed them." Though the religious liberty and press bills were passed several years ago, all recent reform legislation has been stalled. The political association bill, an ambiguous measure that might permit a guarded development of political groups (though not parties), has yet to be reported out of the cabinet. When the long-pending labor reform bill emerged from the cabinet recently, it was found to be almost indistinguishable from the present labor law, which keeps the unions in a vertical strait jacket firmly under the control of the government and the nation's capitalist interests. The old order, despite its Fascist origins, has found itself returning hesitantly to some of the social concerns of Falange founder José Antonio Primo de Rivera. The new order, on the other hand, appears to have decided that maximum profits and capital regeneration can best be attained by holding to the rigid controls Francoism imposes on the citizenry. Business runs more smoothly in the absence of active unions and political organizations.

The fact that Franco's most trusted adviser, Vice President Carrero Blanco, is also under the sway of the Opus ministers obviously was a vital factor in his decision to will them his estate. (Indeed, many of the disenchanted maintain that Franco is already beyond the point where he can make such crucial decisions; that he has simply left it all up to Carrero.) The investiture of Prince Juan Carlos in July was the first sign that the scales had tipped to Opus Dei. Its members had been his most ardent supporters in recent years, no doubt on the theory that, with Juan Carlos as a figurehead chief of state, they would have complete freedom to run the government as they saw fit.

The highly sensitive public relations men of the order are at pains to point out that Opus Dei is in no way a political organization and that its members act as individuals in temporal affairs. "Opus Dei has nothing to do with politics," founder Monsignor Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer told an interviewer recently. "It is absolutely foreign to any political, economic, ideological or cultural tendency or group. . . . Its aims are exclusively spiritual and apostolic." The 67-year-old Monsignor Escrivá, who now directs the worldwide order from Rome, is no doubt stating official policy: there is no international Opus Dei conspiracy to make Spain the personal barony of the order.

Juhl, P.I.B. (Copenhagen)

"No Signorina—the Ventriloquist Makes all the Replies!"

What is also true, however, is that a major part of the Opus Dei's 22,000 Spanish members are bound together by a similar university-educated, middle-class background and a common, Opus-instilled belief that they are a new elite who will lead Spain along the path of modern Catholic virtue. This, when mixed with the personal ambitions of some of its more prominent members, has led to the order's rapid rise among all the important sectors of Spanish life. Zeal, hard work, technical proficiency and money have brought the Opus Dei to the fore. And because its members are held together by Opus Dei's spiritual beliefs, as well as by constant communication with one another within the order, it has proved almost impossible to separate the acts of its members from their affiliation with the order. Though the order holds that man is split between his spiritual beliefs and his work on earth, few Spaniards are willing to accept the division, especially now that Opus Dei members dominate their government. "What would you say if you suddenly looked up and saw that half of your government and economy was dominated by Jesuits or Christian Scientists or Masons?" asked a Madrid University professor. "Could you really say it was a coincidence?"

The new style of post-Francoism, however, has already warmed Western hearts. Because the Opus members are so concerned with business and growth, they know that the Castiella type of nationalistic foreign policy must go. At all cost, the new government intends to appear more liberal, modern and Western. López Bravo has already muted Spain's claims to Gibraltar in favor of a concentration on getting Spain accepted into the Common Market. (Negotiations are now under way on a six-year trade arrangement which might lead to eventual association, if all works out well.) On the American front, Spain is expected to drop its stiff demands for the continued presence of U.S. military bases when negotiations are renewed next year. (That the U.S. Congress may decide to cancel the bases accord next September is a possibility not mentioned in the present mood of cooperative euphoria.)

On the home front, no change is expected, though the more glaring examples of repression, especially in the Basque country and the universities, may be muted (not abandoned) in order to present a better face to the West. The opposition is too splintered and ineffective to mount any real challenges in the immediate future. The once powerful underground workers' commissions, which made the labor front so hot for the government only a year ago, were badly broken by the arrest and harassment of most of their militants during last January's state of emergency. The nation's major campuses remain under virtual martial law, with policemen almost outnumbering students. Little opposition can be expected from the young.

Thus the only effective challenge to Opus Dei dominance of the post-Franco era may come from the parties they so mercilessly dispossessed. Indeed, it could be that in his attempt to find the one group which would provide a stable, coordinated team to govern after he leaves, Franco has opened the chance for the instability and political revival he so abhors. By giving all to the Opus Dei, Franco may have sent the Falange and other anti-Opus elements in his entourage beyond the pale, but nevertheless left them with enough force to be a factor in the future. They can perhaps use the National Movement and the official unions, which they still control, to make things difficult for the new-style Francoists. And a man as dynamic and politically ambitious as the 48-year-old Fraga is not likely to take defeat with humility. It is already reliably reported that he has turned down the ambassadorship to Washington in favor of returning to his post as political science professor at Madrid University. The rumor is already throughout Spain that he will try to rally the opposition.

Be that as it may, the future of post-Franco Spain still remains ultimately in the hands of the army, which first ushered in the dictatorship. While it has been increasingly depoliticized under Franco's careful eye, the fact that his regime was set up as a military dictatorship cannot be overlooked, not even by the Opus. The army in Spain has ever since the Civil War reserved the right to be the final arbiter of the system; indeed, it is constitutionally charged to "guarantee the defense of the [Francoist] institutional system." Franco, as well as his top generals, have made it plain that this defense is to be both external and internal.

The future of Opus Dei's post-Francoism, then, will depend more than anything on how well they can satisfy the army that they are indeed Franco's spiritual heirs. If a political squabble between the Opus and a solidified anti-Opus opposition gets out of hand, the army will dictate who is to govern. And it could well be that neither side will get its desire. The example of Greece has escaped few Spaniards, and the inexperienced Juan Carlos, when he becomes king, will look very much like his brother-in-law, King Constantine—especially to the military. And as Franco's old guard slips from the saddle, the judicial role of the army will fall into the hands of today's colonels. Whatever the changes, democracy, it would seem, is not on the Spanish horizon.

GHOST TOWN VIGILANTES

THE RACIAL PALLOR OF CAIRO

G. LOUIS HEATH

Mr. Heath is an assistant professor of education at Illinois State University. He is the editor of, and a contributor to, The High School Rebel: Readings in Adolescent School Rebellion.

Cairo, a town of 8,500, 45 per cent black, stands at the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. This is the southernmost point of Illinois and in Cairo prejudice is often translated into action. Intense enmity between white and black has been a historical constant here; confrontation and violence have frequently cracked the veneer of community order, particularly since World War II. Recently, hostilities have escalated. Fire bombings and snipings are common occurrences, and several buildings have been burned to the ground (if a destroyed business has hired Negroes, the suspicion is that the arsonists were white). A few blacks have been wounded, and at least one has been killed. There are incessant threats, implicit or overt, mostly from whites. Considerable numbers of machine guns and other weapons have been sold to both blacks and whites.

Black militancy is the current spark to Cairo's traditional powder keg. The blacks, particularly the younger ones who have not been assimilated into the ante-bellum Southern mores (Cairo lies south of Richmond), are challenging established authority relationships, whereby whites proclaim decisions and "nigras" shuffle off to church to stifle their hatred of "the Man" by praying to the Lord. Blacks, organized in the United Front, are now assertively asking for a greater role in city government, more Negro policemen and jobs in the businesses which they until recently patronized, but now boycott. They are defying white paternalism as fervidly as they once chopped cotton.

As late as the summer of 1966, Negroes in the three southern Illinois counties, Alexander, Pulaski and Massac, were chained to low-paying cotton-chopping jobs by the seasonal withdrawal of welfare payments. Each spring the Alexander County office of the Illinois Public Aid Commission notified Cairo Negroes who received aid to dependent children that payments were to be terminated because seasonal labor was available. The labor was in the cotton fields of southern Illinois, southwestern Kentucky and southeastern Missouri, from May to September at 50c an hour. William H. Robinson, a black member of the Illinois Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reported in 1966: "There is evidence of collusion between the large farmers of the three states, the public aid department, and the Illinois State Employment Service to keep the Negroes in a form of slavery by paying them slave wages. When workers return to welfare rolls after the cotton-picking season, they are put on general assistance which pays less than regular welfare payments." The Illinois Advisory Committee's findings stimulated a larger investigation and the practice has been abolished.

The white community has been unable to deal with the new black militancy on any rational level. Their major response, following a black civil disturbance in July 1967 has been to organize a white vigilante group, the White Hats, allegedly "to protect our families, our homes, and our property," but actually to defend ingrained values and practices against the onslaught of the new movement. The present State's attorney for Alexander County, Peyton Berbling, was one of the organizers and even served as an officer. The group is now defunct, but the fact that a man who was once an agent of a terrorist organization could become the foremost representative of the law in Cairo says much about the quality of its justice. The White Hats armed 600 citizens, and drilled conspicuously in the downtown park, wearing white pith helmets. They were deputized as sheriff's deputies and deputy coroners. Cairo businessman Philip D. Marsden once claimed, "I could get my dog deputized in this town." The White Hats periodically participated in target practice and crisis alerts.

The White Hats disbanded last spring under pressure from the state government, particularly from Lieut. Gov. Paul Simon. The Apprehension of Horse Thieves and Other Felons Act, the legislation granting legal status to vigilante groups, was repealed at the same time. But a new group, United Citizens for Community Action (UCCA), has sprung up, and the Negro community views it as the same thing. One can even hear Negro children near the all-black Pyramid Courts housing project jumping rope and singing: "Where have all the White Hats gone? Not far away. Where have all the White Hats gone? They have gone underground to the UCCA."

The United Citizens practice a modern-day vigilantism. Equipped with two-way radios, they cruise the Negro district at night, sometimes with shotguns and rifles protruding from car windows. Both blacks and whites monitor civilian band radio in the evenings. (Preston Ewing, Jr., president of the local NAACP chapter, was until recently a radio and TV repair shop owner.) The messages remind one of the tactics of warfare: "We're close to Niggertown now. The guns are in the back. Our station will be about 100 yards behind Niggertown." "O.K., I'm coming down Walnut now. I'm staying here on this side of the tracks, so if any make any move out of Niggertown, I can handle it." Other conversation focuses upon contingency tactics: "We can roll a string of boxcars in behind Pyramid Courts for cover, if we need 'em. Cuz the city cut down all the brush between the tracks and the Courts, there won't be no cover outside. We can pin 'em down inside." (On one occasion the blacks of Pyramid Courts cornered a guerrilla band of whites on a nearby levee.) This sort of dialogue is not unusual on citizen band radio in Cairo.

The black community organized the United Front in response to the vigilante threat. It also is armed, but it has sought to de-emphasize weapons, realizing that it would be the weaker side in any showdown. Thus, when an AWOL Cairo Negro soldier mysteriously "hung himself" in the local jail and an elderly black man was beaten to death, the blacks didn't make major issues of their suspicions, fearing a mass reprisal upon Pyramid Courts, residence for 2,000 of Cairo's 3,800 Negroes. Instead, the United Front has decided that the way to improve the Negro's position in the town is to wield as much economic power as possible. Accordingly, it declared a boycott of white business. It has been honored by all the blacks, who now buy at a black cooperative store established just north of Cairo or go 38 miles to Cape Girardeau, Mo. For some white merchants business has dropped by two-thirds. "Hell," griped a motel owner, "I'd be out of business if it weren't for the state police and newsmen staying here. I'm losing a lot of money." A real estate man claimed he had sold only two houses since last January. "Me and my family, we're moving to Florida. It's got to be better there. My God, what do they want? They're on aid. They don't work." "I'm losing $150 a day," complained another businessman. "I'm a small businessman and that's too much to lose."

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)

Refusal to patronize local business works a drastic effect upon Cairo, which is in a depression. Of eighty-six Illinois communities with populations ranging from 5,000 to 10,000, Cairo ranks first in family units earning less than $3,000 a year, the income level defined by the federal government as the minimum for subsistence. Some 44 per cent of Cairo's families are below it. Cairo is second among the eighty-six towns in substandard housing: 45.8 per cent of all families reside in such dwellings. Since 1960 only nine new houses have been built and more than 200 have been torn down. There has been no public housing construction since 1927. Cairo is third in unemployment with a 9.4 per cent rate. For blacks, the rate is twice as high and runs to 20 per cent for the Negro males. Cairo is part of the Alexander-Pulaski Counties' depressed area, where Senator McGovern's Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs found considerable hunger and malnutrition. Cairo and Alexander County rate at or near the top for Illinois in high school dropouts, premature births, infant mortality, disease, aid to dependent children and old age pensions.

Part of Cairo's problem is a great loss of population; it has shrunk to one-third of its 1920 figure. Those who leave are disproportionately the young, the potential leadership, which Cairo desperately needs if it is not to become a ghost town. Many whites display bumper stickers proclaiming "Cairo—Love It or Leave It." The young, black and white, have taken the bitter advice, emigrating to St. Louis and Chicago, abandoning Cairo to become "an ugly sepulchre, a grave uncheered by any gleam of promise," as Charles Dickens described it during his visit in 1842.

The tax base has diminished with the population decline, but the percentage of the population on welfare has not—in fact, it has increased. The minuscule population influx has been composed primarily of poor whites from Kentucky, Missouri and Tennessee, who contribute little to the tax base. They compete with blacks for low-paying jobs; many have become resentful welfare recipients. Their presence heightens racial tension.

Father Gerald Montroy, since 1968 representative in Cairo of the Belleville, Ill., Catholic Diocese (all of southern Illinois), referred to by Cairo whites as the "white nigger"; and Rev. Charles Koen, a black leader of the United Front, have advised the state government that major violence lurks just below the ruffled surface. (The Reverend Koen was a controversial leader of the Black Liberators in St. Louis and East St. Louis in 1967 and 1968. The press has referred to him as an "extreme militant.") They have requested Governor Ogilvie to intervene with a long-term scheme for peace, rather than to continue treating the symptoms of basic problems as though they were isolated emergencies. They have even asked the Governor to declare Cairo a disaster area, but Ogilvie thought that unnecessary.

However, when the Cairo merchants began to feel the pinch of the boycott (six had liens on their businesses), President Nixon declared the part of Southern Illinois which includes Cairo an economic disaster area, thereby making federal small business loans easily obtainable. This action, whether or not so intended, effectively undercuts the boycott.

The Governor has dispatched the Illinois National Guard to Cairo on two occasions, but only a temporary cessation of hostilities has been achieved. He has looked the other way throughout much of the trouble. Lieut. Gov. Paul Simon has evinced more concern; he has visited Cairo, and has offered to serve as negotiator. But the United Citizens will have no truck with "outside interference" and "emotional sensationalism" on the part of politicians. The United Front, on the other hand, insists that the Governor or Lieutenant Governor act as negotiator in talks designed to end hostilities. To satisfy Negro demands after the disruptions in the summer of 1967, the white leadership made a "good faith" agreement; but it later reneged and destroyed any trust that may have existed between blacks and whites. Now the Front wants a binding agreement, signed by the parties to the dispute and by a high-ranking state official, preferably the Governor.

Cairo blacks have suffered numerous frustrations in their attempts to secure access to places of public accommodation. They sought to integrate the city swimming pool in 1962, gaining entry by force. After three weeks of unwilling integration (actually a series of sit-ins, demonstrations, cracked heads and arrests), the city officials closed the pool, saying it was not making enough money, and later selling it to a private concern for $1. Today the pool remains closed.

The blacks also attempted in 1962 to integrate a skating rink, owned by Billy Thistlewood, then a member of the local police force. Thistlewood furnished local whites with clubs and chains to repel the intrusion. In 1967, Negro leaders asked that they be permitted to convert into a youth and community center a chicken processing plant that had folded. The city contended that it wanted to keep the factory available for new industry, but the building, after more than two years, stands vacant and unattended. Even the Cairo Little League is segregated; doctors persist in segregating their waiting rooms, and dentists refuse to treat Negro welfare recipients.

When the Cairo schools were integrated during the winter of 1967, four schools were abandoned (they were all-Negro ones; integration generally meant moving blacks into white schools). Black leaders asked the school board for use of the gymnasium in one of these abandoned premises as an activities center. The board refused the request, saying they had long-term plans for the property. "Fine," Negro leaders agreed, "let us use it until the plans are completed." The response was forthcoming within a few days when a bulldozer appeared on the scene and converted the gymnasium into a pile of rubble. City officials erected in its place two basketball goals, which stand at virtually the same locations as did the goals in the old gymnasium. Of the three remaining schools requested by black leaders, two were bulldozed to the ground (although white leaders claimed one of them was to become a medical center) and the other was sold to an all-white group to house a private school, Camelot Parochial. Camelot "serves the better, white children," according to school administrator, Rev. Larry Potts, the fundamentalist Baptist preacher who in 1968 clubbed to death with a baseball bat a 72-year-old Negro, Marshall Morris. Potts was never indicted. He contended that Morris was assaulting his wife in their home. He testified before an Illinois House of Representatives Special Investigating Committee that black militants put Morris up to the attack.

Potts believes the public schools have declined as a result of integration. "The first year after integration, it was chaos. A lot of parents pulled their children out of school then. Many of us felt we ought to give them another chance. The second year was even worse. So many parents just felt they couldn't send their children back again." Mrs. Freida Rose, who has enrolled her child at Camelot, but still retains her position as a board member for the public schools, noted: "We tried integration. But when the Negro children came into the schools, it was terrible. They wrote dirty words on the walls and used such terrible language that we just couldn't take it any more. It isn't that they're Negro. It's just that their morals are so atrocious. I guess they must learn it at home."

Black students in the Cairo public schools have been the target of systematic discrimination. Counselors advise Negro students to drop out of school. A frequent reason cited is that a student is too old for his grade level. Actually, many of the students encouraged to leave school are from families most active in the United Front. Teachers and administrators discourage Negro studentts from participating in the senior class trip, although all students raise funds for the trip. One student was expelled because he had allegedly been "too playful" with a white girl, and two were evicted from a school assembly for clenching their fists in the "black power" salute.

Racial confrontation has fixed a ghostly pallor on Cairo. Although located on a rich alluvial fan at the confluence of two great arteries of transport and commerce, potentially greater than Chicago (and at one time larger and more prosperous), the city is impoverished in 1969 because a rigid and paranoid social structure will not permit the rational use of resources, both human and physical.

The white leaders, believing God and the Bible to be on their side, would rather attack the boycott and the black militants than seek to eradicate the poverty and deprivation which victimize many of both races. A United Front resolution points out: "The real enemy of the poor people of Cairo, the black ones and the white ones, is the government (in Springfield and Cairo) which permits the poor to remain poor at the edge of an affluent society." The situation in Cairo is a classic one of wealthy elites, bound into a ruling clique, pitting one impoverished group against another. The white leaders know that if they can interpret every issue as a racial one, they will never lose an election (the population is 55 per cent white). They fear any organization that cuts across the racial barrier. The Illinois Migrant Council met great opposition when it initiated its adult education program for underemployed seasonal farm workers. The assistant program director was badly beaten and the area coordinator was fired upon. The white leaders know that when impoverished whites and blacks study together, they are only one step from joint political action, and they fear collective militancy even more than black militancy. Black power can be contained in Cairo because it is not sufficient to win political office, but the voices of the impoverished (at least half the population), demanding change through the ballot box, could not be ignored.

A coalition of poor blacks and whites is not an immediate possibility. The polarization of the races in Cairo is, in fact, so great that it is difficult for black and white even to discuss their problems. White police Captain W. H. Thompson claims, "I have never seen so much hatred in my life as in this town." A truck driver snarls, "When the niggers learn that if they start cutting on a white man for no reason at all, they're going to get their head blown off, they'll start leaving white people alone." A shopkeeper insists: "We got the dumbest goddam niggers in the country." The Reverend Potts, who regularly preaches on "Communism in Cairo," is the leading advocate of the "devil theory" espoused by most white citizens. He throws up his hands in disgust. "There's a criminal element in Cairo. There's a militant element that has come and gone back and forth from East St. Louis." A housewife confides: "We want to help the nigras, but these cruddy black 'Castro guerrillas' just keep on agitating. These things take time." This thinking in stereotypes, this imputing of the basest motives to a whole group, creates a sociological climate of intolerance. The most minor incident can set off violence.

The blacks in Cairo have refused to turn inward the antagonism they feel toward whites. There has been some militant preying upon moderate blacks who do not agree with the activist strategy, even one killing, but it has not been much, given the intensity of feelings. The Cairo News, published by the blacks, moralizes: "The one lesson we hope the White Hats have learned is that there is a new black man, woman, and child in Cairo. They all stand ten feet tall and they can smell a sick racist miles away and long before they can begin to deceive the blacks."

The blacks have sought full participation in civic life by initiating legal challenges to discriminatory practices. For example, the United Front challenged a proclamation, issued under the authority of a Cairo City Ordinance, banning picketing in the corporate limits. The Front won with the legal assistance of Robert Lansden, a lawyer and one of the few white liberals in Cairo, who took the case to federal court in Danville, Ill. Lansden also handled cases for Cairo blacks in 1949 and 1952, winning on both occasions. For his efforts, his home has been fire bombed and garbage has been strewn on his lawn. One neighbor, after suffering an accidental fire bombing of his porch, erected on his roof a neon arrow pointing toward Lansden's place. David Baldwin, president of the United Front, feels the boycott would be successful without picketing, but that the activity sustains in all blacks a sense of involvement that is essential to the black movement in Cairo.

Through the United Front, the blacks have discovered what it means to be a constructive agent of change (and when destructive, generally in self-defense). They no longer accept Cairo's archaic, plantation system of values. But the white community, isolated by its collective illusion about what blacks are like, has hypnotized itself into believing that the "niggers" really do not mean all those things about "Black Power" and "black dignity." How long this fantasy will last is difficult to say, but the violence will continue until it ends.

LEGITIMATE DEDUCTIONS?

CONSCIENCE and the INCOME TAX

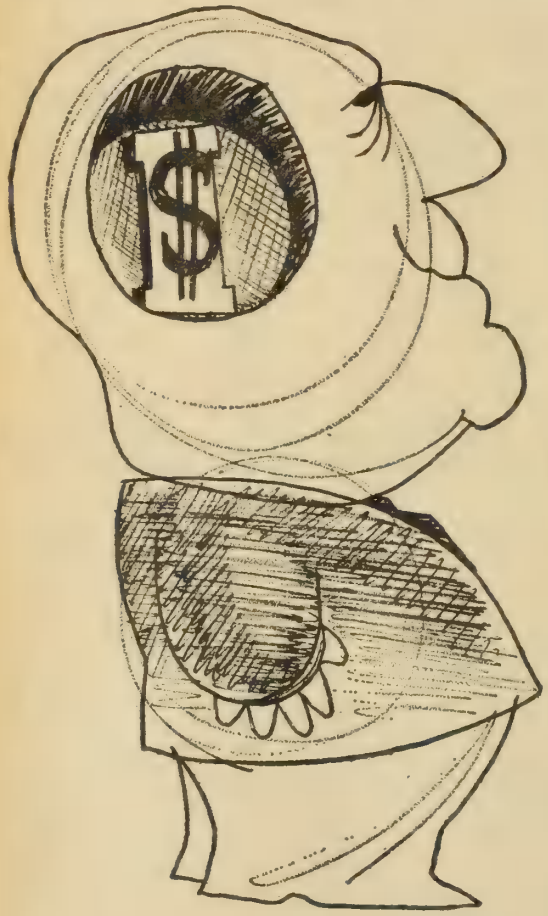
RALPH S. RICE

Mr. Rice is Connell Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles. Earlier in his career he was a practicing lawyer and an assistant attorney general in South Dakota.

Government watchers predict that substantial federal tax reforms will be adopted in 1969 and 1970. It is said that public disillusion with the present tax structure will compel changes.

The sad fact is that several difficulties make such an accomplishment dubious, even though a bill of sorts has passed the House and, with approximately eighty amendments, the Senate. First, enthusiasts are too quick to discount the political muscle—manifest in many an earlier battle—of those who assert a vested interest in a tax shelter. Second, when the bill goes to the Conference Committee of House and Senate, further erosion may be expected.

Finally, the reforms currently being welcomed as revolutionary may well turn out to be ineffectual. For example, promise and performance were far apart in the 1962 tax reforms, which were equally hailed as protecting the generality of taxpayers. Particularly important there were provisions concerning the efforts of the Treasury Department to control abuses in deductions claimed for travel and entertainment. However, what actually took place under these statutes scarcely justifies the hosannas with which it was greeted.



Let us pursue this subject through the eyes and mind of John Doe, a mythical taxpayer beloved of legal scholars.

Doe, who has a passing knowledge of income taxes, sits down to estimate his income subject to the federal tax. As he looks through the scraps of paper on which he has noted possible deductions, his eye falls on an item of $40 for theatre tickets, purchased on an occasion when he was host to Roe, an old college friend with whom he had done some business in the past, and Roe's wife. He must now decide whether the item is deductible, and he reviews the law to find the answer.

He remembers that the basic statute provides that expenses generally are deductible only where they are "ordinary and necessary" in "carrying on any trade or business." The obscurity of such terms as "ordinary" and "necessary" gives him some concern: he recalls the words of Justice Cardozo on the subject:

> One struggles in vain for any verbal formula that will supply a ready touchstone. The standard set up by the statute is not a rule of law; it is rather a way of life. Life in all its fullness must supply the answer to the riddle.

Doe is vaguely moved by these philosophic observations but reflects that they are not really helpful in deciding whether the $40 spent for theatre tickets is deductible; something less ethereal is needed. So he turns to other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. He discovers that additional sections authorize deduction for entertainment expenses in terms equally obscure. It is recited in one such section that the expense of entertainment is deductible if it is: "directly related to" the "active conduct" of the taxpayer's "trade or business."

Noonan

He notes also that somewhat different rules govern in the case of an item: "directly preceding or following" a "substantial" and "bona fide business discussion," including "business meetings at a convention or otherwise." In such case the test is to be whether the item was "associated with" the taxpayer's "trade or business."

As he contemplates the meaning of each word, his confusion increases. He feels that somewhere, somehow, the government must have more clearly communicated to him the basis on which he might or might not take the $40 deduction.

The meaning of dubious words is sometimes made clear by the reports of Congressional committees. Doe examines the Senate report for this statute. It says there that the taxpayer "must show a greater degree of proximate relation between the expenditure and his trade or business than is required under present law." Doe reflects: How much is "greater"? What is "proximate"? What is a "relation"? What is "present law"?

It also says in the Senate report: "It will not be sufficient that the entertainment expense is vaguely or remotely connected with a business motive; it must be demonstrated that the predominant purpose of the expense is to further the trade or business of the taxpayer."

Doe wonders what the words "vaguely," "remotely," "business motive" and "predominant purpose" mean when applied to his theatre tickets. He decides to look at the regulations of the Internal Revenue Service. Remembering that the $40 deduction is permissible only if he shows the expenditure to be "directly related" to his business, he scans the regulations for a definition of the term. He discovers a recital that an expense is "directly related" to a taxpayer's trade or business if:

¶The taxpayer had more than a "general expectation" of obtaining income or some "business benefit."

¶He "actively engaged" in a "business meeting," "negotiation," "discussion" or other "business transaction" for the purpose of obtaining income or a "business benefit."

¶The "principal aspect" of the business and entertainment was the "active conduct" of a "trade or business" of the taxpayer.

¶The person entertained was one with whom the taxpayer engaged in the "active conduct" of "a trade or business."

So he reflects further. Of course, he likes Roe and enjoys his company. Likewise he enjoys the theatre. And he hoped before and throughout the theatre performance, that sometime in the future Roe would do business with him. If he had more than a "general expectation" of income or a "business benefit" he can take the deduction. He remembers that he can also take it if his business advantage was the "principal aspect" of the occasion. In support of the deduction he now remembers that pursuant to plan he described recent professional successes, real and imagined, to Roe in the course of the evening.

He wonders: Is that enough? Particularly, he is puzzled whether in these circumstances, he could fairly say that he had more than a "general expectation" of "business benefit," and that the "principal aspect" of the occasion was business.

Looking further, Doe discovers that the Service has also said that expenditures for entertainment are deductible where made "in a clear business setting directly in furtherance of taxpayer's trade or business." The Service also warns that to use this avenue in justifying a deduction, "generally" the taxpayer must "clearly" establish that the recipient "would have reasonably known that the taxpayer had no significant motive, in incurring the expenditure, other than directly furthering his trade or business. Objective rather than subjective standards will be determinative."

These factors place Doe in a morass of indecision and embarrassment. No longer may he gloss over his conduct and his motivation. He still hasn't decided why, really, he invited Roe. Doe would really like to think of himself as an open and generous friend of Roe, but tax considerations forbid. This self-examination is a prelude to the critical question: Why did Roe think he was asked? Did he suspect that business was uppermost in Doe's mind? Does Roe lack self-confidence; does he think that no one loves him for himself alone? If so, the item is deductible. The same results follow if Roe is a cynic who knows not the meaning of friendship. But if Roe is generous, outgoing, given to easy trust and quick enthusiasms, the deduction may be lost.

Doe is further troubled at this point by the knowledge that certain expenditures are not "generally" considered by the Service to be directly related to a trade or business. This is true if the entertainment occurs at a place where distractions are substantial: at a cocktail party, a night club, theatre or sporting event. It is true also respecting meetings, including persons other than business associates, at such places as cocktail lounges, country clubs, golf and athletic clubs, and vacation resorts. As to such items, taxpayer must "clearly" establish that the expense is related to the active conduct of his trade or business.

How much proof is required to establish this connection "clearly"? What distractions are substantial? Would a

(Continued on page 698)

HARRY GOLDEN

The federal directives are insistent. North Carolina must totally integrate its schools by next year. Interposition did not work, nullification did not work, even the closing of the school did not work. But there are Tarheels who will not give up. In the past year, die-hard segregationists who are the parents of school-age children have financed the opening of almost fifty new "Christian Academies" for the instruction of white children.

The purpose of these private schools is to offer "quality education," so called. In reality, they are renovated barns, small frame houses, old Quonset huts, sometimes even a dilapidated school building long ago turned over to the mice. Tuition runs from $250 to $700 a year. The labor needed to paint the walls, refinish old desks, landscape the yard and construct the playground is all contributed by the parents. At Twelve Oaks Academy in Shelby, N.C., a one-year-old school not yet approved by the state, the headmaster teaches psychology, English, biology and physical science; another teacher handles chemistry, French and history, and a third takes on all the elementary grades from one through seven. Ramseur's Faith Christian School has so far cost $250,000 and the Gaston Day School already has $600,000 in hand. Both schools still operate in the red.

By law, these Christian Academies must offer substantially the same subjects taught in the public schools, and schedule as many school hours for the students through the year as the Department of Public Instruction directs. Charlotte Observer reporters Jerry Adams and Sam Covington found classes at the private schools deserted by noon and the students impressed as carpenters, painters and laborers to ready the physical plant. In some cases the reporters were chased from the grounds by irate faculty and parents when they took pictures. Not one Negro is registered in any of these Christian Academies.

North Carolina moderates and informed educators are caught in a dilemma. These private schools drain support from the public school system. Bond issues are easily defeated at the polls, budgetary requests are denied, and state funds, appropriated on the basis of student enrollment, are less than boards of education had anticipated.

An even worse dilemma faces the older private schools —the parochial schools scattered throughout the state, some of the prestigious academies, the three Negro private schools which have operated since the 1900s, and the twenty-three private schools run by the Seventh-Day Adventists. They have long complied with the requirements for instruction set down by the state. No one seriously believes the new Christian Academies can meet these standards, and it is a worrisome possibility that the public will soon come to lump all private schools together as inferior.

It is even sadder for the children who attend the Christian Academies. Southern colleges do not lower their standards no matter how parents clamor for a show of their patriotism. The South already has 3 million illiterates. The Christian Academies are bound to swell the ranks.

lecture on transubstantiation distract Smith (a sophisticate of 20) in the same manner that it might distract Jones (a clergyman of 80)?

Frustration comes upon Doe: he now knows that he will search in vain for a meaningful standard to measure his right to the deduction, yet he must take a deduction or forfeit it: unlike Congress and the commissioner, he cannot just talk around the problem.

Since this is a modern fable, it would be gauche to underline a moral for Doe or to resolve his problem. Let us, however, consider what his dilemma teaches about the tax structure and the prospects for its improvement:

¶Any effective system of federal taxation must be based on self-assessment. It is just not feasible—nor consistent with what we consider to be the American way of life—to employ an army of tax administrators to scour the land for wrongdoers.

¶Any system of self-assessment presumes that the taxpayer can tell within reasonable limits how much is due the government.

¶The occasional doubt and inconvenience of an isolated taxpayer is both inevitable and unimportant, but where doubts are substantial and arise from transactions which recur throughout the commercial life of the nation, the tax structure may be impaired beyond redemption.

We delude ourselves if we hope to construct a workable system of self-assessment on definitions which do not define. And the "reform" reflected in the current statute does not encourage optimism about future improvements; shortcomings are manifest.

Under present law, Doe's decision is almost completely subjective; the element of personal conscience is paramount. An expense which to one taxpayer seems "ordinary" or "necessary" or "directly related" to a trade or business may not seem so to another. In addition, deductions involving theatre tickets (or the use of the family car, an office at home, other entertainment or travel) incorporate elements of personal satisfaction to the taxpayer. When the taxpayer allocates his costs between personal and business expenditures, what measure does he use? Should he deduct all the expenses? Should he deduct any? Would 10 per cent be about right?

Tax laws which leave the matter in such a posture are thus unrealistic. We are not at the nirvana when tax collection on the basis of a man's personal conscience is effective, especially when the taxpayer can, for a fee, hire another to be his conscience. Consider the taxpayer, known to all of us, who observes that "my tax adviser lets me take 50 per cent of the expense of my second car." Competition among the less competent tax advisers to demonstrate that one is more liberal than another in the "allowance" of deductions to his client is inevitable.

It must also be remembered that the taxpayer who smothers his conscience is, as a practical matter, reasonably safe. In the first place, his return probably won't be audited. The percentage of audited returns where this issue arises varies, but is never large. When the return of a corporation is audited, the facts of the transaction are not always apparent upon a mere review of the corporation books. Moreover, if the taxpayer is caught, the only penalty in practice is that he will have to make up the difference between what he paid and what he ought to have paid, plus interest. It is hard to convict for fraud in these cases. A taxpayer will plead that he has made a mistake in judgment about the law as it applies to him. How can the government successfully claim bad faith when a taxpayer interprets a statute containing words that are quite meaningless? So the danger is that the honest taxpayer will pay, and the dishonest taxpayer will cheat. If the cheats get too numerous, the system will break down altogether.

We need go back no further than the days of speakeasies, bathtub gin and the bottle that just came off the boat to know what happens when there is a breakdown of public morale with respect to a statute. No democracy—no government—can afford the luxury of retaining legislation which affects the lives of all the citizens, but which is cast in a form the people cannot understand and consequently will not accept.

There are other shortcomings in the present tax structure respecting the entertainment deduction. Some taxpayers feel that since they may have to negotiate with agents of the Treasury Department concerning their tax liabilities, they are well advised to claim a very high amount of expense so that they may compromise it at a figure roughly in accord with the facts. This situation has been discussed by a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue as follows:

> A taxpayer honestly believes that he has incurred deductible T&E [travel and entertainment] expense of $500 during the taxable year. He has not, however, kept records to substantiate the deduction. . . . Believing that the Internal Revenue Service will only allow a deduction for 50 per cent of whatever amount he claims, he files a return claiming a deduction for T&E expense in the amount of $1,000. Does this . . . "gamesmanship" . . . constitute fraud?

Perhaps such a return would not reflect fraud if the taxpayer knew for certain that his return would be audited. It is a different matter when the taxpayer—or the person making out his return—realizes that the prospect of auditing is remote, and that the full deduction will probably be available to the taxpayer by default. There is considerable fear that this practice is not unusual: it scarcely enhances confidence in the administration of the tax laws.

There is another weakness in the present subjective approach to self-assessment of the tax. Taxpayers are quick to take issue with agents of the Treasury who question their good faith and exercise of judgment. This is particularly true in the area of entertainment expenses. The taxpayer reflects, not without some justification, that the government has invited him to use his judgment as to the meaning of such words as "primary," "principal" "clearly," "directly related to the active conduct of . . . trade or business," and the like. On such a basis he has, in fact, used his judgment and spent the money. Consequently, he asserts that the government should trust his judgment since it required him to exercise it in the first place.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

In short, the entertainment deduction does not do what Congress and the Administration report that it is supposed to do: make an allowance for a business expense while precluding deductions for personal entertainment. It does not do so for several reasons:

¶The language used is not adequate (and probably no language would be precise enough) to make a distinction between what is allowable and what is not.

¶It is impossible for a taxpayer to decide to take the deduction on the basis of an accepted application of the statute by the public, since the subjective response of others to this problem is neither measured nor measurable, neither known nor knowable. Thus he cannot decide to abide by community response rather than by law.

¶The nature of the deduction is such that detection and correction of widespread abuses is impossible.

Frustration and impairment of tax morality arising from this part of the tax structure imperils the effectiveness of the entire system of self-assessment. Indeed, it is proper to ask: Why is a deduction, so patently unmanageable, permitted to exist? Perhaps it represents an obscurely felt conviction that employees and self-employed carrying heavy burdens elsewhere in the tax structure should be permitted to obtain certain personal satisfactions at the expense of the government. If so, we ought to consider whether relief to segments of the taxpaying public ought to be predicated on a basis so potentially damaging to tax morality and the self-assessment system. There ought to be some better way to soften the severity of the tax bite. Any segment of tax law in which the taxpayer cannot compute his deductions to reach his net income—that is, where self-assessment is impossible in a practical sense—should be stricken from the tax structure. As a method of measuring taxes, it hasn't worked. It can't work. It can only make scoundrels of us all. The generality of taxpayers now have to pay higher taxes to make up for those who cheat under the present law. So we must discard this deduction, and others like it.

But neither the executive nor the legislative branch has so far shown the courage and tenacity to beat out solutions to even this relatively uncontroversial problem.

With this kind of history, is there really hope that this time they will adopt effective measures, backed by meaningful language, concerning the major tax shelters of the day?

LETTERS (Continued from page 682)

vironment. I suggest that society must recognize that the genetic manipulations promised by Prof. S. E. Luria ["Modern Biology: A Terrifying Power," The Nation, Oct. 20] are not science at all but rather medical technology, and are therefore proper subjects for regulation. Medical technology, like industrial technology, has shielded itself from long overdue criticism by resisting (in Rickover's words), "every attempt by society to regulate such use in the public interest, as if it were a modern repetition of the persecution of Galileo."

Medical technology, with unchallenged casuistry, has already transmogrified our concepts of "death." Must we also now accept a sententious redefinition of "life," to suit genetic technologists; or will we recognize in the words of your contributor R. V. Sampson that further than this "it is not possible for perversion to go"?

S. Drucker

deodorant

Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIRS: The commentator in the USIA propaganda film, The Silent Majority, one Wiley Daniels, happens also to be a newsman employed by WJZ-TV (Westinghouse) here in Baltimore. WJZ, the most conscientious news station in Maryland, does not allow its newsmen to appear in commercials, a policy not followed by our other two major TV stations. Then we discover that Daniels is hustling for the USIA. What's the difference between mouthwash and brainwash?

Few people in Baltimore know that the Daniels they see on WJZ or the Daniels who interviews them is also a regular commentator for USIA films, fourteen so far, it has been reported to me. To me, newsman Daniels' involvement with USIA is as disturbing as newsmen who inform for the FBI. On the other hand, if people accept the mass media in this country as propaganda disguised as news, it's not disturbing at all. Merely logical. Grenville B. Whitman

double tax, double vote

Bergenfield, N. J.

DEAR SIRS: In your Nov. 10 issue Alan Stone ["What the City Needs"] is right when he observes that "suburbanites who work in the central city receive police and fire protection, street provision, water, sewage, sanitation and other services for which they don't pay." He assumes that they should pay taxes [and] . . . let us assume that such taxation is justified. But then let those who pay these taxes vote for the officials who spend those taxes. . . . We assume that each taxpayer has only one community in which he can participate. . . . This may no longer be realistic. In fact, our local political divisions and governmental structure may no longer reflect the realism of modern life styles.

Belden Menkus

to save the Petal

Charlotte, N. C.

DEAR SIRS: I write on behalf of Mr. P. D. East of Fairhope, Ala., editor of the Petal Paper. Mr. East has suffered trying to fight the segregationists in Alabama and Mississippi, and he needs some funds to keep up the Petal Paper. I urge all my friends to send him a check. In the struggle for democracy we need all the allies we can get and P. D. East is an ally and friend of democracy. Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'The Fruits of the Two Seasons'

BLAKE AND TRADITION. By Kathleen Raine. Princeton University Press. (Bollingen Series.) 2 Vols. 428 and 367 pp. $22.50 boxed.

J. BRONOWSKI

Dr. Bronowski is senior fellow of the Salk Institute of Biological Studies at La Jolla, Calif. His many published works on science and literature include The Common Sense of Science (Harvard), The Identity of Man (Doubleday), and William Blake and the Age of Revolution (Harper & Row). The Nation has twice devoted special issues to his major essays, "Science and Human Values" (December 29, 1956) and "The Abacus and the Rose: A Dialogue After Galileo" (January 4, 1964).

When T. S. Eliot included an essay on William Blake in The Sacred Wood in 1920, he showed an unexpected critical prescience. There was little curiosity about Blake then, and only his lyrical poems had any number of readers. It was not until the centenary of Blake's death in 1927, when Geoffrey Keynes published all his works in one volume, that a small vortex of public interest began to form in the wake of Eliot (and of Yeats and Swinburne before him). Even so the present surge of Ph.D. theses about Blake, and the swell of books sane or silly, did not take off for another twenty years.

The passage from Eliot's essay that is most often quoted by mischievous critics (of whom I am one) says:

> We have the same respect for Blake's philosophy (and perhaps for that of Samuel Butler) that we have for an ingenious piece of home-made furniture: we admire the man who has put it together out of the odds and ends about the house.

As a judgment of Blake's powerful mind and thought, so much richer than Eliot's (or Yeats's or Swinburne's), this now seems so obtuse as to be funny. The obvious excuse is that it was written at a time when no one had tried to read Blake in the historical and intellectual context of his own day. That makes it funny; what makes it sad is that fifty years later it remains the mood in which most theses and books about Blake are still written.

On campuses up and down the country, he continues to be expounded as an Old Testament mystic humping a rag bag of random prejudices, remote from the issues of modern civilization: an amiable crank who made minor poetry out of personal fantasy. It was in this mood that A. E. Housman in The Name and Nature of Poetry in 1933 described him as "the most poetical of all poets" in whom the poetry "instead of being confounded in a great river can be drunk pure from a slender channel of its own"; and the patronizing tone still sounds in most judgments of what Blake called his "Mental Fight."

Kathleen Raine has spent twenty years studying the furniture of Blake's mind (to use an old-fashioned phrase which is apposite here); it must have been early in the 1950s that I saw the draft of her first essay, on a short poem from Songs of Experience called "Ah! Sun-flower." The theme of Kathleen Raine's remarkable and passionate book is that Blake's thought, including much of his symbolic imagery, belongs to the classical tradition of anti-materialist philosophy since Plotinus. She has shown that Blake was well read and informed in topics of materialist and idealist philosophy. But her theme is not a mere register of sources, of the kind that John Livingston Lowes compiled in The Road to Xanadu to show that Coleridge had buried a mass of pirate treasure from his reading in "Kubla Khan." Though Blake was also a thief of memories, he was not like Coleridge a kleptomaniac: what Blake stored and used was organized by his total view of the world.

Although she does not say so, I suspect that the title of her book Blake and Tradition came to her as a protest against Eliot's smug insistence that "What [Blake's] genius required, and what it sadly lacked, was a framework of accepted and traditional ideas which would have prevented him from indulging in a philosophy of his own." We should remember that the most telling essay in The Sacred Wood was called "Tradition and the Individual Talent."

The tradition of neo-Platonism in which Kathleen Raine places Blake is in its essence a mystical form of humanism. It was its humanism rather than its mysticism which made the early Fathers of the Church suspicious from the beginning, and which caused Saint Augustine to condemn its more extravagant texts such as the Hermetic books. In the authoritarian centuries before the Renaissance, neo-Platonism was the only form of humanist dissent from dogma that was open to independent minds, and it became strong in England in the same spirit during the Puritan revolution in the 17th century. Its chief exponent in Blake's lifetime was Thomas Taylor, and Kathleen Raine shows that Blake read a good deal in him and followed into some of Taylor's sources.

The influence of Thomas Taylor and earlier neo-Platonists on Blake's thought and imagery makes a pointed addition to Etching by Blake for Robert Blair's The Grave (1808). Rosenwald Collection, Library of Congress.

BRIDGES

The bridges, legged like staples, hitch the land together and the river, broken zipper clumsy, bulges between.

Our shadows fall over the wall through the skewing wings of small gulls; fall into the current, curdling sudden spluttered Bronx cheers of froth.

But we are not taken out to sea, only lie darkly, a stain static on the tide.

When we walk away, a syncopation of strides, dragging our blotches behind us—iron filings following beyond bridges—elbow to elbow what do our mitered arms mean? What is this fastening soil to soil, as we ebb over the sidewalk?

KAREN SWENSON

our knowledge. It shows us that Blake was well informed about other writers who struggled with the same intellectual problems that engaged him, and particularly with the problem of the universal grounds for individual dissent in the face of social and religious authority. In this sense, I regard Kathleen Raine's work as an important complement to the analysis of Blake's social conscience that has been carried out earlier: in my book of 1943 (entitled in this country William Blake and the Age of Revolution), in Mark Schorer's The Politics of Vision (1946), and in David Erdman's Prophet Against Empire (1954). When Kathleen Raine says in her acknowledgments that in reading her work in progress I let "early friendship outweigh a difference in point of view" she is too modest. To me, her point of view and mine (and Schorer's and Erdman's) are, in the deepest sense, the same: we are at one in believing and in showing that Blake was a man whose sensibility was whole, and that he did not withdraw his imagination from either the material or the spiritual wants of those whom his harsh age impoverished.

Whatever criticism I have of Blake and Tradition therefore lies elsewhere. It is concerned with the lengths to which the book carries its analysis. It seems to me to be excessive in its detail, and to look for correspondences so minute that the reader may end by distrusting even the large ones. Not everything in Blake is an echo or an analogue of old beliefs and symbols; and when Kathleen Raine seems to labor to find it so, she must make many wonder whether she really is sensitive to Blake's endlessly springing originality. This is a pity, for her book is full of illuminations on a dozen different sides of Blake's work: his concepts of time and space, the satirical and burlesque elements hidden in some of the earlier prophetic books, the point of the visionary visitations by Isaiah and Ezekiel, and many others. In addition she is penetrating in her elucidation of the designs which Blake engraved with his poems, and which are reproduced in large numbers in these two volumes.

It would be wrong of me to fidget about the detail of Kathleen Raine's devotion if I did not feel the same uneasiness on the larger scale, at the obsessive way in which she presses her theme overall. No serious critic would challenge her belief that Blake, like other major poets, saw and sought in poetry the expression of a kind of truth about man that is not exhausted by an enumeration of the material facts of his existence. Nor would anyone now doubt Kathleen Raine's demonstration that Blake found the same philosophy of the imagination in the neo-Platonists, and was impressed by the vivid, mysterious symbolism in which they put it. But somehow this is not enough for her. She implies that neo-Platonism is the only tenable form of this philosophy; and she strains to make it the crucial and overriding content first of Blake's thought and then of his poems.

Both endeavors seem to me ill-judged: they are extravagant and in the end damaging. They prompt the kind of retreat from scholarship which is typified by John Wain's attack on her work: "If a poet can't be shown to be important without bringing in all this lumber, then he isn't important." The way to widen our understanding of Blake is to show that he had a wider mind than used to be thought, not a narrower one. I am sure that Kathleen Raine thinks so too, but the conception has got lost in the fervor of her book.

The familiar classroom picture of Blake as an absent-minded eccentric is a caricature that falls short in two respects. On the one hand, he grew up in the climate and the company of the dissenting rationalists who sympathized with the American and French Revolutions, who made the Industrial Revolution possible, and who were horrified (and destroyed) by the monstrous form it took. On the other hand, he was well grounded and well read in the tradition of philosophy that combines Plato with the Gnostics, and gives the prime place in the universe to the spirit or imagination of man.

> Thou art a Man, God is no more,
> Thy own humanity learn to adore.

It seems puzzling and startling now that these two opposite casts of mind could be combined in a single outlook: yet that is exactly the case. Moreover, we have evidence in A. L. Morton's book The Everlasting Gospel (1958) that the same combination of thought existed in some sects in the Puritan revolution, and had survived secretly for more than a century, into Blake's lifetime. In my view, this situation projects into the present, where it is discernible in the strange and unique character of the Labour movement in England. In all other countries, the Socialist movement derives from the single strand of rationalism, by way of Karl Marx's materialism. But in England the Labour movement has a second strand, which is a purely ethical and other-worldly tradition of nonconformity that goes back (through the Dissenting Academies of Blake's day) to Puritanism and the Platonic element in it.

In just this way Blake held together his practical rage against war and oppression and industrial misery, and his imaginative faith that the human spirit of innocence must be freed. On the one hand:

> The Soldier armd with Sword & Gun
> Palsied strikes the Summers Sun.
> The poor Mans Farthing is worth more > Than all the Gold on Africs Shore.

And on the other:

> He who shall teach the Child to Doubt
> The rotting Grave shall neer get out.
> He who respects the Infants faith
> Triumphs over Hell & Death.

What makes the voice of Blake so moving, what makes the dialectic of his mind so much more contemporary than Marx's, is his undeviating resolve and his constant invention in twisting the two strands together as one:

> The Childs Toys & the Old Mans Reasons
> Are the Fruits of the Two seasons.

Books on Film

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar, the author of F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoön (Oxford), is writing a cultural history of the American movies. He teaches at the University of Michigan.

My friend Elliott, in Ann Arbor where I live, keeps a 16 mm. movie projector in his apartment living room. He rents films and screens them as often as he can, which sometimes means all night. Elliott has more tolerant neighbors than Kirk, who turned two rooms of his duplex apartment over to motion picture screening until his neighbors complained about the noise. Kirk has since left the country, taking with him taped sound tracks of all the movies he had screened, to play on distant beaches and bring to mind the moving image from the irrecoverable screen.

Kirk and Elliott are the frontiersmen of the film generation. Most of their peers are still content with seeing as many movies as they can in theatres and on TV. But within the next decade technology will likely change all that. Beyond the possibilities we already know about, like video tape machines and cable television, there will probably be special attachments to our TV sets, for showing movies whenever we want to see them, or small inexpensive projectors playing cassette-type reels. Movie projectors will become as ubiquitous as tape recorders, and we will sit down each evening to watch movies on the wall as naturally as previous generations used to read books.

If Elliott and Kirk are reliable examples, however, books will be in greater demand than ever—books, that is, about movies. Elliott and Kirk buy all the new paperback books about movies, and many of the hard-cover books as well. They use them, for one thing, as reference works, carefully studying the filmographies and cast lists for information about the directors they admire and the movies that they screen. They are also hungry for anecdotes about the men and women who make and star in movies. It is not merely a fan's interest but an effort to forge a link with craftsmanship and history, rather than with gossip and publicity.

Craftsmanship and history, unfortunately, are rarely what they get from books about movies. Publishers have rushed to exploit the revival of interest in movies with a swift and concentrated production of sloppy and mindless books. Probably forty or fifty books about movies have been published in 1969, three or four times as many as ten years ago. Many are sincere books, particularly the dull, earnest, superficial studies turned out in great quantities by British film buffs and published in bunches like the Cinema One (formerly Cinema World) series, the Movie Edition series, and the International Film Guide Series. Such works could be more easily forgiven if their reference information were accurate, but the facts presented in most recent film studies are notoriously unreliable. The publishing industry's respect for motion pictures is nearly as low as that of the movie industry itself.

This review began as an omnibus survey of the season's motion picture books, but the writer had no heart for a roll call of error and inconsequence, and the wise reader would have no patience. There are exceptions, of course. Personal memoirs such as Lillian Gish's The Movies, Mr. Griffith and Me (Prentice-Hall, 388 pp. $7.95) and Ivor Montagu's With Eisenstein in Hollywood (International Publishers, 356 pp. Paper $1.95) have their own intrinsic interest and integrity. Teachers College Press has brought back into print Lewis Jacobs' useful study, The Rise of the American Film, published in 1939, together with his essay, "Experimental Cinema in America, 1921-1947" (631 pp. $8.50. Paper $3.95). Grove Press and Simon & Schuster are each publishing a valuable series of film scripts in paperback volumes.

If an omnibus review can accomplish anything, however, in the present state of film book publishing, it can direct the attention of readers to the good books about movies in the thicket of mediocrity. Here, then, for readers who wish to build their own library of significant books on movies or give worth-while movie books as gifts, is one man's list of a variety of movie books, currently in print, that repay the reader's investment of money, time and intelligence.

WHAT IS CINEMA? By André Bazin. Translated by Hugh Gray. University of California Press. 183 pp. $5.75. Paper $2.25. (1967.) If there is one essential book on movies, this is most likely the one. Bazin, who died in 1958, was co-editor of Cahiers du Cinéma and mentor of the French new wave directors, Truffaut, Godard, Resnais and Chabrol. His essays raise fundamental questions about the nature of cinema with a philosophical depth and intellectual clarity unmatched by any other work on motion pictures in English. Hugh Gray's translation is admirably lucid.

A GIRL LIKE I. By Anita Loos. Th Viking Press. 275 pp. $5.95. (1966. The autobiography of the author an script writer is perhaps the most remarl able Hollywood memoir ever writte for its candor, its wit and its intelligenc Miss Loos's autobiography is a gre pleasure to read; it also provides mor insights into the history of America movies than many scholarly studies o the same subjects.

THE AMERICAN CINEMA: Directo and Directions, 1929-1968. By Andrev Sarris. E. P. Dutton & Co. 383 p $6.95. Paper $2.95. (1968.) No write has done more to create an informed an serious audience for the films of Amer can directors than Sarris, critic for Th Village Voice. The American Cinema not without its inaccuracies, and no on should take Sarris' theoretical approac or directorial categories as any mor than personal or provisional. Given suc caveats, however, the book is importan and indispensable for its information an frequent shrewd judgments.

FOUR GREAT COMEDIANS: Chap lin, Lloyd, Keaton, Langdon. By Donal McCaffrey. A. S. Barnes & Co. 175 p Paper $2.25. (1968.) McCaffrey's stud of the silent movie comedians, in th International Film Guide series, is successful example of what short paper back books on movies can accomplish It provides a thorough, accurate an lucid account of silent film comedy. has a coherent aesthetic point of vie and is informative, as books by fil buffs for film buffs almost never ar about the connections between mov history and the broader history of Amer can society.

THE FIRST TWENTY YEARS: A Se ment of Film History. By Kemp N Niver. 176 pp. $7.50. (1968.) Niv was the film technician who restore the Library of Congress' collection c more than 3,000 pre-1912 America movies from paperprints to films. F nanced by the Academy of Motion Pi ture Arts and Sciences, this effort, begu in 1952 and still continuing, has mad available a remarkable collection c heretofore inaccessible films. Niver h become the most knowledgeable expe about them. The First Twenty Years an illustrated guide to some of the high lights of the collection. It is availabl from the author, Box 46505, Hollywoo Calif., 90046.

D. W. GRIFFITH: American Film Ma ter. By Iris Barry. Museum of Mod ern Art. 88 pp. $6.95. Paper $2.9 (1940, 1965.) Griffith still awaits h biographer, and recognition as a gre nerican artist—not only by a few film ecialists but by the larger public; not ly for The Birth of a Nation and In-'erance but for many of his fine early ort films and for his neglected work the twenties. Miss Barry's brief early ıdy, recently brought up to date, is ll the best introduction to his work.

LM: An Anthology. Edited by Daniel ılbot. University of California Press. 4 pp. Paper $2.25. (1966.) There are number of anthologies of writings on ovies; Talbot's, in my opinion, is the st. It contains a wide variety of writ-gs on film aesthetics, theory and his-ry, including indispensable essays by win Panofsky and Béla Balázs, as well Agee on comedy, Warshow on the estern, and Ben Hecht on Hollywood.

YLES OF RADICAL WILL. By Su-n Sontag. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 4 pp. $5.95. Miss Sontag's essays on rgman's Persona and Godard in this llection demonstrate, better than any her recent writings on film that I know, the qualities of a film criticism informed by aesthetic intelligence and sensibility.

HITCHCOCK. By François Truffaut. Simon & Schuster. 256 pp. $10. Paper $3.75. (1967.) It is fascinating in several ways to read this interview between two very good film makers, with its suggestions of differences of nationality, generations and aesthetic sensibility. Many rate Truffaut higher than Hitchcock as a director, but Hitchcock's techniques and obsessions provide great insights into the art and psychology of the motion picture.

KEATON. By Rudi Blesh. The Macmillan Co. 395 pp. $8.95. (1966.) Most movie star biographies are free-lance hack work. Blesh's Keaton is not a flawless book but it sets commendable standards for movie biographies, for sympathy, intelligence and perspective. It is a very entertaining book that also marks a significant first step in restoring the reputation of a great comedian and director.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

hat I most appreciated among the stage ferings of the past fortnight was the lwin Nikolais Dance Theatre which, un-rtunately, gave only a few performances the City Center. It is most remiss of e not to have made the acquaintance of is admirable group much earlier. The ason for my neglect may have been at the Nikolais company had for a ng time confined its activities to a emote" part of town (remote from mes Square, that is) at the Henry reet Settlement Playhouse.

The Alwin Nikolais Dance Theatre is ne of the best things on our stage. It more theatre than ballet, but categories damned. It provides a wonderful spec-cle, an experience easily enjoyed but ot so readily assimilated. There is a cer-in mystery to it; while it appears to ave no "meaning" beyond its visual de-ght, one cannot be sure at first view at it is not much more than that. It is abstract of the pleasures we may still tain in living in the mechanical chaos ound us. Nikolais gives the electric rbulence of our civilization—even in me of its destructive aspects—a clear ructure very nearly euphoric.

He comes very close to Gordon Craig's nception of a stage director. He de-gns movement, sets, costumes, lighting, id to a large extent composes the elec-onic score. All that is lacking to fulfill e Craigian idea is speech (the perform-ers do babble occasionally, producing sounds not unlike the shards of conversation which reach one in the currents of a crowd).

Industrial shapes and noises, with dreamlike visions of other spheres and nonhuman forms (protozoa of another planet), are patterned to create a world of marvels. This is a 20th-century fairyland relieved of horror. All is metaphor relating to what we have seen and know but cannot define. Is this, as one suspects, merely ornamental show? I doubt it. It may be compared simplistically to Pop and Op art, but while these are often funny or momentarily fascinating when not depressing, Nikolais' visions are exhilarating even when some sort of doom is suggested. This is the way the world ends, not with a bang but a whoop. There is sophistication in this and even more a redeeming naïveté.

The dancers compose the cheerful focus of the occasion. They blend into the whole, with their gleaming star, Carolyn Carlson, twitching and twinkling as the brightest point of the constellation.

John Bowen's Little Boxes (The New Theatre, 154 East 54 Street) is composed of two one-act plays—the first entitled "The Coffee Lace," the second "Trevor"—about people who wish to avoid the world around them, who, as they say, "never go out."

Both are wistful, though "Trevor" is written as farce with, at the end, a satiric edge. "The Coffee Lace" concerns a group of English prewar music hall "artistes" whose old-fashioned routines have become ridiculous to the postwar generation. When last employed they were engaged as objects of mockery. This so mortified them that, except for their business manager, they resolved never to set foot again in the fierce new world.

The play is a nicely written vignette with small pathos, humor, and a not altogether factitious tenderness. It is rather poorly directed and played. The director and consequently his cast do not seem to have understood that old-time actors such as those depicted are real people and do not necessarily comport themselves absurdly in life. The actor of little talent is artificial only on the stage.

The cast is much better in "Trevor," as is the direction by Perry Bruskin. It concerns a Lesbian couple whose parents come down from the country to visit them in their London flat. The parents of one of the girls wish her to marry; the second girl's mother wishes her daughter —married or not—to live a full sex life (with a man, of course) in the fashion of the day. To conceal the actual state of affairs the two girls pick up an out-of-work actor to play the role of lover to one of them, but as the second girl's parents unexpectedly appear at the same time, the young man is compelled to impersonate her fiancé as well. Comic complications ensue: all good fun, especially as Tony Tanner, as the so-called "Trevor," is a likable and adept actor.

The play becomes earnest toward the end, and the change is not altogether welcome because it is not in tune with the beginning. One of the girls decides to confess all. Her conventional middle-class parents refuse to understand, although their daughter is sufficiently explicit. The girls remain alone once again, baffled and disconsolate. When "Trevor" assures them that many people nowadays are without prejudice in regard to sexual deviation they take no notice of his comforting words. They too are boxed in. The girls, it would seem, are as retarded as their parents.

Jennifer Tilston as the more vulnerable of the two girls is especially sympathetic in a group performance which moves capably within the bounds of its special reality.

The Increased Difficulty of Concentration by the young Czech playwright, Vaclav Havel (at the Forum of the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center) is a somewhat elongated comedy skit. It is moderately amusing; on the whole well played and directed by Mel Shapiro, though not quite in the robustly extravagant manner with which such plays are done at the Theatre on the Balustrade in Prague.

What interested me most is that while I speak of the play in terms of mild approval it was an important work for the Czechs. (Here is yet another example of the audience as the theatre's focal source.) The speech that seems almost embarrassingly out of place with us, a speech in which the central character declares his conviction that the truth of life cannot be measured by computers or bureaucratic dictates but only by the motivations of the human heart, is what Havel meant his play to say. That is what gave it social force in his country.

The Increasing Difficulty, etc., like The Memorandum (produced two seasons ago at the Public Theatre) is a satire on the rigidity of party "scientism." It is true that Dr. Eduard Huml, the play's sociologist protagonist, is beset by troubles that fall upon men everywhere: wife, mistress and aberrant sexual drives. These supply the play's best jokes, especially since the various episodes are presented out of their normal time sequence. But in addition, the doctor, chosen as a specimen to answer crazy questions addressed to him for purposes of useless classification, by a constantly erratic machine, is badgered by the machine's inane operators and an ominous overseer whose every utterance is at once ludicrous and menacing.

Thus the play, a farce of no great subtlety, becomes something vital to the Czech citizen forever under the vigilant and evil eye of—who can say just what. For us, it offers sidelights on contemporary "history" agreeably mixed with bedroom imbroglio.

There are some who regard Noel Coward's Private Lives as a masterpiece on the level of Oscar Wilde's best comedy. It is very neatly constructed, thoroughly apt as a pleasantry, crisply written in an unmistakably personal style. But it provokes in me no great assent in laughter or recognition of experience.

The personal style is important because it represents not only an individual idiosyncrasy—a man—but that of a place and a period: London's stage, café, night club and smart set between 1921 and 1931. It was the time of self-congratulatory flippancy, giddy pleasure in believing in nothing but prickly sensation, and appreciation of one's own appreciation of the dash and swish of it all. Bad manners took on the sheen of the best. Accompanying all this was an undertone of smart music, titillatingly sentimental, champagne induced, as in a wild party where even the knell of doom becomes transposed to a beguiling tinkle. Above all, one senses in all this a total indifference to everyone and everything outside the magic social circle.

It meant that the blithe spirits of the time, enamored of the theatre as superb falsity, had kicked over Victorian restraints as well as ideological solemnity —the previous war above all had to be forgotten. If the revelers had money or proximity to it they could dance in artificial paradises without any thought beyond the luxurious privilege of sparkling in the brilliant atmosphere.

There is no doubt about Coward's special charm. And no one more than Gertrude Lawrence embodied the attractiveness of this lighthearted, romantically scented segment of society which eddied between bright malice and decorative benevolence. Gertrude Lawrence, the first Amanda of Private Lives, was the glowing angel of Coward's orbit.

The current revival (Billy Rose Theatre) is directed by Stephen Porter, who has a gift for flighty comedy (à la Feydeau). Apart from the counter effectiveness of its settings, it is certainly a good production, though it has lit of that silken softness which in t Coward-Lawrence manner goes alo with the crispness. I do not say this disapproval. It is extremely difficult recapture a still remembered mood whi has passed and not yet acquired a patii

Brian Bedford is expert in clarity, ti ing and intelligent delivery of lines, b there is none of Coward's joy-in-wicke ness—as if even his flagellant wit i plied a caress. And while Tammy Grim a pixie if ever there was one, like so oddly fascinating bug or butterfly, is h in top form technically, she is hardly t ideally chic woman of Coward's parti lar fancy. Such creatures have gone w the wind of Vivian Leigh.

Still I must warn the reader that view Private Lives from the "outsid I willingly acknowledge its attractions I do not care for them. Not even as youth in the twenties did I share in myth of the era's lovely frenzy.

ART BOOKS/Lawrence Alloway

ARTISTS

LEON BATTISTA ALBERTI: Universal Man of the Early Renaissance. By Joan Gadol. University of Chicago Press. 64 black-and-white illustrations. 266 pp. $14.50. Alberti well discussed as a representative universal man, not nostalgically but in terms of a complex and coordinated method.

MAX BECKMAN: Memories of a Friendship. By Stefhan Lackner. University of Miami Press. Black-and-white illustrations. 126 pp. $7.95. The author, a friend of the artist, writes touchingly about him. Expressionistic history of Nazism, exile and World War II.

EUGENE BOUDIN. By G. Jean-Aubry and Robert Schmidt. New York Graphic Society. 50 color, 173 black-and-white illustrations. 246 pp. $32.50. Detailed study of the plein-air painter usually treated as a forerunner of Impressionism (he encouraged Monet), but firmly delineated here as his own man. Well illustrated.

THE ARCHITECTURE OF CHARLES BULFINCH. By Harold Kirker. Harvard University Press. 174 black-and-white illustrations. 398 pp. $11.95. Interesting catalogue of the commissions of the "first native American architect"; Boston town houses, churches, statehouses, illustrated and described.

THE BEST OF CHARLES DA GIBSON. Edited by Woody Gelm Crown Publishers. 206 black-and-wh illustrations. 206 pp. $3.95. The sta esque Gibson girls wear better than dimming ironies they so often enact.

ROBERT HENRI AND HIS CIRCI By William Innis Homer with the ass ance of Violet Organ. Cornell Univers Press. 4 color, 66 black-and-white ill trations. 308 pp. $17.50. Sober study the active painter whose basically rea art reveals contacts as wide ranging Gauguin's primitivism, color charts Clive Bell. Detailed and convincing.

KANDINSKY: The Language of Eye. By Paul Overy. Frederick A. Pr ger. 34 color, 35 black-and-white ill trations. 192 pp. $20. Kandinsky's discussed from the related points of v of perception, color symbolism and G talt psychology. A rewarding appro to an artist still curiously underdefine

ALFRED KUBIN. By Wieland Schmi Translated by Jean Steinberg. Freder A. Praeger. 188 illustrations in color black and white. 445 pp. $65. Larg neglected in French and Anglo-Ameri art history, though somewhat overra in German sources, Kubin's Art Nouv diablerie is very well surveyed in catalogue of his graphic work.

JACQUES LIPCHITZ: Sketches

onze. By H. H. Arnason. Frederick A. aeger. 161 black-and-white illustra-ns. 165 pp. $16.50. Lipchitz's clay etches (maquettes) now cast in bronze. om cubism (1914) to JFK memorial 964) related to the finished works by e text.

IETRO LONGHI. By Terisio Pignatti. ranslated by Pamela Waley. Phaidon. t color, 493 black-and-white illustra-ns. 419 pp. $35. Definitive study of 1 18th-century realist, with connections popular culture. On inspection, a much ore vivacious and subtle painter than as supposed. Good details in color.

ENE MAGRITTE. By David Sylvester. rederick A. Praeger. 33 color, 60 black-id-white illustrations. 128 pp. $12.50. xpansion of recent Tate Gallery, Lon-on, exhibition catalogue. Readable essay roposes Magritte's election to a realm f Pascalian silences, which seems too uch.

IICHELANGELO: The Complete culpture. By Frederick Hartt. Harry N. brams. 18 color, 314 black-and-white lustrations. 310 pp. $20. Good photo-raphs of the sculpture, mostly new, ithout emotive chiaroscuro. Dr. Hartt's dmirable directions for looking and his ontextual historical information are lose to the right illustrations.

EN NICHOLSON. By John Russell. larry N. Abrams. 78 color, 220 black-nd-white illustrations. 324 pp. $35. landsome picture book of Nicholson's lacid art that points up his landscape nd architectural references.

LAES OLDENBURG: Drawings and rints. By Gene Baro. Chelsea House ublishers. 20 color, numerous black-and-hite illustrations. 274 pp. $25. Olden-urg's drawings are fluently inventive nd ripe in touch, so this collection is mmensely welcome, though the design f the book is inflated in an Old Master ind of way.

ROPOSALS FOR MONUMENTS ND BUILDINGS 1965-1969. By Claes Oldenburg. Big Table, Chicago. 16 color, 10 black-and-white illustrations. 196 pp. $12.95. Sketches for monuments with otes by the artist and a taped discussion with Paul Carroll, concerning the origins nd intentions of the capricci.

CHARLES WILLSON PEALE. By Charles Coleman Sellers. Charles Scribner's Sons. 11 color, 102 black-and-white illustrations. 510 pp. $20. Scrupulous biography of Peale embedded in an affectionate reconstruction of late 18th- through early 19th-century American society.

PICASSO AND HIS WOMEN. By Jean-Paul Crespelle. Translated by Robert Baldick. Coward-McCann. 222 pp. $7.95. Concentrates on the artist's "seven important liaisons." Vulgar but less irrelevant to Picasso's art than most books of the type.

REMBRANDT, HIS LIFE, HIS WORK, HIS TIME. By Bob Haak. Harry N. Abrams. 109 color, 503 black-and-white illustrations. 348 pp. $35. Luxurious book. The big pages swarm with small comparative illustrations rather than with large-scale Malrauxesque images. Pictures and the clear text are exceptionally well coordinated.

REMBRANDT IN AMSTERDAM. By R. H. Fuchs. New York Graphic Society. 121 black-and-white illustrations. 80 pp. $9.50. Aspects of Rembrandt well revealed by making Amsterdam—as a Dutch city, as an international center—the focus of study.

JOHN SLOAN'S PRINTS. A catalogue raisonné by Peter Morse. Yale University Press. Copious black-and-white illustrations. 406 pp. $50. A strength of American realism is its lively journalistic side, well revealed in Sloan's vivid etchings and lithographs, which show New York as markets, as a village, as Saturday night street life.

TOULOUSE-LAUTREC. By F. Novotny. Phaidon. 32 color, 131 black-and-white illustrations. 198 pp. $18. Sober and perceptive text that locates Toulouse-Lautrec in the relevant art styles of the period.

UNPUBLISHED CORRESPONDENCE OF HENRI de TOULOUSE-LAUTREC. Edited by Lucien Goldschmidt and Herbert Schimmel. Phaidon. 320 pp. $10. Amiable letters that fill in the routine of Toulouse-Lautrec's life but say nothing of interest concerning his art.

VERROCCHIO. by Günter Passavant. Phaidon. 4 color, 316 black-and-white illustrations. 223 pp. $25. Whether or not all the problems of attribution and dating are now settled, this is a well-illustrated and well-written account of Verrocchio's work in all media.

EMBRACE OF LIFE: The Sculpture of Gustav Vigeland. By Nathan Cabot Hale. Harry N. Abrams. 32 color, 277 black-and-white illustrations. 363 pp. $25. The prodigious sculptures of Vigeland, somewhere between Official Art and a Wagnerian dream (actually achieved at the sculpture park near Oslo) of total art. Infatuated text but interesting photographs.

GERMAN ROCOCO: The Zimmerman Brothers. By Henry-Russell Hitchcock. Penguin. 58 black-and-white illustrations. 118 pp. $12.50. Searching study of the architect-decorator brothers, written with Hitchcock's customary data-weighted and energized style.

Art History

THE AESTHETIC MOVEMENT: Prelude to Art Nouveau. By Elizabeth Asin. Frederick A. Praeger. 39 color, 82 black-and-white illustrations. 192 pp. $15. Survey of the crafts of the 1870s-80s. Original research and a keen eye present a synoptic view of a neglected style. First-rate book marred only by the dark, non-Aesthetic, color plates.

THE AVANT-GARDE IN PAINTING. By Germain Bazin. Simon & Schuster. 52 color, 213 black-and-white illustrations. 323 pp. $29.95. Art from Giotto to date. The mainline of Western art is presented not in terms of continuity but as a succession of "breakthroughs" and "anticipations." A preposterous exercise.

A HISTORY OF LATIN AMERICAN ART AND ARCHITECTURE. By Leopoldo Castedo. Translated by Phyllis Freeman. Frederick A. Praeger. Numerous color and black-and-white illustrations. 320 pp. $8.95. Paper $4.95. Immense distances and periods of time bridged without strain by illuminating arguments. Generalizations and a care for data are meshed in a succinct panorama.

ART POVERA. By Germano Celant. Frederick A. Praeger. Numerous black-and-white illustrations. 240 pp. $8.95. Paper $4.95. Anthology of photographs and statements (no sources given, but mostly exhibition catalogues) dealing with the earthworks-conceptual art-situation cluster. Disorganized, but inexpensive.

THE 18TH CENTURY. Edited by Alfred Cobban. McGraw-Hill. 173 color, 416 black-and-white illustrations. 360 pp. $24.95 until May 1970; thereafter $30. Vast Diderotesque overview of sociology, government, war, technology and poverty, with good essays on art (L. D. Ettlinger) and architecture (Sir John Summerson).

THE ART OF ILLUMINATION. By P. d'Ancona and E. Aeschlimann. Phaidon. 24 color, 121 black-and-white illustrations. 235 pp. $24. Tasteful picture book giving instant illumination of a thousand years of the art.

VICTORIAN ADVERTISEMENTS. By Leonard de Vries. J. B. Lippincott. Numerous black-and-white illustrations. 136 pp. $8.95. Funny mélange of magazine ads of 1870-90, particularly the man-machine and woman-machine imagery. The basic consumer appeals seem little different from the 1960s.

THE ARTS IN AMERICA: The 19th Century. By Wendell D. Garrett and others. Charles Scribner's Sons. Numerous illustrations. 412 pp. $17.50 until December 31; thereafter $20. Clear and unrestrictive account of 19th-century American arts and crafts with space for Howard Pyle as well as Mary Cassatt, for a mid-century Elizabethan revival style as well as Tiffany.

ALFONSO II AND THE ARTISTIC RENEWAL OF NAPLES, 1485-1495. By George L. Hersey. Yale University Press. 175 black-and-white illustrations. 118 pp. $12.50. The arts, architecture, defenses and history of Naples, centered on Alfonso II as a Renaissance man in full operation. Significant addition to the study of late 15th-century culture.

WORLD TAPESTRY. By Madeleine Jarry. G. P. Putnam. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 358 pp. $25 until January 1; thereafter $30. Routine profile of tapestry as an art up to the so-called revival of Lurçat.

IMPRESSIONIST DRAWINGS FROM MANET TO RENOIR. By Jean Leymarie. Translated by Robert Allen. Skira. 11 color, 51 black-and-white illustrations. 104 pp. $7.95. There are as many Post-Impressionist as Impressionist drawings, nicely reproduced, with pleasant appreciative notes by Leymarie (who should be writing better things).

VICTORIAN PAINTERS. By Jeremy Maas. G. P. Putnam. Numerous color and black-and-white illustrations. 272 pp. $19.95 until January 1; thereafter $22.50. Nineteenth-century art is now out from under the early 20th-century modernists and is visible as a rich, complex and fantastic field. Maas's survey is excellent with many unfamiliar and highly relevant works reproduced.

ART OF ANCIENT EGYPT. By Kazimierz Michalowski. Harry N. Abrams. 145 color, 759 black-and-white illustrations. 600 pp. $40. Coherent overview of Egyptian arts with good illustrations. The systematic presentation of data is admirably sustained; order and argument take precedent over approximation or evocation.

THE ART OF ANCIENT MESOPOTAMIA. By Anton Moortgat. Phaidon. 300 black-and-white illustrations. 356 pp. $18.50. Succinct but unhurried account of classical Mesopotamian art from 3000 B.C. to 550 B.C. Controlled and informative.

NORTON CRITICAL STUDIES IN ART HISTORY. W. W. Norton.
CHARTRES CATHEDRAL. Edited by Robert Branner. 4 color, 121 black-and-white illustrations. 278 pp. $6.95.
GIOTTO: The Arena Chapel Frescoes. Edited by James H. Stubblebine. 129 black-and-white illustrations. 218 pp. $6.50.
RUBENS: The Antwerp Altarpieces. Edited by John R. Martin. 4 color, 37 black-and-white illustrations. 132 pp. $5.95.
New series with illustrations, documents and essays by different writers that set key works in a solid context of monolingual (everything is translated) art history. Good in principle and in execution.

A HISTORY OF MEXICAN MURAL PAINTING. By Antonio Rodriguez. Translated by Marina Corby. G. P. Putnam. 56 color, 256 black-and-white illustrations. 517 pp. $27.50 until January 1; thereafter $30. Lavishly illustrated and copiously informative account of the only sustained 20th-century reconciliation of art and a revolutionary society.

DADA AND SURREALIST ART. By William S. Rubin. Harry N. Abrams. 60 color, 791 black-and-white illustrations. 525 pp. $35. This is the massive book of which last year's Surrealist show at the Museum of Modern Art was a by-product. A detailed and unified survey of both movements with their relations to 20th-century art as a whole indicated.

POP ART REDEFINED. By John Russell and Suzi Gablik. Frederick A. Praeger. 17 color, 126 black-and-white illustrations. 240 pp. $8.95. Paper $4.95. Catalogue of recent London exhibition. Fast-paced survey, with reprinted documents, of American and British Pop artists. Illustrations grouped iconographically (bathrooms, Cokes, comics).

MASTER PRINTS OF JAPAN. By Harold P. Stern. Harry N. Abrams. 127 color, 36 black-and-white illustrations. 324 pp. $18.50. Charming collection of 17th-19th century prints, with a commentary that converts the exotic into its topical and naturalistic original meanings.

ARTISTS AND ILLUSTRATORS OF THE OLD WEST, 1850-1900. By Robert Taft. Charles Scribner's Sons. black-and-white illustrations. 400 pp. $ Reprint of a classic study of art (pai ing, sculpture) and popular art (illust tions) of the Western scene. Indispensa work on a decisive period of ima making.

THE ART OF EUROPE: The Da Ages. By Paolo Verzone. Translated Pamela Waley. Crown Publishers. color, 21 black-and-white illustratio 276 pp. $6.95. Concise introduction a period (fifth to eighth centuries A.D among the least known of European h tory.

CRITICISM

SARTRE AND THE ARTIST. George Howard Bauer. University Chicago Press. 32 black-and-white illu trations. 200 pp. $8.50. Excellent e amination, occasionally constricted its thesis origins, of Sartre's strange vie of artists, caught as they are in his vie of art. His pieces on Tintoretto and G cometti are masterpieces of some sort.

A YEAR FROM MONDAY. By Joh Cage. Wesleyan University Press. 1 pp. $7.92. Writings, 1963-67. Spatializ typography that is iconic to Cage's sen of multiplicity and connectivity. With the word shower his thought is as co and clear as ever.

KITSCH: The World of Bad Taste. E ited by Gillo Dorfles. Universe Book Numerous illustrations. 313 pp. $10. 1 coherent editing of articles by vario contributors, some good, on a fascinatin area, but the campy fun of the illustr tions swamps the text.

PLASTICS AS AN ART FORM. Thelma R. Newman. Chilton Book C 4 color, and numerous black-and-whi illustrations. 403 pp. $12.50. Plastics a replacing welding for modern folk scul ture. Deplorable illustrations mostly, b the book is useful for technical workin procedures.

MUSIC: Mirror of the Arts. By Ala Rich. Frederick A. Praeger. Numero color and black-and-white illustration 288 pp. $15. Instead of discussing th influence of Wagner on the visual art the author prints the picture of a Luc wig II castle. Doubtful parallels a evoked and exact connections (music an architecture in the 16th century) go u discussed.

AMERICAN ARCHITECTURE AN URBANISM. By Vincent Scully. Fred erick A. Praeger. 525 black-and-white i strations. 275 pp. $18.50. Architecture scussed not in terms of individual monuents, but as social relationships. Posbly started as a polemic against archictural formalism, but spurred by recent ty violence toward a potentially global iew of the man-made spaces.

ELF-REVEALMENT: A Memoir. By 'aphael Soyer. Random House. Color nd black-and-white illustrations. 118 pp. 12.50. These essays (1966-68) by a entle Expressionist do not fulfill the tle. They consist of brief reflections, in ne first person, but entirely public, about rt and artists.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

The possibility that there might be no Metropolitan Opera season this winter, or perhaps even in 1970-71, has been around long enough to engender some speculation about what might be a rational basis for operatic production in New York should the present dispensation actually collapse. Although at the time of writing the prospects for settlement of the labor dispute seem favorable, a little "what-if" still seems in order, for the reason that the next turning point in the Metropolitan's history is just around the corner, as operatic planning goes.

The basic fact is that Rudolf Bing's present contract expires at the end of the 1971-72 season, and is unlikely to be renewed in the wake of this year's debacle; the labor contracts currently under negotiations will expire at the same time, and another financial crisis will doubtless be at hand. There is no reason to believe that the musicians will not once again attempt to improve wages and working conditions, and management will as surely answer by pointing to its already staggering deficit. One trusts that the lockout tactics threatened in 1961 and actually used this year will not be repeated; but, given the 18th-century view of labor relations that pervades at least part of the Met board of directors, it is not impossible. (This philosophy is expressed in such terms as "Why should they want a lot of money when they get to play all that glorious music?" Doubtless the men who play the double-bass parts of Aida year in and year out have their own answer to the question. The similar "logic" that maybe the same principle should be applied to the Sutherlands, Nilssons and Corellis, who are now paid as much for a few evenings of singing "that glorious music" as an orchestra player makes over a whole year, would probably not find favor.)

Discontent among the regular musical employees at the Met has been chronic for years, and management has not been sensitive to it. It has not, for example, considered the possibility that the chorus might find pleas of excessive deficits unconvincing in view of the expensive costumes they are given to wear, or the manifold other extravagances (see Alan Rich's excellent columns in New York, November 24 and December 1, for interesting points on this and related issues). And good will was hardly increased this year when the lockout strategy was bolstered by a crude (although unsuccessful) court action to prevent the employees from receiving unemployment insurance. In the circumstances, the union's intransigence was understandable, if deplorable.

The "Metropolitan way" of presenting opera has been one of the underlying causes for the Met's labor troubles, as it is also fundamental to the institution's wider malaise. There is little evidence that it represents a coherent policy, is anything more than the accumulated habits and idées reçues of decades of making do. That the seven-shows-a-week, thirty-one-weeks-a-year, cast-as-catch-can, star-and-scenery-oriented repertory-theatre approach does not get satisfactory results is obvious (certainly to professional musicians, few of whom—singers aside—are often to be seen in the Met's audiences). There are, in fact, other ways of planning a season, of scheduling performances, of selling tickets—in sum, of running an opera company, and a serious study of alternative possibilities is long overdue.

Since the company's public financial statements are phrased in only the most general terms, no outsider is in a position to guess what effect other ways of doing things might have on the fabled deficit, but the following questions are worth asking: Is it necessary to stage so many productions that the majority of them are under-rehearsed or routine? Is it not possible to arrange things so that casts remain substantially intact for the run of an opera? Can access be had to another, smaller theatre that could be used for works conspicuously ill-suited to the present house? (I am thinking, obviously, of the new opera theatre in the Juilliard School.) What about a series of simply staged or concert performances that would permit the exploration of new works and of long unheard ones, the most successful of which could then later be given full-scale presentation? (One of Rich's interesting discoveries was that at least some of the musicians long to escape from the rut of endlessly repeating the same few dozen operas.) Might not a stagione arrangement (one production at a time, rather than the present semi-repertory system) get better results? How about charging extra prices for "culinary operas" (the singer showpieces)?

To be sure, all such avenues ought to have been explored before the construction of the new opera house at Lincoln Center limited the range of possibilities. But a resourceful management might be able to recapture a degree of flexibility even now. When Bing came, his focus on the visual aspect of opera was a welcome counterbalance to years of neglect, but the sacred cow of "new productions" has run amok in recent years, producing such senseless monstrosities as the Barrault Carmen and the Colonnello Trovatore. What is needed now is the same fresh emphasis on opera as an art involving both theatre and music—not merely at the executive level (the most elegant staging of a Mozart opera is in vain if the sounds emanating from pit and stage are soggy and unkempt) but also at the planning level. Anyone acquainted with the history of opera can give you a list as long as your arm of works that haven't been done at the Met, works at least as valid as some of the turgid monstrosities that have been staged to pamper the vanity of favored sopranos.

What this suggests, to me anyway, is that—in addition to re-evaluating the entire operation—the powers that be in the opera company should conceive their next managerial appointment as having more than a passing relation to musical

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 12-22-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State ..... Zip No. .....

questions (by which I do not mean singing!). The choice should take place in consultation with professional musicians, and the revolutionary suggestion might even be ventured that the company's regular musical employees should have some representation on the committee that makes the nominations. Conceivably a team will be the best solution, but the musical decisions must be in the hands of a musician—someone who will have the respect of the professionals working regularly in the house and of others whose guest appearances would be desirable; someone who knows the operatic literature (as distinct from the present repertory) and is in touch with current events in the world of composition. Only such a person has much hope of breathing new life into what will otherwise become the white elephant of Lincoln Center.

Books By Nation Contributors

We list below books published in 1969 by writers who have appeared in The Nation this year. This compilation, a regular year-end feature, may prove useful for gift-giving suggestions.

SAUL D. ALINSKY. Reveille for Radicals (reprint). Random House. Paper $1.65.

JACK ANDERSON. The Hurricane Lamp. New American & Canadian Poetry. $1.50.

The Invention of New Jersey. University of Pittsburgh Press. $4.25. Paper $2.25.

ALBERT AXELBANK. Soul of Gobi. Kodansha (Japan). $3.75.

MARVIN BELL. A Probable Volume of Dreams. Atheneum. $3.95.

SIDNEY BERNARD. This Way to the Apocalypse. The Smith. $5.95.

PAUL BLACKBURN (translator). Cronopios and Famas. By Julio Cortázar. Pantheon Books. $4.95.

F. YORICK BLUMENFELD. Seesaw: Cultural Life in Eastern Europe. Harcourt, Brace & World. $5.95.

ROBERT BLY. The Morning Glory. Kayak Books. $1.50.

Forty Poems of Juan Ramon Jimenez (translator). Sixties Books. $1.

T. B. BOTTOMORE. Critics of Society (new edition with additional chapter). Pantheon Books. $4.95. Paper $1.45.

GEORGE BOWERING. Rocky Mountain Foot. McClelland & Stewart (Toronto). $3.95.

The Gangs of Kosmos. House of Anansi (Toronto). $1.95.

ANDREW BOYD. Holy War In Belfast. Anvil Books (Ireland). 8/6.

LENNART BRUCE. Moments of Doubt. Cloud Marauder Press. $1.50.

KENNETH BURKE. A Grammar of Motives (reprint). University of California Press. $10. Paper $2.95.

A Rhetoric of Motives (reprint). University of California Press. $8.50. Paper $2.25.

JOHN M. CAMMETT. Antonio Gramsci and the Origins of Italian Communism (reprint). Stanford University Press. Paper $2.95.

ANGELA CARTER. Several Perceptions. Simon & Schuster. $2.50.

Heroes and Villains. William Heinemann (England). 30s.

The Magic Toyshop. Pan Books (England). Paper 4s.

STANLEY COOPERMAN. The Day of the Parrot (2d edition). University of Nebraska Press. $3.50. Paper $1.65.

The Owl Behind the Door. McClelland & Stewart (Toronto). $3.95.

EDWARD COWAN. Oil and Water: The Torrey Canyon Disaster (reprint). Wm. Kimber (England).

ED CRAY. The Erotic Muse. Oak Publications. $12.50.

Law Enforcement: The Matter of Redress. Institute of Modern Legal Thought. $5.

ROGER H. DAVIDSON. The Role of the Congressman. Pegasus. $6.95. Paper $2.25.

WARREN DEAN. Industrialization of Sao Paulo. University of Texas. $7.50.

MELVYN DUBOFSKY. We Shall Be All: A History of the IWW. Quadrangle Books. $12.50.

SIDNEY DU BROFF. Woe to the Rebellious Children (Dutch translation). Editions Walter Beckers (Belgium).

WILLIAM EASTLAKE. The Bamb Bed. Simon & Schuster. $6.50.

GEORGE P. ELLIOTT. From t Berkeley Hills. Harper & Row. $4.9

RICHARD M. ELMAN. The Recko ing. Charles Scribner. $5.95.

AMITAI ETZIONI (with Philip Ehre saft). Anatomies of America. T Macmillan Co. $8.95.

The Semi-Professions and Their C ganization (editor). The Macmill Co. $10.95.

GERALD FEINBERG. The Promethe Project. Doubleday. $4.95. Pap $1.45.

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI. T Secret Meaning of Things. New Dire tions. $3.95. Paper $1.

Tyrannus Nix? New Directions. Pap $1.25.

C. P. FITZGERALD. The Chinese Vie of Their Place in the World (3d r print with postscript). Chatha House (England). Paper 6s.

MERVIN B. FREEDMAN (co-auth with Joseph Axelrod). Search for Rel vance. Jossey-Bass (San Francisco $7.75.

MARYSA NAVARRO GERASSI. L Nacionalistas. Jorge Alvarez (Buen Aires).

HARRY GOLDEN. The Right Tim G. P. Putnam. $6.95.

Ess, Ess, Mein Kindt. G. P. Putnan Paper 75c.

MICHAEL GOLDMAN. At the Edg The Macmillan Co. $4.95.

JOSEPH C. GOULDEN. Truth Is th First Casualty: The Gulf of Tonk Affair—Illusion and Reality. Ran McNally. $6.95.

J. DAVID GREENSTONE. Labor American Politics. Knopf. $8.50.

ERNEST GRUENING (with Herbe Beaser). Vietnam Folly. The Nation Press. $8.75.

DONALD HALL. The Alligator Brid poems new and selected. Harper Row. $4.95.

JOHN HATCH. The History of Britai in Africa. Praeger Publishers. $8.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES. Coat on a Stick Indiana University Press. $4.50.

OSEPHINE JOHNSON. The Inland Island. Simon & Schuster. $5.

OHN JUDSON. Surreal Songs (2d edition). Juniper Books. $1.

Within Seasons. Colby College Press. $2.

ENRY S. KARIEL. Open Systems: Arenas for Public Action. F. E. Peacock. $3.95.

DAVE KELLY. All Here Together. Lillabulero Press. $1.

Summer Study. Runcible Spoon. $1.

STANLEY KIESEL. The Pearl is a Hardened Sinner: Notes from Kindergarten (2d printing). Charles Scribner. $3.95.

MAX KOZLOFF. Renderings: Critical Essays on a Century of Modern Art. Simon & Schuster. $7.50. Paper $2.95.

Jasper Johns. Harry N. Abrams. $25.

ALEXANDER LAING. Jonathan Eagle. Bantam Books. Paper 95c.

KENNETH LAMOTT. The Moneymakers. Little, Brown & Co. $6.75.

JAMES LIGHT. The Modern Age. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. $6.95.

LEE LOCKWOOD. Castro's Cuba, Cuba's Fidel (reprint). Vintage. Paper $2.95.

Conversations with Eldridge Cleaver. McGraw-Hill. $4.95.

JOHN LOGAN. The Zig-Zag Walk. E. P. Dutton. $5.95. Paper $2.45.

THEODORE J. LOWI. The End of Liberalism. W. W. Norton. $6.95.

MARION MAINWARING (translator). Three Novellas. By Ivan Turgenev. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $5.95.

MANUEL MALDONADO-DENIS. Puerto Rico: una interpretación histórico-social. Siglo XXI Editores (Mexico). $3.

Puerto Rico: Mito y Realidad. Editiones 62 (Barcelona).

WESLEY MARX. The Frail Ocean (reprint). Ballantine-Sierra Club. Paper 95c.

EVE MERRIAM. The Inner City Mother Goose. Simon & Schuster. $4.95. Paper $1.95.

Montgomery, Alabama, Money, Mississippi and Other Places (reprint). Telstar Productions. Paper $1.

MORTON MINTZ. The Pill: An Alarming Report. Fawcett. Paper 75c.

FREDERIC MORTON. Snow Gods. World Publishing. $5.95. Paper $1.25.

A. Q. MOWBRAY. Road to Ruin. J. B. Lippincott. $5.95.

JULIUS NOVICK. Beyond Broadway: The Quest for Permanent Theatres (reprint). Hill & Wang. Paper $2.95.

JAMES O'CONNOR. The Origins of Socialism in Cuba. Cornell University Press. $10.

MARTIN OPPENHEIMER. The Urban Guerrilla. Quadrangle Books. $5.50.

GARY ORFIELD. The Reconstruction of Southern Education, The Schools and the 1964 Civil Rights Act. John Wiley & Sons. $9.95.

PHILIP DARRAUGH ORTEGO (with Carl L. Rosen). Problems and Strategies in Teaching the Language Arts to Spanish-Speaking Mexican American Children. U.S. Office of Education (ERIC/CRESS).

Issues in Language and Reading Instruction of Spanish-Speaking Children (with Carl L. Rosen). International Reading Association.

NANCY REEVES. Stereotypes of Woman's Place. Dept. of Printing and Publication, UCLA. Paper $2.

ADRIENNE RICH. Leaflets. W. W. Norton. Paper $1.95.

PAUL ROAZEN. Brother Animal: The Story of Freud and Tausk. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.95.

CAROLYN M. RODGERS. Songs of a Blackbird. Third World Press. Paper $1.25.

M. L. ROSENTHAL. Beyond Power: New Poems. Oxford University Press. $3.95.

The New Poetry: An Anthology of American and British Poetry Since World War II (reprint). Oxford University Press. Paper $2.50.

The William Carlos Williams Reader (reprint). New Directions. Paper $3.25.

THEODORE ROSZAK. The Making of a Counter Culture. Doubleday. $7.95. Paper $1.95.

ANTHONY RUDOLF (translator). Selected Poems of Yves Bonnefoy. Grossman Publishers. $3.50. Paper $1.50.

R. V. SAMPSON. Equality and Power (English edition of The Psychology of Power). Wm. Heineman. Paper 12/6.

EDWARD SCHNEIER. Policy-Making in American Government. Basic Books. Paper $4.95.

ARMAND SCHWERNER. Seaweed. Black Sparrow Press. $4.

JOHN ANTHONY SCOTT. Trumpet of a Prophecy. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.95.

Living Documents in American History (reprint). Washington Square Press. Paper $1.40.

CHARLES SHAPIRO (editor). Contemporary British Novelists (reprint). Southern Illinois University Press. Paper $2.25.

A Guide to Theodore Dreiser. Charles E. Merrill. Paper 75c.

MICHAEL SHEEHY. Is Ireland Dying: Culture and the Church in Modern Ireland. Taplinger. $5.95.

ROBERT G. SHERRILL. Gothic Politics in the Deep South (reprint). Ballantine. Paper 95c.

ROBERT SKLAR. F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoön (reprint). Oxford University Press. Paper $2.25.

RALPH LEE SMITH. At Your Own Risk: The Case Against Chiropractic. Trident Press. $4.95. Paper 95c.

GEORGE STADE (co-editor with F. W. Dupee). Selected Letters of E. E. Cummings. Harcourt, Brace & World. $8.95.

RICHARD STERN. Honey and Wax. University of California Press. $3.95.

Stitch (reprint). Pan (England). 15s.

SHANE STEVENS. Go Down Dead (reprint). Pocket Books. 75c.

JOHN TAGLIABUE. A Japanese Journal. Kayak Press. $1.50.

MICHAEL TANZER. The Political Economy of International Oil and the Underdeveloped Countries. Beacon Press. $12.50.

HANS TOCH. Violent Men. Aldine. $7.50.

CHARLES A. VALENTINE. Culture and Poverty (reprint). University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

JON M. VAN DYKE. North Vietnam's Strategy for Survival. Pacific Books. $7.95.

RICHARD J. WALTON. America and the Cold War (young adult). Seabury Press. $4.95.

JAMES WEINSTEIN. The Corporate Ideal in the Liberal State, 1900-1918 (reprint). Beacon Press. Paper $2.95.

The Decline of Socialism in America, 1912-1925 (reprint). Vintage. Paper $2.45.

KINGSLEY WIDMER. On Refusing: Personal Preface to a Handbook on Selective Trouble-Making. Pendejo Press (Vancouver, B.C.). Paper $1.

Culture and Freedom: Problems of Literary Censorship for the Seventies (co-editor with Eleanor Widmer). Wadsworth Publishing. Paper $2.95.

WILLIAM A. WITHERUP. This Endless Malice: Translations of Enrique Lihn. Lillabulero Press. $1.50.

Sangre de Cristo: Mountain Poems. Lillabulero Press. $1.

PUBLICATIONS

Christmas—The Star of Bethlehem—Peace on Earth—look up to the stars
Magic archetype symbols—The Healing Word

Learn in three days

"The Language of Space"

(Chand & Co.) (Delhi, India) | Cosmic Communication Co. Decorah, Iowa 52101

250 pp. 100 illlustr. hard-linen $5.-, soft $4.-, sound tape $2.-

With Play-rules for kids 9 years+, Meditation on Meaning, Logos of Love, Dissolves the Slavery of Slogans

"We learn to think", Rev. Prof. Hanson; "Creative play, education to essence", Prof. Kainz, Academy of Science.

AN AMAZING JOURNEY into the world of books. Thousands of out-of-print and forgotten works now beautifully reprinted and available. Send for free 140 page catalogue. Johnson Reprint Corporation, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10003.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 100 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

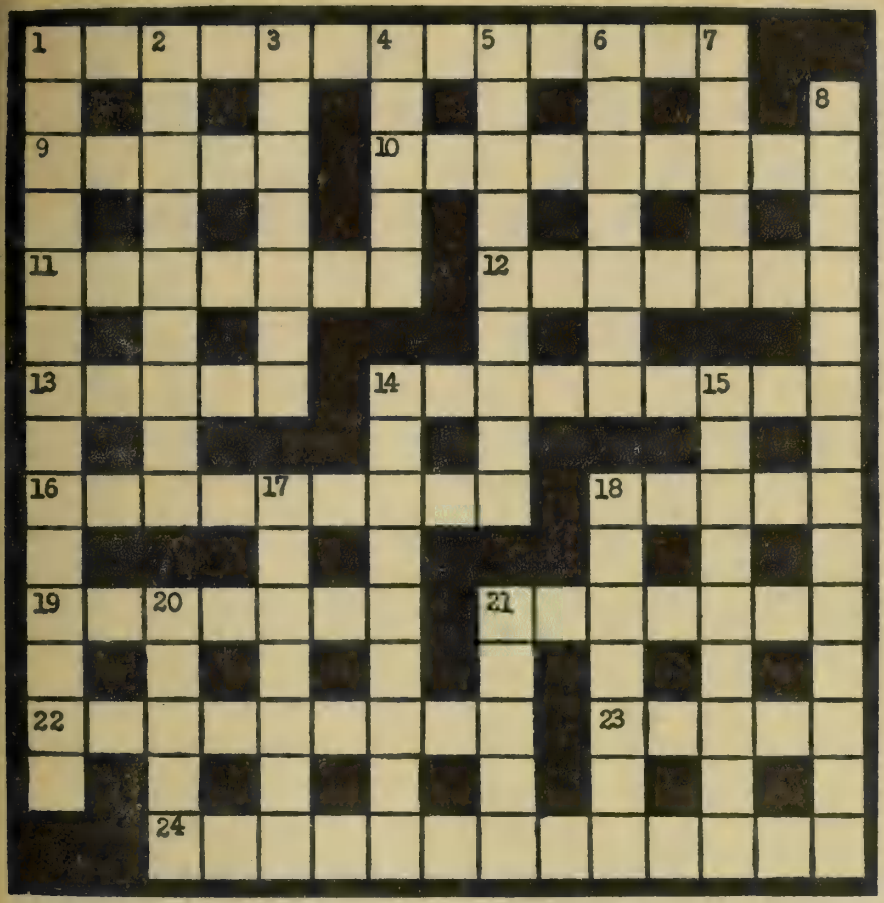
FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

At the afternoon performance of Costa-Gavras' Z that I attended, the audience burst into applause as the lights came up. That happens in movie houses only when the audience is deeply moved.

Z is an extremely adroit, indeed polished, thriller, but it is a picture that stays pretty much on the active surface of events, and that sort of thing does not usually move filmgoers to overt response. I suspect that the applause was politically triggered, and that to a considerable degree it was defensive.

Z is an adaptation from a novel that is based rather closely as to facts on a political assassination that occurred in Salonika a few years before the colonels' coup, and that was one of the events leading up to the capture of Greece by that tyrannical group. It was filmed in Algiers with a predominantly French cast (Irene Papas plays an affecting but entirely subordinate part as the bereaved widow of the murdered deputy). From the start, it is apparent that the police and judicial authorities are indifferent to the fate of the deputy (unnamed in the picture; Gregarios Lambrakis in real life) because he speaks for the liberal, anti-NATO opposition; but as the narrative develops it becomes evident that those exercising power are much worse than indifferent. An intrepid investigating judge —chosen for the case, presumably, because his background promises dutiful respect for the status quo—exposes the murder as a plot instigated at and directed from the highest level. He manages, helped by the courage of a few small people and despite the obstacles presented by a few very grand people, to indict the guilty; but he does not manage to bring them to justice—indeed, he does not live to bring them to justice.



All this is told in the vocabulary of sickening violence (government-hired goons, many of them psychopathic), lethal chases and spine-tingling confrontations of nerve. If the film had a serious social intent—and, given the subject, it would imply a disagreeable opportunism on the part of those who made it to assume that it did not—its style works against its content. Z is heavy with calculated entertainment devices—operating-room mumbo jumbo, a wrestling match in the body of a careening open truck, a car used as a weapon, a comic interlude in the midst of great peril, scintillating forensic dueling, battles royal. These, as well as the black-and-white characterizations (an exception is an amoral young reporter/cameraman, played by Jacques Perrin, who gradually and quite subtly forms his allegiance), and the appeal to emotion through automatic response to brutality and tears, keeps the proceedings safely within the context of amusement. Indeed, one could ask, as a matter of taste, whether the present sorrows of Greece should be used for such a showy entertainment. I note that the picture concludes with a recited précis of the elimination of justice and freedom that came in the wake of the Lambrakis affair, but that does not offset the Le Carré tone of the main action, particularly when it is climaxed with a bulletin-board listing of the more ludicrous suppressions imposed by the provincial and philistine clique now in control.

The film is also removed from any immediately pressing context because it is so redolently French. That could hardly be avoided with such conspicuous Frenchmen as Yves Montand and Jean-Louis Trintignant playing the deputy and his avenger, but it is not a question of singling out this and that performer and saying that his presence and behavior are not what one would expect of a Greek. Many individual Greeks may well look and act like many individuals in this cast, but taken as a whole this company is powerfully Gallic in its gestures, responses and ironic humor. So much is this so that I had continually to remind myself that it was not a melodrama drawn from the machinations of the French military in Algeria in the months before de Gaulle returned to power.

I am left still with the question of why the audience applauded, why Z will certainly be one of the most successful and most discussed releases of the winter. I think the applause may be a sort of exorcism, that the public may be comforted by the picture just because it is so manifestly a make-believe transformation of history. Line after line of the dialogue—the contempt for youth, the appeal to gut patriotism, the obsession with image, the hatred of nonconformity—come shudderingly close to home. The deliberate polarization of the community, the flattery of the rabble, the condoning of their outrages as the understandable reaction to minority views, the manipulation of the police in ideological contexts are all phenomena that few Americans can dismiss as exotic curiosities. And yet they are here presented as though they were strange and diverting. The audience does not applaud because Greek democracy was betrayed but because American democracy still permits the betrayal to be enacted. And the enactment eases the spectators' own forebodings, if it does, because it seems so evidently designed to amuse rather than instruct. Fiction can be relied upon not to come true. Well, usually it can, and no doubt it will so prove in this case. But exorcism by melodrama is not inevitably reliable, and I felt no impulse to clap my hands at this brilliantly executed thriller based on another people's catastrophe.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1326

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Some crumble an otherwise proportionate mixture. (13)
9 Barely descriptive of a not-quite-literary stranger. (5)
10 Behead a sort of of merry old king with 23. (9)
11 and 12 Declare one's intention to be the specific reason for something? (7,7)
13 Prolonged laughter as one hears what the ecdysiast does. (5)
14 Billy, according to the English. (9)
16 What's in a mere exam in English? Study some more! (9)
18 Just desert of triangular appearance. (5)
19 Refuse to make it, perhaps. (7)
21 A pleasant-odored terpene ketone. (7)
22 Bad cheaters should be equivalent. (9)
23 Possibly connected with a running-off at the mouth? (A letter might be better.) (5)
24 A little too excited? (Evidently carried setting up to extremes.) (13)

DOWN

1 Things in opposition about a badly-written poem for those who live with us. (14)
2 One who smooths things over might be only middling as a writer. (9)
3 "Eternal" might describe the circle more than the triangle. (7)
4 Never taken in the objective case. (5)
5 Take again, for example, a slangy review on a true-false base. (9)
6 Diagonal belt. (7)
7 Time to muse? (5)
8 Things permanently out of orbit may seem to, when the place isn't real. (5-5,4)
14 Both hinge, in a way, on the skeleton. (5,4)
15 Chicken out? These are bound to be broken then. (9)
17 How to instill life in a team which is badly shaken? (7)
18 It might be difficult to fix such a type. (7)
20 Rub one the wrong way without direction, like the founder of the Carthusian order. (5)
21 Rank actors, by the sound of it! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1325

ACROSS: 1 Great-grandchild; 9 Sacred cow; 10 Evade; 11 Indian; 12 Inchworm; 14 Gradient; 16 Stair; 17 Chain; 18 Cremonas; 20 Nail file; 21 Bargee; 24 Cited; 25 Tradition; 26 Loch Ness Monster. DOWN: 1 Gossip; 2 El Cid; 3 The Garden of Eden; 4 Race; 5 Now and then; 6 Czechoslovakian; 7 Inamorata; 8 Dreamer; 13 Percolates; 15 Realistic; 17 Cynical; 19 Keener; 22 Grist; 23 Barm.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

INCENSED!? Today's politics are making you mad but you haven't found time to write your Congressman? Let us do it for you. Send us $1 and a brief description of the content and we'll send you the finished letter, unsigned, individually typed, along with an envelope addressed to your Congressman. Letter Service, P.O. Box 8267, Emeryville, Ca. 94608

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WRITING, EDITING, RESEARCH by published writer, Contemporary Authors and Who's Who biographee, free-lance basis. Moderate fees. Box 633, c/o The Nation.

MOVING can be pleasant. Call LAKETON VANS. Licensed, insured, reliable. Low Rates. (212) 672-5092.

WELL-KNOWN BOOK REVIEWER: Publishers' reader; reviews—revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 632, c/o The Nation.

PERSONALS

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

WANTED-MY LADY OF THE ISLAND. Ann is blonde and beautiful. Send her: Chatham-Edinburgh. A. Higgins, Holland House, 69 Dalkeith Rd., Edinburgh, Scotland.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE — needs to love. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City 10017.

POSTERS (over 175, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 225), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Millard Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Feeling Less Than Festive This Holiday Season?

If so, you're not alone. This hasn't been a very joyful year for our country, and you may even be wondering about an appropriate gift for your friends and family.

Why not consider giving holiday subscriptions to The NATION? The NATION is a magazine which takes its job seriously, which still believes in offering sound reason and research instead of platitudes and preconceptions.

Our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one. Each gift subscription will bring your friends and relatives information and entertainment every week of the coming year. And if you act now, we will send you SMOKING AND POLITICS by A. Lee Fritschler, as our holiday gift to you.

clip & mail

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY ..... STATE ..... ZIP .....

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free SMOKING AND POLITICS. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N 12-22-69

BORGES STANTON HOFFMAN

THE NATION

DECEMBER 29, 1969 35 cents

S-7[illegible] PL-1926
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
LIBRARY
1969

BETWEEN GLORY AND DISASTER

The Vanity of Humanism RONALD SAMPSON

Ethics and Social Struggle BARROWS DUNHAM

The Vandal Ideology SCOTT PARADISE

J. H. Plumb on The Enlightenment

LETTERS

Song My in context

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Song My was not an isolated incident. The massacres at Chan Son and Cam He and many others were amply reported by the Western news media. Two years ago at Stockholm and Copenhagen the War Crimes Tribunal sponsored by the Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation exhaustively examined the record compiled by Western news sources dealing with our actions in Vietnam. The painstakingly documented massive volume of irrefutable evidence of war crimes, "Against the Crime of Silence," is a horror story.

Had the American public been permitted to be properly informed about our country's actions in Vietnam instead of misled by the con men in the White House, Pentagon and State Department, Song My might not have happened —unless our degradation has reached that of Germany of World War II.

Theodore Schoenman

Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: Such reports as we have received of the massacres of the civilians in Vietnam are indeed atrocious. But we should not allow them, or our justified sorrow and indignation to blind us to the much more important fact that our whole conduct of this war has been atrocious, and indeed that there is no way to wage war against a whole people on their own soil that is not atrocious. . . . It is for this reason more than any other that we should immediately end our murderous meddling in the affairs of the people of Vietnam, and without delay take all our troops out of their country.

John Holt

exiles of conscience

Watertown, N.Y.

DEAR SIRS: Persons wanting to help young draft exiles in Canada who went north in preference to having their bodies shipped to Vietnam may do so by sending cash, money order or checks (on any U.S. bank) to Dr. Charles Forsyth, United Church of Canada, 85 St. Clair Ave. East, Toronto, Canada. Gifts will be distributed according to need in the various cities where these sons and brothers of ours are living. . . .

These so-called "draft dodgers" . . . are logical products of our famous American teaching that one should follow conscience first: for taking this adage seriously we label them felons, unfit to live here, meanwhile boasting of our great-grandfathers who fled from Germany for the same reason.

Many are utterly without funds, disowned by their families, and possessing only the clothing they wear, with the chill Canadian winter setting in. Persons wanting to send parcels as well as cash may obtain mailing directions from the writer of this letter.

Graham R. Hodges
123 South Hamilton Street

correction

Cleveland Heights, Ohio

DEAR SIRS: In my report on the Democratic Party in Ohio [The Nation, Dec. 1], I stated that John J. Gilligan failed to wrest the Senatorial nomination from Frank J. Lausche in the primary elections. In fact, Gilligan did win in the primaries, but was then defeated in the general election. I apologize for this slip of memory.

Gene I. Maeroff

EDITORIALS

The Ghost of Geneva

The ghost of the League of Nations has caught up with the United States to condemn the use of tear gas and defoliants in Vietnam. Washington found itself completely isolated when the General Assembly approved a Swedish resolution to declare the use of any chemical agents of warfare "contrary to the generally recognized rules of international law as embodied in the Geneva Protocol of 1925." That Protocol, drafted under the auspices of the League, prohibited "the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases and bacteriological methods of warfare." In the forty-four intervening years, it has been ratified by more than eighty countries, including the old and new Chinas, but not by the United States.

Prompted by Congressional murmurs and possibly also by the scheduled UN debate, President Nixon announced with great fanfare on November 25 that he was about to submit the Geneva Protocol to the Senate for ratification. At the same time, he took the significant step of renouncing biological weapons entirely. However, in regard to chemical agents, he stated only that the United States would not be the first to use "lethal" and "incapacitating" chemicals in warfare, a phrasing designed to exclude from his ban the so-called "harassing agents," that is tear gas and defoliants, the main chemicals now being used by the U. S. Army in Vietnam.

A report just prepared by the World Health Organization holds that "no sharp demarcation line can be drawn between harassing agents and other anti-personnel chemical agents because harassing agents may be used in war in conjunction with high explosive, fragmentation or other weapons to increase the lethal effectiveness of the latter." This, in layman's terms, refers to the practice of using tear gas and defoliants to smoke out the enemy from his places of cover, so that he becomes an easy target for more "conventional" weapons. The WHO also warns of possible genetic damage from herbicides.

UN Secretary-General U Thant has been particularly disturbed by the systematic destruction of the Vietnamese countryside, and has taken the unusual step of recommending to the member governments that they "make a clear affirmation that the prohibition contained in the Geneva Protocol applies to the use in war of all chemical, bacteriological and biological agents (including tear gas and other harassing agents), which now exist or which may be developed in the future." The Swedish resolution adopted by the Assembly endorsed this report by the Secretary-General.

American officials tried hard to dissuade Sweden from pressing its proposal, hinting that it would make Senate ratification of the Protocol more difficult. But Stockholm, bitter in its attitude toward American involvement in Vietnam, did not oblige. The Swedish delegation could count on the support of many countries critical of the Vietnamese War in particular and chemical weapons in general. It was backed also by the opinion of statesmen and jurists (some now dead) who had argued at the time of the League of Nations in favor of an all-inclusive interpretation of the Geneva Protocol. James Leonard, assistant director of the U. S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, answered with some validity that if the Protocol was so clear it was strange that its meaning had been debated well into the 1930s and was being argued over again today.

The most effective assistance to the United States came, however, from those who, like Britain and France, abstained from voting because they questioned the competence of the General Assembly to interpret an international treaty, especially forty-four years after its adoption. Such a precedent, remarked Lord Chalfont half jokingly, might make governments hesitate in the future to sign any international instrument.

The General Assembly resolution has no legally binding effect, and the wrangling over the Geneva Protocol had more political than juridical overtones. Nevertheless, both the vote and the debate have served to remind Washington that the war and its sordid manifestations will never be condoned by the United Nations.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

Southern Gothic

Over the years Congressional grotesques have emerged, the product of the one-party Democratic South, of the seniority system, and of the inbred tendency of irresponsible politicians to press their power to the utmost. One thinks of John Rankin, and of Tom Watson before him. One thinks of Theodore Bilbo and many others. It is a tribute to the vitality of democracy that it has survived such a company of political charlatans and demagogues, though not without severe damage. And though democracy has survived, so have they. The most conspicuous grotesque of our day, second to none among contemporaries and predecessors, is L. Mendel Rivers, Representative from the 1st Congressional District of South Carolina since 1940, and since 1965 chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Rivers is regarded by newsmen, and by other Congressmen, as the foremost hawk in the Congress, but in the Song My massacre case he has outdone himself. That he gets away with such antics is largely the fault of the media, printed and electronic. Publicly they treat him with respect, as if he were a normal legislator. What the reporters and commentators say about him privately is something quite different, but that does not perturb Rivers in the slightest. The only columnist who ever took out after him was Drew Pearson; it is a misfortune for the country, and the many decent people in it, that Pearson is dead. What he would have said about Song My, and about Rivers' role in the current probes, would have been vivid.

Rivers is the Pentagon's dearest friend in the House, and the Pentagon reciprocates; but there must be times when the intelligent officers in the services have their doubts about him. He exercises his power with such arrogance that most of his colleagues in the House detest him, although they may also envy him the array of defense installations he has obtained for Charleston. The Navy yard

IN THIS ISSUE

December 29, 1969

EDITORIALS

714

ARTICLES

718 Between Glory and Disaster
718 The Vanity of Humanism — Ronald Sampson
726 Ethics and Social Struggle — Barrows Dunham
729 The Vandal Ideology — Scott Paradise

BOOKS & THE ARTS

733 Gay: The Science of Freedom — J. H. Plumb
734 Logan: The Zig-Zag Walk — A. Poulin, Jr.
735 Borges: The Book of Imaginary Beings — Stanton Hoffman
736 Tangent (poem) — Dennis Trudell
737 Schur: Our Criminal Society
Fort: The Pleasure Seekers — Jack Leavitt
738 McGinniss: The Selling of the President — Robert MacNeil
739 Theatre — Harold Clurman
739 Time (poem) — Harvey Shapiro
740 Two Greetings (poem) — Radcliffe Squires
741 Art — Lawrence Alloway
742 Films — Robert Hatch

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July, the first biweekly period in August and the last biweekly period in December) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION Volume 209 No. 23

was there before he came to Congress, but he has added in his district a Polaris submarine base, a Naval weapons station, an Air Force base, the Parris Island Marine Corps Recruit Depot, a Marine Corps air station, an Army supply depot and two Navy hospitals. Defense industry has followed: a DuPont plant that manufactures nuclear weapons or parts; and, since 1965, Lockheed, McDonnell-Douglas, J. P. Stevens, Avco and General Electric. Rivers' campaign slogan, "Rivers Delivers," is no idle boast. What challenger would stand a chance against an incumbent with such a record?

As far as Rivers is concerned, there was no massacre at Song My—at least that is the view he voiced at the outset. But just in case there was, Rivers has appointed a special subcommittee of tried and true hawks, headed by Rep. F. Edward Hebert (D., La.), who can be relied on not to make too much of any civilian corpses they may stumble upon.

The proceedings of Rivers' committee have been secret, but enough has leaked out to give the public some idea of the testimony. The principal witness has been Chief Warrant Officer Hugh Thompson, the helicopter pilot who received the Distinguished Flying Cross for "voluntary actions" on March 16, 1968, the day of the Song My incident. Apparently Thompson saw women and children being killed, landed his helicopter, aimed his guns at the American soldiers who had been doing the shooting, and moved a number of children to a secure area. A member of the Armed Services Committee said that "there appeared to be an effort by some members of the committee, if not to discredit, then to downgrade Thompson's testimony. But if ever there was a hero in this whole operation it was this man. He was a magnificent witness."

It was James Doyle of the Washington Star who dug out the information about Thompson's testimony. As far as the rest of the news media are concerned, Rivers has gotten away with his assertion that the committee turned up nothing of importance. The broader question is how long Rivers' colleagues intend to endure his effrontery. He has been insulting them for a long time—but then Sen. Joe McCarthy was another who ran amok for years but was finally brought to book.

Training for Song My

Paul Avery of the San Francisco Chronicle spent three years as a war correspondent in Vietnam. His illustrated story in the December 5 Chronicle should interest apologists for the Song My massacre ("isolated incident," etc.).

Avery was accompanying the Marines of B Company, Battalion Landing Team 1/9 on the fifth day of Operation Deckhouse V, a search-and-destroy mission in preparation for deploying a U.S. division in the Mekong Delta. The date was January 10, 1967. The Vietcong, and before them the Vietminh, had held the area for twenty-five years and neither the French nor the South Vietnamese government troops had ever tried to occupy it.

The Marines of B Company were looking for a sniper who had killed two of their men and wounded three others. Avery first witnessed a scene of routine brutality in which a lame old civilian was manhandled. Advancing once more, the Marines heard an explosion and screams up ahead. A sergeant and a lance corporal were staring at a shelter from which a group of women and children were crawling. The children were covered with burns and screaming.

The corporal pointed at the sergeant and said, "This dumb bastard lobbed a willie peter on them."

A willie peter is a white phosphorus grenade. The chemical not only burns but eats into the flesh.

The sergeant glared at the corporal and said he thought there was a VC in there. The corporal called him a liar and said, "You heard the women's voices and the crying baby the same as I did." The sergeant said nothing.

A Navy corpsman began looking for salve to treat the burns. "Like hell," the sergeant said. "We got no time for that. Leave 'em alone and let's find that sniper."

Avery asked the sergeant if he seriously intended to leave the casualties untreated. "That's exactly what I mean," the sergeant said. "Fuck 'em. They're VC too. Around here everybody's VC."

Avery threatened to report the incident and eventually the casualties were helicoptered to the amphibious assault ship Iwo Jima in the South China Sea. At the daily press conference on the Iwo Jima the next day Avery asked about civilian casualties. The press officer knew nothing. Later Avery found out that two of the children and a woman had died.

The aftermath should especially interest the apologists for American atrocities. The lance corporal who had called the sergeant a liar came to Avery and said, "Maybe it was an accident . . . maybe he didn't hear them." Two weeks later, in Saigon, the U.S. military command issued a summary of the results of Deckhouse V. Twenty-one VC had been killed and seventy-four suspects captured. There was no mention of civilian casualties.

And it was almost three years before the story came to light.

Why New Jersey?

Some time back we ran a story by Fred J. Cook, the least of whose distinctions is that he is a long-time resident of New Jersey. Mr. Cook displayed the pattern of corruption in the state but, although his facts were never challenged, many citizens could hardly believe them. It now appears that, with the conservatism of the good reporter, Cook greatly understated the extent to which large parts of the state have become fiefs of the Mafia.

The current exposures are coming to light because Republicans have succeeded Democrats in the state; but

The Nation customarily publishes 48 issues a year, in past years skipping four weeks in July and August. This year, however, only three of the summer issues were dropped, so that the fourth might be omitted during the Christmas-New Year period. Accordingly, the issue which would normally be distributed in the last week of 1969, and dated January 5, 1970, will not appear.

lest this give rise to premature hopes of a lasting clean-up, it should be recalled that for a decade or so the state was run by Republicans under Gov. Alfred Driscoll. This gave the Democrats an opportunity to zero in on the Republican tie-up with crime, particularly in Bergen County, and one consequence was the election of Robert Meyner, the country boy from virtuous Warren County, to the governorship. It did not escape notice that the Democrats ousted the Republicans with a suspiciously large campaign fund.

In New Jersey, thus, Democrats use the scandal of crime to drive Republicans from office and, after the lapse of a proper interval, Republicans use the same scourge to oust the Democrats. In neither swing of the pendulum is crime itself much affected. The arcs of righteous indignation are tempered to a continuation of the system, even though such shows of rectitude may serve the limited purpose of preventing vice from taking complete control of the state's affairs.

Two aspects of this on-going crime serial deserve notice. First, a Governor's Committee set up to investigate the Newark riots of 1967 declared that one cause of the riots was the pervasive feeling in the black community that anything and anybody could be fixed at City Hall, that there was no integrity at all in the aspects and functions of municipal government. Is there anyone who, in retrospect, would seriously question this judgment of the black community?

Second, it is impossible to assign a single cause for the deplorable state of affairs in New Jersey. Many causes, of varying degrees of importance, can be discerned. But one, historical in nature, warrants more emphasis than it usually gets. New Jersey was one of the original thirteen states, but as a political entity it makes no sense. Those who live in the crowded northern communities are primarily concerned with what happens in New York. They have moved to New Jersey for its low taxes and because in its communities a commuter may hope to get a quiet night's sleep. Those who live in the southern portion of the state have much the same relationship to Philadelphia. Those who live in between count for little. This separation of economic and political interests may have a good deal to do with New Jersey's inability to meet the modest standards of probity set by the other states.

More on the Panthers

Last week we stated the urgent need for an investigation of recent shoot-outs in which police have again directed murderous gunfire at Black Panthers and their headquarters. A group of black Congressmen will conduct an investigation into the Chicago night attack. At the same time, a number of organizations, including the NAACP, Urban League, Conference of Black Elected Officials, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the American Civil Liberties Union, have set up a twenty-five-member independent commission to "direct a searching inquiry" into clashes between police and Panthers. Rep. Edward Koch (D., N.Y.) has suggested that the Civil Rights Commission conduct a general inquiry.

No local investigation, as by a grand jury, would be effective. Such a body would not have the confidence of the black community. Moreover, the inquiry must be national, so that it may discover what if any "patterning" the facts disclose. Representative Koch's idea has merit, but an inquiry by the Civil Rights Commission should supplement independent inquiries. The commission has the power of subpoena, and that gives it advantages over privately organized panels. An immediate danger is that a federal grand jury could subpoena relevant documents and records, in the guise of making an investigation, and thereby deny other groups access to them. This threat is implicit in the Justice Department's investigation of the Chicago incident. After a very slow start, the media—rather a section thereof—is now begining to focus attention on the shoot-outs. Until recently, they have been, for the most part, badly reported. The pending investigations, and the general situation, should be kept under close and constant scrutiny if further trouble is to be averted.

By way of justifying their "overkill" tactics, the police invariably cite the Panthers' revolutionary rhetoric and their known arms caches. But not since the gun battles in Dodge City and Tombstone has violent rhetoric been cited as justification for homicides. All sorts of groups use violent rhetoric in this violence-prone society. As to arms, it is a consideration, perhaps, that the Panthers are not an affiliate of the National Rifle Association. If they were, they would probably enjoy immunity from police harassment. The gun market has been booming. In many communities the police have helped train nervous housewives of poor vision in the use of side arms. The Chicago police turned over to the odious General Turner, as a gift of some kind, more arms than they could find in Panther headquarters.

It must be emphasized that the recent incidents have inflamed and unified black opinion from coast to coast. Reports from Chicago, for example, indicate that deep concern over the two killings there has swept the black community. For the first time in years, the entire Negro public in Chicago is aroused and united. Is this what those paragons of social insight, the police, wanted to achieve? A first reaction of the black community in Chicago was the announcement of a dusk-to-dawn curfew, whites being warned to stay out of the neighborhoods. For the moment, the curfew has been lifted but an explosive situation exists and it will not be easily corrected. Police guns, not Panther guns, have won for the black militants the largest measure of support they have yet achieved. So let's have the facts, all of them, including the treatment the twenty Panthers arrested months ago in New York, are receiving from the authorities.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BETWEEN GLORY AND DISASTER

The Nation usually devotes its final issue of the year to subject matter of a more reflective cast than its normal weekly fare. Of recent years these issues have been concerned, in one way or another, with human values in an age of science and technology. That is not surprising; the issue is central to our times. This year the winter solstice seemed a particularly good time, as Barrows Dunham points out, to see if one can "find a side"—a position—"that is hitched to a star." For we are indeed "between glory and disaster," living "as in a house defiled and rotting, where there can be no repair without damage. Yet it is the only house we have."

"Relevance" has been the chic word of 1969, but relevance is a relative term. Behind every discussion of the term there lurks a question, "relevant to what?" The question is seldom asked, and when it is the discussion soon ends in vague references to past values. Relevant to the inherited Western cultural tradition? Relevant to the Judeo-Christian tradition? Relevant to what? The answer eludes us. At this year's meeting of Nobel laureates in Stockholm, assembled to discuss "The Place of Value in a World of Facts," Jacques Monod struck a note that echoed throughout the sessions. No value system exists today either to guide the promise of science or to forestall the menace of science. And without it, Monod declared, no society can long survive in today's world. At present, we are rushing along, as he put it, with a value system inherited from the 18th century. Since we have no other, we give it lip service; no one really believes in an ethic so dated. Under the pressure of science the rate of social change, Kenneth Keniston has written, "will increase up to the as yet untested limits of human adaptability." Unlike moral codes, ethical systems must be constantly reconsidered if they are to be "relevant" guides to behavior in a rapidly changing world. Today, of course, the need is for an ethic, to quote Keniston again, "that makes central the preservation and unfolding of human life and that defines 'man' as any citizen of this expanding globe." That ethic is not implicit in the technological revolution; it will be created, if it is, by man in his roles of citizen and seer. Science cannot save us from ourselves.

The problem has the utmost urgency because the issue is now survival. In seeking a basis for the ethic we must invent, we should be prepared, as Dr. George Salzman said in a memorable October 15 moratorium address at the University of Massachusetts (Boston), "to re-examine all our institutions, all our codes of behavior, all our scales of values, and if need be, to alter or discard those that would block our way to the future." Society can proceed no further "if men are expected to live on two distinct planes of morality—as decent, moral human beings in their private lives, and as manipulators of power and greed, acting deceitfully and without compunction in their external affairs. . . . The affairs of the world are [now] a single vast intertwined web."

The contributions that follow explore a few—if only a few—of the implications that flow from the ethic vacuum in which we find ourselves.

THE VANITY OF HUMANISM

RONALD SAMPSON
Mr. Sampson is a lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol. His most recent book is The Psychology of Power (Pantheon).

Susan Stebbing wrote in 1941: "But it is also no illusion but uncontested fact that here and now we know that hatred, cruelty, intolerance and indifference to human misery are evil; that love, kindliness, tolerance, forgiveness and truth are good, so unquestionably good that we do not need God or heaven to assure us of their worth." When I first read this, it struck a responsive chord; I remember quoting it with approval a decade ago. Virtue, I felt, was self-evident, beyond the possibility of sincere disputation; moreover, this was all that was truly important: that we should get on with the business of doing what we so clearly knew. For if our lives were loving and honorable, if we were kind, tolerant, forgiving and truthful, there would be no problems of an urgent or serious kind.

Moreover, so it then seemed to me—it was not merely that morality was self-sufficient and that discussion of the nature or existence of God was unnecessary. Theological discussion was positively harmful. It was precisely when men began to dispute about the nature of God that they showed their worst qualities, and for good reason. Men become most bitter and intolerant at the point where the touchstone of evidence, to which appeal can be made, breaks down. In the absence of evidence the will to self-assertion, the desire to subjugate one's opponent, find free rein. "God" is such a nebulous, unverifiable concept, meaning all things to all men, I thought, that it is bound to be a bone of inexhaustible contention. In morals, the appeal to universal experience offers itself as an inescapable arbiter; in theology, on the other hand, there is no such arbiter, and so it is not surprising that religion brings out the worst in man.

Consider the record of man's search for God. All history indicates not only that there are apparently no limits to what men will worship under this label but also that men have committed and still commit some of their more atrocious crimes in pursuit of their worship and in their intolerance of other men's differing concepts of what is appropriate or required of them in matters of a religious nature. And among wars it is notorious that none is more calculated to bring out new depths of cruelty than the religious war.

Nor is it simply that religious belief has been intimately associated with fear, superstition and irrationality, spawning innumerable mystical cults and rituals to act as magnets for fanaticism and ignorance. Religion is also intimately associated with the apparatus of political domination and economic exploitation. When reason and persuasion fail of their purpose, the temptation is immediate to seek to buttress one's unacknowledged or weak authority by appealing to divine command. Countless rulers have sought to validate their authority by asserting a divine right, and have tried to make the claim credible through ritual and pomp associated with such hallowed symbols as scepter, miter and orb. After World War I, men began to recognize the full price of this folklore, and their bitterness found expression in sardonically humorous verse:

> God save the king. Gott strafe England,
> God this, God that and God the other thing.
> Good God! said God, I've got my work cut out.

Even in the age of Cromwell, some among the radical Puritans were aware of the sociological function of religion as the "opium of the people." The bare bones of Marx's argument two centuries later are found in Gerrard Winstanley's The Law of Freedom in a Platform or True Magistracy Restored (1652):

> The elder brother replies, What, will you be an Atheist, and a factious man, will you not believe God?
>
> Yes, saith the younger brother, if I knew God said so I should believe, for I desire to serve him.
>
> Why, saith the elder brother, this is his word, and if you will not believe it, you must be damned: but if you will believe it, you must go to Heaven.
>
> Well, the younger brother being weak in spirit, and having not a grounded knowledge of the Creation, nor of himself, is terrified, and lets go his hold in the Earth, and submits himself to be a slave to his brother . . . and so his eyes are put out, and his Reason is blinded.

In our time the major emphasis has probably been focused on the psychology of religion. Stimulated by psychoanalytic theories, men have been increasingly inclined to construe God as a projection of fears, need for consolation, inability to look the unknown unflinchingly in the face, failure to achieve emotional autonomy from parental control and consequent need for an eternal Father. Common to Marxist theories of alienation and Freudian psychoanalysis is the reduction of God to the status of a morbid symbol of man's immaturity as an exploited worker or as a possessed and dominated son. In philosophy, molded largely by the 20th-century reverence for science, concern has been with precision and clarity of linguistic usage. Tests of meaning of the most rigorous nature, acceptable to the scientist, were devised. If a statement were neither a definition nor verifiable by appeal to any possible sense experience, it was held to be meaningless. Under attack, minor concessions were made to avoid manifest absurdity, but only to safeguard the purity of the central positivist principle. If God is to pass such a test before being admitted to the status of meaningful concepts, the onus is on the believer to supply evidence of God's transcendent reality. What evidence of a falsifiable nature can be adduced to prove that man is not alone in the universe, that God would still exist if the human species were to perish? In this way the whole 19th-century debate between immanentists and transcendentalists has been neatly headed off.

The theologians themselves have long been in full retreat before the positivist onslaught, bringing their teachings up to date, rethinking, rationalizing, salvaging what crumbs they could, or even—on the notorious principle that if you cannot beat your opponent, join him—producing ultra-sophistications of their own about what they are pleased to call the death of God. In short, the twin streams of the European Enlightenment, the liberal empiricist stream and the dialectical materialist stream, have united in an immensely powerful river to wash away the last remnants of man's traditional beliefs about the existence and nature of God. Since, however, most of us recognize that man cannot live without some guiding metaphysic, a new "religion," Humanism, is rapidly being evolved in the West and appears to be growing increasingly fashionable. The essential argument is admittedly persuasive and is implicit in the preceding analysis. Since the evidence is overwhelming that nothing is more difficult to secure than agreement among men concerning the nature of reality, and since it is a matter of urgency to secure some measure of agreement about the nature of morality, where common yardsticks of appeal are potentially within reach, let us put the religious debate into cold storage, if it is not possible to get rid of it altogether, so that we can get on with the practical and urgent business of hammering out an agreed morality. To hope that Christians and Marxists, for example, might one day agree upon the nature of reality or the nature of God, is obviously futile and in any case unnecessary. But since they do share common problems, it is urgent and far from utopian that we should begin to try to establish mutual understanding about problems of conduct in the interests of harmony and peace. Let us agree to avoid the odium theologicum and settle for concord about important matters like peace, security and productivity. Ronald Fletcher, professor of sociology at the University of York writes:

> If morality is to wait upon agreement about religious or metaphysical matters then men are in a serious plight indeed, for every religion and ideology in the world differs on these matters, and very radically. Men are everywhere faced, however, with common economic, social, political problems, and are involved—from the personal, right up to the international, level—in issues of reciprocal obligation.

Ethics is an autonomous discipline, he states, and therefore asks rhetorically: "Who is right about 'reality' is a question which can surely wait?" What could sound more reasonable?

It is the purpose of this essay to deny this thesis, to argue that Humanism, be it agnostic or atheistic, is a false religion, that men are "in a serious plight indeed," that this plight has arisen ultimately from false religious belief, that the liberation from false metaphysics only to fall into new forms of error will not alleviate our existing grave situation, but will on the contrary produce even more deadly consequences; that morality is not an autonomous discipline, that the argument about the nature of reality is fundamental, that error about the nature and purpose of God must necessarily lead to avoidable suffering and death, and that the metaphysical debate, so far from being a luxury to be postponed indefinitely, is the most urgent task, now more than ever, confronting men.

That men have worshipped false gods is abundantly evident; the targets against which Marx and Freud launched their arrows were shrewdly chosen. But the fact that men in their blindness have conceived an infinitude of false gods, does not entitle us to infer that therefore God does not exist. That is as though we were to infer from the innumerable instances of men's false reasoning that man is incapable of distinguishing truth from falsehood. Let us return to the original quotation from Susan Stebbing and ask why, notwithstanding the fact that the distinction between good and evil is self-evident, men after millennia of struggle show as yet but faint signs of overcoming evil. We know here and now indisputably that "hatred, cruelty, intolerance and indifference to human misery are evil. . . ." Had Dr. Stebbing stopped there, none could gainsay her. But we must ask why, given this knowledge, we appear to be incapable of acting upon it. Is it that this knowledge has come to us only recently, that we have not had sufficient time to gird our loins? Clearly not. "War of any kind is evil," wrote Herodotus a very long time ago. But we wage it today with apparently undiminished zest. Sexual immorality and depravity also lead to great evil, but when theologians discuss morality solely in the context of sexual relations and to the exclusion of war, we rightly feel that there is something odd—that they are being less than honest to us, let alone to God.

Of the very many ills which afflict humanity one evil dwarfs all the others. Throughout human history men have lived in organized groups under governments which have feared and competed with one another by means of arms, and the resultant arms races have erupted at more or less regular intervals into wars. The present arms race is consuming $183 billion a year, and it is beyond the power of any human imagination to foresee the extent of the holocaust which will ensue if it continues until it erupts into war. In the childhood of our species it was no doubt possible to delude men that evil occurred because the gods were angry or because exceptionally wicked men held sway; but it is no longer possible to deceive in this way. Today, men know that when very great evil threatens to overtake them, it is and can only be because very large numbers of men are contributing their share to that evil, that is to say, are living their lives on a false and evil basis. And this, notwithstanding that we all know, indeed cannot not know, that "love, kindliness, tolerance, forgiveness and truth are good . . . unquestionably good." So where is all the evil coming from?

At this point I find it difficult not to resort to the first person singular, not because the evidence is in any way private or less than general but because it is more likely to touch the imagination when translated into the idiom in which we as individuals experience it. In my childhood it was the practice in my part of the world for children to go to day school on weekdays and to Sunday school on Sunday. It was in the latter school that I was first exposed to the four Gospels of the New Testament, and they immediately reached into my profoundest emotions—not the absurd and manifestly false tales about people rising physically from the dead, walking on the water and conjuring water into wine, but stories such as that of the woman taken in adultery, the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, and the lucid, yet poetic simplicity of the Beatitudes. But although these readings, repeated many times, were to make an ineffaceable impression, another and different lesson was also taught me, one that was the more powerful because it was never openly expressed. I noticed that while I was required to attend Sunday school and while interest was expressed if I received a prize for attendance or diligence in memorizing required lessons, the interest was nevertheless essentially polite. But the interest shown by everyone in my circle to success achieved in lessons and examinations at the day school was of the genuine variety which quickened the pulse.

In short, I learned that "religion" played in life some part that was never made plain beyond the fact that it was peripheral and wrapped around with much that was evidently irrational—dogma, miracle and ritual which inspired not respect but contempt. On the other hand, I learned that to make a successful career, that is to say, to "get on" in the world, was a matter of central and enduring importance, commanding the immediate and genuine respect of everyone I knew. That there might ever be a conflict between these two planes of experience never seriously occurred to me. That there had been such conflicts in history, I was of course aware, but that was on the public stage and in the past, and clearly had nothing to do with my own private, personal existence. The real purpose of life was to be successful, as the world and I measured success. As for virtue, that was something which largely took care of itself; one did as one's neighbor did and as professional standards required, and no one could pretend that such requirements were especially onerous. I knew, of course, that injustice and inequality existed in the world, and that this was wrong; but my obligations in that respect were wholly covered by my tacit membership in and support of the reformist party, which was working, admittedly slowly but nevertheless steadily—Rome was not built in a day—to set matters right. So I had been sedulously taught, and so I believed.

It is not necessary here to describe the gradual and painful process whereby I awoke from this dream. Everyone of my generation knows how the organized parties of reform not only betrayed their "principles" but themselves became active agents in the commiting of atrocity and crime. And as the wars and the famines, the arms race and irresponsible technology, the hangings and assassinations continued, it became more and more evident that the dissidents, the protesters, "the stage army of the good," who were called upon to protest again and again, with enduring stamina, were not drawn at random from all levels of society. They were drawn always from the ranks of the "powerless," the people who had no positions of authority to jeopardize or lose. Those who consistently sought allies against recurring wrong and injustice quickly learned that the reservoir of potential support shrank visibly as one ascended the hierarchy of prestige and power. It would be useful to get X's signature; it would carry a lot of weight, we fondly imagined. But we soon discovered that X's signature was not to be had. Privately he might well be with us, but we must appreciate that for a person in his position, well . . . we did understand, didn't we? So we had to make do with poor old Z's signature, which allegedly carried little or no weight, but which was always to be relied upon.

One other facet of my experience also sharply impressed me. Although great and growing evil occurred in the world, yet, wherever I moved in society, be it among teachers, soldiers, churchmen, criminals, housewives, policemen, workmen, politicians, foreigners, doctors, I never met anyone who struck me as essentially an evil man. Men who were weak and pompous, who dissembled and were evasive, who were self-important, vain and ambitious, who were self-contradictory, self-deceiving, unreliable, acquisitive, these I met in plenty at every level of society; but nowhere was it my misfortune to find an unmistakably evil man. So evil occurred in the world, very great and unbelievable evil, and yet there were no evil men, it appeared. Whenever we sought support to protest against an evil, it was very rare indeed to find anyone who wished to identify himself, least of all publicly, with the evil in question. To be sure, halfhearted attempts at casuistry would sometimes be made, but these would soon fade under the pressure of honest logic. Nevertheless, it was not easy to enlist support against the evil from people of "influence" in the community. For people of influence and position, of power or wealth, had their positions and their power to lose, whereas those unencumbered by such positions were more free to listen to the voice of conscience within. Or, to put the matter the other way round, if a man were consistently to heed and act upon the voice of conscience, he would inevitably be required to pay a price in the shape of growing ineligibility for promotion to positions of authority, increased emolument and "influence."

Cassianus

Conversion of St. Paul

In short, a clash, a conflict, a dilemma was inherent in the logic of things, and it was inescapable that every man had to choose. He could choose to aspire toward fortune or preferment, a successful career, high status, position; or he could listen consistently to and try to act upon the voice of conscience which urged him to protest against the injustice of the world. But what he could not have—as I had so fondly hoped to be the case—was both. A man could not have both power over others and genuine love for others. And while it was obvious which one should choose, it was unfortunately by no means easy to make the right choice, as was attested both by my own backsliding and by the large number of those who were unwilling because of their positions, actual or hoped for, to oppose publicly the evils which they would repudiate privately.

In brief I had learned the ancient lesson that, while all human beings are more than adequately equipped to distinguish good from evil, nevertheless a price is to be paid for choosing the good rather than the evil. There is a reward, too, of course, in the shape of a tranquil conscience and the serenity of spirit that is alone born of a tranquil conscience; but most human beings appear to be more immediately impressed by the nature of the sacrifice than by the reality of the reward, for the former is tangible and the latter is not. And any discussion of the autonomy of ethics which fails to take this dilemma for mortal man adequately into account must be condemned as facile and not very helpful. It is not enough to know that kindliness is good and cruelty is bad. It is also necessary to be able to answer correctly the question: why am I alive and what is the purpose of this life that has been temporarily entrusted to me?

Every man must be bound by some conviction, conscious or unconscious, about the significance he attaches to his life in order to live it, to direct it, to make plans or merely to drift. Whatever a man may say, his behavior over a prolonged period will under close study inevitably reveal the real values sustaining it. And this metaphysic is the most important thing that we must know of a man if we need to assess his basic character or to predict how he will act in a given situation. Since every man is endowed with very powerful appetites, it is perfectly possible to find the meaning of one's life in a ceaseless pursuit of gratification. In practice, most of us are in varying degree aware both that appetites ceaselessly pampered are apt to cloy and that unrestrained egoism on the part of large numbers of individuals is calculated to bring about conditions of misery and discomfort to all concerned. Therefore a policy of unrelieved individualism is generally tempered to some degree by a further extension of this principle. That is to say, the individual finds the meaning of his life not solely in self-indulgence but also in satisfying the wants of a group or groups with which he identifies emotionally. The most universal form of ego identification with a group is of course with the family, but the principle extends in a lesser degree to schools, villages, social classes, religious and ethnic groups and political nationalities.

The difficulty with all these "goods" sought for oneself or one's group is that they are particularistic or exclusive; they displace a like good for somebody else or some other group. They are not compatible with the principle of universalism and therefore violate the principle of justice. They stimulate competition; they are keenly sought just because they confer privilege or special status; they differentiate favorably the successful from those who fail. They are therefore of the very stuff of strife, of envy, of the struggle for power, of the resentments of inferiority, of the war of all against all.

Unfortunately, the energies which are harnessed to these secular goals are very powerful, and sustain the central efforts of a man's striving and struggle over a lifetime. If they are rejected as having morally indefensible consequences to mankind as a whole, inevitably an immense problem makes itself felt. To what is a man to devote his energies? What shall be the central goal of his life? If he ceases to find it in the quest for power, privilege, status, "authority," wealth, what substitute is there that is morally acceptable and which can realistically evoke a comparable single-mindedness and consistently sustained application of energy? In whatever way we seek to answer this question, one thing is certain: the first step consists in renouncing what have hithertto been powerfully felt desires, animating the individual's main aspirations and life goals. And such a task is calculated to daunt even strong people. Resistance cannot but be profound, as St. Augustine testified with a disarming candor and wry humor:

> And when Thou didst on all sides shew me, that what Thou saidst was true, I, convicted by the truth, had nothing at all to answer but only those dull and drowsy words, "Anon, anon," "presently"; "leave me but a little." But "presently, presently" had no present, and my "little while" went on for a long while. . . .

It is important to analyze why it is so difficult. Consider the case: A man has been living his life according to goals arising out of emotions of egoism, sexual gratification, acquisitiveness or group loyalty, emotions laid deep within the psychic life of every human being, emotions which therefore reinforce themselves by the very frequency with which we find them exemplified in the behavior of others. A man has not only to overcome the resistances within himself; he must overcome his initial fear of the resistance of those among whom he lives, often by no means least the resistance of those nearest and dearest. When Christian decided as a result of his dream to hasten forth from the city of destruction, the discovery that he could not persuade his wife and family to accompany him must have been bitter indeed, although Christian's own previous life could scarcely have been such as to prepare them for so strange a development. When Tolstoy at the age of 50, in all the agony of soul he has imperishably described in his Confession, discovered the real nature of the city of destruction and hastened accordingly to flee it, he too found himself in almost complete isolation from his wife and family, although, as he himself realized, the sins of his youth were in no small part to blame.

To follow the voice of truth, as it struggles to make itself heard within the quietude of the individual soul, is difficult because of our instinctive awareness that to do so will not simply fail to add to our popularity, but will evoke strong resistance from those around us, leading at best to a degree of isolation. "There is a saying among children," testified Joan of Arc at her trial, "that men are sometimes hanged for having spoken the truth." There is also an old saw to the effect that if God were to live on earth, people would break His windows. Is not the experience of Socrates, Jesus, Arnold of Brescia, the Maid herself, More, Huss, Giordano Bruno, Servetus, enough to stand in perpetual warning of this terrible truth? But martyrdom requires not only innocence and courage on the part of the victim and cruelty on the part of his persecutors; it requires in addition the acquiescence of the multitude. And a few cannot intimidate multitudes solely by fear. "Ye are many, they are few," as Shelley reminded us. The multitudes must themselves first be morally confused. That this is commonly the case derives from the deceitfulness of the human heart. Men commonly will the good, but are easily gulled. To come to a conclusion that will convict us ourselves of immorality is exceedingly hard, because of the great strength of our vanity and self-love. Paul Tillich has expressed the nature of this inner resistance of the soul with exceptional clarity in his The Shaking of the Foundations:

> Our entire inner life, our thoughts and desires, our feelings, and imaginations, are known to God. The final way of escape, the most intimate of all places, is held by God. That fact is the hardest of all to accept. The human resistance against such relentless observation can scarcely be broken. Every psychiatrist and confessor is familiar with the tremendous force of resistance in each personality against even trifling self-revelations. Nobody wants to be known, even when he realizes that his health and salvation depend upon such a knowledge. We do not even wish to be known by ourselves. We try to hide the depth of our souls from our own eyes. We refuse to be our own witness. How then can we stand the mirror in which nothing can be hidden?

But if it is difficult to acknowledge the truth and follow it, it is not impossible. To do what I will may not always lie within my power, but what surely does always lie within my power is the ability to will the good. And it is the peculiar and unique power of the truth that, if acknowledged freely and honestly, ultimately it will of its own accord rectify our existing false situation. Truth is impregnable against all forms of attack, all mockery, all satire; it is immune to self-contradiction; it is impervious to the emotions of cunning, deceit, self-doubt. It commands universal attention, and ultimately the obedience of all honest men. "Truth," wrote James Russell Lowell in the Biglow Papers, "is quite beyond the reach of satire. There is so brave a simplicity in her, that she can no more be made ridiculous than an oak or a pine."

Huber

Nevertheless, truth is a hard taskmaster, for it demands as the first step in its service a willingness to transcend the claims of the self in the service of other selves. Its first and last law is that of renunciation, which though possible for man, does not come naturally to him. And the paradox is that insofar as a man succeeds in his aspiration to obey truth, he inevitably puts himself at the mercy of all who suffer from no such inhibitions and who accordingly take advantage of him. One man's truth has to confront another man's falsehood; one man's forbearance is met with another's will to dominion; the one's agony of conscience contends with him who is without scruple; the one man's love and nonviolence has to brave the threats of hatred and violence; the total vulnerability of the one stands against the bludgeon of a Cain or Raskolnikov.

In logic, the only possible remedy to the arms race based on fear is unilateral disarmament based on trust. The truth of renunciation which is the key to all goodness is pre-eminently demonstrated here, yet nowhere are there apparently so few willing takers. At no point does human skepticism and despair appear more intractable. The reason is to be found in the conviction, so deep in this world, that evil must inevitably triumph over good. From the author of the seventy-third Psalm to Gerard Manley Hopkins men have lamented the evident fact that the ungodly prosper in the world while the godly are chastened for their pains.

Why do sinners' ways prosper? and why must Disappointment all I endeavour end?
Wert thou my enemy, O thou my friend,
How wouldst thou worse, I wonder, than thou dost Defeat, thwart me? . . .

Many have found in this fact alone the most eloquent of all testimony to the necessity of the immortality of the soul. Something other must exist to redress the balance of this vale of tears. "Had I no other proof of the immaterial nature of the soul," affirmed Rousseau's Savoyard vicar, "the triumph of the wicked and the oppression of the righteous in this world would be enough to convince me."

But on reflection we must surely see that there was no other way in which man could be taught the truth. If to avoid defeat we resist evil violently, we provide yet another alibi for wrongdoing, we do something dubious, we teach a wrong lesson. Men see only that a battle of wills is taking place, and they understand that well enough from long familiarity. It is essential that we show that we struggle not that our will should prevail but that the truth of justice or equality should prevail. Not my will but Thy will! Will it is that we must obey—and it is clearly not the will of organized men, nor is it the natural will of the individual. Then whose will? What is the will we follow in the quest for self-perfection? If it were our own will, would not the skeptics be right who accuse those who strive after perfectibility of vanity or self-righteousness?

We can abdicate all "power" means of implementing our will, only if we have confidence that by following the way indicated by conscience and reason as the true way, thus paradoxically putting ourselves at the mercy of the evil will, good will ultimately be advanced and the truth prevail. Not my will but Thy will! But what confidence can we have in the presence of so much violence, a vast surrounding ocean of evil? Faith? Yes, perhaps, but not blind faith—it must be reasonable faith based on evidence and reasoning conducted as always by rigorous adherence to the logic of the argument to the end. After all, if we are to have faith, it may well cost us our lives. The evil one, soldier or criminal, whom men fear as the potential agent of violent death, may well take advantage of our self-chosen vulnerability to dispatch us forthwith. And these are no academic possibilities but actual contingencies being experienced in the flesh by many here and now. Are we to sacrifice our all on the basis of blind faith, where reason would surely call at best for agnosticism?

It is inescapable that so long as one man survives who is willing to take advantage of his physically weaker brother to slay him, this world must remain the kingdom of power. But might it not be that an unknown X factor could, if found, trusted and relied upon, ultimately prevail over the forces of power, of evil, even in this world, the only world we know? But what if this X factor becomes efficacious only if we trust it even unto possible acceptance of a violent, premature and otherwise escapable death? And if such an X factor is found by all testable experience to exist, a factor before which power itself is rendered impotent by entirely nonpower means, what name must we give it? Truth? Yes, but it is the very core of truth that we are seeking to define. Magna est veritas et praevalebit. Yes, indeed, if we always scrupulously follow it, but what is its essence and what is the evidence? What is the one thing that overcomes all our resistance, our pride, our self-love, our self-seeking, our power? Everyone knows the answer to this—it is love.

Was neverë werre in this worldë
Ne wikkednessë so kenë
That ne love, an him liste,
To laughyngë ne broughtë

But what is love? Again its inmost essence, its great strength, turns out to be powerlessness. When the barrier of our self-pride is broken down, when we become as little children, with the natural, naive humility of the child, it is then and only then, when power has fled us completely, that ultimately we move even the most hardened.

When Joan of Arc rode at the head of her troops, when she was hailed by all France as the maid sent to liberate Orléans, to secure the crowning of the Dauphin, when she mounted her white charger to hurl herself upon the English, she constitutes the very stuff of romance, of legend, of glory, but the truth is not in her. On the contrary, it was during this period that Joan's inimitable qualities of simplicity, common sense, truthfulness, courage first began to show signs of being undermined and corroded by her elevation to a position of leadership among the "great" ones of the earth. As Michelet carefully noted, the banner she originally carried had by the time she was taken at Compiègne been put aside for the sword, "excellent both to thrust and cut." The Christian Maid had become coarsened by military conquest to the point where she could surrender a captured Burgundian freebooter to the royal bailiff for execution. It is only after her capture, after she has been brought low and subjected to base brutality, that she puts on the lineaments of truth—so much so that across half a thousand years she still speaks to our most lucid reason and plumbs the profoundest emotions. Abandoned by the world, entirely alone, exposed to the coarsest insult, sick, wracked by fear and doubt, in mortal physical peril, humbled, she achieves her apotheosis. Treacherously asked if she believed herself to be in a state of grace, she replied: "If I am not, may it please God to bring me into it; if I am, may He preserve me in it." And asked why she had recanted, she defeated guile with the irrefutable courage and simplicity of the truth: "Because I was afraid of the fire."

If we turn back to the story of Jesus himself, we feel compelled to ask if it is mere coincidence that the account of the cursing of the fig tree because it failed to bear fruit out of season, and the hounding of the moneychangers out of the temple—both of them acts out of character and less than edifying—come immediately after Jesus' triumphant ride into Jerusalem, acclaimed by the multitude. Be that as it may, it is certainly not the success which has captured the imagination of the world for two millennia. What moves mankind is the vision of a child cradled in a cattle manger, because there was no room at the inn, which the well-to-do had already occupied. That was the significant beginning; the end was the crucifixion between two thieves. The man taught with unmistakable clarity: Resist not evil, and the forgiveness of sin. "Neither do I condemn thee. Go thy way and sin no more." And when Pilate marveled that a man being tried for his life, should make no attempt to defend himself, thrice called on him to answer, he met only with silence. "God forgive them, for they know not what they do." And indeed it is the case: we do not know, we do not really know what it is we do, or we could not inflict such astounding and unbelievable cruelties on one another. Men behold one another incomprehendingly. The Bishop of Linz confronted by the heroic Jägerstätter could see only a young man with a lust for martyrdom; and Jägerstätter could in charity only conceive of the bishop as one who had not received the grace to see things as they really were. But through it all runs the consistent thread of the truth, simple, void of ambiguity, unmistakable to all with eyes to see. On the one hand the sword of Caesar, the governor's crown, the armed might of the centurion, the cry for blood that arises when power feels itself threatened; and confronting it, what? An emaciated, disarmed, defenseless carpenter's son, whose only crime has been the continuous, quiet yet impassioned eloquence of his plea that we should love one another.

To all of which no doubt the reply from those who pride themselves on being what is called "tough-minded" will be that emotion is emotion and reason is reason, and reason indicates that, whatever the truth of the foregoing, we have done nothing to demonstrate that ethics is not an autonomous discipline. We have been discussing morals, not theology. Let it be conceded for the sake of argument: humility and forgiveness, especially of enemies, are high virtues, high guarantors of moral excellence. Where does that leave us? Agnostics have never denied that morality exists, nor would they necessarily quarrel with this definition of the content of morality. The question at issue is whether or not morals are self-sufficient.

Let us recapitulate the central argument. It comes naturally to man to attend to what appear to be in his own interests or conducive to the pleasures of himself or the group with which he emotionally identifies. But all experience testifies that such conduct on the part of individuals and groups leads directly and inevitably to competition, strife, fear, hatred, rivalry, self-deception, greed, xenophobia. In short, they are destructive of man's real interests. Therefore the true form of conduct, which will promote man's genuine interests, is the opposite of self-interest. It consists in finding the meaning of one's life, not in the quest for wealth, power and prestige but in engaging in activities prompted by consideration of the needs of one's fellows. And this policy, although productive of great and enduring satisfaction, does not appear to come naturally and easily to man, although it is certainly possible for him to achieve it. The former metaphysic is the law of power and/or violence and leads to evil; the latter is the law of love and equality and leads to good. And the meaning of every individual's life consists in the choice which he is of necessity required to make between these alternatives. The balance of forces is never more than precariously poised between the two; and in the nature of things if the forces of power are sufficiently ruthless, the immediate victory must always go to them. And this means that the individual who chooses the good must not only overcome the disposition of his own natural egocentric passions but must also overcome his own natural fears of the powerful, who are in a position to do him great harm, and are very likely to attempt to do so because they are effectively threatened only by the individual who seeks the good and evokes a like response in the conscience of others.

But the question remains: why should the individual choose the good, when it is a path full of difficulties and pitfalls, and may well lead him into a position of discomfort, hardship, persecution or even peril to his life? Because it is the good? But why should I prefer the good to my own immediate comfort, appetites and security? Even if I am capable of willing the good, why should I? Why should I not will what is natural to me? The good is clearly not the fruit of my own spontaneous will, nor is it the will of nature, whose law is one that is indeed "red in tooth and claw"; still less is it the will of human law, which is at all times and everywhere based on fear and violence. Then why should I obey this will? Whose will is it? I should obey it, because it is the will of God. There is no other possible answer. If God did not exist, I would have no reason for obeying this law; it would be no more than the idle dream, which is what vain, presumptuous and wicked men have always cynically claimed it to be.

Nor would this be all. If God did not exist, it would be possible to secure everlasting peace by mutual deterrence through the balance of terror—that is to say, to bring about good by doing evil, as the casuists and sophists would always have us believe. But it is not so possible. As men sow, so shall they always reap. Nothing and no one can disturb this law. And this is the answer to Man Friday's celebrated question to Robinson Crusoe: "Why God not kill the devil?" Man's only protection lies in his obedience to the moral law; were it possible to disobey it with impunity without bringing about evil consequences in its wake, the last barrier between the soul of man and his total depravity would go down. It may be asked why, if God exists, man be not given tangible proof of the fact, authentic evidence verifiable through the senses, scientifically warranted; a Day of Judgment, perhaps? Could we not each of us have been permitted to draw up one day at "A siding at a railway station" with James Anthony Froude, and see with our own eyes the first-class passengers receiving their sentences, and the philosopher who believed that we lived in the best of all possible worlds being condemned to renew his life once more, only this time as one "born blind and paralytic"? Of course the answer is "no," since virtue ceases to be virtue immediately it is followed for reasons of prudence, of calculation or utility.

If God did not exist, then the individual's struggle to perfect himself would indeed be no more than a form of moral vanity or egocentric spiritual pride, which is how the enemies of perfectibility are so eager to construe it. When we fail in our moral striving, we are humbled, and that is good for us. When we succeed—and if success were impossible, aspiration itself would be fatally undermined—we are threatened by pride. When Bunyan was once complimented on the quality of the sermon he had just delivered, he replied: "You need not remind me of that. The Devil told me of it before I was out of the pulpit." If God did not exist, we would indeed be caught in a "double bind" from which no moral escape would be possible. But this is not so, as Job discovered when by his self-righteousness he brought upon himself the voice out of the whirlwind, whose awe-inspiring admonition left him no alternative but to acknowledge that he was "of small account," that he abhorred himself and repented "in dust and ashes."

Finally, if God did not exist, then ultimately we should unavoidably feel impelled to look not simply to our own truthfulness, integrity and humility but to our own power to implement the good and ward off the evil. And this quest for power, commonly disguised by what appear to be good or disinterested motives, is the primal source of the evil which we feel ourselves called upon to overcome. We can overcome it completely only if we can say with genuine conviction: Not my will but Thy will!

In the context of a discussion concerning the probable outcome of the existing "defense" policies of the world's governments, I was once asked by a clergyman: "Supposing mankind proves unable to turn back the clock of the suicidal arms race of the governments, and the consequences prove as dire as we fear; suppose in fact that all life on our planet were to perish, would it matter?" My immediate response was one of incredulous shock at a question seemingly resting on brutal, callous, cosmic indifference. But the man was kindly, humane, responsible, concerned, and he posed his question with deliberation and a grave serenity. I began to grasp his point. All life is mortal, all living things are destined to perish utterly, leaving no trace. This we know incontrovertibly. So in what sense can it be said to matter if life itself were ultimately destined to perish? I have often attempted to formulate an answer, and have found myself groping inarticulately, for it is as difficult as it is necessary that such a question be faced and honestly answered. I was therefore grateful when I came across the following passage in the Journal of Amiel, which seems to me to put the heart of the matter with great clarity and force, and speaks for my own deepest feeling:

> It is by no means necessary that the universe should exist, but it is necessary that justice should be done, and atheism is bound to explain the fixed obstinacy of conscience on this point. Nature is not just; we are the products of nature: why are we always claiming and prophesying justice? Why does the effect rise up against its cause? It is a singular phenomenon. Does the protest come from any puerile blindness of human vanity? No, it is the deepest cry of our being, and it is for the honour of God that the cry is uttered. Heaven and earth may pass away, but good ought to be, and injustice ought not to be. Such is the creed of the human race. Nature will be conquered by spirit: the eternal will triumph over time.

ETHICS AND SOCIAL STRUGGLE

BARROWS DUNHAM

Mr. Dunham is the author of Man Against Myth, Giant in Chains (both Hill & Wang) and Heroes and Heretics (Knopf).

From a moral point of view, politics is peculiar: in its conduct, good means are often ineffective and effective means are often bad. The reason is that politics still moves within its ancient welter of struggle. Struggle is the mixed exercise of consent and coercion. The old democratic principle that government rests on the consent of the governed states more than a moral ideal or a maxim of jurisprudence: it states a fact. For no government can feel secure that has not the consent of most of those it governs. It may in fact govern in the interest of a few, but it must seem to govern in the interest of all and must give empirical signs that it does so. These signs may be temporary and misleading, but they must be there. Accordingly, the evils that attend the gathering and maintaining of consent are deceit and enticement—evils damaging, no doubt, but not deadly.

It is otherwise with coercion. When effective, coercion compels people to do what they do not want to do, or to refrain from what they want to do. It defeats their wishes, and if these wishes are innocent and kind, will thus have caused harm. It will also have caused harm by the very means it uses: slander, loss of livelihood, imprisonment, wounds, death.

Every one of these is an intrinsic evil—that is to say, an evil whenever and wherever it appears, regardless of any good it may be connected with, even as cause to effect. If it were possible, say, to produce paradise by killing 10 million people, the result would be scarred by the killing and would be noticeably less than paradise. There is no way to get a completely good end without using completely good means. This fact troubles only those who seek completely good ends. Sinners and statesmen have not the problem.

From a moral point of view, a system of human behavior in which good means tend to be ineffective, and effective means tend to be bad, is absurd. It is not absurd, alas, in the sense in which a canine leopard is absurd—a thing that cannot be. Quite to the contrary, it is the prevalent system of behavior. During our century, it has caused deaths so multitudinous and agonies so exquisite as to eclipse all previous sufferings. It promises still more and greater, with perhaps as ultimate issue the annihilation of mankind. How much of this must there be, one wonders, before men consider the morality of means as eagerly as the effectiveness of means, and thus begin to purify politics?

Given all this, some people (though not in the end very many) have thought it desirable, or morally required, to abstain from politics, thus to avoid the rot that taints both doer and things done. But this is no escape. To abstain is to allow to happen, and one who permits evil is not much better, though perhaps a little better, than one who commits it. If we abstain from politics, from social struggle, we allow politics to remain as it is: the mere, bare exercise of power, where the victory goes to whoever at the moment has greater power, not to him who uses what power he has, with all its moral risks and calamities, at least for some demonstrable good.

Most of the earth's present population lives in poverty or near it because a few million people of greater power have founded their wealth or modest prosperity upon this condition. The impoverished billions, who are the most, struggle to be least no longer. Ethics commits us to their side, for ethics knows no privileged few and intends the benefit of everyone. The lowly are to inherit the earth, not because they are lowly but because they are nearly all of us and can make a world for us all.

Now, suppose a man, aware that politics involves evildoing, abstains. He will have a certain moral purity. He will have personally caused no harm, no evil; but he will have prevented no evil, no harm. Moreover, so far as he has lived and acted, the starving billions continue to starve. He would not harm, but he would not help. What if it is the case that not helping is a means of harm?

Thus the good that politics, social struggle, alone can achieve collides with the evident evil of some of the means. From this has arisen the hope that a refusal to commit evil will somehow, despite all expectation, produce the desired end—that the things now accomplished by harm can also be accomplished by love. There is no doubt that the result, if it were to be the result, would be immensely nobler than anything achieved thus far. What we human beings need is unity, concord. Without it, we are left wagging each of us his height amid the multitude —powerless to grow by the growth of all.

But love will be effective only as it evokes love in response, and therefore cooperation. For this to work across great struggles, the "sides" would have to cease being sides. Doubtless, in the end, they must do this, since, if they pursue hate to the limits of weaponry, they will all be dead. Perhaps as against the threat of universal death there is beginning to be a new side, the side of mankind as a whole. If this side were ever to win, all struggles would have ceased or been brought within peaceful administration.

Meanwhile—a long meanwhile, but not I hope a permanent—we are caught in various struggles, and ethics assures us that we gain no moral merit by copping out. We have to stay in. Staying in, we find that love tends to beget hate, and hate love. It's a matter of sides. If you take a side, then you love it and the people on it, and you hate, or at any rate are hostile to, the opposing side and the people on that. Or—the other way round—if you detest a certain side (this happened to many of us, thirty-odd years ago, with the Nazis) then you take the opposing side, with a consequent love. So long as sides exist and are taken, there is no avoiding the dialectic of love and hate, each opposite clutching the other. No avoiding, that is to say, unless, rising perceptively above the struggle, we can find a side that is hitched to a star.

I think we ought to attempt this; and Christmas, which celebrates the winter solstice—a crisis, not between man and man but between man and nature—seems a good time to try. We are as in a house defiled and rotting, where there can be no repair without damage. Yet it is the only house we have. Shall we burn it down and ourselves within it, or shall we make it resistant to rot and easy to repair?

Let us look, accordingly, at the struggles we are in. These are of three sorts: (1) the struggle among nations, (2) the struggle among social classes, and (3) the struggle of men against government.

(1) Nationhood is an old idea, but the chance really to be a nation arose within the past 500 years. The first nations, in the modern sense, became so by seceding from the medieval Church: Luther's Germany, Henry VIII's England. France became a nation without seceding, except for a few revolutionary years; nevertheless, one has to speak of a Gallican Church.

The early nations colonized, and their colonies in turn became nations. Every one of these has heard at some time what we Americans heard in 1775:

A cry of defiance and not of fear,
A voice in the darkness, a knock at the door,
And a word that shall echo forevermore!

It has so echoed, and it is, of course, the midnight message of Paul Revere.

What makes a nation a nation? The fact that the members of it have a common territory, a common tradition, a common mode of producing and distributing goods, a common system of government, usually a common language and, above all, a common apparatus of armed defense and attack. It has thus happened that nations are the way in which men are most powerfully organized. Nowhere is any social class (unless it holds national power) armed against any other social class in the way that nations are armed against nations. Accordingly, the struggle among nations profoundly affects all the other sorts of struggle.

(2) The struggle between social classes is that between the relatively few men who make profits on other people's labor and the very many men upon whose labor profits are made. Fifty to a hundred years ago, this conflict appeared most plainly within the industrialized nations: capital against labor, employer against employee. When, however, there came to be empires—the British first and now the American—basic exploitation passed over upon colonial peoples, and workingmen in the imperial country were let share, though modestly, the profits. This ingenious device produced the illusion that the class struggle no longer existed at home. At the same time, for colonial peoples, it joined the struggle against poverty with the struggle for national liberation—a prime example of how the two sorts of struggle act on each other.

Other examples abound. Historically, nationhood is a concomitant of capitalism, indeed its offspring. But when, within our century, the leading capitalist powers began armed competition for possession of the earth's resources, there occurred two great wars, which had as part of their result the appearance and spread of socialism in very large areas indeed. One-third of the earth's population—a billion people—now lives in some form of socialism. Thus the effect of the nationalist struggle upon the social struggle has been to bring capitalism nearer an end. The true cause of socialism is capitalism itself.

Durer

That one gets what one does not want and wants what one does not get is perhaps a law of history. It works the same way on the Socialist side. Marx and Engels observed in the Manifesto that "the workingmen have no country"—because, wherever they lived, they suffered the same exploitation. Out of this concept grew Socialist internationalism, the prospect that the working class, since it had identical interests across frontiers, would put an end to national rivalries and therefore to wars. Moreover socialism, as a system without inner conflicts, was expected to need no expansionist adventures. This was the dream, and it is still the dream.

The historical reality was that when the nations collided in 1914, the Socialist parties supported their various governments. Nationalism won over socialism. Lenin alone, with his remarkable followers, held the old internationalist view, and with it he made the revolution in Russia. But when he had made it, he had made it in one country, which was immediately attacked by some fourteen other countries, along with armies of the dispossessed aristocracy and bourgeoisie. The evolution successfully defended itself; yet, when all was done, there was socialism in just one country.

There is now socialism in many countries, but these countries appear to be more aware of being nations than of being Socialist. Each has of course adapted Marxism to its immediate national needs, and that is only good sense. But each also asserts its present interpretation of Marxism, joined as it is with just these immediate national needs, to be the only universally valid interpretation. It is sad to see such nonsense in a great movement. Alas, the notion of a One True Church dies hard.

(3) The struggle of men against government. The continuing life of this struggle and its recent rise to some sort of primacy show that history is full of irony and wit, and perhaps has these as part of its essence. For this struggle is nothing less than the old capitalist revolution reborn in greater splendor, though with quite different economic intent. The intent now is not at all to exploit anybody, but rather to put everybody beyond the reach of exploitation by any class or control by any bureaucracy.

The old capitalist revolution was in fact a series, beginning with the Protestant Reformation and passing through the Cromwellian wars, the Bloodless Revolution of 1688, our War of Independence and the French Revolution. The ideals of this series were anarchist and even antinomian: liberty, equality, fraternity. Of these it can be said that you won't have any one of them completely unless you have them all. It is fair to judge that commercial society, though it did rather well with liberty, has pretty much failed with the others.

Of this failure our own American history gave the most spectacular example. That all men are created equal is asserted in our Declaration of Independence to be a self-evident truth. Yet the man who wrote those words was himself a slave owner, though not liking the status; and our Constitution, until amended in 1868, counted a slave, for purposes of census, as three-fifths of a person.

If we keep for a moment to arithmetic, we can say that, according to the ideals of the capitalist revolution, one equals one, is neither more nor less than one. It has followed that everybody within the reach of that revolution who, however, turned out to be treated as less than one, has striven to make good the difference. The blacks got only the verbal three-fifths annulled in 1868. They are now demolishing the social, factual difference.

These same ideals guide the rebellion of youth—the ones who are, since it seems we must use this idiotic terminology, not "black" but "white." Here I think we must attempt conjectures that may seem rash. The race between general happiness and universal death is now so close that we must stretch our minds to conceive more than old caution or lingering timidity will allow.

One country in the world, the United States, is technologically equipped to produce abundance, to satisfy all the needs and most of the wishes of its inhabitants. Prosperity (a feeble word in this context) is just around the corner, though the corner is one we may never turn. Something like absolute happiness is possible; so also is absolute ruin.

The chance at absolute happiness exists because some of the conditions for it exist. These conditions also give rise to certain expectations. In a society of abundance, where everyone thrives, one would expect (as part of the thriving) an abundance of liberties, and these would be not freedoms from but freedoms for—for loving, for giving, for making up one's own mind, untouched and untouchable by penalty or bribe. These freedoms, the freedoms for, are exactly the ones the young demand. Against is what they are against. Interdit d'interdire was the motto of the French students in May 1968.

Accordingly, one can understand why the young white rebels come from prosperous families and comfortable homes. They have grown up in material plenty, and they are thus peculiarly fitted to recognize that their society does not yet grant the liberties that plenty should entail. Moreover, the new sexual freedom, also an effect of technology, saves them from deceits and compromises that used to attend adolescence. They are less soon lured toward hypocrisy, and may thus give candor a long life.

Perhaps that is why the rebellion of youth is so profoundly moral—an attempt to make ethics prevail. The youth don't give you a history of capitalist or bureaucratic practices; they tell you, quite simply, that the practices are wrong. Hard-bitten administrators, for whom ethics has always been a cover rather than a guide, suppose this to be a cover also, and go looking underneath. When they look underneath, what they find is just more morality.

The effect of this third sort of struggle upon the others is extensive and, I think, benign. So far as governmental activity can be held within the ideals of liberty, equality, fraternity—within, say, our Bill of Rights—there will be less violence and more justice and, above all, less likelihood of universal death. If this can happen, what was noble in capitalism will remain: the technology for abundance, and the modes, accurately defined, in which men may live protected amid their vast social powers.

Struggle, in all its varieties and interactions, is as old as recorded history, and no doubt older. It is present history, and will be, for a time one cannot determine, future history. These struggles are the precise source of the odious moral paradox we saw at the beginning: that there can be no improvement without damage, no achieved good without committed evil. The inference seems clear: to get rid of the paradox, we must get rid of its source—that is to say, we must bring all struggles of this kind and magnitude to an end. What are the chances?

(1) The struggle among nations is to end in concord. Nationalism has been a stage in which we learned to live, loyally and even affectionately, in something larger than a family, a tribe, a neighborhood. We are to become, what the 18th century was fond of predicting and our visitors upon the moon have proclaimed, citizens of the world, indeed of the cosmos.

(2) The struggle among social classes is to end in the sharing of abundance, an abundance that therefore cannot fail to be equal and fraternal. When this has happened, men will look back, as upon past idiocies, astonished that there were ever times when some men wanted to own other men, or to be as lords to serfs or as employers to employees. For the whole idea of underlings, wretched of the earth, least of these our brethren, is contrary to reason and contrary to common sense.

(3) The struggle of men against government is to end in the ending of government. There is to be a time when no one shall have the power to coerce our decisions or our acts, because, when that time has come, neither the structure of society nor the content of our wishes will entail coercion. This is, of course, the anarchist dream; it is also the Marxist—the withering away of the state.

These three goals, implied though they are in the three sorts of struggle, may be defeated, balked of fulfillment, by the way the goals are sought. Their attainment does indeed seem to require an effort beyond human power, as that power now is or seems likely to be. For my own part, I doubt and doubt bitterly. But doubting ultimate glory is worse than useless, since, if the doubt is confirmed, we have gained nothing, and if the doubt paralyzes (as it will) we may lose a great deal. Suppose, instead, we stubbornly say that the thing can be done. What reasons could we adduce?

(1) The thing itself—concord, abundance, liberty—is so attractive, commanding, magnificent that the race would be damnably stupid not to bring it off.

(2) Though I may despair when I consider the present rulers of earth, who seem to have little appreciation of the goals, I can also consider the rest of my fellow citizens, the Asians, Africans, Europeans, all of us who are the peoples of the world—the now badly governed, who might learn to govern well. And then I cannot feel empty of hope.

(3) Suppose I take things at their presumable worst—not saying, however, that human nature is hopelessly corrupt, for from that view I could only draw the useless inference that we are doomed. Let me take as the "presumable worst" human nature as human beings are when they possess and exercise political power. I think that is when people are at their worst. A politician would probably be horrified if he had personally to kill somebody, but he will participate in the killing of thousands, at a remove apparently sanctioned by law or policy.

It has long been understood how one man ought to treat another, and in this regard of person to person our behavior is really not bad. But the behavior of multitudes toward other multitudes is quite a different thing: loyalty to one's own group may seem to entail harm or death to other groups. For some reason, which I don't know, we have done better with person to person than with nation to nation or class to class. Perhaps the thing turns on immediacy: you are with a nice guy and can like him; you are with a charming girl and can love her. The social virtues on a large scale are harder to come by.

Nevertheless, history will show that some great social virtues have been attained in a way that has been lasting. Tolerance is an example. This noble ideal began to be practiced in Holland in the 17th century, because the various constellations of power in that country—churches, synagogues, parties—were in such a relation that no group could dominate any other. The same thing happened in England not long after, and Voltaire, in exile there about that time, was moved to say: "If there were in England only one religion, despotism would be a threat; if there were two, they would cut each other's throat. But there are thirty, and all are content."

My notion is that social morality is a thing that politics backs into. It does the morally good thing because there comes a time when it is impossible to do the opposite. I think that we shall probably survive not because our rulers love us but because they won't want to do the thing that will destroy us all. It will seem to them, as indeed it has on two occasions, politically impracticable.

One doesn't look a gift horse in the mouth, and one doesn't reject salvation because of its origins. I understand, of course, that bad motives may corrupt consequences; but when the consequence is survival and safety, I'll let the motive pass. If we, as a race, survive, the rest of the gains seem attainable, because everything that went into our survival will have promoted them. And in this we can hope for help, unintended perhaps and even unwilling, from the killers that now have power.

Maybe it won't happen that way. Yet as we now are, hanging between glory and disaster, a nudge from us upon our rulers, a faithful insistence upon the best, may very well leave our grandchildren happy—to make the earth a garden, to populate the planets, and to chase, if they wish, the expanding universe.

THE VANDAL IDEOLOGY

SCOTT PARADISE

Mr. Paradise is executive director of Boston Industrial Mission. He is the author of Detroit Industrial Mission: A Personal Narrative (Harper & Row).

Some call it an ecological crisis; others admit only to a variety of serious environmental problems ranging from pollution to ugliness. In any case, the bombardment of articles, books and television programs in the past few years have made us aware that something is wrong. Exploding populations, advancing technology and economic development have joined to face us with a triple threat. But except for a few voices, the depth of the difficulty eludes expression.

We assume, rightly, that more science and technology, better planning, or more adequate political arrangements are needed; but we assume, wrongly, that a combination of these will save us. The argument runs, if we lack as yet the political will to solve the problems, a few local catastrophes will surely bring us to our senses and force us in due course to achieve general solutions. While admitting that stricter regulation of polluters and developers will be necessary, we talk as though the American industrial system could survive without really radical modification.

The contrary is true. Not only must our industrial system be changed; the system of beliefs about man's relationship with the natural world which underlies it must be corrected if we are to escape the jaws of the coming crisis. This system of beliefs might be described as an ideology. It is almost always assumed. In one way or another, its propositions are often asserted as self-evident truths. In fact, their influence on social policy and the allegiance they hold over the majority of Americans should make envious the proponents of the traditional religions.

American ideology of man and nature might be reduced to the following seven propositions:

(1) Man is the source of all value. This is not anthropocentrism for that implies only that man is the center of value. Rather it is anthroposolipsism, which asserts that man alone has any inherent value. Everything else is valuable only as it benefits man.

(2) The universe exists only for man's use. This proposition is a corollary of the first. If man is the single source of value, anything which men cannot use is useless and can be destroyed without compunction. Some of us broaden the idea of usefulness to include things of scientific, aesthetic and ecological value. But in practice this belief more often further narrows the meaning of value to that which has calculable economic value. Thus if the world's whaling fleets find profit in exterminating the last of the great whales, the whales must go. No argument about either the rights of whales or their ecological value will be admitted. The only argument that might possibly have effect contends that more profit might be made if whaling were limited so as to guarantee a perpetual harvest of blubber and meat.

Since the universe exists only for man's use, man may with a crusader's zeal war against nature and bring it to unconditional surrender.

(3) Man's primary purpose is to produce and consume. This is the heart of the good life. We sometimes define man as the tool-using animal, homo faber. Theologians pronounce us co-creators with God. As co-creator, man has a license also to destroy and waste. In spite of such protests as the hippies represent, the work ethic still reigns. Neither a play ethic, nor a love ethic, nor a service ethic yet challenges it. Only a consumer ethic grapples with it for supremacy.

(4) Production and consumption must increase endlessly. Since life's primary purpose is producing and consuming, abundant life blesses us through increasing material abundance. Goods equal the good, and nothing can quench our infinite thirst for them. Growth of the gross national product defines progress and makes possible a continual and simultaneous increase in population and rise in standard of living. Those concerned with social justice see evil in that some nations have enjoyed too little economic growth; they see hope in the possibility that all nations will have more.

(5) Material resources are unlimited. The thrust of this proposition lies not in the absurdity that the finite Earth has infinite resources but rather that we do not need to heed the warnings of those concerned with their depletion. New deposits of minerals and fossil fuels are found every decade. Our technology of extraction constantly improves and enables us to develop deposits unreachable or uneconomical a few years ago. For those resources genuinely scarce we can find substitutes. Ultimately our technology will be equal to extracting all the raw materials we need for millions of years from sea water and the granite on the earth's surface. When worried voices speak of overcrowding, they need only be referred to the vast empty spaces on the map of the world and the statistics that 70 per cent of Americans are needlessly crammed together on a tiny fraction of the country's land surface. Even warnings about pollutants need not cause alarm because the human genius for short-range technical improvisation is equal to any crisis that is likely to arise.

(6) Man need not adapt himself to the natural environment since he can remake it to suit his own needs. This assumption, sometimes referred to as "the bulldozer mentality," manifests itself most clearly when American military or business personnel live overseas. There they often create an environment more like that of continental United States than of the country in which they are stationed. We see it also in the possibility, sometimes realized through central heating and air conditioning, of never needing to spend more than a few minutes at a time in temperatures below 65 or above 75 degrees Fahrenheit from one year to the next. We see it in the vacationer who sprays his seaside acreage with DDT. On the other hand, while man need not adapt himself to the natural environment, it is assumed he can and must adjust to any stress perpetrated by his own technology. Smog, noise and ugliness come with progress, and man can and must learn to live with them.

(7) A major function of the state is to make it easy for individuals and corporations to exploit the environment to increase wealth and power. Ideas concerning private property stand central in this proposition. Because it has influenced the shape of the American social structures, it is easier for a lumber company to cut down redwoods than for the government to prevent it from doing so. It is easier for a developer to destroy a beautiful old mansion to make way for new ranch houses than for the public to organize a drive and raise money to save the historic house. It is easier for strip miners to destroy a countryside than for a legislature to pass preventive legislation or the courts to enforce it. All these business initiatives increase the gross national product. The government structure and operation is biased to encourage such development rather than effectively to protect the natural and cultural heritage.

Although people often assert each of these beliefs, most Americans would perhaps not subscribe to them when stated this baldly. Nevertheless, our social policy, both public and private, operates as if these were our beliefs. And not only does this system of beliefs run in the mainstream of American culture but it is also spreading to infect societies all over the world. Any nation wanting to industrialize will find a certain usefulness in it. It tends to free a society from a veneration of places and things which might inhibit their being used for economic development. It directs attention away from personal and family relationships, away from tradition and ceremonial. It offers a moral alternative to leisure. These ideas seem necessary in order to blast most nations out of ancient ways and set them on the road of development.

But in the long run the consequences of this ideology must be disastrous—first, because no organism can endlessly multiply and exploit its environment; second, because it betrays life's meaning to elevate the economic, technical and procreative processes to absolutes. In America where this ideology has long been dominant, people tend to forget that it is not self-evident and has not always been universally accepted. It contradicts assumptions around which most cultures have organized life throughout history. Even today in the developing nations many governments are struggling with wrongheaded persistence to win the unwilling and recalcitrant people of the villages to this ideology.

Wolgemut

The profound challenge facing America today is whether we can discover a new orientation which will preserve the necessary values and the truths in the current ideology, and yet redirect our goals so as to preserve our environment and our humanity itself.

To correct the seven propositions just stated is a good place to begin. They might be restated thus:

(1) Man is to be valued more highly than other creatures. Such a proposition is truly anthropocentric. It puts man at the pinnacle of creation but does not isolate him as the only thing of value. Other creatures have beauty and splendor of their own.

That this kind of assertion perplexes many in the culture is hardly surprising. A nation that coined the phrase, "The only good Indian is a dead Indian," is not likely to defend the cause of wildlife. But moral progress follows a widening awareness of the circle of fellowship. If we see it as ethical advance to discover Indians as our brothers, it is a move in the same direction to recognize animals as our cousins. Some of the most eloquent spokesmen for this perception speak out of the scientific community. Men like Loren Eiseley and Konrad Lorenz, who have spent lifetimes sensitively observing nonhuman life, can tell us without sentimentality that many animals are capable of relationship with us. Unfortunately, they cannot say with like confidence that we are interested in relating to them.

But many cannot believe that anything has value not bestowed on it by men. Those so invincibly anthroposolipsists might just understand that the human race is not an island but a part of the whole community of life. If any species disappears, man and all the rest are diminished. The extermination of animal species attendant on the growth of human population reduces the variety, fascination and stability of the biosphere. And therefore it erodes the quality of human life.

(2) Man has become the guardian of the earth. His prerogatives to use the earth's resources are balanced by his responsibility to cherish them, protect them and use them carefully. Man does evil when he exterminates species of animals or does irreversible damage to the environment. When he does destroy life he needs to calculate the benefits he receives against the impoverishment of the living community. Man also is able to improve the environment. These changes entail disadvantages as well as benefits. Here, too, costs as well as benefits need to be carefully calculated before the project which will effect the change is undertaken.

(3) Man is far more than a producer and consumer. Without production and consumption, of course, life cannot continue. But without singing, dancing or poetry, without loving, discovering or learning, without art, music or drama, life is hardly worth continuing. By participating in these pursuits in concert we lay hold of our humanity. The model of life as mass production and massive consumption is only one of many possible models. Most cultures throughout most of the human experience have been decidedly less obsessed than we with getting and spending. A recent study of the Kung Bushmen in the Kalihari Desert reports that on the average these people spend only three days a week food gathering and hunting. During the remaining four days they vigorously pursue noneconomic activities. Such a record, while perhaps arousing the wrath of their work-oriented fathers, would fill many of today's youth with envy and admiration. Our massive affluence should make it possible to emulate the Bushmen to some degree and so recover new dimensions of our humanity.

(4) Improvement in the quality of life takes precedence over increasing the quantity of material production. The growth of the gross national product does not necessarily lead to an enlargement of human well-being. It may in some instances lead to the opposite. Our social goal should be to achieve a zero rate of population increase and a state of increasing human well-being with a minimum increase in material production and consumption. Herein lies a new understanding of efficiency. In the long run this policy should lead to a state of relative equilibrium bebetween the human race and the natural environment. But within this relative equilibrium men could make great progress in the arts, literature, sciences and human relationships.

(5) Material resources are to be used carefully and cherished. The assumption of limitless resources breeds indifference to waste and to the likely needs of our descendants. This indifference drains us of joy and appreciation for things in the intoxication of consumption. Russell Baker observed in The New York Times that to transform goods into trash as quickly and efficiently as possible has become America's major pastime. On the other hand, human fulfillment comes not through an ascetic denial of the value of material things but by passionately and sensitively embracing them. Using and loving a few things long and carefully leads to a different kind of experience, a more profoundly fulfilling one, than does the careless use and abandonment of many things in rapid succession. We need a new materialism to replace the consumerism which now goes by that name.

(6) Man is to relate himself to the natural environment, remaking it according to its nature as well as for the sake of his short-term economic advantage. Such considerations in many instances might deter us from covering superb farm land with parking lots, shopping centers and suburban subdivisions, or from carelessly filling or polluting intensely rich protein-producing wetlands and estuaries. It might save us from building expressways on some of our urban shore lines or trying to farm areas whose soil will predictably respond by becoming wasteland. Man's power to improve the world for his own use is not unlimited. His actions on it result in ecological reactions. He is part of a living web which responds when he acts and forces him to respond when it acts. Such a pattern of mutual action and reaction may be described as a relationship. In most instances man rightly claims the initiative and determines the quality of the relationship. But to make war on nature and force it to an unconditional surrender will lead to unexpected and disconcerting counterattacks. To win final victory requires that we make a desert and call it peace.

(7) A major function of the state is to supervise a planning process which will prevent the impairment of the quality of the environment. This proposition implies a different conception of the rights of property. Land and resources cannot be seen as ours in the sense that we can abuse or destroy them for profit or pleasure. Instead, the right to hold and develop them depends on these actions contributing to the public good and preserving the quality of the environment. Of course, this principle can be applied only with complicated calculations of costs and benefits, but too often the calculations are still being made on the assumption that measures adopted for private gain usually lead to public benefit and that short-run, measurable economic advantage is an adequate criterion for determining action. The burden of proof must be shifted from those who would preserve the environment to those who would exploit it, and from those who would limit property rights in the interest of public and environment to those who would defend such rights for private advantage.

These suggested modifications of our beliefs about man's relationship with nature are perhaps so radical as to be almost incomprehensible to many. Nevertheless, such thoughts are increasingly in the air. Conservationists, ecologists, hippies and certain groups of the New Left have created a climate in which such ideas have become more plausible than they were only a few years ago. [See "Man in Nature: Model for a New Radicalism" by Catherine Riegger Harris, The Nation, November 10.] Most of us, however, still doggedly embrace the hope that we can continue in the present course and save our society by tinkering. We still prefer to hope that if we reduce the military budget, develop better urban planning and pollution-control techniques, and enlarge the war against poverty, all will be well.

Technological forecasters and other futurists are still debating whether such a hope is realistic. The supposition that "something will turn up" to retrieve the situation can keep the hope alive and the argument continuing beyond the point of no return.

And, of course, it is just possible that the present system can continue on approximately its present path. But even if it can, argument can be made that it shouldn't. The perceptions and commitments suggested in the modified statement of belief serve as a far more satisfying basis for human fulfillment than does the current ideology. A society that would emerge from this new vision might have powerful appeal. Rebellious youth and growing interest in conservation may be straws in the wind to suggest that it would. In this appeal may lie seeds of revolution.

Crescentius

BOOKS & THE ARTS

A Mighty Maze! But Not Without A Plan

THE SCIENCE OF FREEDOM. Vol. II of The Enlightenment: An Interpretation. By Peter Gay. Alfred A. Knopf. 223 pp. $10.

J. H. PLUMB
Mr. Plumb is a professor of history at Christ's College, Cambridge. His latest book, The Death of the Past, will soon be published in this country by Houghton Mifflin.

For generations now the philosophers of the Enlightenment have suffered in public esteem because of the disrepute into which they fell during the 19th century. They were dismissed as superficial thinkers who could never resist a witticism; mockers who scoffed at the sacredness of belief; blind optimists who ignored the sinfulness and bestiality of man; lackeys of authority who pandered to the foibles of despots; armchair revolutionaries and sofa cynics.

At the head of the family was Voltaire, grinning toothlessly and maliciously at the follies of men, yet ignoring their grandeur. Rousseau presented difficulties, for his very obscenity seemed to hint at profundity. But his total lack of judgment, the parade of his own indecencies, the crass, unendurable sentimentality of his novels, particularly Emile, put the bulk of his work beyond consideration. Le Contrat Social, within the context of the history of political thought, could be treated as both profound and important: in the same sense that Hume's Treatise on Human Nature could be absorbed into the history of philosophy or Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations treated as the foundation of economic theory. But the full context of their thought: its growth, its complexity, its social impact, its intimate relationship with the whole family of the philosophers, was quite another matter.

For many decades now, interest has revived in 18th-century thought and thinkers—one has only to turn to the two magisterial bibliographical essays in Peter Gay's two volumes to realize the wealth of material upon which he has drawn. And yet this material is largely technical, professional and limited, dealing with some specified aspect of the work of Diderot or Voltaire or Rousseau. Very few scholars have attempted to survey the whole of the Enlightenment. What has, alas, been absent in this plethora of books and articles on the philosophes is a sense of relevance to modern times and modern thought. We have needed a synthesis that rose beyond particular studies, one that would confirm that the philosophes were the first to proclaim the potentialities and aspirations of modern man and to offer some of the sharpest criticisms ever made of tyranny, obscurantism and infamy.

Outrageous claims? I do not think so. Better still, neither does Peter Gay. His book will be a turning point, not in the studies of the Enlightenment (which are too complex for that) but in what is more valuable still: in the appreciation of what the thinkers of the 18th century had to offer, not only to their own dark and troubled world but also to ours. If this should be so, he will have made a contribution to far more than historical study. He may be instrumental in helping a new recovery of nerve among modern humanists. It is overdue.

In this volume, Peter Gay describes the reactions of the family of philosophes to aesthetics, to science, to law, to politics and to education. He draws on a wide range of works, moving with practiced skill from Ferguson, Smith or Dugald Stewart to Beccaris, Winckelmann or Kant. Few men in our generation have read so widely or so deeply in the huge output of the philosophic family as has Professor Gay. No book of prime importance slips through his net. He discusses them all. But he never assumes that his readers will be so familiar with any work that he need not describe its theme and intention. In less skilled hands this could easily have led to an endless précis of books, but Gay's summaries of content are always pertinent to the underlying themes of the Enlightenment.

In essentials, the philosophes wished to explain life in purely human terms. Even though they did not abolish God, they pushed Him back into a first cause or a principle of benevolence implicit in the universe as they saw it. They judged law, institutions, political philosophy, and education by the touchstone of human happiness. The quality of life, however, was not the standard by which most 18th-century governments evaluated institutions. They accepted slavery, torture, child labor, rigorous censorship, brutal laws and brutal punishments. One needs to be reminded over and over again of what a prison to spirit, mind and body was much of 18th-century life.

The philosophes, from Voltaire to Samuel Johnson, shared a sharp realization of the infamous ways of men entrusted with power. Furthermore, they knew that many of these horrors arose out of a blind acceptance of the authority of the past. And so they battled and fought with every literary weapon in the efficient armory, from works of learning to lighthearted poetry. The Encyclopaedia and Emile had the same intention: to criticize society in the hope of a reformation which would enhance human life, make it freer, happier and more secure.

And they believed, the majority of them, that this could be achieved by the application of intelligence to human problems—by developing a science of living. Aware of man's tendency to persecute, subject and exploit, they were nevertheless confident that life could only improve if the areas in which intelligence could have full play could be extended. These areas were primarily religion, politics, law. The Enlightenment was, as Professor Gay demonstrates so aptly, a time of renewed confidence in man's ability to understand his world and, perhaps, improve it by pushing back the boundaries of ignorance.

This book has a richness of intention as well as of texture. It re-establishes the grandeur, the nobility and the dedication of the philosophes. No one, in the future, will be able to dismiss them as superficial. As a panorama of 18th-century intellectual life, Gay's book is outstanding. However, like all books which cover so wide a field, it has some shortcomings.

England's intellectual life is treated as if its developments were similar to those of Europe; whereas momentous changes were taking place in England that were ominous for the further development of the Enlightenment itself. From the 1730s one can discern in England a growth of and a respect, almost a hunger, for tradition; a movement away from Locke to Burke, an idealization (at least among the upper classes and the literary establishment) of what has been rather than an argument for what might be. The attitude of the philosophes was being adopted by a different social class: in England by the technocrats, industrialists and dissenters. This was to happen more generally throughout Europe after 1780.

And I, for one, would have welcomed a close analysis of the relationship between social movements and the ideas of the philosophic family. Treating the period of roughly 1690-1780 as a unity must lead to some distortion. The absence of consideration of those social groups for whom the works of the philosophes bore the hallmark of freshly discovered truth is, to me, unfortunate in a work of such quality.

These criticisms are not made, however, to belittle one of the most impressive feats of scholarship of the sixties. For the work, as a whole, I have the most profound admiration. It will be a long time before it is surpassed.

Unpredictable as Grace

THE ZIG-ZAG WALK: Poems 1963-1968. By John Logan. E. P. Dutton & Co. 123 pp. $5.95. Paper $2.45.

A. POULIN, Jr.

Mr. Poulin, a poet, is completing an anthology of contemporary American poetry for Houghton Mifflin, and editing a collection of contemporary poetics and criticism for E. P. Dutton. He is chairman of the Division of Humanities at St. Francis College in Maine.

Reviewing John Logan's second book of poems, Ghosts of the Heart, in 1962, James Dickey concluded that Logan stood "an exciting chance of being one of the finest poets we have ever had in this country." The Zig-Zag Walk confirms Dickey's judgment. Logan's fourth collection is his finest to date, and one of the decade's most exciting books of poems.

Absent from these poems is the equipage of erudition which sometimes cluttered Logan's earlier work; the Roman Catholic dogma and "orthodox symbology" (as Dickey called it) which tested the reader's willing suspension of disbelief; and unsuccessful attempts at confessional verse à la Lowell. Present and perfected is Logan's characteristic lyricism; his fine attention to minute detail:

I see the seaside daisy die so beautifully here. It loses its nunlike coif as the lavender leaves fall off and tiny yellow rockets burst about its heart
till only the perfect-spiraled flower skull is left . . .;

his sensuality of imagery:

Here the logs lie like lovers,
short by long, benign, nudging gently in the tide. . . .

and his religious imagination:

For like the lost or stolen flesh of God,
the self, more alive or more dead, opens on to truth
of earth
and sea and sky—
and the thieves' cave yawns empty of our smuggled body.

These new poems are exciting and moving because they are genuinely personal and natural, determined neither by thematic nor structural formula. In an earlier poem Logan theorized that the poet's gift is

. . . the wand of tongues that charms the exile of listeners into a bond of brothers, breaking down the lines of lead that separate a man from a man, and the husbands from their wives, in these old burned glass panels of our lives.

In these poems, poetics is transformed into practice. Although controlled and often masterly, they succeed in sounding as natural as breathing, beginning simply and growing in intensity and power out of their own necessity, as the breath of a man in battle or in love, and rising to a discovery of personal epiphanies. They are "unpredictable as grace." Never is the poet's hand obvious or obtrusive; and never does he engage in personal, verbal or technical entrechats which draw attention to themselves. Rather, the poetry is genuine and transparent. Here is a person. This is the sound of a man's voice when he speaks poems. And the poetry is in the person.

What is also memorable is the quality of personalism which Logan has achieved, the self revealing its multifaceted and complex dimensions in small interpersonal dramas and in direct intimacy with the reader. Logan does not expect his reader to be either father confessor, psychiatrist or voyeur. He speaks to him as friend and lover, revealing himself gradually, sharing unexpected moments of quiet joy, both large and small revelatory experiences, but respecting certain areas of himself and his experience as sacred. When he does confess, he usually admits simply to that most basic human failure of not responding to another, of either not giving or recognizing that human grace which is indeed capable of redeeming the time—even if only for the briefest moment. So that having come to the end of the book, one does not sense that he has examined a case study or waded through pools of an actively imaginative psyche. One knows he has been touched by a whole and commanding person.

Although a full thematic design does emerge, the poems individually discover and rediscover a man's vital and open-ended sense of life in each new experience. The book's thematic design is itself open-ended. In the concluding poem, "The Search" (which originally appeared in The Nation), he repeatedly asks, "Whom do I seek?" Much of The Zig-Zag Walk describes that search: in effect the self's quest for full realization and transcendence. If "orthodox symbology" is absent from these poems, Logan's essentially religious imagination is still very much present—somewhat secularized in appearance, but also strengthened in intensity.

The book's opening poem, "The Zoo," posits the conflicting assumptions of Logan's central theme. On the one hand, the self participates in the basic search, "the continuous, universal game/ of fish becoming man." But in various other parts of the book, it is clear that that game prods, magnetizes man ever farther up on the evolutionary ladder toward a final self-realization. And essential to this evolution, of course, is the ability and willingness to change, to engage in process, even in that final process of death which, Logan quotes Gabriel Marcel as saying, "is not a problem to be solved./ It is a mystery to be entered into."

In "Birches" Robert Frost said: "I'd like to get away from earth awhile/ And then come back to it and begin over." Logan recognizes much the same spiritual tension. The impetus toward transcendence is, on the one hand, virtually arrested, for the self is trapped in a complex of cages and prisons. And it is precisely that tension which offers the self the opportunity for transcendence. A kind of reversal of Frost's precept. There is participation in animal history; in "The Zoo" he writes:

This Primate House echoes with our mixed cries;
it reeks with our ambiguous breath.
Each one caged as an oracle
I feel each upright animal can tell how much my life is a human life, how much an animal death.

There is also participation in the moral history of guilt: in "Three Moves" he recognizes the essential difference between animals and man; the tame ducks do not rise:

These foolish ducks lack a sense of guilt, and so all their multi-thousand-mile range is too short for the hope of change.

Then there are "the prisons of our skins" and society's real jails where

We are nailed up as in a coffin,
Only touched by burlap clothes or bugs.
We would stroke the beaming shoots of sun!
But they've blocked every window tight with tin.

And lastly there is the paradoxical contemporary jail of exile (in Canada) because of that interminable Vietnamese War which thwarts "the keen blessing of your insight/ . . . bright and quick/ with presence as a fresh, dawn-white/ drop of milk."

There is still another kind of prison, that caused by the self's attachment to "the fogged earth/ down there/ with its esoteric itch of flesh." The self is a landlubber at heart: "I am afraid . . ./ I reach for land." It is afraid of heights: "I feel afraid in this/ shattering new light./ Dread drifts like fog around my heart./ Why?/ The sheer, terrible height?" And: "The awful height stirs in me/ the huge, uneasy/ gull of my own soul." Indeed at times the self is simply recalcitrant as Frost's Yankee, refusing to leave this earth:

I'll stay here among the monuments of sheer, brown and gray rock
where you can read the names of lovers, sailors and of kids etched in chalk. . . .

However, it's not all that simple. Logan realizes that final transcendence can be achieved only when and if the self has fully responded to human and earthly experience. His premise asserts an inner generated and outer directed process of change and growth. The mystery of salvation (if one can resort to such terminology at a time when everyone but the Pope is dropping that notion) is its incarnation. Grace is discovered and given and received specifically through human and incarnate acts: the self giving itself up totally to earth and sea and sky; a friend who has given up his house and bed to young lovers; a young girl's gift of a "blue, porcelain/ egg . . ./ colored beautifully/ for a Russian Easter. . . ." And the final grace of death ("Poem, Slow to Come, On the Death of E. E. Cummings"):

You wrapped your lean, linen arms close around your life
naked as before our birth, and began to weave away from earth uttering with a huge, awkward, torn cry the terrible, final poetry.

Logan's central theme is best represented in "White Pass Ski Patrol" which is a secular and sporty account of the ascension. This member of the ski patrol "has become very strong/ living on the slopes," continually rising (on the ski lift) and caroming "down his own path" —speeding, dancing, balancing, taking all human risks and, when necessary, ministering to others, at times pulling down "from the dangerous cascades his/ heavy sledge of pain." And he rises again, "vanishes in air!" But only after he has come down, after he has learned what the body can do, what grace the body can realize on its own. So that finally:

There are the shadow tracks he left down the long, white hill beside the lift. Wait! Look up! Cloud trails in the bright sky!
Breathing a wake of snow ribbons, something has just flown over the mountain!

Like Teilhard de Chardin's fully evolved man, the skier moves through the final process into pure light.

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS IN THE NATION

Labyrinthine Ways

THE BOOK OF IMAGINARY BEINGS. By Jorge Luis Borges with Margarita Guerrero. Revised, enlarged and translated by Norman Thomas di Giovanni in collaboration with the author. E. P. Dutton & Co. 256 pp. $6.95.

STANTON HOFFMAN

Mr. Hoffman teaches English at Sir George Williams University in Montreal. He is the author of a recent study of Joseph Conrad, published by Mouton.

A dealer in enigmas and perplexities, Jorge Luis Borges is a strangely singular writer. He has created forms unlike any others in our literature, the ficciones and the inquisiciones, his terms for his short fictions and essays respectively. The forms often seem interchangeable. His fictions, which are sometimes no more than summaries of several versions of a single work by an imaginary author, where real and imaginary authors and characters intermingle, are deceptively simple vehicles for the most complex and labyrinthine philosophical arguments about time, reality, God, the universe, consciousness, human thought—arguments which, Borges claims, interest him more for their aesthetics than for their truth. The Book of Imaginary Beings further reveals the formal singularity of Borges, for it elevates compilation to a potentially fictional form and suggests the encyclopedia as art.

The Book of Imaginary Beings is a fantastic bestiary, a compilation and alphabetical arrangement made up of examples taken from familiar and more distant, esoteric mythologies, as well as, in a few cases, from individual writers such as Kafka, Poe, C. S. Lewis, Swedenborg. They are creatures imagined or dreamt at different periods in time and culture, beings of the imagination like Leviathan, Behemoth, the Sphinx, Cerberus, Hydra, the Phoenix, Griffins, Unicorns, Fairies. Borges' interest in these fantastic creatures comes from how they reveal that men in different times and places share similar, if not identical, dreams, and that men dream and think into existence amazing beings that are strange, powerful, and as real in their unreality as we are unreal in our reality.

In some cases, Borges' entries are very brief:

> As all Egyptians knew, Abtu and Anet were two life-sized fishes, identical and holy, that swam on the lookout for danger before the prow of the sun god's ship. Their course was endless; by day the craft sailed the sky from east to west, from dawn to dusk, and by night made its way underground in the opposite direction.

In other cases, his entries are longer, more elaborate, as when he presents the Phoenix, which he relates to the Egyptians' search for eternity, to the mirror of the Platonic Year, and to the history of the world repeating itself. His entry concludes, characteristically, with a bibliography of the various writers who have referred to the Phoenix: Herodotus, Pliny, Claudian, Ovid, Dante, Quevedo, Milton, Shakespeare in Henry VIII, a Latin poem attributed to Lactantius, an Anglo-Saxon imitation of this poem, Tertulius, St. Ambrose, Cyrillus of Jerusalem. In all cases, the entries are terse, cryptic, matter of fact, lacking comment or interpretation, as if the book were no more than what Borges' remarks in his preface seem to suggest, that this is simply a compilation in which there is a "kind of pleasure in useless and out-of-the-way erudition."

But I want to suggest that The Book of Imaginary Beings is more than a Borgesian entertainment. Its real justification lies in its relationship to Borges' other work, especially to those pervasive themes and metaphors which seem to me to establish Borges' singularity and importance as a writer. For the reader of Borges (who because he is a reader of Borges will be open to this sort of thing), The Book of Imaginary Beings is one long, elaborate and elegant ficcion or inquisicion. The difference is that here there is only the inference of the typical Borgesian protagonist, the man who thinks labyrinths into existence, whose mental processes are these labyrinths, and who is ultimately trapped in these labyrinths.

The inference of a universal mind and dreamer, arguments about the self as an illusion and a dream (since we are being dreamt by someone else), the implications of extreme idealist arguments, and constructs about the nature of time and consciousness—these essential Borgesian themes manifest themselves not only in this book's encyclopedic totality but also in its choices of particular entries. Borges' entry on Bahamut or Behemoth closely resembles one of his fictions, "The Circular Ruins." Both involve arguments of infinite regression, forms of Zeno's paradox about Achilles and the Tortoise: a paradox which is central to Borges' fiction and vision. In Bahamut, God, having made the earth, then needed to provide the earth with a base, and then that base with another base, and that base with another base, and so on. In "The Circular Ruins" a man dreams another man into existence only to realize that he too is being dreamt by someone, which implies that the person who is dreaming him is also being dreamt by someone, and that person by someone else, on to infinity.

The encylopedia is the form for the revelation of the totally idealist world of Tlon in Borges' fiction, "Tlon, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius." The encylopedia becomes the book of and the metaphor for the universe, analogous to the libraries that figure so importantly both in Borges' life and in his fictions: "The Library of Babel" and "The Secret Miracle." Sought for in the mazelike libraries of these stories is the one book that will explain everything and that will provide a solution to the confusing chaos of symbols and books that are collected in these libraries. Borges' librarians seek to find arguments of order in their surroundings of enigmatic disorder. Yet to argue belief in the existence of a book, a catalogue of catalogues, that contains all other books and is thus the key to the library and its vast and chaotic volumes, is to be caught in an impossible labyrinth. Again, one finds only an infinite regression: each catalogue of catalogues must imply a prior catalogue of catalogues.

Thus this congenial and pleasurable "useless" act of erudition leads to labyrinths and hints of desperation and futility. Underlying this compilation is what defines the worlds of Borges' fiction and essays: the desire for and the terror of self-annihilation, entrapment in the labyrinths of one's own making, and the possibilities of order out of disorder and confusion. There may be a key to the dreams that make up The Book of Imaginary Beings, but this key is missing. At the end of "The Library of Babel," Borges' librarian protagonist speaks of his solitude, rejoicing in the hope that he has found some kind of ultimate order in his infinite library. We are free, as Borges or his librarian, to try all sorts of arguments and constructions, but with the suspicion that these constructions and arguments may be after all only our own labyrinths.

The volume contains three prefaces: one to this present English translation, and the prefaces to the 1967 and 1957 Spanish editions. In his 1957 preface, Borges talks about the responses of children to the real zoo, which he implies is no different from our responses to the fabulous or imaginary zoo of mythologies.

TANGENT

This afternoon
I watched a young black man named Jackson step into the first pitch from a man with a Southern noncom face and hit it out of the game.

It did not seem a social comment.

But rather a young man clocked a fastball, and, keeping his right (moundward) elbow locked as he'd said on the pregame show he must, interrupted it with the force of his back and thighs.

The ball was still reaching for its arc as it (bird, impulse) cleared the chainlink fence in right center.
Moments later
electric words on the scoreboard said the longest ever to that side of the stadium,
but I already knew that.

DENNIS TRUDELL

In his preface to the 1967 edition, Borges declares that all things, including the universe, ourselves, even God, are imaginary beings, and that in terms of these "strange creatures conceived through time and space by the human imagination," we are ignorant of the meaning of the dragon in the same way that we are ignorant of the meaning of the universe.

Because a book of this kind "is unavoidably incomplete," each new edition will form the bases of future editions, which "themselves may grow endlessly." Borges is aware that his search is for more and more evidence, but he is without the sense of what this is to be evidence for. Thus he must imagine a book that must contain everything. This third edition of The Book of Imaginary Beings is part of this impossible movement toward this impossible completeness.

'Hooked!'

OUR CRIMINAL SOCIETY: The Social and Legal Sources of Crime in America. By Edwin M. Schur. Prentice-Hall. 244 pp. $6.95. Paper $2.95.

THE PLEASURE SEEKERS. By Joel Fort, M.D. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 255 pp. $6.50.

JACK LEAVITT

Mr. Leavitt is an assistant professor of law at John F. Kennedy University, Martinez, Calif., and a free-lance writer.

The general public seems to have little use for ideas that contradict present attitudes about crime, drug abuse and the roots of discontent. Crime continues to be symbolized by Negro thugs waiting in darkness to rob and attack us; drug abuse continues to be identified as a fixed progression from marijuana to heroin to hell, with hallucinatory side trips through LSD, brought about by evildoers who snare our children with the joys of degeneracy; discontent continues to be deemed an exaggerated clamor by those who prefer immorality and laziness to the assured rewards of hard work. The problems we face have one comforting feature: we consider ourselves victims instead of perpetrators. Stop them and you save us.

It is all summed up by Harry Anslinger, former U.S. Commissioner of Narcotics, in the December 1969 Esquire:

> If we are to survive, we must reject the ruinous and insidious policies of liberal bleeding hearts, soft judges and super-sophisticated do-gooders. History is strewn with the bones of nations which have tolerated weak laws, indifferent enforcement and court leniency.

By definition, a crime is an act or omission that violates a specific command of a duly constituted legislative body which has made its determination within constitutional limitations. In our fallible way, we have empowered our fallible representatives to express the communal will on what behavior threatens our well-being. If a specific prohibition squares with our organic law, which rarely deals in details, we must either obey the decision, prepare to suffer the prescribed sanctions, flee to a more permissive society, or compound our violation by attempting to unhorse the sovereign. Ideally, we should each benefit from universal obedience to our criminal laws and be grateful for a society that can control its outlaws.

Despite this hope, we face an immediate gap between our legislative enactments and our individual conduct because, as Dr. Edwin M. Schur, a sociologist, educator and attorney, indicates, our social problems reflect our form of social organization. "Disorganization and organization are theoretically inseparable," he says; "the types of problems we find in a given social order represent the price that is paid for maintaining that particular structure." Since much crime is closely related to other aspects of the American social order, we must do more than "eliminate" criminal activities. We must, Schur believes, find "functional alternatives," or approved ways of satisfying the same individual and social needs that inspired the objectionable conduct.

Thus Schur calls America a "criminal" society: its criminality is what it deserves. As major support for this broad premise, he cites the "real crimes" of our culture: a great inequality between the supposedly equal members of our society; a national willingness to use violence (especially depersonalized, euphemistic violence) as a basic implement of foreign policy; an emphasis on the values of dynamism, individualism, competition and personal monetary success to give meaning to typical social situations; a tendency to "create" crime by legislating against private conduct like consensual homosexuality, abortions, use of drugs and other "crimes without victims"; and our adoption of an unseeing, unworkable orientation to crime problems, usually based on "get tough" policies that isolate criminal behavior from general social reform.

Moving from this overview of criminality to the prevention of particular crimes by early identification of potential offenders, of course, presents our greatest difficulty, chiefly because most people in a "crime setting" do not become criminals. Examined critically, our causal theories of criminal behavior—from innate criminality programmed by atavistic genes, to mental or moral defectiveness, to imitative patterning after the literature of the mass media, to poverty, to racial discrimination, to the impact of broken homes—all fail in one regard. They never explain why, but for the grace of God, John Bradford—or any of us—has so far escaped the hangman. Given this unknown difference, this extra power in ourselves, we would rather post rewards for the apprehension of our felonious inferiors than give those potential felons a greater chance for a productive life.

No better introduction to our national incongruities will serve than a few sentences from back-to-back pages of the standard textbook, The Pharmacologic Principles of Medical Practice (2d ed.):

> The [LaGuardia] Committee's investigation showed that Marihuana smoking did not produce a tolerance for the drug or a true addiction with withdrawal symptoms. The sensations desired by the habitués were a feeling of contentment, inner satisfaction, and a free play of the imagination. The relation between Marihuana usage and eroticism was found capricious. . . . The drug is a vicious one and serves no purpose in therapy. [Emphasis added.]

Harmless but evil—so runs the refrain.

From the standpoint of Dr. Joel Fort, a physician specializing in public health, social psychiatry, and drug abuse, "essentially everyone is a drug user even if the discussion is restricted solely to mind-altering substances." Himself a teetotaler and nonsmoker, he believes in progressing beyond drugs to a society where, "lives of significance, relevance and meaning can be developed which include love for people, beauty, art, literature, music, nature, and other facets of a rounded, full, and creative life." In the interlude, however, he considers it dangerously hypocritical of us to condemn a small range of drugs while we enthusiastically drink, smoke, swallow, sniff or inject equally objectionable substances. Perhaps the most serious result of present drug controls, he feels, is that in the absence of aggrieved private complainants, the punitive laws will be enforced only by making us an oppressive society, featuring police spies and routine violations of our constitutional rights.

Fort's compendium of popular drugs provides an impressive setting against which we can measure the reasonableness of our current drug laws. In his list of socially approved substances are aspirin (responsible for thousands of deaths and illnesses each year, plus birth defects in lower animals); alcohol (which produces death from cirrhosis of the liver and psychosis from irreversible brain damage, and which has created more alcoholics in the metropolitan San Francisco area alone than there are narcotics addicts in the entire United States); nicotine (an $8-billion-a-year industry, directly responsible for the premature deaths of 125,000 Americans annually); caffeine, as found in coffee-tea-chocolate (which causes insomnia, restlessness, irritability, cardiac irregularity, perceptual disorders, tremors and accelerated breathing, and which can break chromosomes); tranquilizers (which cause many users to suffer from skin rash, light sensitivity, rigidity of the muscles, hepatitis and a robotization of their emotions and activity); and sedatives (which can lead to physical and emotional dependence, drowsiness, morning hangovers, and death from accidental or deliberate overdoses).

The moral of these homey illustrations is that any drug can be dangerous, depending on how much is used, how frequently, and with what degree of purity. Just as no drug is totally harmless, neither should any be labeled as uniformly and inevitably harmful. In Fort's formulation, we must think about drug use and abuse in multiple dimensions, considering the average dose compared to an excessive dose; the duration of drug action; the potential for dependence; the user's reasons for seeking the drug; the relation between long-term and short-term effects; the various concepts we employ, in the absence of drug use, to define normality and abnormality; and the best ways to regulate the different kinds of drugs and different kinds of users.

Of special importance are the concepts of "soft" drugs, "hard" drugs and the stepping stones that supposedly lie between them. In popular lore, as exemplified by Hooked!, a comic book now being distributed to youngsters by the National Institute of Mental Health and the U.S. Public Health Service, the older brother of the hero-victim has properly sounded the warning, "Eddie, I'm telling you . . . pot can lead you on to far more dangerous things." Sunk in adolescent depravity, Eddie answers, "Good! Anything's better than slaving your life away for nothing, like our old man did!" And, "a while later some guy showed us how to use 'H' . . . Heroin. We all started sniffing an' skin popping. It seemed like a real great kick for awhile. . . ." Until, finally, Eddie lies screaming, screaming, screaming for a shot he won't get. "It's torture, believe me!" he cries, and adds, "You know, some people call us junkies 'The Living Dead' . . . and I guess they're right."

Presumably, if we have absorbed the entire message from this tax-supported tract, a "soft" drug is one that is illegal (but readily available to back-alley, teenage gangs), gives the user such a feeling of "having a ball" that he has to drop out of school, and ultimately disappoints him so badly he corrupts himself permanently with a "hard" drug which destroys him through its (a) toxicity and (b) unavailability.

The actual practice, as Dr. Fort shows, is somewhat different, since people may move up and down or back and forth from "soft" to "hard" and back again, depending on the dimension of "hardness" used as a base line. Ninety-five to 100 per cent of addicts "used as their first potent mind-altering drugs alcohol and nicotine, both of them illegally in their early teens, with some of them later taking up marijuana and some who took up marijuana turning to heroin." If we wish to establish truth by sequence, he notes, we must seek a better common denominator than marijuana for all heroin users. An unbiased investigation would disclose that every present addict at one time in his life was dependent on milk, leaving us with no other recourse but to condemn mothers for giving them the original impetus that led to narcotics.

As to a concept of "hardness," Fort makes clear that all drug use can be dangerous but that primary villains depend on our attitudes rather than inherent properties in the various drugs. People may use a potentially "hard" drug, for example, in such a way that it never produces any hard effects on them. Heroin and other opiates are "hard" because they create addiction, or physical dependence, in ways similar to alcohol and barbiturate-sedatives. Yet heroin is "soft" because, unlike alcohol, it produces no permanent damage to the body even with decades of heavy use.

As for the relation of narcotics to crime, we know that drug users do commit anti-social acts (e.g., robbery, burglary, prostitution) to make sure that they have the drugs they want. To a majority of our public officials and editorial writers, these crimes prove that drug use is evil. To others, the real evil lies in government suppression of particular drugs that can then be obtained only by trafficking with criminals, and only after payment of higher prices than honest people can generally afford. Should we ask, "Would a heroin addict rob the neighborhood pharmacy at gunpoint if heroin were available on the same terms as Milltown or Jack Daniels?" While many people will insist, "Yes—because he's a bum," we should allow room for a more reasonable, contrary view. In summing up his chapter on hard drugs, crime and violence, Fort states:

> In all probability, sometimes mind-altering drugs, whether alcohol or others, will interact with a personality made prone to violence by social and psychological influences to precipitate or intensify violent behavior, while in other instances such a drug may well dampen the fires of violence through depressant actions, and reduce the likelihood of its being expressed antisocially.

The truth, dimly seen, is that we are what we are, bound to frustration if our greatest prospect for self-satisfaction is reliance on drugs for ourselves or, instead, on contempt for drugs, followed by punishment of all drug takers who seem to be having a better time than we are.

Fort's study gives added enforcement to the conclusion reached in Schur's Our Criminal Society that "crime in America will not be effectively reduced until we make basic changes in the structure and quality of American life." National goals of monetary success and comfortable living, based on wealth for all and special recognition for those whose adroit schemes reap great profits, will result in a working principle that, of all anti-social activity, the least excusable is remaining poor, the most impertinent is discrediting our current mythology.

Caveat Emptor

THE SELLING OF THE PRESIDENT. By Joe McGinniss. Trident Press. 253 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT MACNEIL
Mr. MacNeil is with the B.B.C. in London. He is the author of The People Machine (Harper & Row).

It is regrettable that Mr. McGinniss' book stops with the 1968 election. Readers may be lulled into thinking that the "selling" of Mr. Nixon ended with the inauguration. It did not. The men in charge of daily maintenance of Mr. Nixon's image in the White House are still hard at work constantly developing, retouching and trimming that image of the President which it is considered appropriate to project to the American public.

There is nothing essentially new in all this, any more than it is new these days for a Presidential candidate to mobilize the best resources of Madison Avenue to lubricate his journey to the White House. Presidents Kennedy and Johnson and their staffs often seemed to give as much thought to the image as to the accomplishments of their Presidencies. What is new with Mr. Nixon is the professional

TIME

In the Book of the Revolutions of Souls
Which we are now writing,
Willing or not.

Tell me, declare the phantom
Of your heart. The gods
Are all equal.

Every night, climbing
Out of that nothingness
Into that nothingness.

HARVEY SHAPIRO

caliber of the image manipulators who surround and envelop his Presidency as they did his campaign. What is also new is that they have in Mr. Nixon a subject amenable to this treatment; a man who understands perhaps better than any major American politician today that it is image as much as substance which wins mass support, and that image is so readily manipulable.

What Mr. McGinniss saw in the campaign, White House correspondents now observe in the Presidency. With one hand, McGinniss says, his advisers were trying to build the illusion that Nixon considered communicating with the people one of the great joys of seeking the Presidency; while with the other they shielded him, controlled him and even the atmosphere around him. "It was as if they were building not a Presidency but an Astrodome, where the wind would never blow, the temperature never rise or fall, and the ball never bounce erratically on the artificial grass," McGinniss says. (The Astrodome image became piercingly apt for that Saturday afternoon, November 15, when Mr. Nixon sat insulated from the reality of at least 250,000 peace marchers within sight of the White House, while he watched the Ohio State-Purdue football game and studiously pretended that the demonstrators did not exist on his planet.)

McGinniss' book is fascinating on two levels: it offers a glimpse into previously undocumented aspects of the complex Nixon personality and it unmasks with devastating effect the professional amorality of those who people so much of the communications industry, their efficient dedication to the master of the moment.

McGinniss finds a great deal about Nixon and the "men in short hair and dark suits who always followed him around" offensive to his aesthetic and moral sensibilities. He has the clear eyes of a young man (McGinniss is 25) uncorroded by the years of martinis and professional anxieties that caused so many middle-aged men (like Norman Mailer) to see in Richard Nixon the prosaic savior of the nation. McGinniss finds in Nixon's character, "Something which craved regulation, which flourished best in the darkness, behind clichés, behind phalanxes of antiseptic advisers." Nixon "could breathe freely only inside a hotel suite that cost a hundred dollars a day."

> Let's face it, a lot of people think Nixon is dull. They think he's a bore, a pain in the ass. They look at him as the kind of kid who always carried a bookbag. Who was forty-two years old the day he was born. They figure other kids got footballs for Christmas, Nixon got a briefcase and loved it. He'd always have his homework done and he'd never let you copy.

These are the words of Roger Ailes, the TV director who staged Nixon's regional discussion programs. He and other advisers whom McGinniss interviewed had much to confide about their problems of eradicating the Nixon image.

> Now you put him on television, you've got a problem right away. He's a funny-looking guy. He looks like somebody hung him in a closet overnight and he jumps out in the morning with his suit all bunched up and starts running around saying, "I want to be President." I mean this is how he strikes some people. That's why I think these shows are important. To make them forget all that.

It is difficult to believe that such an inspired description was not heartfelt, was not the speaker's own view. If it was, if he despised the man so, why was he using all his professional skills to make Nixon President of the United States, his United States?

Far from the Great Liberal Conspiracy Mr. Agnew sees in the communications establishment, what is much nearer the truth and really alarming is the kind of moral indifference which McGinniss captures in his study of these men working for Nixon: the utterly detached view of thousands of men whose business is communicating with their fellow citizens but whose interest in the content of what they are communicating is what it might be if they were broadcasting into an ant hill.

The advertising and television people in McGinniss' book are almost prototypes: Ailes, the imperious young TV director; Frank Shakespeare, the former C.B.S. executive with simplistic right-wing views; and Harry Treleaven, the advertising man with a passion for artificial flowers. "There was an artificial flower shop on the way," McGinniss says. "He would stop, whenever he had time and browse tenderly, as one might in a bookstore. What impressed him most, he said, was how skillfully something artificial could be made."

This is not a scholarly or even a carefully researched work. It is simply a reporting job and a somewhat impressionistic one at that. "Politics, in a sense," Mr. McGinniss says, "has always been a con game." So, apparently, was the leg work for his book. Much of it reads as if the people in Nixon's campaign either did not know, or had forgotten, that McGinniss intended to write it all down and even publish it. Under whatever guise the material was obtained, it is a devastating case history of what the wedding of mass-consumer television and political ambition has achieved.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Ronald Ribman's three one-act plays collectively entitled Passing Through Exotic Places (Sheridan Square Playhouse) might have been called "The Sins and Sorrows of the Middle Class." The intention is good; so too is much of the writing. We have it on the evidence of his previous play, Journey of the Fifth Horse, that Ribman is a thoughtful dramatist. Yet in the present work there is a flaw which is fatal.

The first panel of the triptych contains an element of suspense which is sustained almost to its end but then disappoints. It opens at three in the morning with a smartly dressed character entering the home of a respectable married couple somewhere in the suburbs and being suspected of burglary. The householder, Charles Ferris, points a gun at the intruder and Mrs. Ferris insists that her husband call the police. Being a reasonable person, Ferris is willing to listen to the accused man, Sweeny, who assures Ferris that having drunk too much at a party he has entered the house by mistake—all the houses in the vicinity look alike. Ferris is convinced.

After a bit, however, it becomes evi-

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

dent that Sweeny is lying. Once again he is threatened with arrest. Sweeny, cool and adept, begins telling another tale—more pathetic this time—about the reasons for his being so distraught. Ferris now not only believes Sweeny innocent but pitiable. Yet each time he relents Ferris discovers that he has been hoodwinked. The last of Sweeny's explanations is so heartrending—Ferris' natural compassion is enhanced by the fact that his own son was killed riding a motorcycle—that Ferris offers him a job in his business. But Sweeny is still lying.

Now Sweeny admits that he is a gambler, a crook, a high-wide-and-handsome criminal. What has made him so? He could believe in nothing after he had come back from the war in Vietnam. He is now bent on exploiting to the full such men as Ferris whose stupid lethargy made it possible for the war to happen. He taunts Ferris with a final challenge: "Why did your son kill himself on a motorcycle?" Ferris shoots Sweeny.

From this we are to understand that (a) the immorality of the younger generation is caused by the lack of real values in the older; and (b) that the latter, secretly disturbed by the accusation, retaliates in violence against the young.

But why, to begin with, does Sweeny keep on talking when he has several opportunities to walk out of the house unharmed? More important, since Sweeny has never at any point uttered anything but lies, why should we believe his final story, that he is a Vietnamese War veteran? And further—but wait: these faults are a symptom of something unacceptable in the basic premise throughout.

The second variation on the main theme takes place on a faraway island where the first white people to set foot are a man and a woman from the Peace Corps. When the play opens a young fellow, fresh out of college and just arrived to take up his Peace Corps duties on the island, encounters a well-dressed black sitting on the terrace of the property of Mr. Shawcross and his wife, who are about to leave for the States at the completion of their assignment.

The new arrival, middle-class, Jewish, is an idealist of the purest strain (in fact, he is something of an idiot), eager to bring the benefits of civilization to the underdeveloped region. The educated black warns him that the natives are content to be what and as they are. After the black disappears into the house, Mr. and Mrs. Shawcross appear. The man is depicted as an old-time Southern plantation overseer, and his wife as a bitchy flirt. They advise the newcomer that the feckless innocence and inferior minds of the natives impede their will to work so that the Shawcrosses have had to grow cotton by their own efforts: the natives did nothing but sit by and watch.

Then a ragged servant appears—the obsequious black of ancient myth—but he is none other than the educated fellow we saw at the opening, now in convenient disguise. Shawcross points to this cringing moron as an example to his "liberal" successor. When the Shawcrosses depart and the new man is left alone he hesitatingly begins to order the servant about somewhat in the Shawcross manner.

The symbolism (through stylization) is unmistakable. So much so that nothing is credible except as "symbol." The Peace Corps is equated with feeble white liberalism. Its representative desires to escape his Jewish and middle-class inferiority (or guilt) complex. Furthermore, blacks anywhere, everywhere abhor the aid of whites who insist on changing or "improving" them. They therefore fox their would-be benefactors when they do not kill them.

The last piece simply shows a poor Italian barber, ignorant, obtuse, racially prejudiced and stubborn—the lowest rung of the middle class—bemoaning the death of his son in the Vietnamese War. He grieves insanely over his past error in refusing to let his son go to college, but he will never change.

What is wrong in these plays is that they are based on assumptions that we are supposed to accept at face value because they have been pronounced axio-

TWO GREETINGS FOR THE END OF A DECADE

1. Christmas

What a blindness squinnied at the window.
All blear, the forsaken bay of snow gone blind, O
Blind in dusk. Zero, even zero, was lost
As I watched world's ghost sieved through world's ghost.
Sun, moon were comeless. Then in the blur
Of blind I saw a deeper blindness, the stir
Of void in void, and then a ripple-riddle
Of shadow no darker than the churn of petals
In the heart of white peonies. Still, taking, striking form
Until it stood in a sudden garden, a great white swan
Among snow and trees. This is the bird that must rise
From the cold seething of hope long gone.
But trust it: where it turns, there the true north lies.

2. New Year's Day

A few days more and I shall tear
The last sheet from a calendar
Whose pretty scenes, one by one—
A lenten rose in snow, Taos in sun,
The Golden Gate Bridge filtered from haze—
I crumpled and in their place
Stared into being a scene
Of snow on a raped girl's eyes, sunlight on a gun,
Ravines in Kentucky stuffed with rusting cars.
What scene now to end this calendar?

No bitter picture comes, only a story told Me of a boy who found a not quite cold
Sparrow's egg on the black sill
Outside his window and taped it in his navel till
It hatched. I see him big boned, afraid,
As, giving up his sex, he watches, lying in bed,
The shell crack in that mother-place
Of his body. With him I gaze
Like a mother into the bare lizard face
That, crutched up on naked wings, stares
Back with the neutrality of survivors over the dinosaurs
From all history's bottomless calendar.

RADCLIFFE SQUIRES

matic by the New Left en bloc. They are belied when they are presented in images none of which is in the least convincing in its own sphere. "Revolutionaries" have their own clichés no less empty than those of the flag-waving era. It is not that they are ideologically false but that they are arrived at mechanically, not lived through. They emerge as raw editorializing—sometimes cartoon clever —without self-supporting substance.

I have gone into so much detail in this instance because Ribman, among the better new dramatists, exemplifies what is their cardinal error: they too often write what they believe should be written, not what their experience enables them to write. Their work is well meant but generally factitious, "deserving" rather than sound.

Passing Through Exotic Places is well acted by Vincent Gardenia who has honesty and Italianate fire, by Robert Loggia who is forcefully direct and has a good sense of characterization, and by Tresa Hughes whose simplicity is always telling.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Photography has been credited with the destruction, or at least the outdating of, realist painting; the argument was usually the utilitarian one, why do it by hand when the camera is quicker and more accurate? When that came to seem not quite true, it was reckoned that the camera must, at least, have wiped out narrative painting. Thus television commercials took the place of genre painting. These crudely evolutionary views usually originated with the supporters of nonfigurative art, among them Malevich, and despite their pleasant simplicity are fallacious. The ideas suffer from a Marshall McLuhan kind of error which assumes that the addition of a new channel to society's switchboard precipitates Darwinian furor. In fact, the record of the 20th century is that switchboards grow and the number of channels increases; new channels do not drive out their predecessors like old apes. Since the absolute imitation of appearances is impossible, owing to differences in perception and to the problems of translating a three-dimensional world onto a two-dimensional surface, there can, in fact, be no contest.

The point is made evident in the exhibition, "Paintings from the Photo," at the Riverside Museum (310 Riverside Drive; through February 15). The show has as its subject the use of photographs by painters in the context of hand-done art. There are six artists (Harold Bruder, Richard Estes, Audrey Flack, Howard Kanowitz, Malcolm Morley, Joseph Raffael) with one omission that I regret (Richard Artswager) and one that I am grateful for (Lowell Nesbitt). Oriole Farb, director of the museum, has rightly excluded both collages of photographic bits and silk-screen paintings on which half-tone reproductions are printed on canvas (Rauschenberg and Warhol). Her theme is the incorporation of photographic sources into the textures of painting done, and subtly, by hand.

The photograph is the most direct code for objects and events that we have, and though it is true that the camera distorts and photographs lie, it has a particular evidential value. The visual cues of photographs are firmly ingrained in our perception as the most iconic form of representation. Iconicity means one-to-one relationship between signs and the objects they refer to; even the blurs and distortions of photography have come to resemble a texture of truth. Painters who use photographs as sources take possession not of a more truthful medium than their own but of another medium, with different conventions entirely. None of these artists is concerned with motion or aerial photography; they are using still photographs of high iconicity. Sometimes it is fidelity to subject matter that is operative, as in Bruder, but it can also be fidelity to the encoded forms of photography itself, with subject matter taking second place, as in Morley. Estes uses photography as an aide-mémoire to get his shiny urban surfaces right, and Kanowitz uses it to catch informal poses and simulates its grainy surfaces.

Harold Bruder paints indoor and outdoor subjects; in both he uses photos, but with opposed results. The landscapes with figures smaller than life are derived from numerous photos taken by the artist and used like a mosaic to build the painting. He takes advantage of the camera's power to arrest chance conjunctions of forms and makes these accidents suspenseful. Soft-edged, grayed, hazy, his outdoor scenes convey the scatter and inattentions of life delicately poised. He has successfully extended a subdued realist style in the direction of accidental grouping and gesture. In addition, there are greatly enlarged children's heads, but in these he has not found a way of drawing that can keep pace with the dilated photographic image. Joseph Raffael in his new paintings, however, has succeeded in blowing up photographic sources to a prodigious scale.

The four paintings by Raffael, done this year and last, are impressive and their originality might be indicated by reference to his earlier works. These usually consisted of details of people, animals, objects and landscapes, taken from magazines, each one isolated on the bright white canvas; the archipelago of images seemed linked, but in a buried way. This was, so to say, painting by clues, an array of inexplicit but coherent fragments. His new paintings are still photo-derived but his method of working is quite different: he represents objects, one at a time, in close-up, on large canvases. There is an irrational wholeness now about each huge and lustrous image. Three of the paintings are of the heads of works of art and Raffael turns the fancy, gift-book lighting of his sources into a dense radiance. At a time when paintings tend to be high-keyed transcriptions of the full range of light and shadow, he has adopted a wide scale of values from cloacal darks to feverish whites and made it work by sheer intensity and insistence.

Malcolm Morley is represented by paintings of the last four years, starting with a small oil sketch, 1965, for one of his ocean liner paintings, "Christopher Columbus" (the final work is also in the show). One of his first large figure compositions is here, "Ship's Dinner Party" of 1966 and, from this year, there are two new paintings. One is a portrait group, "Central Park," presumably taken from a commissioned photograph as were earlier portraits by Morley; and the other, "Chateau," is the first of a projected series of paintings of romantic architecture from postcards. Morley's handling of paint combines a dead-pan fidelity to his source and a certain extra juice that comes from the difference between paint and printer's ink. Also, Morley's hand intervenes and, even when feigning obedience, he has one of the most educated hands in the city. The difference of source and painting mounts as Morley's fidelity increases. A part of his strategy is not to take the dense painted image to the borders of the canvas; the white margin asserts the constituent substance of the canvas on which the image sits. (Edge-to-edge images that cover the whole canvas become more simply like their sources and lose some of the ambiguity that the margin supports.)

The trouble with Audrey Flack, compared to Morley, is the expedient way she uses photographs. She writes in the catalogue that they give her access to subjects about which she would otherwise be ignorant, but she shows no interest in the visual data of her sources. All she wants are the nuns in marches and Mexican workers as subjects; her transcriptions of the source photographs turn them into coarsely monochromatic naturalistic painting. In her most recent piece, "War Protest March," she has sharpened and intensified her touch, getting away from her usual loose drags and ridges of paint. She has stopped her image before hitting the edges and framed it by a narrow red-and-blue border, presumably as a result of the example of Morley's "Marine at Valley Forge."

There are two things that painters can do with photos in their work and here she has begun to do them. Photographic references both intensify illusion and affirm artificiality. This interplay of accurate reference and syntactic curiosity occurs because the camera provides both a direct record and a distorting one. It is the absorbing theme of this show that reality and artificiality are bound together in complexities that invalidate thoroughly the old forms of the art/photography discussion.

Howard Kanowitz is the only one in this show to be involved in all-out illusionism. His cut-out figures, grayed with the indeterminate tones of interior light, the same size as life, mingle obtrusively with visitors. Oriole Farb has the center section of last year's "The People" and it looks fine, at one moment fading into the crowd, the next moment slicing through it in a cutting edge of artifice. It is shown at the Riverside out in the open in a clear diffuse light. This direct presentation should be a lesson to the Waddell Gallery where Kanowitz shows and where his work is always grossly overdramatized. His new work is a series of painted cut-outs of college basketball stars done with a stunning illusionism that swings these under-life-size figures into zippy motion. The risk of quotation paintings from photographs, as you maintain the play of artifice and iconicity (part to the subject, part to the channel), is virtuosity and the risk is out in the open in Kanowitz, whereas Morley and Raffael avoid it. Raffael's "Judy and Me Dancing," for example, at the Riverside is a tour de force, but a tough not a showy one.

PUBLICATIONS

OKLAHOMA LIMITED, Southwestern political opinion. Published monthly. $5.00 per year. Box 2777N, Norman, Oklahoma 73069

AN AMAZING JOURNEY into the world of books. Thousands of out-of-print and forgotten works now beautifully reprinted and available. Send for free 140 page catalogue. Johnson Reprint Corporation, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10003.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 12-29-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State ..... Zip No. .....

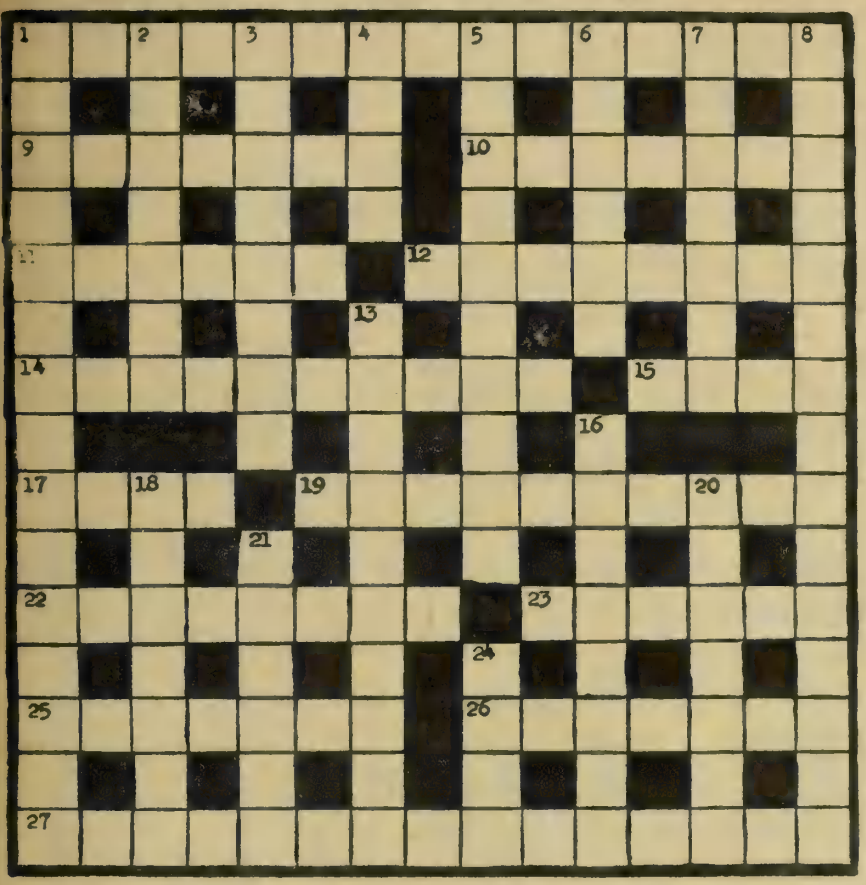
FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

I never read Horace McCoy's novel, but I can remember the Depression and I can see that They Shoot Horses, Don't They? must have been an acrid tract for those years. Unemployment was the pollution of Herbert Hoover's America, and it degraded people in grotesque and terrible ways. They Shoot Horses, which is the account of a dance marathon, is an example of what that degradation looked like.

What isn't clear to me, on the basis of the film adaptation, is how McCoy could have stretched this bitter anecdote to the length of a novel; there is not nearly enough material here for a movie. The characters are defined by their initial appearances, the situation is precisely what it appears to be, the comment is complete in the title. You know from the first moments that, over a period of several weeks, fifty or more couples will dance themselves into a torment of exhaustion for the mirage of "1,500 silver dollars," and for two hours you watch them do so. It is an appalling spectacle, but one that provides no development from its premises.

Faced thus with a tableau of catastrophe, I become uncomfortably aware of myself as gaping. My interest in these people is not solicited on any ground other than their desperation; it is like reading of trapped miners or running to the scene of an accident. The voyeur mood is engendered also because McCoy's story does not hit contemporary nerves. In this it fares less well than Bonnie and Clyde which, for all its period lithography, played variations on matters of identity and estrangement of which our own period knows its versions. The clammy terror of a whole nation gone broke has no contemporary parallels; we have not ended poverty, but we have driven it off the main avenues of our society (how we did that is another matter) and Brother, Can You Spare a Dime? is a song without echoes. Dance marathons staged for an audience obscenely comforted by the fact that it can afford two bits to watch people more miserable than itself is not part of our moral squalor. (It is true that the impresario of McCoy's bear pit takes great pains to maintain the credibility of his enterprise, but it would be straining, I think, to draw comparisons with the techniques of present-day government.)



Sydney Pollack, the director, brings the machinery of They Shoot Horses so excruciatingly to life that you can smell the sweaty dust of the ocean-side dance hall. His cameras are relentless in the too bright light of the too noisy ballroom, and the endurance grind becomes a hellish merry-go-round that is physically exhausting to watch.

The actors are also on their own particular merry-go-rounds, each assigned an identifying characteristic and told to display it whenever the action comes his way. And that becomes dramatically exhausting. The principals are Jane Fonda, Michael Sarrazin, Susannah York, Gig Young and Red Buttons, and again on a mechanical level, they are all admirably convincing—precisely what old files of Life will assure you they ought to be. However, there is a disconcerting aspect to their direction. Seen on the dance floor to be alarmingly near coma, they experience a kind of instant recuperation during their ten-minute rest periods whenever the plot gives them assignments to carry out. To be sure, the assignments are not very long or very complex, but it is startling to discover that these somnambulists can exchange crisp dialogue when the plot calls for it.

And I wonder whether McCoy made it plausible that a single dance contest should have been the occasion of a death by heart failure, two attacks of lunacy (one perhaps permanent) and a mercy killing (that bit about shooting horses). On the screen, the succession seems a little excessive, like the parade of disasters in a temperance pamphlet. The effect of horror—and dance marathons were authentically horrible—is weakened by the addition of melodrama. It relieves the coldness.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1327

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Seeking to verify the story of what you might draw on? (8,7)
9 Straightens up and then relaxes a little? (7)
10 Increases the yen for a big roll, possibly. (7)
11 Pitched so as to make a naval-type color? (6)
12 And others just use the first three letters for it? (2,6)
14 Mary Foster pearls from one are unlikely. (6,4)
15 It's a place in Italy, obviously, or was in the Borgias' time. (4)
17 Fundamentally a statesman? (4)
19 Possible threat, most likely to affect your heating system? (10)
22 A good starting place to look for fish or fowl. (8)
23 City to run around in, particularly for a dramatist. (6)
25 Such sins are reminiscent of Portia's waiting-maid. (7)
26 Might prove a drain to Venezuela. (7)
27 You might find those engaged in it trying, in practice. (15)

DOWN

1 Take into consideration your altered appearance, as a sign of small business, perhaps. (5,4,6)
2 Boards made from the type around the outside of the tree. (7)
3 Maine flower, much shorter than 26. (8)
4 Fitting things like tables and trays might.
5 Do they indulge in other than strictly legal affairs? (10)
6 One may hand out parts useful for furniture on the coast. (6)
7 If one does, the wind-up might have to come later. (7)
8 Does it have selenographic features? (3,3,2,3,4)
13 See 24 down
16 Animal so wild as to be pictured as famous. (4,4)
18 Rock, perhaps, cut better than anyone else could do it! (7)
20 A place to stumble on an oil-gusher? (7)
21 Does he pursue one drink after another?
24 and 13 Real, as an obvious example. (4,2,3,5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1326

ACROSS: 1 Commensurable; 9 Naked; 10 Decollate; 11 and 12 Express purpose; 13 Peals; 14 Truncheon; 16 Reexamine; 18 Negev; 19 Rubbish; 21 Camphor; 22 Educators; 23 Delta; 24 Overexercised. DOWN: 1 Contemporaries; 2 Makepeace; 3 Endless; 4 Sides; 5 Recapture; 6 Baldric; 7 Erato; 8 Never-never land; 14 Thigh bone; 15 Eggshells; 17 Animate; 18 Nomadic; 20 Bruno; 21 Caste.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

MUSIC

RECORDER, VIOL DA GAMA MUSIC. Write for free current listings. Provincetown Bookshop, 246 Commercial St., Provincetown, Mass. 02657.

FREE 48 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING can be pleasant. Call LAKETON VANS. Licensed, insured, reliable. Low Rates. (212) 672-5092.

BOOK PRINTING — Paperbacks, hardcover, pamphlets. As few as 200 copies. Quality printing at Budget Prices. Free details. Box 285N, Floral Park, N.Y 11001

WELL-KNOWN BOOK REVIEWER: Publishers' reader; reviews—revises manuscripts in French and English. Box 632, c/o The Nation.

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WRITING, EDITING, RESEARCH by published writer, Contemporary Authors and Who's Who biographee, free-lance basis. Moderate fees. Box 633, c/o The Nation.

PERSONALS

MEXICAN IMPORTS
at warehouse prices
SPECTRUM IMPORTS, INC.
2121 Broadway (74-75) NYC
3rd floor; 362-8000
paper flowers, wrought iron, glassware, jewelry, huarache sandals, lanterns, tinware, hand-loomed ponchos, shawls, serapes, rugs, toys, pottery, etc.
Daily 10-7 Saturday 11-5

CARTOONS WANTED. Original drawings of Masses, New Masses, Liberator artists. Will purchase single drawings or complete collections. Send details to: Box 182, Durham, Penna. 18039.

POSTERS (over 200, many anti-war), BUTTONS (over 200), BUMPERSTICKERS, PEACE JEWELRY AND EARRINGS. Wholesale and retail. Free catalogue. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission St., San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

50% MORE PEOPLE IN THE U.S. IN THIRTY YEARS? YES — if the present birth rate does not change. Zero Population Growth, Inc., 367 State St., Los Altos, Calif. 94022

Re: my Chicago novel HOGBUTCHERS, FOUR DOZEN, NEAR NORTH: Agent says: Title would scare off book-buyers. Request readers write me whether or not that title alone might keep them from buying the novel. FELIX SINGER, 3023 Clifton, Chicago, Ill.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Forget Someone?

Did you forget a friend or relative in the gift-giving rush this year? Or did you just not have enough time to do all your shopping in time for the holidays?

If you are still wondering what to send your friends and family this holiday season, why not consider giving The NATION? A gift subscription would bring information and reading pleasure throughout the coming year. And our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one.

In an age when the Vice President appears to be threatening the news media, your friends will appreciate receiving The NATION, a magazine dedicated to speaking its mind. So use the coupon below to place your orders now. If you do, we will send THE AGE OF PROTEST, edited by Walt Anderson, as our holiday gift to you. And to all our friends and readers, The NATION sends its best wishes for the coming year.

clip & mail

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY ..... STATE ..... ZIP .....

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free THE AGE OF PROTEST. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....
zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N 12-29